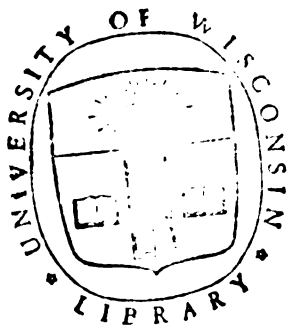
This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

Google™ books

https://books.google.com



This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

Google™ books

https://books.google.com

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

SUPPLEMENT TO THE ACADEMY.
11 January, 1902.

The Academy

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE & LIFE.

JULY — DECEMBER,

1901.

WISCONSIN
HISTORICAL SOCIETY

VOLUME LXI.

PUBLISHING OFFICE: 43, CHANCERY LANE, LONDON, W.C.

1901.

Digitized by Google

116,612

LONDON:
PRINTED BY CLEMENT'S PRINTING WORKS, LTD.,
NEWSPAPER BUILDINGS,
PORTUGAL STREET, STRAND, W.C.

WISCONSIN
HISTORICAL SOCIETY

Digitized by Google

AP
A164
A-43
61

873771
JUL 12 1954

CONTENTS OF VOLUME LXI.

LITERATURE.

REVIEWS.

PAGE

Abelard and Heloise, The Love-Letters of 107
Adams's (D. C. O.) The Saints and Missionaries of the Anglo-Saxon Era 192
——— (J.) edition of German, "Self-Education" Series 221
Addis's (M. E. Leicester), Scottish Cathedrals and Abbeys 633
Addo's (F. G.) Sea Coast and Fishing 286
Ainsworth's (Harrison) Windsor Castle. New ed. 408
Aitken's (G. A.) edition of Swift's The Journal of Stella 70
Alfred, Was He King of England? By A Saxon 238
Allen's (Phœbe) Playing at Botany 132
——— (James Lane) A Kentucky Cardinal .. 260
Animals, Living, of the World, The 613
Apperson's (G. L.) The Idler's Calendar 460
Archer's (William) Poets of the Younger Generation 363
Armstrong's (Sir Walter) Sir Henry Raeburn .. 545
Arnold-Foster's (E. P.) translation of The Poems of Schiller 259
Austin's (Alfred) Alfred the Great 258
Bagot's (Mrs. Charles) Links with the Past .. 407
Baillie's (Alexander F.) The Oriental Club and Hanover Square 610
Balfour's (Graham) Life of Robert Louis Stevenson 378
Ball's (W. W. Rouse) History of Mathematics .. 222
Bardsley's (Canon) Dictionary of English and Welsh Surnames 155
Baring-Gould's (S.) A Book of Brittany 150
Barlow's (Jane) Ghost-Bereft 612
Bates's (Percy) The English Pre-Raphaelite Painters 360
Bayfield's (M. A.) Electra of Sophokles 222
Beavan's (Arthur H.) Imperial London 51
Beckett's (Reginald A.) Romantic Essex 108
Begbie & Gould's Great Men 32
Begbie's (Lionel F.) Boshtan Ballads 257
Bellloc-Lowndes's (Mrs.) His Most Gracious Majesty King Edward VII. 132
Benham & Welch's Mediæval London 505
Berenson's (Bernard) The Study and Criticism of Italian Art 283
Beresford's (R.) First Latin Reader 221
Besant's (Sir Walter) The Story of King Alfred .. 238
Birrell's Miscellanies 565
Bjor son's (Björnstjerne) Laboremus; A Play in Three Acts 11
Boas's (Prof. F. S.) edition of The Works of Thomas Kyd 403
Bockett's (F. W.) Literary Landmarks for Pilgrims on Wheels 131
Books, Christmas 545-550
—— for Children 550-554
—— for Boys and Girls 555-559
Botsford's (Dr. George Willis) History of Rome .. 216
Bournes' (George) The Bettesworth Book 501
Bradley's (A. C.) Commentary on Tennyson's "In Memoriam" 128
——— (A. G.) Highways and Byways in the Lake District 341
Brandes' (George) Main Currents in Nineteenth Century Literature 47
Brown's (J.) Livy, Book I., and The Gallic War, Book V. 221
Browning's (Mrs.) Casa Guidi Windows 345
"Brown Linnet's" Widow Wiley and Some Other Old Folk 481
Buchanan's (Robert) Complete Poetical Works .. 384
Bullen's (F. T.) Deep Sea Plunderings 408
Butler's (Samuel) Erewhon; or, Over the Range 424
——— Erewhon Revisited: Twenty Years Later 424
Calverley, Charles Stuart, The Complete Works of 28
Campbell's (Roderick) The Father of St. Kilda .. 171

REVIEWS—continued.

PAGE

Carr's (Kent) Miss Marie Corelli 191
Cassell's Social England 506
Cawein (Madison) Weeds by the Wall and One Day and Another 379
Chesterton's (G. K.) The De endant 509
Chevalier's (Albert) Before I Forget 599
Cheyney's (Prof. Edward P.) Introduction to the Industrial and Social History of England .. 218
Cholmeley's (R. J.) Theocritus 222
Clark's (John Willis) The Care of Books 460
Clarke & Murray's School Grammar of Modern French 220
Colvile's (Sir H. E.) The Work of the Ninth Division 92
Conway's (Sir Martin) The Bolivian Andes .. 12
——— (R. S.) Livy: Book II. 221
Cook's (E. T.) Rights and Wrongs of the Transvaal War 12
——— Popular Handbook to the National Gallery 286
——— (Theodore Andrea) Anthology of Humorous Verse 611
Cope's (E. M.), translation of Tschudi's Elizabeth, Empress of Austria 210
Cornish's (F. Warre) Chivalry 506
Corstorphine's (H.) edition of Woodstock .. 218
Cotterill's (H. B.) The Æneid of Virgil, Book VI. 221
Country Life 241
Cowan's (Samuel) Mary, Queen of Scots 207
Crane's (Stephen) Great Battles of the World .. 53
Crawford's (W. S.) Synesius the Hellene 360
Creighton's (Dr. Mandell) The Church and the Nation 507
Crofton's (Mrs. Caldwell) From the Heart of the Rose 340
Crowley's (Aleister) The Mother's Tragedy .. 379
Crozier's (Dr. John Beattie) History of Intellectual Development 236
Cruickshank's (J. W. & A. M.) The Umbrian Towns 259
D'Annunzio's (Gabriele) Gioconda 336
Davidson's (John) The Testament of a Man Forbid 240
Davies's (E. S.) edition of Kenilworth 218
Day's (Rev. Edward) The Social Life of the Hebrews 88
Deane's (Anthony C.) Little Book of Light Verse 488
De Fleury's (Dr. Maurice) The Criminal Mind .. 335
Devonshire's (Mrs. R. L.) translation of Vallery Radot's Life of Pasteur 455
De Windt's (Harry) Finland As It Is 540
Dick's (Cotsford) Society Snapshots 588
Dickeon's (H. K.) Sir Robert Murdoch Smith .. 460
Dilke's (Lady) French Furniture and Decoration in the XVIIIth Century 547
Dodge's (W. P.) From Squire to Prince 151
Du Chaillu's (Paul) The World of the Great Forest 358
Duguid's (Charles) The Story of the Stock Exchange 9
Du Pontet's (R. L. A.) edition of Morceaux Choisis 220
——— (C.) Cæsar: Gallic War, Books VI. and VII. 221
Duttons, of Dutton in Cheshire, Memorials of the 52
"Edinburgh Waverley," The 33
Elia, the Essays of 503
Ellis's (Havelock) The Criminal 383
Elson's (Louis C.) Shakespeare in Music 506
Empire, The Heart of the 8
"Englishmen, Famous" 220
Ethe idge's (W. G.) German Unseens 221
Evered's (Philip) Stag-hunting with the Devon and Somerset 482
Fawcett's (Mrs.) Life of Sir William Molesworth 587
Fea's (Allan) Secret Chambers and Hiding Places 29
——— King Monmouth 358
Festing's (Gabrielle) Unstoried in History .. 286

REVIEWS—continued.

PAGE

Fielding's (H.) The Hearts of Men 281
Finnemore's (John) Alfred to Elizabeth 220
Fitchett's (W. H.) The Tale of the Great Mutiny 459
Fitzgerald's (Joseph) Word and Phrase: True and False Use in English 387
Fletcher's (Ernest) edition of Conversations of James Northcote, R.A., with James Ward .. 377
Forsyth's (P. T.) Religion in Recent Art 613
Foster's (William) edition of Letters Received by the East India Company 90
——— (Joseph) Some Feudal Coats of Arms .. 504
Fountain's (Paul) The Great Deserts and Forests of North America 460
Fourier, Selections from the Works of 382
Froude's (James Anthony) English Seamen in the Sixteenth Century 111
Furnivall's (Dr.) edition of Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare 548
Gardner's (Prof. Percy) Historic View of the New Testament 630
Garnett's (Richard) Essays of an Ex-Librarian .. 404
Gase's Concise French Dictionary 221
Geikie's (Cunningham) The Vicar and His Friends 406
Gerard's (Frances) Wagner, Bayreuth, and the Festival Plays 52
Gibson's (M. D.) edition and translation of Studia Sinaitica 93
——— (Edgar C. S.) John Howard 500
Gilbert-Smith's (Ernest) The Story of Bruges .. 89
Gillie's (R. C.) The Story of Stories 548
Gleyer's (Terrot Reaveley) Life and Letters in the Fourth Century 608
Godley's (A. D.) The Fables of Orbilius 221
Goodwin's (W. W.) Demosthenes: De Corona .. 222
Gorst's (Harold) The Curse of Education 30
Gosse's (Edmund) Hypolympia 426
Graham's (R. B. Cunninghame) A Vanished Arcadia 255
——— (Rose) S. Gilbert of Sempringham and the Gilbertines 189
Gray's (Prof. Andrew) Treatise on Physics 222
——— (John Alfred) At the Court of the Amir .. 502
Green's (Kathleen Haydn) Twelve Allegories .. 10
——— (Dr. Samuel G.) Handbook to Old Testament Hebrew 89
Greenidge's (A. H. J.) Roman Public Life .. 216
Gregory's (Eleanor C.) Christian Mysticism .. 132
Grein's (J. T.) Premières of the Year 32
Gribble's Lake Geneva and its Literary Landmarks 35
Griffith's (George) In an Unknown Prison Land 505
Gruggen & Keating's Stonyhurst 217
Gurney's (Mrs. Gerald) The Childhood of Queen Victoria 260
Haggard's (H. Rider) A Winter Pilgrimage .. 339
Hall & Osborne's Sunshine and Surf 590
Hall's (Mrs. Maud R.) English Church Needlework 384
——— (H. R.) The Oldest Civilisation of Greece .. 31
Hallett's (Cecil) The Cathedral Church of Ripon 260
Hamilton's (Cosmo) Impertinent Dialogues .. 33
——— (Col. H. B.) Historical Record of the 11th (King's) Hussars 591
Hankin's (St. John) Mr. Punch's Dramatic Sequels 503
Hardy's (Thomas) Poems of the Past and the Present 475
Hare's (Augustus) Walks in London 135
Harper's (Henry A.) An Artist's Walks in Bible Lands 341
Harrison's (Frederic) George Washington and Other American Addresses 458
Harrow School Register, The 53
Hart's (Bushnell) American History Told by Contemporaries 408
Hasluck's (Paul N.) edition of Practical Draughtsmen's Work 224

Digitized by Google

REVIEWS—continued.

PAGE

Hawkins & Smith's The Story of Alfred the Great .. 238
Hayden's (E. G.) Travels Round Our Village .. 460
Helmholtz's (H. F.) edition of The World's History .. 590
Henderson's (John B., jun.) American Diplomatic Questions .. 152
Hendry's (W. E.) Hawthorn and Lavender, &c. 584
Henley & Henderson's edition of The Poetry of Robert Burns .. 360
Hinde's (Mr. & Mrs.) The Last of the Masai .. 383
Hirsch's (Max) Democracy versus Socialism .. 152
Hoernes's (Dr. Moritz) Primitive Man .. 112
Hole's (Dean) Then and Now .. 458
Holland's (O.) translation of Demosthenes: Olynthiacs and Philippics .. 222
Hollander's (Dr. Bernard) The Mental Functions of the Brain .. 589
Holmes's (Edmond) Walt Whitman's Poetry .. 511
Hope & Browne's School Hygiene .. 217
Hughes's (Rev. Hugh Price) The Morning Lands of History .. 507
Hurd's (Archibald S.) How Our Navy is Run .. 340
Hutchinson's (Horace G.) Dreams and Their Meanings .. 499
Hutton's (Edward) edition of The English Poems of Richard Crashaw .. 607
Ilchester's (Countess) & Stavordale's (Lord) edition of The Life and Letters of Lady Sarah Lennox .. 456
Ingelow, Jean, and Her Early Friends, Some Recollections of .. 360
Ingram's (John K.) translation of Passages from the Letters of Auguste Comte .. 256
Innes's (A. D.) edition of Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Keats: Selections .. 218
Iredale's (Andrew) An Autumn Tour in the United States and Canada .. 152
Island, Desert, An Episode on a. By the author of Miss Molly. .. 209
Jackson's (T. C.) The Preceptor's Book-keeping 224
Jaeger's (Henrik) Henrik Ibsen .. 628
Jebb's (Sir Richard) Modern Greece .. 127
Jeffrey's (P. S.) edition of Patrice's Au Pôle en Ballon .. 220
Jerrold's (Walter) Surrey .. 92
Jessopp's (Dr. Augustus) Before the Great Pillage 149
Joachim's (Harold H.) A Study of the Ethics of Spinoza .. 500
Julian's (Lady) Revelations of Divine Love .. 110
Kenyon's (C. Fred) Hall Caine .. 632
Kerr's (Lady Amabel) A Saint of the Oratory .. 151
Kipling's (Rudyard) Kim .. 289
Knight's (James) The Self-Educator in Chemistry 222
Knowles's (F.) translation of Rooses' Dutch Painters .. 547
Komensky's The Labyrinth of the World .. 68
Kristeller's (Paul) Andrea Mantegna .. 406
Lang's (Andrew) Magic and Religion .. 27
——— The Mystery of Mary Stuart .. 381
——— ——— Alfred Tennyson .. 480
Leathes-Culley's (Mrs. J. D.) On the Warpath .. 89
Leavenworth's (Charles S.) The "Arrow" War with China .. 269
Lee's (Elizabeth) The George Eliot Reader .. 218
Lehmann's (R. C.) The Adventures of Picklock Holes .. 460
Leighton's (Dr. Gerald R.) The Life History of British Serpents .. 235
Liberty's (Arthur Lasenby) Springtime in the Basque Mountains .. 73
Liddell's (Mark H.) edition of Chaucer .. 218
"Linesman's" Words by an Eye-witness: The Struggle in Natal .. 479
Loftie's (W. J.) London Afternoons .. 505
London, Lists of the Streets and Places in the County of .. 346
Lorimer's (Norma) By the Waters of Sicily .. 426
Lorne's (Marquis of) Life and Reign of Queen Victoria .. 589
Lounsberry's (G. Constant), An Iseult Idyll, and other Poems .. 286
Lucas's (C. P.) Historical Geography of the British Colonies .. 91
Lucilla, Songs of .. 48
Lützow's (Count) translation of Komensky's The Labyrinth of the World .. 68
Macaulay's (G. C.) edition of Works of John Gower .. 67
Mackie's (Gascoigne) The Man of Kerioth .. 48
Macmechan's (Archibald) The Porter of Bagdad and Other Fantasies .. 152
Maeterlinck's (Maurice) Théâtre, Sœur Béatrice, and Ariane et Barbe Bleu .. 537
Markham's (Christopher A.) The Stone Crosses of the County of Northampton .. 173
Marshall's (R.) His Excellency the Governor .. 171
Martyn's (Edward) The Tale of a Town and The Enchanted Sea .. 540
Mason's (R. Osgood) Hypnotism and Suggestion 355
Maude's (Aylmer) Tolstoy and His Problems .. 612
Maynadier's (G. H.) The Wife of Bath's Tale .. 13
McCarthy's History of the Four Georges and of William IV. .. 109
McCrindle's (J. W.) Ancient India .. 112
McCurdy's (James Frederick) History, Prophecy, and the Monuments .. 88
McHugh's John Henry .. 117
Mckenzie's (Fred A.) The American Invaders .. 359
Meaden's (C. L.) Latin Pronouns .. 221
Menpes' (Mortimer) Japan: A Record in Colour 548
Merejkowski's (Dmitri) The Death of the Gods 239

REVIEWS—continued.

PAGE

Miles's (Eustace H.) History of Rome up to A.D. 500 .. 216
——— How to Remember .. 466
Minchin's (J. G. Cotton) Our Public Schools .. 217
Mitchell, Dr. Weir, Selections from the Poems of 71
Molloy's (Fitz-gerald) The Queen's Comrade .. 339
Moore's (T. Sturge) Aphrodite against Artemis 147
Morison's (M.) Time-Table of Modern History .. 132
Mowbray's (J. M.) A Journey to Nature .. 243
Müller's (Max) Last Essays .. 565
Munby's (Arthur) Poems .. 426
Murray's (Dr. James A. H.) New English Dictionary .. 7
——— (Henry) Robert Buchanan: and Other Essays .. 50
Music, Studies in .. 360
Newbigin's (Marion) Life by the Sea Shore .. 132
Newnham-Davis's (Lieut.-Col.) Dinners and Diners .. 69
Nichols's (Francis Morgan) translations of The Epistles of Erasmus .. 632
O'Brien's (R. Barry) The Life of Lord Russell of Killowen .. 478
Old Mortality: A Continuous Reader .. 218
Oliphant's (Nigel) Diary of the Siege of the Legations in Pekin .. 131
Ormerod, Oliver, The Writings of .. 360
Ottley's (R. L.) Short History of the Hebrews .. 192
Paget's (Stephen) edition of Memoirs and Letters of Sir James Paget .. 282
Pain's (Barry) De Omnibus .. 170
Pantin's (W. E. P.) Macmillan's Latin Course .. 221
Paradox, Essays in. By the author of Exploded Ideas .. 407
Parker & Unwin's The Art of Building a House 408
Parker's (E. H.) John Chinaman and a Few Others .. 459
Pater's (Walter) Essays from the "Guardian" .. 356
Patrice's (V.) Au Pôle en Ballon .. 220
Payne's (W. M.) translation of Jaeger's Henrik Ibsen .. 628
Pearce's (E. H.) Annals of Christ's Hospital .. 482
Pearse & Hague's Analysis of English History .. 220
Pearson's (Karl) The Ethic of Freethought .. 240
Pellissier's (Georges) Le Mouvement Littéraire Contemporain .. 383
Perris's (G. H.) The Life and Teaching of Leo Tolstoy .. 612
Phillips's (W. Alison) Modern Europe .. 284
Phillpotts's (Eden) Fancy Free .. 482
Photograms of the Year 1901 .. 482
Pigou's (Arthur Cecil) Robert Browning as a Religious Teacher .. 190
Pike's (O. G.) Woodland, Field, and Shore .. 240
Poole & Becker's Commercial French .. 220
Prescott's The Conquest of Mexico .. 260
Prestwich's (Lady) Essays, Descriptive and Biographical .. 32
Prideaux's (Col. W. F.) Notes for a Bibliography 258
Pycraft's (W. P.) The Story of Fish Life .. 286
Quilter's (Harry) What's What? .. 463
Rawlings's (Gertrude B.) The Story of Books .. 52
Rawnsley's (Rev. H. D.) Ruskin and the English Lakes .. 589
Read's (Emily) Nature Songs .. 48
Reid's (S. J.) The Life and Times of Sydney Smith 72
René's (E.) Hands, and How to Read Them .. 286
Rhys's (Ernest) Readings in Welsh History .. 220
Rice's (Cale Young) Song-Surf .. 379
Richter's (Jean Paul) Catalogue of Pictures at Locko Park .. 590
Roberts's (John) Modern Billiards .. 633
Robinson's (Arthur W.) edition of In Memoriam 218
——— (E. Kay) To-day with Nature .. 340
Rome, Roads to: Records of Converts .. 335
Rooses' (Max) edition of Dutch Painters of the Nineteenth Century .. 547
Rose-Innes's (Cosmo) With Paget's Horse to the Front .. 408
Rowntree & Sherwell's British Gothenburg Experiments .. 384
Ruffin's (M. E. Henry) John Gildart .. 208
Ryland's (Frederick) edition of Swift's The Journal to Stella .. 70
Salmon's (P. R.) edition of The Year-Book of Photography .. 32
Salzmann's (L. F.) History of the Parish of Hailsham .. 152
Saunders's (Thomas Bailey) Schopenhauer .. 87
——— (E. K.) Fénelon, his Friends and Enemies .. 401
Schuckburgh's (E. S.) Short History of the Greeks 216
"Scott, Sir Walter" Readers for Young People .. 218
Scudamore's (Cyril) Belgium and the Belgians 51
Seeley's (H. G.) Dragons of the Air .. 338
Selous's (Edmund) Bird Watching .. 52
Shakespeare, The Picture: Julius Cæsar .. 218
Shaylor's (Joseph) Some Favourite Books and their Authors .. 241
Shoemaker's (Michael Myers) Palaces, Prisons, and Resting-Places of Mary Queen of Scots .. 613
Sidgwick's (Alfred) The Use of Words in Reasoning .. 50
Sillard's (Robert M.) Barry Sullivan .. 609
Skeat's (Rev. Walter W.) Notes on English Etymology .. 167 ——— collection of Fables and Folk-Tales from an Eastern Forest .. 405
——— ——— edition of Chaucer .. 504
Skrine's (Francis Henry) Life of Sir William Wilson Hunter .. 481
Sloane's (Dr. W. M.) Life of Napoleon Bonaparte 591
Smart's (F. W. B.) The Age of Louis XI. .. 220

REVIEWS—continued.

PAGE

Smith & Bryant's Euclid's Elements of Geometry 222
Smith's (Alexander) Summer in Skye and Dreamthorp .. 55
——— (F. E.) The Story of Newfoundland .. 92
——— (Helen Ainslie) The Thirteen Colonies 130
——— (D. Nichol) edition of Hazlitt: Essays on Poetry .. 218
Snowe's (Lucy) The Paying Guest .. 129
Soutar's (Dr. George) edition of Pope: Select Poems .. 218
Spielmann's (M. H.) British Sculpture and Sculptors .. 548
Stamer's (W. J. A.) Road Travel in Central and Western Europe .. 73
Stanley's (Arthur) edition of Patriotic Song .. 538
Statham's (S. Reginald) My Life's Record .. 148
St. Cyres' (Viscount) François de Fénelon .. 401
Stevens's (Mrs. G. W.) A Motley Crew .. 285
Step's (Edward) Shell Life .. 172
Stephen's (Leslie) edition of Letters of John Richard Green .. 423
Stephens's (W. R. W.) The English Church .. 92
Stephen & Lee's Lives of the Illustrious .. 595
Stevenson's (Rennie) Through Rhodesia with the Sharpshooters .. 340
Stewart's (Charles) Haud Immemor: Reminiscences of Legal and Social Life in Edinburgh and London .. 609
Stone's (J. W.) History of Mary I., Queen of England .. 586
Strachey & Calthrop's edition of The Letters of the Earl of Chesterfield to His Son .. 12
Strong & Barnett's Historical Reader of Early French .. 220
Strong's (S. Arthur) edition of Kristeller's Andrea Mantegna .. 406
Strutt's (Edward C.) Fra Filippo Lippi .. 547
Stuart's (John) Pictures of War .. 259
"Swift, Jonathan, D.D., The Prose Works of" .. 70
Symons's (Arthur) translation of D'Annunzio's Gioconda .. 336
Symons, Arthur, Poems by .. 627
Tarpey's (W. Kingsley) Crabbed Age and Youth 129
Terry's (Charles S.) edition of The Chevalier de St. George and the Jacobite Movement .. 151
Thomas's (J. W.) Intuitive Suggestion .. 631
Thompson's Gardeners' Assistant .. 241
——— (E. S.) The Meno of Plato .. 222
Thorpe's (C. H.) How to Invest and How to Speculate .. 13
Thrush, The: A Book of Original Poems .. 611
Tollemache's (Hon. Stanhope) British Trees .. 52
Townsend's (Meredith) Asia and Europe .. 168
——— (W. G. Paulson) Plant and Floral Studies .. 223
Toynbee's (Rev. H. F.) English Commentary on Dante's "Divina Commedia" .. 187
Trench's (Herbert) translation of Merejkowski's Death of the Gods .. 239
Tschudi's (Clara) Elizabeth, Empress of Austria and Queen of Hungary .. 210
Tweedie's (Mrs. Alec) Mexico as I Saw It .. 408
Unger's (F. W.) With "Bobs" and Kruger .. 359
Vallery-Radot's (René) The Life of Pasteur .. 455
Venturi's (Adolfo) The Madonna .. 612
Vernon-Harcourt's (F. C.) From Stage to Cross .. 630
Villari's (Prof. Pasquale) The Two First Centuries of Florentine History .. 187
——— (L.) Giovanni Segantini .. 546
Villebois-Mareuil, Colonel, The Diary of .. 257
Vivian's (Olive & Herbert) The Romance of Religion .. 357
Vizetelly's (Edward) From Cyprus to Zanzibar .. 482
Voltaire's Contes and Mélanges .. 221
Walden & Manley's Introduction to the Study of Physics .. 222
Walker's (H. De R.) The West Indies and the Empire .. 632
Walpole's (A. S.) Little Arthur's History of Greece 216
War Notes: The Diary of Col. de Villebois-Mareuil 257
Ward's (Prof. H. Marshall) Disease in Plants .. 223
——— Grasses .. 223
Ware's (Fabian) Educational Foundations of Trade and Industry .. 224
Warrack's (Grace) edition of The Lady Julian's Revelations of Divine Love .. 110
Watson's (Thomas Lennox) The Double Choir of Glasgow Cathedral .. 13
——— (Forbes) Flowers and Gardens .. 52
Watts-Dunton's (Theodore) Christmas at the Mermaid .. 612
Weekley's (E.) Primer of French Literature .. 221
Welch's (Rev. A. C.) Anselm and His Work .. 172
Wellby's (Capt. M. S.) 'Twixt Sirdar and Menelik 72
Wells's (H. G.) Anticipations .. 476, 565
Weston's (Jessie L.) Morien .. 591
Wharton's (Mrs.) Crucial Instances .. 75
Wherry's (Albinia) Stories of the Tuscan Artists .. 548
Whiting's (Lilian) The World Beautiful in Books 635
Whitman's (Alfred) The Print-Collector's Handbook .. 359
Wilkinson's (E. G.) The Rise of Hellas .. 221
Williams's (J.) The Oxford Year .. 48
Willson's (St. J. B. Wynne) Virgil: Æneid V., VI. .. 221
Wilson's (Agnes) edition of Lamb: Select Essays 218
——— ——— (Mrs. James Glenny) A Book of Verses .. 379
Wimbolt's (S. E.) The Georgics of Virgil, Book II. .. 221
Windle's (Bertram C. A.) The Wessex of Thomas Hardy .. 457
Winkler's (M.) Schiller's Wallenstein .. 221

Digitized by Google

REVIEWS—continued.

PAGE

Wolf's (Lucien) edition of Menasseh Ben Israel's Mission to Oliver Cromwell 190
Wood's (Charles W.) Glories of Spain 259
Woodward's (William Harrison) Outline History of the British Empire 218
Workman's (F. B. & W. H.) In the Ice World of Himalaya 341
Worsfold's (T. Cato) The French Stonehenge .. 53
Wright's (H. P.) Juvenal 221
——— (William Aldis) edition of More Letters of Edward FitzGerald 583
Wyatt's (Alfred J.) edition of An Elementary Old English Reader 218
Yeats's (Jack B.) James Flaunty 590

FICTION.

Ackworth's (J.) The Coming of the Preachers, 342, 438
Aide's (Hamilton) The Snares of the World .. 194
Albanesi's (E. Maria) Peter, a Parasite 508
Antæus, A Modern. By the writer of An Englishwoman's Love-Letters 440, 483
Arnold's (E. L.) Lepidus the Centurion .. 508, 634
Bachelor's (Irving) D'ri and I 386
Bagot's (Richard) The Just and the Unjust .. 262
Baker's (James) A Double Choice 242
Baring-Gould's (S.) Royal Georgie 212
Barlow's (Jane) From the Land of the Shamrock 193, 262
Barr's (Amelia E.) Souls of Passage 134
Barry's (William) The Place of Dreams .. 362, 460
Bartram's (George) The Thirteen Evenings 74, 113
Bateman's (May) The Glowworm 386, 432
Becke's (Louis) By Rock and Pool on an Austral Shore, and Other Stories 133
——— Yorke the Adventurer 362
Benefactress, The. By the author of Elizabeth and Her German Garden 342, 432
Bennett's (Louie) The Proving of Priscilla 484, 613
Benson's (E. F.) The Luck of the Vails 211
——— (B. K.) A Friend with the Countersign .. 262
Besant's (Sir Walter) The Lady of Lynn 14
Bigelow's (Mrs. Poulteney) While Charlie was Away 194
Bindloss's (Harold) A Sower of Wheat .. 193, 434
Bloundelle-Burton's (John) The Year One .. 194
Boothby's (Guy) A Millionaire's Love Story .. 34
——— Farewell, Nikola 342, 435
Bowles's (Mamie) Gillette's Marriage .. 386, 438
Brown's (Alice) King's End 14, 54
Bryant's (Marguerite) The Princess Cynthia .. 508
Bullock's (Shan F.) Irish Pastorals 410
Burgin's (G. W.) A Goddess of Gray's Inn 362, 435
Burnett's (Frances Hodgson) The Making of a Marchioness 462, 591
Caine's (Hall) The Eternal City 192
Cable's (G. W.) The Cavalier 386
Cambridge's (Ada) The Devastators .. 134, 153
Campbell's (Frances) Love the Atonement .. 94
Capes's (Bernard) Love Like a Gipsy 362
Carey's (Rosa M.) Herb of Grace 212
Carmichael's (Montgomery) The Major-General 154
Castle's (Egerton) "La Bella," and Others 74, 113
——— The Light of Scarthey .. 114
——— (Agnes & Egerton) The Secret Orchard 262, 341
Causton's (J. D.) The Comedy of a Suburban Chapel 438
Cay's (Nowell) The Presumption of Stanley Hay, M.P. 34
Chambers's (R. W.) Cardigan 212
Cherry's (Aunt) Tom Genuflex 134
Chesney's (Weatherby) John Topp, Pirate .. 54
Clark's (Imogen) The Domine's Garden .. 14, 94
Clarke's (Cosmo) An Uncongenial Marriage .. 114
——— (T. Kingston) Men v. Devils 462
Cleeve's (Lucas) Mostly Fools and a Duchess .. 93
——— Mary Anne of Parchment Buildings 435
Clifford's (Hugh) Bush-Whacking and Other Sketches 34, 93
——— (Mrs. W. K.) A Woman Alone .. 54, 113
Cobb's (Thomas) Severance 34, 154
Coleridge's (M. E.) The Fiery Dawn 439
Connell's (F. Norreys) The Follies of Captain Daly 262
Connor's (Ralph) The Man from Glengarry 542, 614
Conrad & Hueffer's The Inheritors 93
Constable's (F. C.) Marrable's Magnificent Idea .. 34
Cooper's (E. H.) A Fool's Year 386
Crawford's (Francis Marion) Marietta 410
Creed's (Sibyl) The Vicar of St. Luke's 13
Crockett's (S. R.) Love Idylls 212, 292
——— The Firebrand 484, 541
Croker's (B. M.) Angel 342
Crouch's (A. P.) A Modern Slavedealer 134
Cunninghame's (Lady Fairlie) The Little Saint of God 262
Daniels's (Heber K.) Dol Shacklefield 74
Danvers's (Clarice) A Stolen Opera 242
Dawson's (A. J.) Joseph Khassam, Half-Caste 362, 409
De Sulmalla's (Countess) Under the Sword .. 634
Diehl's (A. M.) Love's Cross Ways 410
Douglas's (George) The House with the Green Shutters 362, 431
Dowie's (Menie Muriel) Love and His Mask 74, 193
Dreiser's (Theodore) Sister Carrie 114, 153
Drummond's (Hamilton) The Seven Houses .. 74
Dudeney's Mrs. Henry) Spindle and Plough 440, 634

FICTION—continued.

PAGE

Dunn's (Martha Baker) Memory Street .. 242, 438
Esler's (Rentoul) The Awakening of Helena Thorpe 483
Farquharson's (A. C.) Nazarus 440
Fenn's (Clive R.) For All Time 114
Flandran's (Charles Macomb), The Diary of a Freshman 362, 435
Fletcher's (J. S.) The Golden Spur 440
Forbes's (Hon. Mrs. Walter) Dumb 462
Ford's (J. O.) Mr. Elliott 386
Forestier-Walker's (Clarence) translation of Romance of a Harem 460
Forsslund's (M. Louise) The Story of Sarah .. 410
Francis's (M. E.) Fiander's Widow 174
Franklin's (Miles) My Brilliant Career 34
Fraser's (John), Death, the Showman 262
——— (W. A.) Mooswa 288
——— (Peter) Tatty 462
Fuller's (Hulbert) God's Rebel 194, 410
Gallon's (Tom) Rickerby's Folly 212
Gerard's (Morice) A Black Vintage 94
——— (Dorothea) The Million 193
Gibbs's (G.) In Search of Mademoiselle 462
Gilbert's (H.) Hearts in Revolt 242, 438
Gissing's (Algernon) The Wealth of Mallerstang 386
Gorky's (Maxim) Foma Gordyeeff 484
——— The Orloff Couple and Malva .. 542
Grace's (Alfred A.) Tales of a Dying Race 440, 591
Gray's (Maxwell) Four-Leaved Clover 134
——— (Melville) Ardnargh 542
Green's (A. Lincoln) The End of an Epoch 484, 592
Griffiths's (Major Arthur) A Set of Flats 194
——— A Bid for Empire 634
——— (D. Ryles) Elgiva 508
Gull's (C. Ranger) The Cigarette Smoker 592
Gwynn's (Stephen) The Old Knowledge .. 386, 432
Halsham's (John) Kitty Fairhall 410
Hamilton's (Lord Ernest) Mary Hamilton 74
Hancock's (A. E.) Henry Bourland 74
Hartley's (Cecil) The Broad Road that Stretches 54
Haultmont's (Marie) The Marriage of Laurentia 483
Hazelton's (G. C.) Mistress Nell 74, 154
Healey's (Chris.) The Work of His Hands 288, 385
Herrick's (R.) The Real World 592
Hewlett's (Maurice) New Canterbury Tales 262, 287
Hichens's (Robert) The Prophet of Berkeley Square 410, 432
Hobbes's (John Oliver) The Serious Wooing .. 73
Hocking's (S. K.) The Awakening of Anthony Weir 194
Hodder's (Alfred) The New Americans 614
Holland's (Clive) Monsmé 288, 460
Hope's (Anthony) Tristram of Blent .. 114, 133
Hornung's (E. W.) The Black Mask 342
Howard's (Lady Mabel) The Failure of Success 462
Howells's (W. D.) A Pair of Patient Lovers .. 13
"Iota's" The Happenings of Jill 439, 507
Island, Desert. An Episode on a. By the author of "Miss Molly" 134
Jacobs's (W. W.) Light Freights 342, 361
Jane's (Fred T.) Ever Mohun 211
Jefferson's (R. L.) The Coward 134, 174
Jewett's (Sarah Orne) The Tory Lover 484
Johnson's (Grove) The Idealist 484
Keary's (C. F.) Twixt Dog and Wolf 508
Keightley's (S. R.) A Man of Millions 362
Kernahan's (Mrs. Coulson) No Vindication .. 134
Kieson's (E. L.) Margaret Hetherton 212
Kinross's (Albert) Within the Radius 440
Langbridge's (Frederick) The Cutting of the Weir 634
Langton's (Lionel) The Fall of Lord Paddockslea 484, 633
Lawson's (Henry) The Country I Come From .. 14
——— Joe Wilson 542
Lee's (Robert James) The Heretic 134
Lefeuvre's (Amy) Heather's Mistress 194
Le Queux's (William) The Temptress 212
——— The Court of Honour 288, 435
Levett-Yeats's (S.) The Traitor's Way 440
Lilac Land: Back to. By —— 592
"Limbo's" My Own Death 614
Livesay's (Jessie E.) The Little Tin Gods 74
Lloyd's (Wallace) Bergen Worth 54
Locke's (W. J.) The Usurper 462
Lover's Progress, The 386, 460
Ludlow's (J. M.) Deborah 342, 438
Lyall's (David) The Gold that Perisheth 194
——— (Edna) In Spite of All 386
Maartens's (Maarten) Some Women I Have Known 361, 409
Macdonald & Edgar's The Warrigals' Well .. 194
Machray's (Robert) Sir Hector 154, 241
Macnaughton's (S.) The Fortune of Christina M'Nab 362, 483
Malet's (Lucas) The History of Sir Richard Calmady 212, 261
Manu's (Mary E.) The Fields of Dulditch 542
Marchmont's (A. W.) For Love or Crown 460
Marlowe's (George) Jesse 134
Marsh's (Richard) Both Sides of the Veil 74
——— The Joss: A Reversion 154
Marshall's (Charles S.) Real Life 194
——— (Mrs. Charles) A Parish Scandal .. 614
Mason's (A. W.) Clementina 342, 432
Maugham's (W. S.) The Hero 14, 33
McIlroy's (Archibald) A Banker's Love Story .. 462
McLaws's (Lafayette) When the Land was Young 362, 460
Meade's (L. T.) A Stumble by the Way 508
Merejkowski's (Dimitri) Christ and Anti-Christ .. 174
Merriman's H. S.) The Velvet Glove .. 542, 633

FICTION—continued.

PAGE

Merwin's (S.) The Road to Frontenac 410
——— & Webster's Calumet "K" 508
Mitchell's (S. Weir) Circumstances 409
——— (Edmund) Only a Nigger 440
Mitford's (Bertram) The Triumph of Hilary Blackland 242, 385
Moffat & Druce's Ray Farley 592
Montresor's (F. F.) The Alien 342, 434
Moore's (George) Sister Teresa 14, 53
——— Evelyn Innes 14
——— (Arthur) The Eyes of Light 508
Munro's (Neil) The Shoes of Fortune 440
Murray's (D. Christie) Despair's Last Journey 262, 341
Nisbet's (Hume) A Losing Game 288
Normyx's Unprofessional Tales 242
Norris's (Frank) The Octopus 193, 210
——— (W. E.) The Embarrassing Orphan 385, 438
Oppenheim's (E. Phillips) Master of Men .. 262
Osborne's (Duffield) The Lion's Brood 34
Oxenham's (John) Our Lady of Deliverance 362, 460
Page's (T. N.) In Ole Virginia 542
Pain's (Barry) Stories in the Dark .. 484, 507
Parker's (Gilbert) The Right of Way .. 288, 431
——— (Eric) The Sinner and the Problem 342, 435
Payne's (Will) The Story of Eva 94
Peake's (Elmore Elliott) The Darlingtons 194, 434
Pearce's (J. H.) Youth goes a-Marketing 242
Pemberton's (Max) The Giant's Gate .. 242, 287
Peterson's (Maud) The Potter and the Clay 342, 385
Philips's (F. C.) A Woman of the World's Advice 542
Phillpotts's (Eden) The Striking Hours .. 133, 173
——— Fancy Free 462
Pidgin's (C. F.) Quincy Adams Sawyer 54
Pinkerton's (Thomas) Blue Bonnets Up 212
Primm's (Perrington) Ivy Cardew 483
"Q.'s" The Laird's Luck 342
Raymond's (Walter) Fortune's Darling .. 212, 241
Rayner's (Emma) Visiting the Sun 440
Reaney's (Mrs. G. S.) The Romance of an Emergency 614
Reid's (William A.) Cash is King 174
Rhys's (Grace) The Wooing of Sheila 94
"Rita's" Prince Charming 34
——— A Jill's Journal 212, 292
Roberton's (Margaret H.), A Gallant Quaker 342, 438
Robertson's (Morgan) Richard Halpin 462
——— (William) The Stone of Dunalter .. 592
Rynd's (Evelyne E.) Mrs. Green 33
Sandars's (Newton) Concerning Some Fools and their Folly 484, 613
Serao's (Matilde) The Ballet Dancer 462
Sergeant's (Adeline) A Great Lady 54
——— Sylvia's Ambition .. 288, 483
——— The Mission of Margaret .. 634
Setoun's (Gabriel) The Skipper of Barncraig 154, 173
Sheehan's (Rev. P. A.) Luke Delmege 614
Shiel's (M. P.) The Purple Cloud 288, 361
Sidgwick's (Mrs. Alfred) Cynthia's Way 410
Sims's (George R.) A Blind Marriage 435
Sinjohn's (John), A Man of Devon 386
Snowden's (Keighley) Barbara West 288
Stacpoole's (H. De Vere) The Bourgeois .. 288, 435
Stephens's (Riccardo) The Wooing of Grey Eyes 242, 261
Stephenson's (N.) They That Took the Sword .. 14
Stevenson's (B. E.) A Soldier of Virginia .. 410
Stuart's (Esmé) Nobler than Revenge 34
Sturgis's (Julian) Stephen Calmari 242, 287
Sutcliffe's (Constance) Our Lady of the Ice .. 508
Tanqueray's (Mrs. B.) The Call of the Future .. 174
Thomas's (Annie) The Diva 262
——— (John) Lloyd of the Mill 614
Thompson's (Maurice) Alice of Old Vincennes .. 94
——— Sweetheart Manette 462
Tracy's (Louis) The Strange Disappearance of Lady Delia 194
Tweedale's (Violet) Her Grace's Secret 54
Tynan's (Katharine) A Union of Hearts 212
Tytler's (Sarah) Women Must Weep 134
Upward's (Allen) The Ambassador's Adventure 386, 460
Van Vorst's (B. & M.) Bagsby's Daughter .. 212
Warden's (Florence) A House with a History .. 34
Watson's (H. B. M.) The Skirts of Happy Chance 94, 113
——— The House Divided .. 542
——— (E. H. Lacon) Christopher Deane .. 484
Webber's (Byron) Sport and Spangles 542
Wells's (H. G.) The First Men in the Moon 484, 541
Wemyss's (George) The Fly-Wheel 134
Westall's (William) Don or Devil 288
Western's (Ernest) Gyda the Goth 174
Weyman's (Stanley J.) Count Hannibal 410
Whitby's (Beatrice) Flower and Thorn .. 362, 483
White's (Percy) The Grip of the Bookmaker 34, 153
——— (Stewart E.) The Westerners 212
Williamson's (Mrs. C. N.) Queen Sweetheart .. 174
Wilson's (T. Wilson) T'Bacca Queen 483
Woods's (Margaret L.) Sons of the Sword 484, 624
"Zack's" Tales of Dunstable Weir .. 385, 431
Zola's (Emile) The Honour of the Army .. 14
——— The Monomaniac 288

SUPPLEMENTS.

Autumn Announcements 301—328
Christmas 545—560
Educational 213—224
Fiction 427—442

Digitized by Google

ARTICLES.

PAGE

Anonymity Business, The (The Anonymous Literary League) 157
Art and Life. (Mrs. Wharton's "Crucial Instances") 75
Blake, William, the Poetry of 15
Book, A Good Old ("The Tin Trumpet") .. 107
Books, Favourite, of 1901: Some Readers 567, 579
Browning, Mrs., as Prophetess. ("Casa Guidi Windows") 345
"Browning's Profoundest Attempt." (The Dark Tower) 98
Business Side, The. (Mr. G. S. Street on a Literary Career) 95
Conventional-Sentimental, The (Rita's "Jill's Journal" and Crockett's "Love Idylls") .. 292
Coppée (M. François) Talks. (Interview with M. Coppée) 118
Critic, The, in the Market Place. (W. Archer's "Poets of the Younger Generation") 363 Education, The New: Some American Ideals .. 215
Eliot, George 175
"English, The English of the." (Mr. Julian Ralph on Americanisms) 138
Essayist, Concerning an. (Alexander Smith) .. 55
Excogitant Young Man, The. (Mr. Chesterton's "The Defendant") 509
Fiction, Ten Months of 429
Friend, Candid, The. (Mr Henley on R. L. Stevenson) 487
Glittering Style, The. (Mowbray's "A Journey to Nature") 243
Harvest. (Autumn Announcements of Books) .. 303
"How To," Mr., Again. (How to Write an Essay) 246
Irish Brogue, The 291
Irrevelant, The Charm of t' e (Trade and Class Papers) 115
Irreverence, The Tedium of. (Ingoldsby Legends) 569
Jewry, All. (The Jewish Encyclopædia) 76
Kipling's (Mr.) Way. (Kim) 289
Library, The Red-Hot. (Salvation Army Library) 178
Life, The Art of. (Claudius Clear's Letters in the "British Weekly") 443
Literature and Tobacco 225
——— in 1901; Some Memories and Impressions 561
"Lives of Great Men All Remind Us." (Stephen and Lee's "Lives of the Illustrious" 595
London. (Mr. A. Hare's "Walks in London") 135
———, An Index to. ("Lists of Streets and Places") 346
Memory: An Art or an Instinct? (Mr. E. H. Miles's "How to Remember") 466
Needful, The One Thing. (Gribble's "Lake Geneva") 35
Pegasus at Tattersall's 570
Prose of Poets, The. (Sir Philip Sidney) .. 615
Quest, The Old. (Three Books by Mr. Birrell, Mr. Wells and Max Müller) 565
Readers, Do They Read? (Use of the Libraries) 59
Reading, The Over-Praise of. (Miss Whiting's "The World Beautiful in Books") 635
Rhyme, Does it Connect Ideas? 389
Richardson Revival, The 485
Rostands, Elizabethan, The 593
Sanities, Primal. (Walt Whitman's Poetry) .. 511
Smith. (Canon Bardsley's "Dictionary of Surnames") 155
Sub-Fiction. (Penny, Twopenny and Threepenny Novels) 445
Things Impossible, A Dreamer of. (Edgar Allan Poe) 263
United States, Plain. (American Slang) 117
Verse, Dilettante. (The Horace Club) 37
——, Light, What Is It? (Mr. A. C. Deane's "Little Book of Light Verse") 488
What's What's What? (Mr. Harry Quilter's Work) 463
Words: Some True and False Uses. (Fitzgerald's "Word and Phrase") 387
World, The, Where Is It? ("The Last of the Dandies") 411
Writer, Small, The. (Autumn Announcements of New Books) 343

SIGNED ARTICLES.

Affinities, Certain. (Relationship between Sounds and Forms). E. W. 195
Bookmen, Not as the. (Robert Louis Stevenson) Herbert C. MacIlwaine 513
Catalogue, A Second-Hand. (Mr. Walter T. Spencer's List) V. V. V. 266
Fiction, The Fallow Fields of. (The Organic Existence of Communities). E. A. B. 57
Greenaway, Kate. E. V. Lucas 466
Insanity in Literature. (Recent Parisian Books). Hannah Lynch 137, 159
Irish Movement, The New: A Conversation. J. W. 413
Monkhouse, W. Cosmo: An Appreciation. W. D. A. 77
Novel, The, What Will it Become? J. G. L. .. 215
Paris Letters. H. L.:—
Arvède Barine's Work on St. Francis of Assisi; La Comtesse Mathieu de Noailles' Volume of Poetry; M. Charles Legras' Nos Contemporains Anglais 39

SIGNED ARTICLES.—continued.

PAGE

Marcel Prévost's Le Domino Jaune; Paul Marguerite's Preface to Jean Lombard's Byzance; Eugène D'Eichthal's Study of Socialism, &c. 177
M. Octave Mirbeau; Louis Lamarque's Un An de Caserne 265
M. de Treville's Les Jeunes Filles Peintes par Elles-mêmes; Propos de Félix Faure 365
J. J. Weiss's Lectures on Molière; Mme. Jean Bertheroy's Le Mirage; George Beaume's Les Robinsons de Paris 465
Victor Hugo's Post-Scriptum de Ma Vie; Arvède Barine's Jeunesse de la Grande Mademoiselle; Jacques Vincent's Trois Amoureuses; André Theuriet's L'Amie de Noël Tremont 618
Poet, A Minor, of the Seventeenth Century. (Thomas Vaughan) E. H. 97
Prudhomme, Sully. (The Nobel Prize for Literature). H. L. 636
Sartor Re-read. (Mr. J. A. S. Barrett's edition of "Sartor Resartus"). Francis Thompson .. 17

SHORT STORIES.

Cement 198
Confessio Amantis 39

THINGS SEEN.

Baker, The Chief 196
Bloomsbury Potentate, The 344
Bookseller, The 464, 486
Caller, The 290
Candlesticks, The 176
Circus Passes, The 413
Cornfield, The 76
Critic, The 16
Demonstrators, With the 566
Diners, The 365
Dome, The 636
Earth, Mother 176
Emigrants, The 290
Evangelist, The 96
Fog, The 444
Food 156
Gaff, T. e 594
Generation, Younger, The 196
Harbour, The 196
Hive, Observation, The 36
Householder, The 37
Lady, An Old 412
Landowner, The 616
Mackerel 636
Optimist, The 264
Ordinaire 244
Passion, The Ruling 116
Peril 156
Philanthropist, The 344
Progress 57
Promotion 594
Pursuit, The 226
Reno incement 16
Return, The 486
Riches 97
Rook, The 244
Schoolmistress, The 464
Search, The 117
Sentiment 57
Shipwreck, The 388
Smoke, The Column of 365
Snob, The 136
Sound, Sight, and Sentiment 510
Speakers, Two 388
Swimmer, The 136
Traveller, The 265
Unities, The 76
Usurer, The 616
Way, By the 226

CORRESPONDENCE.

Age, Rivals in. ("Notes and Queries" and "Bye-Gones") 80
"Anonymity Business, The" 199
Art, The Aims of 99
"Australasia, Old and New" 18
Biography, A Note on. (Mr. Henley's Article on Stevenson) 596, 640
Boys, Books for 447
Caine, Mr. Hall 78, 99
Campbell or Burns? (Disputed Quotation) .. 620
Chaucer, Thomas 572, 597
"Commentator, The Ordinary." (The Snake in Literature) 267
Correspondents, School for 598
"FitzGerald, Edward, More Letters of" 619
Gravitation, Rights in 597, 618
"Hazlitt," The New 139, 159, 197

CORRESPONDENCE.—continued.

PAGE

Ingoldsby Legends, The 597
"Insanity in Literature" .. 159, 227, 247, 347
Irish Brogue, The 346, 392, 414
Khassan, Joseph 390
Life and Literature .. 98, 119, 139, 158, 159, 227
"Linesman," The Identity of 571
Macaulay's "Ivry" 513
Muall, Mr., and Maeterlinck 638
Monkhouse's (Mr.) Poetry 99
Novelists, A School for. (G. Manville Fenn's "The Canker-worm.") 571
Nuns, French, The 468, 489
Pater's (Mr.) Style 267, 390
Poet, An Anonymous. (Authorship of some French Verses) 489
Poetry, True, What is it? 18, 39
"Rather." (True and False Uses of Words) 414, 447
Rhymes, Double 59
Riddles, The Lady of. (Mary Stuart) 267
Rubaiyat, First American Edition of the 347
Sartor Re-read 39
Song, Patriotic 508
Spelling, Poetic 448
"Stabbed in the Dark": Tragedy 620
Statham's (S. Reginald) My Life's Record .. 199
Stevenson on Henley 597
Taste, Twentieth Century 227
"To-be-Forgotten, Th ." (The Theory of Life in the Grave) 513
"Tragedy": Ancient and Modern 160
Wessex Pilgrimage, A 228
West, Barbara 392
Women, The Plague of 414, 446

POETRY.

Carruth's (Prof.) "Each in His Own Name" .. 603
Crabbe 247
In Memoriam, H.C.M.W. 293
Night Piece, A 179
Pan, The Dairymaids to 489
Stanza from Rückert's "Weisheit des Brahmanen" 376
Tudor Tune, To a 179

THE LITERARY WEEK.

Adeler's (Max) Captain Bluitt 451
Ague, A Leicestershire Charm for 580
Alfred Period, MSS. and Reliques of the .. 165
Allen's (Grant) County and Town in England .. 452
Am Bárd (Gaelic Magazine) 123
Anglo-Saxon Review, The 278
Archer's (Mr. Wm.) "Real Conversations" 144, 375
Argosy, The 233
Arnold, Mrs., Death of 5
———, Sir Edward, New Epic Poem by .. 63
At Home, A Literary 104
Athenæum, The 453
Atlantic Monthly, The 64
"Authors, Queries about" 104
Autograph Letters, A Catalogue of 605
Badminton Magazine, The 164
Balfour, Mr. Graham, and Mrs. Stevenson .. 145
Balfour's (Mr. Arthur) Introduction to The Foundations of Belief 471
Beaconsfield's (Lord) Novels, Mr. G. W. E. Russell on 85
Beerbohm, Mr. Max, on Holiday Reading .. 43
———————, on Names 625
Bennett, Mr. E. A., on the Average Reader of Fiction 204
Besant, Sir Walter, An Appreciation of 3
Bibliomaniacs and Kleptomaniacs 184
Biography, The New York Nation on 604
Birrell's (Augustine) edition of Boswell's Johnson 183
Black's (Hugh) Culture and Restraint 453
Blackwood Magazine, The 533
Bookman, The 85, 104, 183, 253, 581
Book Sales of the Season 83
——, Modern, Design and Manufacture of the 125
Books found in Ships' Forecastles 25
———, French, and the English Customs Authorities 533
Brooks's Club, The old Betting Books at .. 45
Browning, Mrs. Barrett, A Criticism of 252
Buchanan, Mr. Robert, Proposed Memorial to .. 123
Burns, Robert, Books and Pictures relating to .. 124
———————, An Unpublished Poem by .. 399
Burton, Mr. Richard, on the Essay 204
Butler's (Mr Samuel) Erewhon 332
Caine, Mr. Hall and his Work 85
———'s Eternal City, "Pocket Version" of .. 185
Calmady (Richard) The Younger, A Parody of .. 332
Carlyle, A Letter by, to his Mother 25
——— as seen by the Rambler 473
Castle's (Egerton) The Light of Scarthey .. 105
Century Magazine 399
Chambers's Journal 279, 399
Chambers's (Robert) Commonplace Book .. 399
Chesterfield's (Lord) Letters to His Son 5
Chesterton, Mr., on Sir Walter Scott 124
———————, on English Literature 145
Chivers (Dr.), Lines by 496

Digitized by Google

THE LITERARY WEEK—continued.

	PAGE
Church, Mr. Alfred J., The Profits of	205
Church Quarterly Review, The	64
Classical Review, The	331
Cockney Dialect, The, Mr. Ashby Sterry on	144
Collaboration in Novel Writing	43
Commentator, The	420
Connoisseur, The	279
Conrad, Mr. Joseph, on Fiction	185
Conservator, The	145
Cook, Mr. E. T., and Unreviewed Authors	532
Cornhill Magazine, The 46, 84, 397, 422, 496, 497,	624
Critic, The (New York)	331, 623
Current Literature	419
Daily Mail Year Book, The	604
Dante Readers, Books for	184
—— Society, New Members of the	333
Definition, Curious	253
De Soissons' (Count Charles) Essays on Modern Writers, etc.	146
Dial, The (Chicago)	331
Dickens, Charles, Unpublished Letter by	624
Dobson's (Mr. Austin) Verses on the Cornhill Magazine	84
Dooley's (Mr.) Translation of Lord Kitchener's Proclamation to the Boers	185
Douglas's (George) The House with the Green Shutters	604
Doukhobor Migration and Tolstoy's Resurrection	579
Duff, Dr., and Yorkshire Bookshops	399
Elizabethan Society, The	333
English Illustrated Magazine, The	373
Epicene Pronouns, Proposed	33
Epitaph by the Poet of Bakewell	532, 580
Fawcett, Mr. Edgar, on the State of Poetry in England	623
Fiction, Prose, Handbook to	472
Fiction, The American Appetite for	532
"Fire, Mist (A) and a Planet," The Author of	603
Fletcher, William, Byron's Valet	398
Forster, Mr. T., on East London and Epping	205
Fortnightly Review, The 105, 165, 252, 278,	398
Forum, The	204
Frederick, The Empress, Mental Activities of	103
Furniss's (Mr. Harry) Acquaintance with Du Maurier	420
Garnett, Mr. Edward, on "The Contemporary Critic"	581
Germ, The, Facsimile Reprint of	4
Gilbert, Mr. W. S., A Conversation with	144
Girls' Realm, The	451
Gorky, Two Translators of	473
Gorky's Foma Gordyeeff	332
Greenaway, Miss Kate, Lines by Mr. Dobson on	451
Green's Short History of the English People	419
Grein's (Mr.) Play Competition	399
Gummere's (Prof. F. B.) The Beginnings of Poetry	452
Gwynn, Mr., on "Vers de Société"	6
——, on Mr. Walter Pater's Style	232
Halfpenny Comic Art, The	581
Hampstead Annual, The	604
Hardy, Mr. Thomas, on Wessex	183
—— and Mr. George Meredith	251
Harper's Magazine 84, 163, 278,	420
Hazell's Annual	604
Hazlitt's Style, A Sketch of	533
Helm's (Mr.) Onslaught on Macaulay	473
Henley, Mr. W. E., Poems by	232
——, on R. L. Stevenson 495, 531,	582
Henry VIII., The Visits of	64
Hewlett, Mr. Maurice, on Stendhal	420
Howells, Mr. W. D., on the Differences between English and American Fiction	44
Howells, Mr. W. D., on Humour	582
"Howlers," A Collection of	605
Hugo (Victor) Museum in Paris, Proposed 279,	397
Hugo's (Victor) Essay on Shakespeare	232
Ibsen's (Dr.) Health 204,	351
Ideal, The	123
Idler, The	4
Inglesant, John, The "True Story" of 83, 123,	144
International Monthly, The	251
James, Mr. Henry, on Rostand	397
Jefferies, Mr. Richard, At Home	164
"Johnson (Dr.) Among the Poets"	497
Jokai, Maurus, A Picture of	106
Kennan, Mr. George, expelled from Russia	123
Kerr, Mr. Commissioner, Utterances of	105
Kipling's (Mr.) "The Lesson"	84
—— "M. I."	279
—— Kim, The "Russian Agents" in	534
Lamb, Charles, An Uncollected Poem by	144
Lamb's "Paraphrase on the King and Queen of Hearts"	453
Lang, Mr. Andrew, on "The Reading Public"	496
Le Gallienne's (Mr.) Essay on "The Desire of the Star for the Moth"	25
Letter-writing, Model	625
Literary Police Case at New York	25
—— Activity in the United States	165
—— Patronage	278
—— Agent, The	352
Literature, Can it be Taught?	24, 65
——, Advertisements in	124
——, Pernicious: How to Put it Down	252
Longman's Magazine 65, 398,	580
Lynch's ("Colonel") A Koran of Love	496
Macarthur, Mr. James, on the Religious Novel	278
Macmillan's Magazine 5, 399, 497,	623
Macnamara's (Dr. T. J.) Children's Witticisms	497
Maeterlinck on the Mystery of Justice	398
Magazine, First-class, The Successful Conduct of a	84
Manchester City News "Notes and Queries"	84

THE LITERARY WEEK—continued.

	PAGE
Mendouh Bey, on the Decline of Poetry in Turkey	206
Meynell, Mrs., on the Atlantic Cloudland	382
Milton, John, The Real	279
Mind	471
Monkhouse's (Cosmo) Nonsense Rhymes	534
Monthly Review, The 5, 103, 106, 163, 398,	581
Moore, Mr. George, An Interview with	184
Morris's (William) Works, Publication of	399
Nation, The 124,	604
New Liberal Review 6, 85,	497
New York Journal Saturday Review 45,	604
New York Times' Saturday Review 6, 25, 184, 185, 231, 279, 533,	581
Nicoll (Dr. Robertson) on the Halfpenny Newspaper	253
Nobel Prize for Literature, The	579
North American Review, The 44, 45, 232,	582
Notes and Queries	495
Novel, Historical, The 233,	254
Novels, Relation between their Merit and their Popularity	44
Novels, Cutting the Edges of	186
Ojetti, Signor Ugo, on Mr. Hall Caine's The Eternal City	252
Omar Khayyam Craze in America, The	125
—— Calendar, The	472
Ouida and her Publishers	352
Outlook, The	143
Pall Mall Gazette, The 352,	354
Pall Mall Magazine, The 3, 43, 144, 232, 375, 419, 473,	625
Parnell, Mr. Charles S., Sale of Books belonging to	144
Pater's (Walter) Essays from the Guardian	183
—— Philosophy of Life	623
Pearson's Magazine	26
Periodicals, Annual Index to	65
Pilot, The 5, 104,	422
Pinero's (Mr.) "Iris"	251
Plagiarism, Literary 164,	421
Poet Lore	64
Poetry, Unconscious, in Classic Novels	126
Princess, The Tribulations of a	66
Publishers' "Readers," An Opinion of	233
Punch on "The New Novel"	353
Quarterly Review, The 43,	44
Rambler, The 279, 353,	473
Ravenna, Mr. Harold Spender and Lord Byron on	278
Richardson, Samuel, Twenty-volume edition of the Works of	353
Review of Reviews, The	532
Revue de Paris	43
Rhyme, Connection of, with ideas	398
Richardson, Samuel, The Career of	472
Rinder, Mr. Frank, on Book Collecting	375
Roberts, Mr. W., on Book Collecting	165
Rosegger, Peter, the Austrian Novelist	352
Rostand's (Mr. Edmond) Compiègne Verses	580
"Ruskin Plot, The," at Cothill	374
Russian Educational Establishment for London	185
Samhain	420
Scholarship and Poetry	103
Scribner's Magazine	103
Seccombe, Mr. Thomas, and Borrow's Works	532
Serving-Man, The, in fiction	5
Shakespeare, First Folio, Sale of a Copy of the	45
—— —, Messrs. Jacks' "Windsor" Edition of	333
Shakespeareana, New (New York)	374
Shanklin Gazette, The	126
Shaw, Mr. Bernard, on the South African Commissariat Arrangements	333
Shaw, Mr. Bernard, on Pugilism	374
Shorter, Mr. Clement K., and the Brontës	4
Sketch, The 43, 104,	624
Smith, Mr. Nowell, on "The Popularity of Criticism"	252
Spectator, The	25
Spelling, English and American	533
Sphere, The 103, 183, 421,	582
Spottiswoode, Mr. William, on the Choice of a Profession	624
"Star and the Moth, The"	85
Stevenson, R. L., An Unpublished Chapter in the Life of	3
Stevenson, R. L., Unaccomplished Literary Projects of 351,	373
Stubbs, Bishop, and Local History	64
Sunday Sun, The	103
Swinburne, Mr., and Mr. Watts-Dunton	473
Symons's (Mr. Arthur) Introduction to Flaubert's Salammbo	452
Symons's Translation of Scènes de la Vie de Bohème	495
Tait, Prof. Peter Guthrie, A Sketch of	24
Tatler, The 4,	398
Tauchnitz, Baron, and Foreign Authors	232
Temple Bar	164
"Temple Bible, The"	398
Thackeray, Personal Reminiscences of 164, 184,	497
Thrush, The	104
Tolstoy and His Serfs	104
——'s Writing Engagements	623
Triggs, Prof. Oscar Lovell, on Literature and Great Writers	204
"Turner House Classics, The"	354
United Irishman, The	455
"Unit System" of Publishing	420
Universal Magazine, The	532
Vanity Fair Album	603
Vatican, The, as a Literary Storehouse	375
Von Woltzogen's "Ueberbrett"	452

THE LITERARY WEEK—continued.

	PAGE
Watts-Dunton's (Theodore) Aylwin	373
Wells, Mr. H. G., on Literature 105,	373
Westminster Gazette, The	205
White, Mr. Andrew D., on Tolstoy	4
——, Mr. Arnold, on the King's Tit	103
Windsor Magazine	279
"Wit and Wisdom from New Book	233
Women-Binders, Exhibition of the Guild of	497
Words, The Coinage of	143
World's Work, The	233
Yeats, Mr., on Magic	103
——, on Eglington's Two Essays on the Remnant	453
Yonge, Miss, Proposed Memorial to	3
Zola, M., A Conversation with	44
——, and his Publishers	104

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTES.

Abbott, Mr. Evelyn, The Works of	234
Adeler, Max, the Works of	126
Aidé, Mr. Hamilton, The Works of	46
Aldrich's (Mr. T. B.) "Mercedes"	206
Alfred the Great, Plays on the Subject of	106
Austen, Jane, Biographies of	234
Barlow, Miss Jane	626
Barsetshire and Carlingford Books	146
Bell, Mr. Mackenzie, The Works of	234
Benson, Miss Margaret, The Works of	234
Biographies, Big	626
Blessington, Lady, Works relating to	376
Bourget, Paul, in English	6
Brooks, Mr. Shirley, The Works of	498
Browning, Robert, Works relating to	606
Buchan, Mr. John, The Works of	186
Cats, Books relating to	400
Caudle's (Mrs.) Curtain Lectures	354
Christmas, The Bibliography of	626
Clifford's (W. K.) Lectures and Essays	454
Clive's (Mrs.) Paul Ferroll	6
"Cloister Library," The	186
Conrad, Mr. Joseph, The Works of	186
Dickens, Sonnets on	454
Dictionary of National Biography	400
Doran, Dr., The Works of	422
Drayson, Maj.-Gen., The Works of	334
Eliot, George, Books concerning	86
Ellacombe, Canon, The Works of	234
"English Men of Letters"	106
"Every-Man," The Old "Morality"	6
Farrar's (Dean) Julian Home, Editions of	146
Filippi, Miss Rosina, The Works of	254
Geste of Kyng Horn, The	400
Gilbert, Mr. W. S., The Burlesques of 146,	166
Gosse's (Mr.) Collection of Austin Dobson's Fugitive Pieces	66
Greenwell, Miss Dora, The Works of	254
Gwynn, Mr. Stephen, The Works of	6
Hazlitt's Works, Reprints of	46
Hugo, Victor, Translations of the Works of	126
James, Mr. G. P. R., The Stories of	206
Jay Miss Spicer, The Literary Products of	606
Johnson's Lives of the Poets, Editions of	354
Kingsley's Works, Reprints of	26
Lambs' Tales from Shakespeare	376
Literature, English, "Histories" and "Handbooks" of	334
"Little Library," The	186
Le Queux's The Temptress	280
Lowell, James Russell, The Writings of	606
Lyall, Sir Alfred, The Works of	106
——, Miss Edna, The Works of	186
—— ——, and her Publishers	234
Lytton, Bulwer, as a Writer	86
Mitchell, Dr. S. Weir, The Works of	498
Monkhouse, Mr. Cosmo, the Works of	66
Murray's "Reader" Criticised by Mr. A. W. Pollard	26
Neil, Mr. Samuel, The Works of	234
Newell, Mr. R. H., The Works of	86
Newman, John Henry, Works Relating to	606
Novels, Necessity for Condensed Editions of	106
Planché's Recollections and Reflections	454
Poet Laureate, the Position of	46
Radcliffe, Ann, Reprints of the Works of	198
Radford, Mr. George, The Writings of	6
Reade's The Cloister and the Hearth	26
Richards's (Grant) Cashel Byron's Profession	376
Richardson, Samuel, Reprints of the Works of	66
Robespierre, Books Relating to	106
Robinson, Miss A. M. F., The Poetical Works of	86
——, Mr. F. W., The Works of	606
Rodd, Sir Rennell, The Verse Writings of	280
Rogers and Luttrell, Story Relating to	46
Salammbô and La Chartreuse de Parme, Translations of	422
Scott's Novels, Abridgment of	498
Scudder, Mr. Horace E., The Works of	280
Shakespeare and Music	126
Sheridan's Plays, Editions of	126
Sherwood, Mrs., The Works of	334
Smalley, Mr. G. W., The Works of	234
Stanley's (Mr. Arthur) Collection of Patriotic Song	422
—— ——(Dean) Life of Dr. Arnold	606
Stevenson's Familiar Studies of Men and Books	26
Symons, Mr. Arthur, The Works of 234,	254
Syrett, Miss Netta, The Works of	376
Tatler, The, of 1830-32	46

Digitized by Google

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTES—continued.

PAGE
"Temple Library," The 106, 186
Tennysonian Lines before Tennyson 186
Tennyson, Rossetti's Surreptitious Sketches of.. 498
Trimmer, Mrs., The Works of 536
"Turner House Classics, The" 354
Tynan, Miss (Mrs. Hinkson), The Works of .. 116
Van Dyke, Mr. Henry, The Works of 422
Wagner, Memoirs of 280
Watts-Dunton's (Mr.) "Christmas at the Mermaid" 166
Whitman, Walt, Books relating to.. 280
Wolsey, Cardinal, Books relating to 400

PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

(New Series.)

No. 93, Lines in Praise of the Strawberry .. 20
No. 94, Quotation applicable to the State of the Liberal Party.. 40
No. 95, Imaginative Remarks by Boswell and Johnson on Le Gallienne's "The Desire of the Star for the Moth" 60
No. 96, Stanza on a Dead Author 80
No. 97, Suggested New Titles for Well-known Works 100

PRIZE COMPETITIONS—continued.

PAGE
No. 98, Apology supposed to have been written by a Dead Author 119
No. 99, Verse, entitled "Sea Birds" 140
No. 100, List of Novels which have effected Revolutions in Law or Manners 160
No. 101, New Coined Words helpful in Literary Criticism 180
No. 102, Prose Eulogy of the Tomato 199
No. 103, Denunciation of some Social Conventions 228
No. 104, Most Interesting incident seen during a Holiday 247
No. 105, Plot of a Magazine Story 268
No. 106, Description of Pictures in a Private Room 293
No. 107, The most interesting Books in the Autumn Announcements 348
No. 108, Ode to Forgotten Authors 366
No. 109, Plea for a Poet born since 1850 392
No. 110, Best Novels of 1901 430
No. 111, Verses, entitled "Bulbs" 448
No. 112, Criticism of Lines on "Bulbs" .. 468
No. 113, Criticism of a Book published in 1901.. 490
No. 114, Criticism of a Dramatic Detail in Shakespeare's Plays.. 513
No. 115, Christmas Carol 572
No. 116, Ghost Story.. 598
No. 117, New Year's Greeting to a Soldier in South Africa 620
No. 118, Quotations applicable to Lord Rosebery 640

ILLUSTRATIONS.

PAGE
"Bearing a Burden" (Menpes) 548
Book Covers, Children's 551
——————, Boys' and Girls' 557
Ferguson, William, of Kilrie, Portrait of (Raeburn) 545
More, Hannah, Portrait of (Raeburn) 545
"Sheepfold, In the" (Segantini) 547

OBITUARY.

Arnold, Mrs. 5
Besant, Sir Walter 3
Frederick, The Empress 103
Greenaway, Miss Kate 466
Stillman, Mr. W. J. 24
Tait, Prof. Peter Guthrie 24

Digitized by Google

MUDIE'S LIBRARY
(LIMITED).

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per annum.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books t the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS
NOW OFFERED AT
GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)
Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET;
241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C., LONDON;
And at Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

An American Transport in the Crimean War.

By Capt. CODMAN.

In this work Capt. Codman relates his experiences of an American Chartered Transport in the Crimean War..... The Crimean War is the connecting link between old and modern methods of warfare.

Frontispiece.
198 pp.
Price 3s. 6d.

London:
SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON & CO.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS TO "THE ACADEMY,"

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

DIGBY, LONG & CO.'S New Novels
SIX SHILLINGS EACH.

SECOND IMPRESSION NOW READY.
THE MAIDEN'S CREED. By Alan ST. AUBYN, Author of "A Fellow of Trinity," &c.

SURGEON-MAJOR H. M. GREENHOW'S NEW NOVEL.
THE EMPEROR'S DESIGN. By the Author of "The Bow of Fate," "The Tower of Ghilzai."
Dundee Courier.—"A powerfully-written story."
Daily News.—"A well contrived and readable story."
Scotsman.—"A most interesting novel."
Leeds Mercury.—"The story is deeply interesting."

J. T. FINDLAY'S NEW HISTORICAL ROMANCE.
A DEAL WITH THE KING.
By the Author of "The Secession in the North," &c.
Scotsman.—"The story is delightful in every respect....enthralling the reader from beginning to end"

NEW NOVEL BY ALIX ORIENT.
TANGLES: The Game and the Onlookers.
Manchester Courier.—"An excellent novel, full of interest.... It is a novel to be read with greater interest a second time."
Leeds Mercury.—"A clever and interesting novel. 'Tangles' is thoughtfully and well written, and will more than repay perusal."

MRS. ROBERT JOCELYN'S NEW NOVEL.
THE SEA OF FORTUNE. By the Author of "H.F.H.'s Daughter," "Only a Flirt," &c.

J. E. MUDDOCK'S NEW NOVEL.
WHOSE WAS THE HAND? By the Author of "Stripped of the Tinsel," "In the King's Favour."

FRANCES CAMPBELL'S NEW NOVEL.
LOVE, THE ATONEMENT. By the Author of "For Three Moons," &c. [Just out.

HIS LAWFUL WIFE. By Jean MIDDLEMASS, Author of "A Girl in a Thousand," &c.

A DARING SPIRIT. By Mrs. BAGOT HARTE, Author of "Wrongly Condemned," "At the Eleventh Hour," &c.
Birmingham Gazette.—"A brightly written story."
Outlook.—"Sensational, but good of its kind."
Pall Mall Gazette.—"A book to be read with pleasure."

A STOLEN WOOING. By Seyton HEATH.
Manchester Courier.—"A very good novel indeed. The story is well told and full of interest."
London: DIGBY, LONG & CO., 18, Bouverie Street, E.C.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!
6s., claret roan, gilt, Illustrated.
LONDON IN THE TIME OF THE DIAMOND JUBILEE.
London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.
Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.
Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING, A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.
THE NORFOLK BROADS.
BRECON and its BEACONS.
ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.
THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.
THE ISLE OF WIGHT.
THE WYE VALLEY.
THE SEVERN VALLEY.
BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.
BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.
LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR, LLANFAIRFECHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON.
ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.
CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, & FESTINIOG.
BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and PWLLHELI.
MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, & CHELTENHAM.
LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.
NORWICH, LOWESTOFT, YARMOUTH, and the NORFOLK BROADS.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.
"It very emphatically tops them all."—Daily Graphic.
"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 5s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.
LONDON AND ENVIRONS
By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.
With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.
London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT, & Co. Ltd., The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers.
Paris and New York: BRENTANO'S.

SELECTIONS FROM ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD'S
PUBLICATIONS.

WORKS BY DR. MACLAREN.
Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 5s. each, post free.

THE GOD of the AMEN, and other Sermons.
"The several sermons contained in this volume are replete with a keen spiritual insight, combined with an aptness of illustration and beauty of diction which cannot fail to both impress and charm the reader."
Methodist Times.

THE WEARIED CHRIST, and other Sermons.
"They show the same wonderful fertility of apt and beautiful illustrations, the same exquisite use of language, the same direct heart-searching power which we are accustomed to find in all Dr. Maclaren's works."—Christian World Pulpit.

THE BEATITUDES, and other Sermons.
"An excellent exposition of the Beatitudes.....full of thought and knowledge and power."
British Weekly.

THE UNCHANGING CHRIST, and other Sermons.
"Distinguished by the finest scholarship and most exquisite literary finish."—Christian Leader.

THE HOLY of HOLIES. A Series of Sermons on the 14th, 15th, and 16th Chapters of the Gospel by John.
"No British preacher has unfolded this portion of Scripture in a more scholarly style."
North British Daily Mail.

PAUL'S PRAYERS, and other Sermons.
"They are plain enough to be understood by the unlearned, and yet have sufficient richness and cogency to attract the most cultivated."
New York Observer.

CHRIST'S "MUSTS," and other Sermons.
"Felicitous exposition, rugged, intense eloquence, and beautiful illustration."—Word and Work.

London: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, Limited, 21 and 22, Furnival Street, Holborn, W.C.

Digitized by Google

VOLUMES FOR THE SUMMER

ISSUED BY

CASSELL & COMPANY, Limited.

AN IMPORTANT NEW NOVEL

About 175,000 Copies of

ALICE OF OLD VINCENNES,

By MAURICE THOMPSON,

HAVE BEEN CALLED FOR IN THE UNITED STATES.

The Work will shortly be published in England by Messrs. CASSELL & COMPANY.

Price 6s.

The First large Edition prepared having been more than exhausted by the orders received in advance, it has therefore been found necessary to postpone publication for a few days.

THE ART GIFT-BOOK OF THE SEASON.

JUST PUBLISHED, price 7s. 6d.

ROYAL ACADEMY PICTURES, 1901.

Containing FIVE SPECIAL REMBRANDT PHOTOGRAVURE PLATES,

And about 200 exquisite Illustrations, including reproductions of some important Pictures by eminent Artists that appear in NO OTHER PUBLICATION.

"The most perfect representation of the Academy ever placed within reach of the public."
Westminster Gazette.

MR. J. BLOUNDELLE-BURTON'S NEW NOVEL.

JUST PUBLISHED, price 6s.

A VANISHED RIVAL. By J. BLOUNDELLE BURTON,

Author of "In the Day of Adversity," "A Bitter Heritage," "The Hispaniola Plate," &c.

"We predict that whosoever reads this, one of the most masterly of Mr. Bloundelle-Burton's productions, will be carried along by swiftly moving events, full of delightful excitement."—Field.

MR. FRANK STOCKTON'S NEW VOLUME OF STORIES.

JUST PUBLISHED, price 6s.

AFIELD and AFLOAT. By Frank R. STOCKTON,

Author of "Mrs. Cliff's Yacht," "Adventures of Captain Horn," "The Girl at Cobhurst," &c. With 12 Illustrations.

"Brimming over with the author's gifts of imagination, humour, and delicate observation."
Manchester Guardian.

A BOOK FOR ALL PUBLIC SCHOOL MEN.

JUST PUBLISHED, price 5s.

AN ETON BOY'S LETTERS.

By NUGENT BANKES,

Author of "A Day of my Life at Eton," &c.

"There isn't an old, or let us say an elderly, Etonian to whom this book will not come as a tickle in the ribs, waking him up to any number of pleasant memories."—Punch.

CASSELL'S SIXPENNY EDITIONS OF FAMOUS NOVELS.

THE NEXT VOLUME, READY IN A FEW DAYS, IS

J. BLOUNDELLE-BURTON'S famous adventure story of the Spanish Main, entitled

THE HISPANIOLA PLATE.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED, Ludgate Hill, London.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS

SIR WALTER BESANT'S NEW NOVEL.

Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

THE LADY OF LYNN.

By SIR WALTER BESANT,

Author of "The Orange Girl," &c.

With 12 Illustrations by G. DEMAIN-HAMMOND.

New Six-Shilling Novels.

A FORBIDDEN NAME:

A Story of the Court of Catherine the Great.

By FRED. WHISHAW.

"A thoroughly competent piece of work."
Manchester Guardian.

THE MILLIONAIRE MYSTERY.

By FERGUS HUME,

Author of "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab."

"A capital book, which no one will read without enjoying."—Scotsman.

WILDERSMOOR.

By C. L. ANTROBUS,

Author of "Quality Corner."

SECOND EDITION.

"The book is so clever, that it can hardly fail to be appreciated as it deserves."—Morning Post.

THIS TROUBLESOME WORLD.

By L. T. MEADE And CLIFFORD HALIFAX, M.D.

SECOND EDITION.

"Full of sparkling dialogue and stirring scenes."
Daily.

New Three-and-Sixpenny Books.

THE HONOUR OF THE ARMY

And Other Stories.

By ÉMILE ZOLA.

Edited, with an Introduction, by ERNEST A. VIZETELLY.

HER ROYAL HIGHNESS WOMAN.

By MAX O'RELL.

THIRD EDITION.

"A delightfully amusing companion."—Punch.

CHAPENGA'S WHITE MAN.

By A. WERNER.

"The story of this little brown imp is fascinating."
World.

TOLD BY THE TAFFRAIL.

By SUNDOWNER.

"Undeniable cleverness."—Spectator.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

Mr. T. FISHER UNWIN'S LIST.

GEORGE MOORE'S GREAT NOVEL, SISTER TERESA, will be published on July the 8th, in Unwin's Green Cloth Library; and an entirely rewritten Sixpenny Edition of EVELYN INNES, by the same Author, will be ready on the same day.

RENAISSANCE TYPES. By WILLIAM SAMUEL LILLY, Honorary Fellow of Peterhouse, Cambridge. Cloth, gilt, 16s.

POEMS. By W. B. Yeats. New and Revised Edition. Cloth, 7s. 6d.

A LITERARY HISTORY of IRELAND. By Dr. DOUGLAS HYDE. New Edition Just Published. ("Library of Literary History.") Cloth, 16s.

THE BOOK of the CHEESE: Traits and Stories of "Ye Olde Cheshire Cheese," Fleet Street. Fourth Edition. Fully Illustrated. Cloth, 2s.; paper, 1s.

A NOVEL OF NEW ZEALAND LIFE OF THIRTY YEARS AGO.

A THOUSAND PITIES. By Ellen TAYLOR. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

YESTERE: the Romance of a LIFE. By "VARTENIE." Cloth, 6s.

Books for Summer Reading

By PAUL BOURGET. THE DISCIPLE. 6s.

By GWENDOLEN PRYCE. JOHN JONES, CURATE. 6s.

By J. L. LAMBE BY COMMAND OF THE PRINCE. 6s.

By W. BARRY. THE WIZARD'S KNOT. 6s.

By AMELIA E. BARR. THE MAID OF MAIDEN LANE. 6s.

By ALLAN McAULAY. BLACK MARY. 6s.

By MARY E. MANN. AMONG THE SYRINGAS. 6s.

By GEORGE MOORE. SISTER TERESA. 6s. [July 8.

By HENRY WILLARD FRENCH. DESMONDE, M.D. 2s. 6d.

By LOUIS BECKE. TESSA, THE TRADER'S WIFE. 2s 6d.

By JOHN OLIVER HOBBES. THE GODS, SOME MORTALS, AND LORD WICKENHAM. Cloth, 2s; Paper, 1s.

By BARRY PAIN. ANOTHER ENGLISHWOMAN'S LOVE-LETTERS. Cloth, 2s.; Paper, 1s.

By ? THE LETTERS OF HER MOTHER TO ELIZABETH. Cloth, 2s.; Paper, 1s.

By IRVING BACHELLER. EBEN HOLDEN. 6d.

By ROBERT BUCHANAN. EFFIE HETHERINGTON. 6d.

London: T. FISHER UNWIN, Paternoster Square, E.C.

Digitized by Google

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No 1522. Established 1869. 6 July, 1901. Price Threepence.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

Owing to the death of Sir Walter Besant, and to the necessity of making fresh arrangements for the publication of the Author, that periodical will not be published in August and September. To the current number, which appears in black borders, Mr. George Meredith, President of the Society of Authors, sends the following appreciation of the late Editor of the Author:

> Our society has to sustain a heavy blow in the death of Sir Walter Besant; and although vitality breathes from a bright example, such a loss may well seem to us at the moment irreparable. It is hard to speak of him within measure when we consider his devotion to the cause of authors, and the constant good service rendered by him to their material interests. In this he was a valorous, alert, persistent advocate, and it will not be denied by his opponents that he was always urbane, his object being simply to establish a system of fair dealing between the sagacious publishers of books and the inexperienced, often heedless, producers. How unselfishly, with how pure a generosity he gave his valuable time to the previously neglected office of adviser to the more youthful of his profession, may be estimated by a review of his memorable labours in other fields. They were vast and toilsome, yet he never missed an occasion for acting as the young author's voluntary friend in the least sentimental and most sensible manner. He had no thought of trouble or personal loss where the welfare of his fellow-workers was concerned. We have lost in him the very beating heart of our society, and it is by holding his name in grateful remembrance that we may best hope to have something of his energies remaining with us.

Mr. Alfred Sutro has been engaged this week in contradicting certain ridiculous rumours, originating in America, in regard to the health of M. Maeterlinck. One was that he had gone into a Retreat in consequence of his mind being affected. We have Mr. Sutro's authority for stating that M. Maeterlinck is in the enjoyment of excellent health.

Mr. Rudyard Kipling's Kim, which is appearing serially in Cassell's Magazine, will be published in the autumn. The first English edition will consist of 50,000 copies.

The Bishop of Winchester has issued a circular letter appealing for donations to the proposed memorial to Miss Charlotte M. Yonge. It has been decided that some suitable memorial shall be placed in the village church of Otterbourne, in which Miss Yonge daily worshipped; and further, that in the Cathedral of Winchester, with which her name will always be associated, visitors shall be "appropriately reminded of an authoress whose books are known and loved by thousands both in England and in America." The exact form of the memorial in the cathedral must partly depend upon the money forthcoming in response to this appeal. A carved oak reredos in the restored Lady Chapel, or a stained-glass window near to that which commemorates Jane Austen, has been suggested as appropriate. Donations may be sent to Messrs. Prescott, Dimsdale and Co.'s Bank, Winchester.

Mr. R. L. Stevenson, in a letter from Samoa, in September, 1894, to his cousin, Mr. R. A. M. Stevenson, in Edinburgh, wrote: "Tell some of your journalistic friends with a good style to popularise old Skene; or say your prayers, and read him for yourself. He was a great historian, and I was his blessed clerk and did not know it, and you will not be in a state of grace about the Picts till you have studied him." Mr. Eneas Mackay, of Stirling, announces a new edition of Skene's Highlanders of Scotland. The first edition is out of print, and very scarce.

Mr. John P. Young, managing editor of the San Francisco Chronicle, has sent to the Times the following communication with reference to an article in the Pall Mall Magazine for June, called "An Unpublished Chapter in the Life of Robert Louis Stevenson," written by Mr. H. W. Bell:

> The part of Mr. Bell's article regarding which I am able to speak with positiveness is that in which he states with some circumstantiality that Robert Louis Stevenson, late in December, 1879, arrived in San Francisco, and in the spring of the following year was "given a job" in the city department of the San Francisco Chronicle, which he performed in such an unsatisfactory manner that the item he was assigned to write had to be given to another reporter to put into English suitable to the readers of the paper and the latitude of California; and that later "he continued to write articles for the Sunday edition of the Chronicle, but there is no indication that he thought affectionately of them, for he never rescued them from the files." Both these statements are absolutely false. I was managing editor of the Chronicle at the time, and personally knew every reporter, whether on the regular staff or doing merely detail work. I also read and accepted all the manuscripts published in the Chronicle during the period mentioned, and can assert with positiveness that the Chronicle was never honoured by the offer of one from Mr. Stevenson. I do not trust to my memory solely on this point, but have caused the account books of the Chronicle to be carefully examined, and no trace of Mr. Stevenson's name can be found in them. Had he worked a single day for the paper, or contributed an article or articles, there would be a record of the fact, for the affairs of the Chronicle are methodically managed. To make assurance doubly sure, however, I have questioned the then city editor of the Chronicle and others who were on the staff of the paper in 1879 and 1880, and they all unite in saying that there is absolutely no foundation for the statements I am here denying, as they have already been denied in the columns of the Chronicle. I wish to add something that should be conclusive on this point. The Chronicle, like most journals, tries to make the most of such facts as the connexion of distinguished writers. Does any one suppose for a moment that if Robert Louis Stevenson had been a contributor to the paper that we should not have been proud to dwell on the fact?

Digitized by Google

Mr. Elliott Stock's facsimile reprint of The Germ has the merit of being absolutely faithful to the original. Its four numbers (the last two were entitled Art and Poetry) are issued, together with a separate pamphlet preface by Mr. W. M. Rossetti, in a neat card-board case. Original copies of The Germ are now very scarce and proportionately valuable. As much as £104 has been paid for a set. Mr. W. M. Rossetti is the natural historian of the magazine, inasmuch as he was its editor. The Præraphaelite Brotherhood was founded in 1848, and Mr. Rossetti not only names its members—Holman-Hunt, Millais, Dante Gabriel Rossetti, Woolner the sculptor, James Collinson, Frederic George Stephens, and himself—but adds a list of those who were intimate with the members. In 1849 the members first exhibited pictures conceived in the new spirit; and then they bethought themselves of literature. The author of the project > was Dante Gabriel Rossetti. He alone among the P.R.B.'s had already cultivated the art of writing in verse and in prose to some noticeable extent ("The Blessed Damozel" had been produced before May, 1847), and he was better acquainted than any other member with British and foreign literature. There need be no self-conceit in saying that in these respects I came next to him. Holman-Hunt, Woolner, and Stephens were all reading men (in British literature only) within straiter bounds than Rossetti; not any one of them, I think, had as yet done in writing anything worth mentioning. Millais and Collinson, more especially the former, were men of the brush, not the pen, yet both of them capable of writing with point, and even in verse. By July 13 and 14, 1849, some steps were taken towards discussing the project of a magazine. The price, as at first proposed, was to be sixpence; the title, "Monthly Thoughts in Literature, Poetry, and Art"; each number was to have an etching. Soon afterwards a price of one shilling was decided upon, and two etchings per number: but this latter intention was not carried out.

The name of the magazine was not settled without difficulty, nor was it then adhered to. Among the titles suggested were "The Seed," "The Scroll," "The Harbinger," "The Sower," "The Truth-Seeker," and "The Acorn." Dante Gabriel Rossetti's suggestion was "Thoughts Toward Nature," and this furnished the subtitle. Seven hundred copies of the first number were printed, of which about 200 were sold. Of No. 2 only 500 copies were printed, and the sale was smaller than before. The magazine would then have stopped but for the offer of the printers to produce two more numbers at their own expense. These also fell quite flat. "People would not buy The Germ, and would scarcely know of its existence. Its debts exceeded its assets, and a sum of £33, due on Nos. 1 and 2, had to be cleared off by the seven (or eight) proprietors, conscientious against the grain."

The most famous contribution to The Germ, by far, was Dante Gabriel Rossetti's "The Blessed Damozel," though it appeared in a form very inferior to that which he afterwards gave to it. The Germ text has been published separately, with an exhaustive introduction, by Messrs. Duckworth. Miss Christina M. Rossetti and Coventry Patmore contributed verses. Patmore's little poem, "The Season," should alone have helped the magazine to a larger sale:

> The crocus in the shrewd March morn,
> Thrusts up his saffron spear;
> And April dots the sombre thorn
> With gems, and loveliest cheer.
>
> Then sleep the seasons, full of might;
> While slowly swells the pod,
> And rounds the peach, and in the night
> The mushroom bursts the sod.
>
> The winter comes: the frozen rut
> Is bound with silver bars;
> The white drift heaps against the hut;
> And night is pierced with stars.

Mr. W. M. Rossetti's own most interesting contribution is a careful review of "The Strayed Reveller; and Other Poems. By A." The number of copies of Mr. Stock's complete reprint is 700; the price, 10s. 6d. net.

Being a fighter, Mr. Clement K. Shorter is likely to answer the strictures passed upon his biographical treatment of the Brontës in the introduction to Messrs. Downey's new library edition of Mrs. Gaskell's Life, written by Mr. Temple Scott and Mr. B. W. Willett. These critics name three books which have added important new material to this work. They are Sir T. Wemyss Reid's monograph on Charlotte Brontë, Mr. Francis A. Leyland's The Brontë Family, and Mr. Shorter's Charlotte Brontë and Her Circle. Concerning the last-named, the editors express the opinion that Mr. Shorter, "in some instances, simply represents the views of Mr. Nicholls, who is, of course, prejudiced, especially as he did not like Mrs. Gaskell." They add:

> The most flagrant instance of Mr. Shorter's injustice to Mrs. Gaskell is his statement on p. 464—that he had "gathered from Mrs. Gaskell" that Charlotte Brontë's marriage had been an unhappy one, whereas Mrs. Gaskell speaks of it in such terms as "the too short, almost perfect happiness of her nine months of wedded life," and quotes Charlotte's last words, "Oh! I am not going to die, am I? He will not separate us; we have been so happy!" Had Mr. Shorter not read Mrs. Gaskell when he wrote thus, or did he deliberately misrepresent her? Either alternative is apt to engender mistrust in him as a biographer, and, as a matter of fact, there are other cases in which he fails to do justice to his predecessors, or to state the case fairly.

It is never right to judge a new paper by its first number save with allowances, and some imaginative sympathy; but even without these Mr. Shorter's new Tatler must please. It is a very bright budget of the men and women and things of to-day, and we wish it success. The Tatler's dealings with literature are in the personal vein. Like unto this, for example: "Mr. Arthur Humphreys, so well known as the head of the bookselling firm of Hatchards of Piccadilly, and as the publisher of Lord Rosebery's Napoleon, has been engaged at Sandringham in arranging the King's private library. His Majesty, although he has suddenly come into possession of the fine library at Windsor, has naturally a genuine affection for the library which he has built up for himself in his Norfolk home, and indeed his interest in his books is really very keen." On the same page, which is headed "The Literary Personalities of the Hour," we have portraits of Mr. A. E. Housman, Mrs. J. C. Woods, author of Tangled Trinities, and "Zack." The particulars given of the three Housmans, Alfred Edward, Laurence, and their sister, Miss Clemence Housman, are interesting and useful.

Mr. Andrew D. White, the United States Ambassador to Germany, writes very interestingly, in the July Idler, about some recent walks and talks he has had with Tolstoy. He thoroughly believed in Tolstoy's sincerity and genius, but found himself constantly at issue with him in his opinions. Tolstoy spoke with disapprobation of travel, and Mr. White fastens on this, observing: "Of all distinguished men that I have ever met, Tolstoy seems to me most in need of that enlargement of view and healthful modification of opinion which come from observing men, and comparing opinions on different lands and under different conditions. This need has been all the greater because in Russia there is no opportunity to discuss really important questions."

Digitized by Google

In Tolstoy, says Mr. White, we see a man who, nourished in and on Russia, is a narrow and fantastic teacher, and > a man of genius denouncing all science, and commending what he calls "faith"; urging a return to a state of nature, which is simply Rosseau modified by misreadings of the New Testament; repudiating marriage, though himself most happily married, and the father of sixteen children; holding that Æschylus and Dante and Shakespeare were not great in literature, and making of some obscure writer a literary idol; holding that Michael Angelo and Raphael were not great in sculpture and painting, yet insisting on the eminence of sundry unknown artists who have painted brutally; holding that Beethoven, Handel, Mozart, and Hadyn were not great in music, but that some unknown performer, outside any healthful musical evolution, has given us the music of the future; declaring Napoleon to have had no genius, but presenting Kutusoff as a military ideal; loathing science—that organised knowledge which has done more than all else to bring us out of mediæval cruelty into a better world—and extolling a "faith" which has always been the most effective pretext for bloodshed and oppression.

>
> The long, slow, everyday work of developing a better future for his countrymen is to be done by others far less gifted than Tolstoy. His paradoxes will be forgotten; but his devoted life, his noble thoughts, and his lofty ideals will, as centuries roll on, more and more give life and light to the new Russia.

To their edition of Lord Chesterfield's Letters to His Son, which we notice elsewhere, Mr. Charles Strachey and Miss Annette Calthrop affix a quotation from the letter of March 19, 1750, which we will quote at more length from the text. Writing from London to his son in Italy, Lord Chesterfield says: "When you return here, I am apt to think that you will find something better to do than to run to Mr. Osborne's, at Gray's Inn, to pick up scarce books. Buy good books, and read them; the best books are the commonest, and the last editions are always the best, if the editors are not blockheads, for they may profit of the former."

When Lord Chesterfield found that his son was fond of out-of-the-way books, he tactfully wrote, in the same strain: "I am also very well pleased to hear that you have such a knowledge of, and taste for, curious books, and scarce and valuable tracts. This is a kind of knowledge which very well becomes a man of sound and solid learning, but which only exposes a man of slight and superficial reading; therefore, pray, make the substance and matter of such books your first object, and their title-pages, indexes, letter, and binding but your second."

By the way, there is an example in Mr. Strachey's introduction to the Letters of a very deliberate, yet, we cannot help thinking, rather unfortunate choice of a word. Referring to Chesterfield's reputedly "immoral" advice to his son on the subject of women, dissimulation, etc., he says: "I maintain that all the advice contained in the Letters which any unprejudiced, unpriggish person might reasonably call immoral, could easily be contained in a very few lines of this large book; and, speaking for myself, I should call such advice naughty rather than immoral." For ourselves, we would much rather go on calling Chesterfield's advice immoral, and then indicate the particular shade of immorality which ought to be imputed to him under all the circumstances. "Naughty" suggests frivolity or carelessness. Chesterfield can be charged with neither; the charm and strength of his letters—and they are very charming, and very strong—lies in their sincerity and firmness of intention.

We did not think, in discussing Matthew Arnold's Letters, last week, that we should this week record the death of Mrs. Arnold, to whom many of them were addressed, and by whose permission all of them were printed. Mrs. Arnold died last Saturday, at Pain's Hill Cottage, Cobham, after a long illness. She was Frances Lucy, daughter of the late Sir William Wightman, the Queen's Bench Judge, and was married to Matthew Arnold almost exactly forty years ago. Three children survive her—Mr. R. P. Arnold, an inspector of factories, and two daughters, one of whom is the wife of Mr. F. W. Whitridge, of New York. The younger daughter is the widow of the Hon. Armine Wodehouse, M.P., who died but two months ago.

Those who like curiosities and details of fiction will enjoy a paper in the July Macmillan on "The Serving Man in Fiction." The writer has most to say about Scott, Dickens, and Thackeray. We write the names in the order in which they appreciated and sympathised with servants. To Thackeray, it is maintained, servants "are knaves or fools, cunning knaves or contemptible fools. . . . In Thackeray's opinion Sam Weller would have told his master's purposes to Job Trotter, and then the precious pair would have looked how they might make a little for themselves. . . . Servants may consider Thackeray as an open enemy, and Dickens as but half a friend. He, too, hates the menials of the mighty, but he breaks them on the wheel with heavy blows, while Thackeray sets them up like so many St. Sebastians as marks for his arrows. Mr. John Smauker and Mr. Frederick Lightfoot are both mangled objects after the operation. Dickens's declared mission is to show how much good can be in humble folk, but in this, like most missionaries, he more often takes the wrong road. The servants of the poor, those who labour for labourers, are under his protection, and he defends them too much as Serjeant Buzfuz would have done; special pleading is not convincing. Is any one moved to a crusade by the sorrows of 'Guster, or the forlorn state of Sally Brass's slave, the Marchioness? But to censure Dickens's conception of pathos is to mutilate the slain. His life's work was to move English people to laughter—neither the Scotch nor the Irish care for Dickens—and the two characters whom all novel-readers admire and cherish are both servants, Sam Weller and Mark Tapley." But Mr. Andrew Lang is a Scot.

From "The Serving Man in Fiction" it is a rather long step to "The Preternatural in Fiction." This subject is being treated in the Pilot by a writer who signs himself M.E.C. His first paper, last week, dealt with Mrs. Oliphant's Tales of the Seen and Unseen. The writer opens with a brief and suggestive consideration of Shakespeare's attitude to the preternatural.

In a warmly appreciative article on Mr. Robert Bridges's poetry, in the Monthly Review, Mr. Arthur Symons says: "Mr. Meredith, caring mostly for originality, invents for every noun an adjective which has never run in harness with it, and which champs and rears intractably at its side. Mr. Swinburne, preferring what goes smoothly to what comes startlingly from a distance, chooses his epithets for their sound and for their traditional significance, their immediate appeal, sensuous or intellectual. Mr. Bridges obtains his delicate, evasively simple effects by coaxing beautiful, alien words to come together willingly, and take service with him, as if they had been born under his care." But this verbal petting is not enough.

American critics are apparently quite aware of the fact that the "booms" of historical and other novels which are now the order of the day in the States have little relation to the permanent advance of American literature. "Perhaps one of these books," says the New York Times Saturday Review, "may be bought and read five years from now, possibly ten, just conceivably twenty. But nobody who has watched the rise, decline, and fall of immediately successful books will assign to any a long date. He will rather entertain the presumption, founded on experience, that an immediate success is ephemeral, that it is a matter which concerns bookselling more than literature, that these prodigious successes are really commonplace and insipid and transitory as works of art."

Digitized by Google

We remarked some weeks ago that Mr. Stephen Gwynn is a deft writer of vers de société. That he takes a critical interest in this branch of literature is shown by his article on the subject in the July New Liberal Review. Talking, at the outset, of the difficulty of defining vers de société, Mr. Gwynn says:

> Will any one say off-hand whether the verses in which Horace invites Virgil to dinner are or are not vers de société? For my own part I should incline to exclude them from that class on the ground that the Latin in them differs radically from the polished colloquial tongue which we know in Cicero's Letters. Vers de société, as I understand them, use the rhythm of verse, but the dialect of prose, which is more complex and conventional than the dialect of poetry. Of course, the two dialects have much in common: "I love you," "I hate you," are good either in poetry or in prose. But you cannot say in poetry, "I congratulate you on your safe arrival," whereas the very essence of vers de société is the dexterous arrangement of such phrases as this one in smooth, running verse, so as to afford a certain piquant incongruity between the matter and the form.

Mr. Gwynn runs over the best writers very pleasantly: Cowper, Praed, Calverley, Mr. Lehmann, Mr. Dobson, Thackeray, Mr. C. L. Graves, Mr. Lang, Mortimer Collins, and others.

Bibliographical.

It is interesting to know that there is still a demand for Paul Ferroll and Why Paul Ferroll Killed his Wife, new editions of both of which are promised by Messrs Chatto & Windus. Messrs. Chatto have had the books on their list for some years. I have a Paul Ferroll of theirs dated 1881, and a copy of its sequel dated 1882. The firm reissued the former in 1890. The story came out originally in 1855, and is, therefore, non-copyright. The sequel belongs to 1860. An interesting criticism on both will be found in Women Novelists of Queen Victoria's Reign (1897), written by Miss Adeline Sergeant. Miss Sergeant mentions that it was not until the fourth edition of Paul Ferroll was prepared that the concluding chapter, bringing the narrative down to the death of Paul, was added. "It is rather curious," as Miss Sergeant says, "that Mrs. Clive should have written another volume to explain why Paul Ferroll killed his wife"; and it is notable that in this sequel, which is much inferior to its predecessor, she changes the names of all the characters except Paul's wife—which is also rather unaccountable.

I am glad to see Paul Ferroll still to the fore, and apparently still in the current repertory of fiction, because I have always regarded it as, in its way, an historical "document." It marks a development in English story-telling. It was, as Miss Sergeant truly calls it, "the precursor of the purely sensational novel, or of what may be called the novel of mystery. . . . It set forth the delights of a mystery, the pleasures of suspense, together with a thrilling picture of 'the strong man in adversity.' . . . It introduced its readers to a new sensation. . . . To find a villain—and a thorough-paced villain, the murderer of his wife—installed in the place of hero, and represented as noble, handsome and gifted, naturally thrilled the readers' minds with a mixture of horror and delight." Mrs. Clive's third novel, John Greswold (1864), is now wholly neglected.

The new Professor of English Literature at Owens College has been tolerably prolific as an author. Between 1880 and 1882 he published several prize essays, his first substantial publication being his work on The Literary Relations of England and Germany in the Sixteenth Century (1886). Then came his book on The Age of Wordsworth (1897), and his edition, with introductions and notes, of the works of Shakespeare (1899). His work as editor of the Warwick Library and the Warwick Shakespeare is well remembered. He has always taken a great interest in the drama of all countries, and we owe to him translations into English of the Brand (1893) and Love's Comedy (1900) of Ibsen. Altogether, a good literary record, and suggestive of things yet to come.

Mr. Stephen Gwynn, who has only recently brought out a little volume of verse, now announces the imminent appearance of a novel from his active pen. If this sort of thing goes on, we shall soon have to compile his bibliography. Unheard of, I believe, in the literary world prior to 1898, Mr. Gwynn published in that year a Memoir of James Northcote and a story called The Repentance of a Private Secretary. In 1899 he produced three volumes—a study of Tennyson, The Decay of Sensibility, and Other Essays, and a description of the Highways and Byways of Donegal and Antrim. Mr. Gwynn has certainly made a good deal of literary hay during the last four years.

Paul Bourget in English is a growing quantity. In 1887 Mr. Vizetelly gave us his Love Crime and Cruel Enigma. In 1889 came his André Cornelis, translated by Mrs. Cashel Hoey. To 1891-92 belongs his Pastels of Men, which came to us viâ America, and was reproduced in 1899. To 1892 belongs also A Saint and Others, Englished by John Gray. The Love Crime reappeared in 1893. In 1894 another translation of A Saint came from U.S.A. In 1895 we had M. Bourget's Outre-Mer: Impressions of America, which reminded us that another Outre-Mer, Longfellow, had long ago recorded his impressions of Europe. In 1896 again came A Living Lie and A Tragic Idyl; in 1898, Some Portraits of Women, translated by Mr. William Marchant; and in 1900 Domestic Dramas, also Englished by Mr. Marchant. The two last named are American in origin, as is also, I suspect, the Bourget book just issued, The Disciple.

Greatly daring, Mr. William Poel is going to give at the Charterhouse a performance of the old "morality," "Every-Man," which Dr. A. W. Ward, I see, regards as "the flower and crown of the literary species to which it belongs." Those who propose to witness the representation may be glad to be reminded that the text of the "morality" is to be found in Hawkins's Origin of the English Drama, and also in Hazlitt's Dodsley. Extracts from it are given by Mr. Pollard in his English Miracle Plays. A sketch of the story is supplied by Dr. Ward in his English Dramatic Literature, vol. i., in which may also be seen an account of its literary history. Its full title is "A Treatise, how the hye Fader of Heven sendeth Dethe to somon every creature to come and gyve a counte of theyr lyves in this Worlde."

I was right, it seems, in expressing my belief that Mr. George Radford's article on Falstaff had been included in his Shylock volume, and that he was also the author of a book of Occasional Verses. I am now reminded that he contributed to the Johnson Club Papers (published, like Shylock, &c., by Mr. Fisher Unwin) an essay on "Dr. Johnson at Lichfield," and some verses addressed to the editors of that work. Mr. Radford comes of a well-known Plymouth family, and is a solicitor and a L.C.C. He is brother to Mr. Ernest Radford, whose little books of verse are known to all close students of contemporary bardism.

The Bookworm.

Digitized by Google

Reviews.

With a J Pen.

A New English Dictionary on Historical Principles. Edited by Dr. James A. H. Murray. (Clarendon Press. 2s. 6d.)

The English language resembles England in this, that the earth-worms of time have turned over every inch of it, and not a letter, any more than a county, is without its historical strata, relics, and suggestion. A chance column of the New English Dictionary is as fertile of fact and romance as a chance village into whose history you may look. Here we have the major number of words borne by that alphabetical light-weight, J. Two things would strike one quickly, even if they were not pointed out by Dr. Murray. One is the large number of words of unknown or obscure origin. Many of these may be set down as onomatopœic. The other is the number of personal proper names which have become common nouns, or have otherwise been saddled with special duties. Take some obscure origins first. Jibe, meaning to accord with, is a rare word nowadays, though Mark Twain has it in his Screamers. "The piece you happened to be playing didn't seem to gibe with the general gait of the picture that was passing at the time." Seven years ago the New York Nation said, in its review of Trilby: "The dislike of Trilby's posing for the 'altogether' doesn't jibe with the author's authoritative declaration that to all artists nothing is so chaste as nudity." Dr. Murray thinks that jibe may be phonetically connected with chime (chime in with). Jib, meaning (of a horse) to stop, or move restively backwards, is another orphan word. Dr. Murray doubts its transference from the gibbing of a sail, nor can any historical connection be traced with OF. and modern dialect French giber, to kick. Jiffey, a short space of time, is also a puzzle. The earliest quotation found is in Munchausen: "In six jiffies I found myself and all my retinue at the Rock of Gibralter." Six jiffeys seems slow work, now that "half a jiffey" is commonly said. Jig, a lively dance, has jigged itself into the language without a birth certificate. We do not often see it now in the sense of a piece of sport, a joke, or jesting matter. "An arch, merry trick," is the definition of an eighteenth century vocabularist. Thackeray wrote: "Her jigs and her junketings and her tears"; and Mr. Howells has written, apropos of something: "The die is cast, the jig is up, the fat's in the fire, the milk's spilt." Jig may mean a horse, also a man. The great Bentham wrote: "This Lord and Lady Tracton are the queerest jigs you ever saw." Man's names for man are more curious than flattering. The late Mr. Hamerton wrote a book on Man in Art; someone might write one on Man in Language, and speculate with sad entertainingness on the processes by which man came to look on his brother man as a Johnny; also as a Joker, a Joskin, a Jigger, a Chap, a Card, a Stick, a Buffer, a Shaver, a Blade, a Dog, and what else has been common. As the child of an orphan "jigger" has done well for itself, having struck so many roots into the language that it is now one of the hardiest of verbaceous creepers. Literally, a jigger is one who dances a jig; hence an odd-looking person, a guy. But nautically, a jigger means several things which only elderly seafaring men can be supposed to understand. In mining, fishing, pottery, billiards, and the United States Mint, the word has its uses; and it is slang for a door, a prison-cell, an illicit distillery, and a drink or dram of spirits—all these are jiggers. As a frequentative of the verb jig, jigger is said of a fish struggling on the hook. "He came up slowly and 'jiggered' savagely at the line," writes Mr. Andrew Lang in an angling sketch. Then what are we to make of jigger as an oath? Dr. Murray can but point hither and thither in uncertainty. "Well, I'll be jiggered," one hears him mutter in despair.

Some melancholy reflections might be founded on the sense development of the word jockey; for if an honest man be the noblest work of God, this word proclaims him the rarest. Jockey is but a pet diminutive of John. The normal male child is Little Jock or Jocky. "Hence applicable to any man of the common people; also a lad; an understrapper." Hence, also, by humorous transference, jocky may be a thing. The descent of the word from high to low estate is parabled, as it were, in a well-known scrap of Coleridge's table-talk. "Silence," he remarked, "does not always mark wisdom. I was at dinner, some time ago, in company with a man who listened to me and said nothing for a long time; but he nodded his head, and I thought him intelligent. At length, towards the end of the dinner, some apple dumplings were placed on the table, and my man had no sooner seen them than he burst forth with—'Them's the jockies for me!' I wish Spurzheim could have examined the fellow's head." Continuing its descent in the human line, jockey became the equivalent of a beggar, or vagabond. A writer of 1685 had: "He turned a vagrant fellow like a Jockie, gaining Meal, Flesh, and Money, by his Charms." Yet earlier than this jockey had come to mean a man who had to do with horses. When Pepys wanted a pair of horses for that fine coach of his, wherewith he dazzled the Hyde Park throngs, he went in search of them accompanied by his friend Hewer, and Hewer's jockey. And Smollett wrote of selling Gil Blas's mule to "a very honest jockey," who, obviously, was not a race-course jockey. Macaulay, in discussing one of Hasting's acts, wrote: "The crime . . . was regarded by them in much the same light in which the selling of an unsound horse is regarded by a Yorkshire jockey." Here we are switched on to the line of cheating in connection with horses, and in other ways. As early as 1683 the word begins to have this sense. In 1740 it is explained, as a verb, by Allen, thus: "To jockey a man is to impose upon, to cheat, to overreach; to deal with anyone, as Jockeys do with all the world. Nor is there a more deceitful race of Men than Jockeys, in their Sale of Horse flesh." Thackeray, it may be remembered, used the word in this way in Vanity Fair, when recording Becky Sharp's dealings with one of her friends in Paris. "Rebecca was a good economist, and the price poor Jos Sedley had paid for her two horses was in itself sufficient to keep their little establishment afloat for a year at least. And the way in which she jockied Jos, and which she described with infinite fun, carried up his [her husband's] delight to a pitch of quite insane enthusiasm." Dr. Murray does not, we think, quote Defoe, but there is a passage in his Tour which is interesting in that it shows how, even on the race-course, the jockey was not always the professional rider, but was sometimes the sharping owner. In the crowd at Newmarket he points out Sir R—— Fagg, of Sussex, > of whome Fame says he has the most in him, and the least to show for it, relating to Jockeyship, of any Man there; yet he often carry'd the Prize; his Horses, they said, were all Cheats, how honest soever their Master was; for he scarce ever produc'd a Horse but he look'd like what he was not, and what no Body cou'd expect him to be. . . . I was so sick of the Jockeying Part, that I left the Crowd about the Posts, and pleased myself with observing the Horses.

It should be noted, however, that much earlier than this Evelyn wrote of professional jockies—i.e. riders in the modern sense. The sinister overlapping of guileless and guileful connotations is preserved to-day; for while a "jockey" may be above suspicion, "to jockey" still means to act fraudulently or with artifice.

Returning, for a moment, to Johnny, it is interesting to find its present meaning of a uselessly ornamental fellow anticipated by Byron. In the last letter he ever wrote to

Digitized by Google

John Murray, dated from Missolonghi, he says: "On Sunday we had the smartest shock of an earthquake which I remember . . . and the whole army discharged their arms, upon the same principle that savages beat drums, or howl, during an eclipse of the moon:—it was a rare scene altogether—if you had but seen the English Johnnies, who had never been out of a cockney workshop before!—or will again if they can help it."

Among other proper names turned to common uses is Jonah, which William Black used as a verb in his novel Sabina Zembra: "I seem to Jonah (i.e. bring ill-luck to) everything I touch"; and in Captains Courageous Mr. Kipling puts this definition into the mouth of a fisherman on the Newfoundland banks: "A Jonah's anything that spoils the luck . . . I've known a splittin'-knife Jonah two trips till we was on to her." Probably many people are unaware of the supposed identity of jorum, a bowl of punch, with Joram in 2 Samuel viii. 9, 10, where we read: "When Toi king of Hamath heard that David had smitten all the host of Hadadezer, then Toi sent Joram his son unto King David, to salute him, and to bless him, because he had fought against Hadadezer, and smitten him. And Joram brought with him vessels of silver, and vessels of gold, and vessels of brass."

Jimp meant at first slim, delicate, and was a lover's word.

> I see thee dancing on the green,
> Thy waist sae jimp, thy limbs sae clean, sang Burns in rapture, and Barham echoed him in his "Legend of the Knight and Lady":

> Then his left arm he placed
> Round her jimp taper waist.

Hence jimp came to mean scant, bare (of measure). Scott, writing to Lockhart of certain Orkney Islanders, could say: "The manners of these islanders seem primitive and simple, and they are sober, good-humoured, and friendly—but jimp honest." Scott underlined the word, in apology for it; but Stevenson, in Catriona, wrote promptly—we suppose correctly: "He had jimp said the word"; i.e. he had scarcely uttered the word. The derivation of Jilt is obscure. The connection between Jews and the Jew's-harp cannot be traced. Juggins, like Jobson, was a surname, and each name has come to denote a bumpkin or dull-witted fellow. Disraeli named a Lancashire collier Juggins in Sybil. "But," says our lexicographer, "it does not appear whether or how far this is the source of the slang term"; some take the latter as a fantastically perverted derivation of 'mug,' greenhorn, found (1861) in Mahew's London Labour." Jingo was in 1670 a piece of conjurer's gibberish, nothing more. A conjurer said, "Hey, jingo!" A quarter of a century later Motteux rendered Rabelais' par Dieu, as By Jingo! in the mouth of Panurge. The origin of the modern political sense is known to everyone, and now we have jingodom, jingoesque, jingoish, jingoism, jingoist, and jingoistic. A jim-jam was formerly only a flim-flam or whim-wham. As late as two years ago the Daily News wrote, perilously: "Every regiment has its little jim-jams," i.e. fantastic ways, peculiarities. For the plural already meant delirium-tremens. Dr. Murray's earliest quotation in this sense being from James Runciman's well-known Skippers and Shellbacks: "I'll die on the flags with the jim-jams before I'll wet my lips with it again." Joke appeared only in the second half of the seventeenth century, and is apparently an adaptation of the Latin jocus. It was often spelled "joque." In 1813 Southey hit on the happy word jokesmith to describe a manufacturer of jokes. He feared "to give occasion to the jests of newspaper jokesmiths." The word jolly has a very long and interesting history. Coverdale used it appreciatively, not ironically or sportively, when he wrote: "I thought my selfe a iolye fortunate man as well for the nobylite of my kyndred . . . as also for my strayte observying of ye law." A Royal Marine is now, in slang, a jolly. "I'm a Jolly—'Er Majesty's Jolly—Soldier and Sailor, too." All this, and much more, leaves the origin of jolly-boat "uncertain," though it does not leave Dr. Murray without learned conjectures. The same disappointment awaits us when we pass from jury to jury-mast. The letter J seems to have tempted all kinds of coinages and far-fetched constructions. Words like jirble, jigmaree, jiggetting, jinks, job ("of unascertained origin"), jolt ("etymology obscure"), junket ("of somewhat obscure history"), jutty ("a phonetic variant of jetty"), and many other words, might be cited in illustration. We have dabbled in the curiosities, but Dr. Murray properly invites special attention to such important and well-understood words as Judge, Jury, and Just. "The idiomatic uses of the adverb just are singularly protean and elusive."

A New Social Programme.

The Heart of the Empire. Discussions of Problems of Modern City Life in England, with an Essay on Imperialism. (Unwin.)

This book emanates from Cambridge University, and is a praiseworthy attempt to bring back England, now, as the authors think, drunk with an Imperial dream, to a sober consideration of her domestic affairs. It is recognised by thinkers that for once the end of a century and the death of a Queen synchronised also with the end of an era. Old creeds, old politics, old forms of thought, old programmes, have all withered and passed away together. Our authors recognise that an entirely new set of problems await solution in the future. The present disorganisation of the party of progress is no mere accident or result of personal failure, but a sign that the last remainder-biscuits of the old programme are consumed, and the Party has not yet found its natural standpoint amid the new conditions. Platforms still resound with Gladstonian echoes, though the original voice is silent and the work of Gladstone is done. From those who were his lieutenants and disciples it is hopeless to look for the new watchwords; they but follow the traditions he left. And there are less abstract reasons for the indifference to social reform that has come to England. First a great wave of prosperity has passed over the country, and in times of wealth and fatness it is natural to worship the God of Things-as they-are. At the same time the landowner, the "auld enemy" of Liberalism, has been hard hit, and has given way to the nouveau riche, so that any repetition of the ancient denunciation falls harmless in the air. The Land Question is atrophied, and so, for other reasons, is Disestablishment. Both were Liberal rallying cries two decades ago. Yet there is as much need as ever for a party of progress, and the band of writers here assembled has attempted to fashion a programme suited to the exigencies of the hour.

To say that they have succeeded would be to ignore the necessary sifting and elimination that alone can bring out the salient points, but they have opened what is certain to become a most interesting discussion. Let us see what their proposals are. Mr. Masterman, a Fellow of Christ's College, leads by showing that the massing together of population in large towns is changing the English character. As long as John Bull remained on the land he was slow, and stolid resolute when put on his mettle, but difficult to rouse. Subsequent events have shown that life in town has developed in him many of those traits that distinguish our neighbours across the Channel: feverishness, excitability, subjection to alternate fits of depression and enthusiasm. The flaming new press, with its eternal emphasis and exaggeration, its feminine emotionalism and hysteria, really appears to reflect as well as encourage the temper of the people. Mr. Masterman effectively contrasts "the old silent life of England, close to the ground, vibrating to the lengthy, unhurried processes of nature," with the character of the town-dweller, "stunted, narrow-chested, easily-wearied, yet voluble, excitable, with little ballast, stamina, or endurance, seeking stimulus in drink, in betting, in any unaccustomed conflicts at home or abroad." But he does not escape the danger of treating the question from one point of view, and he does not recognise that the problem of the town is also the problem of the country. An essential of every useful problem must be that it contain a proposal for nursing a rural population. Nor does he, as it appears to us, get quite to the root of the matter as regards the city. As long as "municipal barracks" exist—that is to say, many-storied top-to-bottom houses, where families are reared without the possibility of obtaining adequate exercise or fresh air—the generation cannot but be emaciated, nervous, and decadent. At the same time we recognise the force of his objection to Mr. Balfour's patent scheme for planting workpeople many miles out of town. The time spent in travelling to and fro is a consumption of their scanty leisure. Mr. Masterman must radicalise still further before he finds a solution.

Digitized by Google

Mr. F. W. Laurance, from Trinity College, takes up the argument, but does not greatly forward it. His excursus on the question of rural housing needs to be garnished with fact. The average rent that a farm labourer can and will pay is eighteenpence a week (see the result of the investigations of the late Mr. Little and Mr. Wilson Fox), and a satisfactory cottage cannot be put up for less than £150, so that here we come to an impasse. It is quite futile for him to call on the landlords to do what they are not compelled to and what is not profitable. All they will do in return is to shrug their shoulders, point to their losses through agricultural depression, and ask for Protection. The trend of opinion just now is in favour of making the peasant owner of his house and land, and a shadow of that privilege was actually offered by a Tory Government. In England there are fewer small holdings than in any other country of Europe. Besides, no treatment of the subject is satisfactory that takes no account of the stupid building bye-laws. He writes much and sensibly about the urban aspect of the housing problem, but it needs crystallising into phrases that will strike the imagination of the wayfaring man.

A paper to which we turned with curious interest was Mr. Head's disquisition on "The Church and the People." He writes from the inside, and what impresses one most is his recognition of the fact that with the strength of the nation the Church has completely lost touch. Rich and poor alike view it apathetically, and he laments, not without cause, that its ministry has lost attraction for men of intellect. Yet he dreams of it becoming once more a great religious force in the nation. That may or may not be; but it seems to us that the clergy, bound by old formulas at a time when new truths have been propounded, have lagged hopelessly behind when they should have led, and it will be more than a miracle that causes their re-institution. Mr. Head scarcely takes account of the fact that the best teaching of the day is scientific and positive. Let him imagine one of these apathetic young men "whose falling away he deplores" in church and listening to an exposition of the dogmatic theology still preached. Speaker and hearer think and talk in different languages, and there is no sympathy between them. One can scarcely imagine the re-adjustment that would bring them together. Other chapters of the book equally invite comment, but we desist. Sympathising fully with the object of the writers, we can only hope that their proposals will be frankly discussed.

The House.

The Story of the Stock Exchange: its History and Position. By Charles Duguid. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

No student of London should be destitute of this book, which certainly fulfils the author's hope that it may interest readers who are unconnected with City finance. The present writer's ignorance of Stock Exchange business is that of a boy on a village green, yet Mr. Duguid's pages have held him almost from first to last. Not, perhaps, quite to the last. The descriptions of Stock Exchange enthusiasm after Ladysmith and Mafeking read a little tediously just now, but even these will be ripened by time. Mr. Duguid became the acknowledged historian of the "House" when it was seen how excellent was his contribution to the Stock Exchange Souvenir, issued at the end of the century. His paper is here expanded into a goodly volume of more than 450 pages.

We cannot attempt to summarise the story Mr. Duguid unfolds. He sets forth very clearly the rise of Stockbroking, which, for practical purposes, may be said to have taken place under William and Mary, although stockbrokers had appeared at the end of the seventeenth century, and mercantile brokers very much earlier. The Stock Exchange found its first home in the second Royal Exchange, where the "Stocks Walk" was between the Grocers' and Druggists' Walk and the Italian Walk. At this time, and, actually, till the middle of the last century, stockbrokers could ply their business only under licences from the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen. At the end of the seventeenth century the number of licences was limited to a hundred. These members distinguished themselves from outside brokers, who thus early were on the scene, by wearing a silver medal suitably inscribed. Even the favoured hundred were looked down upon by the merchants in the Royal Exchange, and the cleavage grew so wide that at last, in 1698, the stockbrokers left the Royal Exchange in a body. 'Change-alley, close by, with its considerable space and its comfortable coffee-houses, rose into importance in a night. Here, in the first half of the eighteenth century, stock-jobbing became the scandal and danger of British commerce. Bulls, Bears, Rams, and Bubbles were already everyday terms with the crowd which oscillated between Jonathan's and Garraway's. Hither came Members of Parliament, nobility, gentry, authors, to swell the din.

Tricks of all kinds were rife, as when a horseman rode frantically into the City falsely announcing the death of Queen Anne. In 1720 the South Sea Bubble swelled in all its beauty, and burst. Previously, Swift had been a speculator. In the Bubble we meet his fellow-poet, Gay, who at one time stood to gain £20,000 by selling out. He held on, to his ruin. Twenty-eight years later, while 'Change-alley was still weltering through much obloquy, it was burned down. Eighty dwelling-houses and Garraway's and Jonathan's coffee-houses were destroyed. The story of the Stock Exchange is punctuated by fires, but from this one it quickly recovered, and not many years later Horace Walpole remarked that "From the Alley to the House [of Commons] is like a path of ants," so eager were Members of Parliament to speculate. About this time a futile attempt on the part of the leading members of the Stock Exchange to form an inner club at Jonathan's (from which coffee-house they removed a broker by force, and were defeated in the lawsuit that followed) led to the establishment of the first separate building. It ran across the site of the present Peabody statue, behind the Royal Exchange, and became the nucleus—only the nucleus—of Stock Exchange business. Those of our readers who have been inside the Rotunda at the Bank of England, where applications for Consols and Boer war loans, with their deposits and call money, are received, may be surprised to learn that this decorous place was once the recognised market for dealings in public funds, and was, therefore, a place of mammonish din and disrepute. The beadle imposed silence at intervals by the use of a deafening rattle. Unscrupulous brokers lay in wait for the simple and unwary, selling them stocks at unfair prices. This state of things lasted, with more or less scandal, until 1834, when an Act of Parliament was obtained to expel the stockbrokers from the Rotunda. They went with an ill-grace, although the new Stock Exchange in Capel-court was at hand.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Duguid draws very interesting pictures of the early nineteenth-century scenes in Capel-court. In those days members brought their own chops and steaks and had them cooked at the chop-houses, paying a penny for this service, and buying vegetables, bread, and drink. The rules of the Stock Exchange were then crystallising, and in 1803 the first official price list appeared. But queer things still happened. In February, 1814, there was the elaborate De Berenger fraud, in which a bogus courier, his brilliant uniform wet with the salt spray of the Channel, and his pockets full of Napoleons, drove post-haste from Dover, and over London Bridge into the City, with the news that the Allied Armies were in possession of Paris and that Napoleon was slain. The coach disappeared over Blackfriars Bridge. A golden harvest was reaped; but a little later a scarlet regimental coat, cut into small pieces, was fished out of the Thames by a waterman. An investigating committee could not get at the truth. Another side of the Stock Exchange was represented at this time by such distinguished members as Francis Baily, afterwards the astronomer; David Ricardo, the political economist; and Horace Smith, of the Rejected Addresses. When Smith and his friend, William Heseltine, who was also a writer, joined the Stock Exchange, they agreed that each would retire when he had made £50,000. They forgot this for years, but when, one day, it occurred to Horace Smith that he had so determined, he exclaimed to his friend: "I've made my sum, and I'm off to-morrow." Heseltine only sneered at an ambition so moderate. Smith retired to Brighton to become a cheerful man of letters. Heseltine heaped up £200,000, lost most of it, and died broken-hearted.

To the Stock Exchange of to-day Mr. Duguid devotes half his book, telling how members do business, how they prosper, fail, eat, play the fool, fight for their country, and do good works. To the last the story deviates into tragic drama. Mr. Duguid thus describes the scene on Saturday, December 29 last, when the Globe group crash was darkening the end of the century:

> On Saturday morning, when business should have been merriment, and members of the Stock Exchange should have been closing their books for the New Year's holiday, gaily wishing each other a happy New Century, the grimmest of scenes was enacted in the House. The very hand of Barker, the waiter, shook like an aspen leaf as amid death-like silence he announced failure after failure, and failure after failure. Early evening papers came flaring out with the sensational story of the failure of four firms on the Stock Exchange. But that was not half nor a third of the tale of the day. Ere the hammer had ceased thirteen Stock Exchange firms, involving no fewer than twenty-nine members of the House, had been declared defaulters, and subsequent failures increased the number. Some of the failed firms had been firms of eminence. One who was declared a defaulter had been a member for nearly half a century, another for thirty-two years, another for twenty-seven years, and two others for twenty years. One had just been given command of a battalion of Volunteers in South Africa where he was serving in the Boer war; two others had been married within the two preceding weeks, one of them actually being on his honeymoon.

Those who see only iniquity in the Stock Exchange will find much in Mr. Duguid's pages to confirm them in their harshest judgments, and they will derive no comfort from his last pages, in which he shows the ever-growing prosperity of the institution. Capel-court is certainly of the earth earthy, but even its censors may learn from this book that it is a growth, not an invention, and that its maze of roots extend, perhaps, beneath their own doorsteps.

Allegories.

Twelve Allegories. By Kathleen Haydn Green. (Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

This volume is as slender as any that we remember to have met with. The whole of the matter could be printed on less than half-a-dozen pages of the Academy, and yet, such is the ingenuity of printer and publisher, it constitutes a book of, apparently, one hundred and seventeen pages. As an example of what can be done in the way of making one word serve for five, it is decidedly curious and interesting.

Miss Green has chosen a peculiarly difficult form of literary art, and we may say that if she has failed she has failed not more conspicuously than scores of predecessors in the same venture. The "poem in prose" has more than once been the final achievement of a supreme literary artist, as with Turgenev and Baudelaire. Turgenev's allegories seem the simplest thing in the world—the labour of a casual half-hour; but they happen also to be the product of a life-time of experience in the craft of words. Turgenev, one notes, avoided the archaic phraseology which marks the usual poem in prose, and which is probably supposed to give it a poetical quality. Miss Green's trifles would have been better if she had followed his example instead of that of the average artificer. "Nay," "Of a truth," "'Twas," and verbs ending in eth do not make poetry in prose, nor do they in the slightest degree help to make it. Miss Green's prose is correct, and fairly neat; sometimes it is pretty; but it is never distinguished. Her fancy is sentimental; it runs in well-trodden ways, with a general tendency towards the sweetly melancholy. Its didactic moods are the least satisfactory. Space enables us to quote one allegory entire; it is a fair sample of the book, but somewhat shorter than its eleven companions:

THE TWO GARDENS.

There was a King who had a Garden that he loved exceedingly well.

And of all his people he chose him two men that were Gardeners to tend his Garden, and he made of it two several portions, and gave to each man one to plant and cherish.

And he left them for a while, for he said: "I will return to see how ye have prospered in your labours."

And the Gardeners toiled each after his manner, till when many days had sped the King drew near again to view his Garden.

And as he passed through the first man's share, behold, it was full clean, and tended well, and free from weeds; but nothing grew there—neither flowering plant, nor tree, nor grape-vine.

And the King said to the Gardener: "How is this—ye have no flower for an offering?"

And he said: "Lo! O King, the Garden is large, and I am but one man for all the labour; and this great while I have striven to rid the land of weeds, so that as yet I have not planted tree nor flower—only the weeds I have uprooted."

And the King replied not but passed on to view the second Garden how it fared.

And he saw it was all filled with weeds and grass, and creeping plants that cumbered all the ground; but in the middle of the Garden was a little space made clear, and therein grew a fair white Lily wondrous tall, that breathed the sweetest perfumes in the air.

And the Gardener said unto the King: "Behold,

Digitized by Google

my Lord, where I have toiled and laboured! The Garden is full large, and weeds will grow apace; yet I heeded them not for the sake of this one flower that I might make to thee thereof an offering!"

And the King said: "It is well—the flower is very fair; and how shall it avail to rid the land of weeds if nought be planted in their stead? Lo! thou hast better wrought who hast one perfect flower to show thy Lord amidst these many weeds than he whose toil but leaves a barren garden!"

And the King plucked the white Lily where it grew, and took it home into his palace.

One naturally asks: "Why did the King go and pluck that solitary Lily?"

Last of the Vikings.

Laboremus: a Play in Three Acts. By Björnstjerne Björnson. (Chapman & Hall. 5s.)

When a creative talent has fulfilled the hour of absolute maturity, its imaginative processes usually undergo an excessive refinement; they are over-subtilised, and there is, of course, no corresponding increase of force to give the subtlety and the refinement that almost physical support which they need. Consequently the work of a venerable artist, while it breathes a fragile charm, often fails in conviction. Such is the case with Ibsen, and such is the case with his great compeer, Björnson. Laboremus was produced for the first time at Christiania less than a couple of months ago, and we are driven to the conclusion that either dramatic taste in Norway is decidedly less naïve than it is in England, or the play failed intensely in its appeal to the audience. Of dramatic power, Laboremus has little or none. It is a story as fanciful as any of Maeterlinck's, wrapped in a cloak of pseudo-realism. There is no true realism in the piece, except a realism of phraseology and mise-en-scène. The theme is stated, with full details, at least three times in the play; we give extracts from the statement in the third act:

Borgny: I wanted to tell you something that happened in my own family. A lady, one of the noblest that ever lived, fell very ill. She sat in an easy-chair or lay in bed, and was no longer able to do anything. She could not even play, which she liked best of all; nor was it possible for her to have her daughter with her.

Longfrid: Why could she not have her daughter with her?

Borgny: The disease was contagious. . . . This longing for music and for her daughter rendered her condition worse. The doctors came to the conclusion that she ought, at least, to hear some music. The family lived in the country, but was very rich. So they advertised through a musical agency for an accomplished lady-pianist.

Longfrid: But the disease was contagious!

Borgny: That was why it was so long before any one could be found. At last, however, there was one who ventured.

Longfrid: A skilful one?

Borgny: An extraordinary one. A renowned one, even.

Longfrid: This interests me! Music as a cure! . . . And what was the result!

Borgny: Excellent. She enchanted every one. There was something in her person and in her music, something that hypnotised.

The patient revived; her appetite increased; sleep came; her vital power was quickened, so that the doctors began to have fresh hopes. Far and wide, people spoke of it. The music had really worked wonders.

But there was a "shy man sitting in a corner," the husband. The pianist fell in love with him, and changed her tactics. The patient understood everything:

Longfrid: And said nothing?

Borgny: I should not have done so either; and soon she was no longer able to say anything.

Longfrid: How so?

Borgny: The other one took away her strength, inch by inch, with her wishes, with her eyes, with her music. She even turned the music against her.

Longfrid [Rising]: Such a thing I never . . .

Nor we either, except in poetic fiction, where the idea has served its turn many times. A theme so fanciful should have been treated fancifully. It is in vain that Björnson sticks it in the rooms of a modern hotel. The reader cannot possibly be convinced in any realistic way, because his common-sense tells him that the notion is fundamentally absurd. If the reader had merely been asked to accept the idea for what it is, a conceit, he would have been able to comply, with advantage. Björnson seems wilfully to have added to his difficulties. Why should the disease have been contagious? Does it not appear strange that a daughter should abandon her mother while a stranger takes her place? These trifles fatally impair such slender vraisemblance as the idea possesses. We are aware that the story may be said to have a spiritual significance; but, if the operative machinery is made realistic, the spiritual significance cannot begin to signify until the more earthly aspect of the affair has been rendered convincing.

The play commences after the death of the patient. The husband has married the pianist. But that dream is soon shattered, and the pianist next inveigles a musical composer, who, by a coincidence far too facile, is writing an opera on the subject of Undine. Happily for the composer, the daughter of the dead woman supervenes, and gives him a new conception of the Undine. The pianist disappears. "Now you will be able to work," says the composer's uncle. Hence, we presume, the title of the play.

The plot is richly embroidered with the inventions of an opulent fancy—a fancy which seems always inclined towards the "precious"—as, for instance, in the love-scene between the Undine-pianist and her second victim:

Lydia: I thank you for wanting to come to me. You shall not be disappointed. I will create a deep, vast silence around you, as if you were living in a forest, a large forest.

Longfrid: How?

Lydia: In art the essential thing is to be alone, far away from all surroundings.

Longfrid: Naturally.

Lydia: Last time this was not possible. All the time was lost in trying to find out how to be alone. That caused the unrest. Don't you understand?

Longfrid: Perhaps . . . Yes, do you know . .

Lydia: Let us go away, Longfrid. There is no other means. You and I—I and you, and stillness, stillness. No one and nothing else besides. Then you shall see.

This might be an extract from something by Rémy de Gourmont in the Mercure de France. Lydia's defence of the Undine-methods is done in the same vein:

Lydia: What I understood was her longing. Her pain in the life she led. Her craving for what she could not reach. Her aspiration after a higher form of life. Her belief that she could reach it by winning the soul of a man, and then by having a share in life through him. . . . A crime? I see no crime in the Undine. The story of the Undine is the great Nature-yearning; the great love for what is above her, for that which delivers, whatever be the obstacles.

This is all very well, but it sounds strangely in "a large, richly-furnished drawing-room." Most of the play is pretty; some of it is beautiful; all of it has a vague distinction. But its fine-drawn, capricious scenes are matter for amiable gossip over tea-tables rather than serious discussion. The thing is just good enough to talk about. We can say this without abating our appreciation of the high value of the totality of Björnson's artistic achievement, now extending over some fifty years.

Digitized by Google

The translation is bad.

Other New Books.

THE LETTERS OF THE EARL OF CHESTERFIELD TO HIS SON. EDITED BY C. STRACHEY AND A. CALTHROP.

Mr. Strachey, who writes the introduction to this edition, makes a sturdy, and, we think, valid defence of Lord Chesterfield, who has been condemned far more by one or two scraps of easy-going advice to his son than by the body of his Letters or by his life. Dr. Johnson, as everyone knows, fell out with Chesterfield, and naturally his judgments on the peer were most epigrammatic when they were most hostile. It is remembered that he called Chesterfield's morals those of a whore, and his manners those of a dancing-master, while it is forgotten that his later judgments were milder, and even tended to admiration, as when he admitted that Chesterfield's manner was "exquisitely elegant, and he had more knowledge than I expected." Mr. Strachey is justified in thinking that "had circumstances been more propitious, Johnson might possibly have come to regard the Earl as no more objectionable than (say) Jack Wilkes." The glib condemners of Chesterfield have, many of them, not so much as paused to remember that the son to whom he chose to write as one man of the world to another was his illegitimate offspring, and that Chesterfield's whole attitude to his boy was unique. Loving him, undoubtedly, as a father, he chose to sink the father and advise him as an experienced friend. In his later Letters he addressed his son as "My Dear Friend," in order to emphasise his desire to meet him on equal, or, at least, unprejudiced terms. How many fathers would like to adopt, in some measure, Chesterfield's plan, and have not the courage!

The Letters are a slow tragedy of parentage. The father's persistence in advice is really pathetic. His eyes follow his son around Europe, and his letters search him out everywhere. "When I have wrote you a very long letter on any subject, it is no sooner gone but I think I have omitted something in it, which might be of use to you; and then I prepare the supplement for the next post; or else some new subject occurs to me, upon which I fancy I can give you some information, or point out some rules which may be advantageous to you."

His wit is charming in the conclusion of his 103rd letter: "My long and frequent letters, which I send you in great doubt of their success, put me in mind of certain papers, which you have, very lately, and I, formerly, sent up with kites, along the string, which we called messengers; some of them the wind used to blow away, others were torn by the string, and but few of them got up and stuck to the kite. But I will content myself now, as I did then, if some of my present messengers do but stick to you." But they stuck to little purpose. The son never acquired the graces which his father had for thirty years instilled; he failed in Parliament; and after a diplomatic career that galled Chesterfield by its undistinguished decency (the son has been as much libelled as the father) Philip Stanhope, the most counselled man of his age, died at Avignon. By a crowning irony the news of his son's death was brought to Chesterfield by his son's commonplace widow, of whom he had never heard. Yet he received the stranger well, and the two grandsons she presented. Decidedly this edition of Chesterfield's Letters is welcome. Introduction and notes are alike excellent. (Methuen. 2 vols. 6s. each.)

RIGHTS AND WRONGS OF THE TRANSVAAL WAR. BY E. T. COOK.

Mr. E. T. Cook, it is pretty generally known, was editor of the Daily News for five years, and retired from that post early in the present year. He is a Radical, but a Radical who believes in the Empire, and the volume which he has just published is almost as much an explanation of his attitude in our relations with the Transvaal as it is a study of the causes which led up to the Transvaal War. Mr. Cook believes that "substantially" Great Britain has been in the right, and the Dutch ex-Republics in the wrong, but though his book is informed with a definite opinion, he has endeavoured to supply the reader with the data necessary for arriving at an independent judgment. He has made it his aim to supply throughout chapter and verse for every reference, and has cited textually the more important despatches, collecting them in their proper order from a mass of Blue-books, many of which are now out of print. The task is one which demands an orderly and logical mind, an understanding of causes and effects, and that clear insight into human nature which appears to be absolutely foreign to so many among us. Mr. Cook has, thanks to his training, been able to bring these to bear upon his book, though he is hampered by his prepossessions. But he has struggled gallantly against them, and if it is any merit to be impartial in a matter of the kind, Mr. Cook has, perhaps, come as near that state as any man can. He recognises that there was, and is, a conflict of ideals, of race, and of ambitions, in South Africa, or, to put it shortly, between Mr. Rhodes's ideal of a United South Africa under the Union Jack and Mr. Kruger's ideal of a United South Africa under a Dutch Afrikander flag. He gives quotations which show how, years before the Raid was thought of, Mr. Kruger cherished the idea of driving the English into the sea, and had begun to make the Transvaal the arsenal of South Africa, and by chapter and verse he demonstrates that the Outlanders had rights, or that Mr. Gladstone thought he had secured rights for them, and that the Johannesburg capitalists held out against the Reform movement as long as they possibly could. Mr. Cook's work is one of the indispensable books on the subject, and with a little more detachment it would have been among the most valuable of them. Its usefulness will be increased by its full index, and the chronological list of the more important despatches quoted in the body of the text. (Edward Arnold.)

THE BOLIVIAN ANDES. BY SIR MARTIN CONWAY.

This record of climbing and exploration in the Cordillera Real is marked by all the good qualities which have distinguished Sir Martin Conway's previous work; it is full, accurate, high-spirited, and exhilarating as the lower snow-slopes. Difficulties are the life-blood of your true mountaineer, and Sir Martin grasps difficulties by the hand in the most friendly fashion, and turns them to good account. If he failed to reach the summit of Mount Sorata, that was merely because the weather conditions made the complete ascent impossible; but he did stand upon the summit of Illimani, at an altitude of 21,200 feet, and heard his guide, Maquignar, say the notable words, "Monsieur, à vous la gloire." It is for such moments that the explorer lives.

Sir Martin's observations were not made without serious obstacles, for the Indians who live upon the high plateau of Bolivia have no knowledge of the innocent methods employed in making a "bar-subtense survey," and they not unnaturally suspect that some witchcraft is at work when a theodolite points straight at one of their sacred mountains. On one occasion Sir Martin only escaped death by frequent discharges of his revolver, "taking care, of course, not to hit any one, for that would have made matters infinitely worse, and would have put an end to the possibility of completing my survey."

Digitized by Google

The book has interesting chapters dealing with the yet only partially developed rubber industry of Bolivia, the gold-mines of Cusanaco and Yani, and the tin-mines of Huaina Potosi. There is also much of value concerning the relics of the great Spanish occupation, an occupation the influence of which is still manifest in some quaint survivals. Altogether this latest of Sir Martin Conway's contributions to the noble literature of exploration is worthy of its predecessors. (Harper.)

Messrs. Longman have issued in a single octavo volume Mr. S. R. Gardiner's study of Oliver Cromwell, which was published by Messrs. Goupil, with illustrations, in the Illustrated Series of Historical Volumes. A photogravure portrait, from Samuel Cooper's painting at Cambridge, is given as frontispiece. The price of the book is 5s. net.

The Index to the First Ten Volumes of Book Prices Current, just issued by Mr. Elliot Stock, will be warmly welcomed by possessors of the set, who have now a key to the series. Mr. Jaggard, the compiler, is quite entitled to exclaim, as he does, on the magnitude and worry of his task. The work involved the marshalling into order of thirty-three thousand titles, and considerably over half-a-million numerals. We have no means of testing the accuracy of the result, but we have no doubt that Mr. Jaggard has erred only because he is human, and that he has really filled "the vacuum caused by the want of an up-to-date Lowndes."

As a study in a remote "working" of the literary mine, Mr. G. H. Maynadier's work, The Wife of Bath's Tale: Its Sources and Analogues (Nutt, 6s. net), will doubtless appeal to a select audience of scholars. Mr. Maynadier is Instructor in English at Harvard University, and this study was presented by him in 1898. "It considers the sources of 'The Wife of Bath's Tale' and of the English tales manifestly related to it, their connection with one another, and their possible relation with other tales which seem to present what is virtually the central incident of Chaucer's poem." Mr. Maynadier claims originality for some of the resemblances he has noted, among them those of Thomas of Ercildoune, and of the Wolfdietrich poems to Chaucer's story.

"The investor must keep his eyes open, consult his broker as before, and make use of the wits with which Nature has furnished him." With these wise reservations, Mr. C. H. Thorpe sets out, in How to Invest and How to Speculate (Grant Richards, 5s.), to instruct the man in the street in "certain guiding principles." The only guiding principle we should ourselves offer is, Don't speculate at all; and to do Mr. Thorpe justice, his book consists mainly of advice and information as to investment. Of course there is speculation and speculation, as Mr. Thorpe points out in his chapter of "Hints to the Small Investor." For the married small investor, Mr. Thorpe thinks an endowment policy is, after all, the best investment. It certainly saves all worry. A useful and informing book.

In The Double Choir of Glasgow Cathedral: A Study of Rib Vaulting (Hedderwick & Sons, Glasgow) Mr. Thomas Lennox Watson is in the position of an architect coming to the aid of the historian. There are few documentary records of the history of Glasgow Cathedral, and, therefore, it is in the cathedral itself that the missing story must be sought. This source of information is, again, narrowed down to the art of rib-vaulting, of which the cathedral presents some important types of different periods. It is by a technical examination of these vaultings that Mr. Watson endeavours to elucidate the history of Glasgow Cathedral. His obvious mastery of his subject, and the care with which the publishers have produced his treatise, will commend this handsome book to its predestined readers. The illustrations are numerous and excellent.

Fiction.

A Pair of Patient Lovers. By W. D. Howells. (Harpers. 6s.)

Five short stories make up this volume, which is delightfully bound, contains a portrait in colours of the author, and is the first of a "Portrait Collection of Short Stories." Those who know and love the ease and suavity of Mr. Howells, his delicate appreciation of the finer shades of emotion, his sportive play upon the surface of life with but a passing glimpse into the deeper pools, will find him at his best in the story of the Pair of Patient Lovers. We meet again the "happy married lovers"—those of the Wedding Journey—and, as usual, they are tremendously interested in the affairs of other lovers whose happiness is trembling in the balance. Says Mrs. March:

> "I am getting no good of the summer at all. I shall go home in the fall more jaded and worn out than when I came. To think that we should have this beautiful place, where we could be so happy and comfortable, if it were not for having this abnormal situation under our nose and eyes all the time!"
>
> "Abnormal? I don't call it abnormal," I began, and I was sensible of my wife's thoughts leaving her own injuries for my point of view so swiftly that I could almost hear them whir.

The abnormal situation is caused by Mrs. Bentley, the invalid mother, who will permit the engagement of her daughter to the young clergyman of Gormanville, but refuses to dispense with her nurse and consent to the marriage. We follow the eight years of patient waiting only through the eyes of Mr. and Mrs. March. That is Mr. Howells's well-known method—the working from the eye to the implication. The method has its limitations. It never presents the story from the inside. But Mr. Howells is supreme in his power of inference from the pose of a head or the angle of an eyebrow. Of the other stories in this volume, "The Pursuit of the Piano" is the most whimsical, and the slightest. And the thing is so well done that one almost forgets to ask whether it were worth the doing by such a master of his art as Mr. Howells.

The Vicar of St. Luke's. By Sibyl Creed. (Longmans. 6s.)

This is a story of parochial life, and a very good one. It is also an essay in controversy, and from that point of view, too, it is good. The Vicar is a familiar type. Knowing little of either theology or history, he is an enthusiastic maintainer of the "pure Catholic" tradition of the Church of England, and bent upon carrying his parish with him in his efforts to introduce into the services some elegancies of ritual. That man is very honest. The loss of his betrothed—for his convinced preference for the single state had not saved him—brings him to an examination of his position which results in his finding rest at last, "full in the panting heart of Rome"; he is left in the earliest stage of the strenuous process by which Jesuits are made.

Of another kind is Docker, the senior curate; a fashionable man, of accomplishments, who is not actually insincere and not quite a gentleman, but clever and capable. In the bosom of the family he can satirise the position rather effectively. Thus:

> "That's a grand principle we've got ourselves provided with, certainly. . . . Put clearly, it amounts to this. The hierarchical institution of the Anglican Church is absolutely sacred, and to be bowed down to and venerated, hang Dissenters, you know; at the same time, it is quite plain that we Catholic clergy within the aforesaid Church owe obedience to our ecclesiastical superiors only in matters as to which our ecclesiastical superiors show themselves duly submissive to the opinions of us Catholic clergy. Great, isn't it?"

Digitized by Google

This clear-eyed young man is very properly rewarded with a minor canonry, and, presently, when he has grown "broad," with a fat benefice.

The half-pay Colonel, new-converted by the Vicar's eloquence on the subject of altar-lights, characteristically expresses his convictions in this simple-hearted way:

> "The Roman Church may answer all right for people who have the misfortune to belong to it, but I've nothing to do with that. What I can't make a pig-headed fellow like Bind see is that we—we pure and uncorrupted Catholics—are really the grand bulwark against the spread of the errors of Rome in this country. The grand, the principal bulwark!"

You hear him?

But our allusion to the Vicar's eloquence reminds us that Miss Creed has a dreadful habit of interlarding her good story with little bits of extremely thin rhetoric—like this:

> Eloquence, eloquence, in thyself more powerful, more sweet, more bewitching than all the other gifts under Heaven given to man, and, therefore, perhaps bestowed on him by the Divine wisdom most rarely of all; beautiful eloquence, how simply and royally didst thou enter into possession of thine own!

Let us find consolation in the thought that a lady young enough to write that, and a good deal of the same sort, in the midst of so much that is really good, will soon be old enough to laugh at it. We hoped for some time that we had at last lighted upon a novel without a love interest. There is one, but you can easily skip it. The morbid little milliner, on the other hand, as a study in hysteria, is worthy of consideration.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final Reviews of a selection will follow.]

SISTER TERESA. BY GEORGE MOORE.

This long, closely-printed volume is the sequel to Evelyn Innes. "After being engaged for two years on the history of Evelyn Innes," says Mr. Moore in the preface, "I found I had completed a great pile of MS., and one day it occurred to me to consider the length of this MS. To my surprise I found I had written about 150,000 words, and had only finished the first half of my story. I explained my difficulties to my publisher, suggesting that I should end the chapter I was then writing on what musicians would call 'a full close,' and that half the story should be published under the title of Evelyn Innes and half under the title of Sister Teresa. My publisher consented, frightened at the thought of a novel of a thousand pages—300,000 words." (Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

EVELYN INNES. BY GEORGE MOORE.

A sixpenny edition, much revised, and ninety pages shorter than the original. "The story," says Mr. Moore in the preface, "has not been altered, but the text is almost entirely new. No one, perhaps, has rewritten a book so completely. I am aware that the alteration of a published text is deprecated in the Press, but it is difficult to understand why, for have not Shakespeare and Balzac and Goethe and Wagner and FitzGerald rewritten their works? Among my contemporaries, Mr. George Meredith and Mr. W. B. Yeats have followed the example of their illustrious predecessors." (Fisher Unwin. 6d.)

THE LADY OF LYNN. BY SIR WALTER BESANT.

This story was appearing in a contemporary at the time of the author's death. It is an historical novel, after the style of The Orange Girl, beginning: "The happiest day of my life, up to that time, because I should be the basest and the most ungrateful of men were I not to confess that I have since enjoyed many days far excelling in happiness that day, was the 20th of June, in the year of Grace 1747. For on that day, being my nineteenth birthday, I was promoted, though so young, to be mate or chief officer on board my ship, the Lady of Lynn, Captain Jaggard, then engaged in the Lisbon trade." (Chatto and Windus. 6s.)

THE HONOUR OF THE ARMY. BY EMILE ZOLA.

Nine stories by M. Zola, translated by "various hands," edited, with a preface, by Mr. Vizetelly. Most of the tales were written several years ago, and appeared in the pages of a Russian review. "They show," says Mr. Vizetelly, "their author in a variety of moods, and, if some may seem sombre and tragic, the reader will find others of a very different kind—one, indeed, which is all joviality, whilst another is brimful of quiet humour." (Chatto and Windus. 6s.)

THE COUNTRY I COME FROM. BY HENRY LAWSON.

The country Mr. Lawson comes from is Australia, where he has a considerable reputation as a writer of stories, and of verse. He is known, too, in this country. The present volume contains a selection of stories and sketches from his While the Billy Boils; Over the Sliprails, and On the Track. The book contains no table of contents. (Blackwood. 6s.)

THE HERO. BY W. S. MAUGHAM.

A story of modern life, with a tragic ending, by the author of Liza of Lambeth. It is one of the many new novels that make some use of the Boer War. In the beginning Colonel and Mrs. Parsons are awaiting the return from South Africa of Jamie, who has been recommended for the Victoria Cross. Jamie did not manage his life well. A novel "engagement present" is mentioned on the last page—"a complete edition of the works of Mr. Hall Caine." (Hutchinson. 6s.)

KING'S END. BY ALICE BROWN.

"She was a young woman, brilliant with the promise of a beauty not yet altogether hers. Somewhat thin, according to the type of lithe New England maids, her figure was straight, well-poised, and made to move in rhythm." That was Nancy Eliot as she came down from Thimble Mountain, where a religious meeting had been held, to the village of King's End. The story is all about the village folk and their affairs. (Constable. 6s.)

THE DOMINE'S GARDEN. BY IMOGEN CLARK.

"T'en one tay, v'en Annetje is maype a year olt, I come home. It is in t'e spring ant sickness ant sorrow are in t'e lant, only not in my house, t'ank Kott." That is how the Domine talks in this American historical novel. It begins with a long letter from Captain John Bellenden to Sir Harry Fenwick, Bart., from New York, dated 1757. (John Murray. 6s.)

THEY THAT TOOK THE SWORD. BY N. STEPHENSON.

A well-written story of the American Civil War. Lincoln comes into it—"They were almost startled by the womanly gentleness of his face, it had seemed so repellent the moment before." The story begins on the thirtieth night of August, 1862. Miss Amy Golding sat at her window. Below stairs her grandfather, with several of his friends, sat at wine in the dining-room. She heard them start a song. It was the "Star Spangled Banner." (Lane. 6s.)

Digitized by Google

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage, One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscription, prepaid (including postage) 17/6

„ Quarterly 5/0

„ Price for one issue /5

The Poetry of William Blake.

"ONE thought fills immensity," says William Blake. He not only defines the supreme quality of thought—he constantly attains it; and his works—the actual books themselves—come to be regarded in a mystical sense as symbols of the Two Infinities—the infinitely great and the infinitely little, both of which were included in his extraordinary range of vision. Messrs. Methuen's latest addition to the "Little Library" series, Selections from the Works of William Blake, is uniform in size and appearance with the other volumes of the series that have preceded it; and yet it looms larger than them all, because even in Selections William Blake has the thoughts that fill immensity.

This dainty little volume contains an interesting portrait of the poet taken from a life-mask, and an adequate, and at times luminous, introduction by Mark Perugini. In glancing over the Selections, the wonder at the special epoch of Blake's advent grows more and more.

It is on the threshold of that most formal of all literary portals—the portal giving access to the over-perfumed chambers and artificial parterres of the eighteenth century—that we encounter the unique and arresting personality of William Blake. He flashes across an age of barren fact and arid minutiæ, the lighting of an extraordinary imagination. His faith burns with splendid intensity in the dry air of universal scepticism. While others labour with sterile assiduity in the schools of style, he is inspired with words direct from heaven! and over the eighteenth century litter of "puffs, powders, patches, Bibles, billet-doux," his child-songs float, buoyant and radiant as sunlit thistledown on a rhythmic wind.

At every point his genius clashes with the conventions of his time; he bears kinship in simplicity of symbol and magnificent concreteness of vision to the Dreamer of Revelation; he is brother to Chaucer in freshness of outlook and joy of heart; and Mr. Swinburne links his name with the noblest interpreter of the modern democratic spirit, drawing a parallel between Blake and Walt Whitman in common sweetness of personality and bold outspokenness of view.

For such range and intensity of vision as his, one medium in art was insufficient; and his drawings are as vital as his poems. It is only by doing violence that we dissever the text of his Lyrics from the lovely designs wherein he set them—designs wherein, to quote Mr. Swinburne, "herb and stem break into grace of shape and blossoming form, and the branch work is full of little flames and flowers, catching as it were from the verse enclosed the fragrant heat and delicate sound they seem to give back."

Blake's extraordinary originality of mind is manifested even in the manner of producing his books: his own hand printed and engraved them by a method all his own. In all things he stands without precursor or successor, absolutely alone; his precise and politic age neglected and misunderstood him, and still much remains that is obscure, both in his life and in his work. Yet the simplest and the tenderest child-notes that have ever found their way into verse come to us out of his "Songs of Innocence." They are full of the joy of the child, of the happy faith of the child. In reading them we seem to understand something of the ancient teaching that set the child above the wisest of men; and all the old forgotten beauty of aspiration after "Mercy, pity, peace, and love," comes back with a new light. Blake's Lyrics have the quality of absolute spontaneity, and beside them the most child-like of song is apt to appear stilted and self-conscious. His simplicity of phrase is never the result of paucity of thought; rather it reveals the closest and most loving understanding of children and animals—that insight that Thomas à Kempis tells us is born of purity. The mind that was filled with such tenderness for the lamb, included the comprehension of the tiger, and bent into shape that poem magnificent for might and restraint:

> Tiger, tiger burning bright
> In the forests of the night,
> What immortal hand or eye
> Framed thy fearful symmetry?

As faith and love were the corner-stones of Blake's creed, so doubt and cruelty he regarded as the two most heinous offences against heaven.

> If the sun and moon should doubt
> They'd immediately go out,

he says in "Auguries of Innocence," a poem regarded by Mr. W. M. Rossetti as "one of Blake's noblest performances," and by Dr. Richard Garnett as "little remote from nonsense."

It is to be noted that many of Blake's poems were composed in early youth. "The Poetical Sketches," written between the ages of twelve and twenty, contain some of his most perfect work, and are, according to Dr. Richard Garnett, "little short of miraculous." Take this verse from "To Spring":

> Come o'er the Eastern hills and let our winds
> Kiss thy perfumed garments; let us taste
> Thy morn and evening breath; scatter thy pearls
> Upon our love-sick land that mourns for thee.

Here we have all that goes to make up beauty; perfect form, music, and image; and that elusive light and colour that defies analysis, but that is felt to be the very essence of poetry. We give some other lovely lines from "To the Evening Star":

> Let thy west wind sleep on
> The lake; speak silence with thy glimmering eyes,
> And wash the dusk with silver.

It is not easy to realise that the Blake of the Songs of Innocence and Experience is also the Blake of the Prophetic Writings—works of so obscure a meaning that the most patient of investigators have found them hard to decipher. The editor of the present Selections can only find room for "The Book of Thel," "Proverbs of Hell," from the "Marriage of Heaven and Hell," and a fragment from "Jerusalem." But in his introduction he makes several interesting points, distinguishing between prophecy and prediction, and giving some suggestive notes on mysticism, perhaps a little too dogmatically expressed. Then Mr. Swinburne has given the Prophetic Books loving study, and we have the light of his essay to help us; and Messrs. Ellis and W. B. Yeats have written an interpretation remarkable for its microscopic research, in which even the charts, on such subjects as the "Symbolic use of the Triad in the Structure of the Poem," illustrate the difficulty of elucidation. How are we to bridge the period of "The Lamb," and the period of "The Marriage of Heaven and Hell," "The Daughters of Albion," "Milton," "Jerusalem," and the rest?

On consideration, simplicity is not, after all, so remote from mysticism. It is the men of simplest life and soul that have been the greatest dreamers, and the truths most unapprehendable have had the simplest objects for symbols. The thistledown holds within its wings the possibility of groping roots, that dream of purple colour even in the dark earth. From childhood upwards, Blake was a seer of visions. On this insufficient evidence is based the assumption of his madness. The question is amply discussed in Mr. Gilchrist's admirable "Life," and need not concern us here. The step from a visionary to a mystic is not a long one. Behind this material world of appearances, Blake saw the spirit-world, which he conceived to be the reality. Outward vision he counted a snare, and the inner vision alone to be trusted:

Digitized by Google

> We are led to believe a lie
> When we see with, not through the eye,

he says in one place: and in another: "I assert for myself that I do not behold the outward creation, and that to me it is hindrance and not action." Nevertheless, he was bound of necessity to use material symbols as the only medium of expressing his huge abstract conceptions: and yet on his own statement he finally lost sense of the value of the images he employed. Hence the resultant confusion.

Traces of mysticism are discoverable even in the earlier works. There is the faint light of another world showing through in this verse from "The Little Black Boy":

> And we are put on earth a little space,
> That we may learn to bear the beams of love;
> And these black bodies and this sunburnt face
> Are but a cloud, and like a shady grove.

In the "Songs of Experience" there lives one of the most haunting abstractions in literature. The lines are in the invocation to earth, and are among the most beautiful that Blake has written:

> Hear the voice of the Bard
> Who present, past, and future sees;
> Whose ears have heard
> Thy Holy Word
> That walked among the ancient trees;
>
> Calling the lapsèd soul,
> And weeping in the evening dew;
> That might control
> The starry pole
> And fallen, fallen light renew!

This exquisite personification was the forerunner of the uncouth hieroglyphs that figure in the Prophetic Writings. It should be said, however, that these books contain isolated passages of great beauty; and that "The Book of Thel," in particular, despite the differences of commentators, is easy of interpretation. This poem may appeal to those—if there be any such—to whom "The Songs of Innocence" appear somewhat trivial, and who are repelled by the obscurity of the later work. Thel's address to the lily of the valley is memorable, not so much for grace and delicacy as for the intimate revelation of an exquisite flower-soul. Chaucer's daisy alone is worthy to stand beside it:

> Thel answered: "O thou little virgin of the peaceful valley,
> Giving to those that cannot crave, the voiceless, the o'ertired,
> Thy breath doth nourish the innocent lamb; he smells thy milky garments,
> He crops thy flowers, while thou sittest smiling in his face. . . .

Limits of space, unfortunately, prevent mention being made of more than one other passage from the Prophetic Writings. The description of the lark in "Milton" gives Blake a not unworthy place beside the lovers of that most favoured bird:

> He leads the choir of day; trill, trill, trill, trill:
> Mounting upon the wings of light into the great expanse;
> Re-echoing against the lovely blue and the shining heavenly shell;
> His little throat labours with inspiration, every feather
> On throat and breast and wings vibrates with the effluence divine. . . .

With this passage we may fittingly close; taken symbolically, it is not inapplicable to Blake himself. "Trill, trill, trill, trill," stands for the very notes of his joyous child-songs; few poets can lay claim to a more genuine inspiration; and no one poet combined as he did the warm love for the meanest of earth-things—the worm, the pebble, the clod of clay—with the same capacity for soaring into the infinite abstractions of the empyrean.

Things Seen.

Renouncement.

The great west door was wide. From the sunshine I gazed deep in to where six high candles glowed like red doubts through a fog of incense. Mass was over; the organ was mute. Even as I looked, a boy in a gauzy surplice was extinguishing, from right to left three, from left to right other three, of the candles. Yet the people stayed; not in their seats, but crowding on foot the gangway of the nave, approaching the altar at snail's pace.

Skirting the tail of the throng I found my way to the north aisle, which commanded a view of the whole church.

At the entrance to the choir sat a young man gorgeous in red and gold. One by one the people knelt before him. He offered his hands, open palm downwards, to receive the reverent kiss. Then the hands sundered, and the right waved the sign of benediction over a bowed head.

Time after time the little ceremony was repeated. There were men who bent silver heads; a tottering, old fellow in workhouse garb; another whom I fancied a veteran colonel of cavalry—men who in their own way had lived out their lives. A grave young sailor received the blessing, and a sergeant of the Irish Guards. Two little lads in sailor suits could hardly be persuaded to rise. There were proud, ugly women, and young girls in summer gowns (these came away, some of them, with tears in their honest eyes), frowsy beggar women, a girl with a crutch in a shouting violet frock, and a Eurasian ayah with bangles on her feet. Saxon, Celt, Latin—you might distinguish the types. All the players in this little drama showed some sign of emotion—all but one—the little lonely young man in red and gold. The self-seeking world might worship the Renouncement it dared not emulate; but he, with his eyes bent down, saw none of them. At every instant of respite his hands fell into his lap and his fasting body drooped. He was dead tired.

The Critic.

We have a spasmodic acquaintance, for on about three days out of the seven he drives the 'bus on which I travel homeward at night. He is a "superior man," owning the 'bus he drives, with a son who is a sergeant-major and a daughter who wears pretty hats and sometimes rides on father's 'bus. This sunny afternoon I was introduced to her with a jerk of the whip, for she had been to visit her aunt at Old Ford and father had picked her up. The driver is superior and having discovered that I am a "writing gentleman," discusses with me the fringe of literature: such as the relative merits of the Mail and the Express. This afternoon the presence of the daughter in the pretty hat elated him, and as we rolled down Piccadilly he threw over his shoulder news of the purchase of some Encyclopædia or other, news which was half lost in the roar of traffic. But the pretty hat twinkled with triumph. At St. George's Hospital we pulled up. "Ever notice that?" said the driver. I followed the direction of his whip. Across the hospital, with windows between, ran the inscription:

Digitized by Google

SUPPORTED BY VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTIONS.

The pretty hat twinkled again as I said that hospitals should be supported by the rates. "But it's wrong," said the driver. "It ain't grammar. Supported voluntary!" The horses started towards Knightsbridge. At Albert Gate we were stopped by the traffic. "It ought to be vo*luntarily*," said the driver. "That's grammar. I bin talking about that for the last ten years." "But why not read it across?" I suggested. "Supported by Voluntary Contributions. That's grammar." He looked doubtfully over his shoulder at me, and fell into silence. The pretty hat ceased to twinkle, and as I descended from the 'bus I was rather sorry to have spoiled a triumph which had lasted so long.

Sartor Re-read.

THERE is a certain tremour in returning to a book which has been an avatar to one's youth, an author who has been among the authentic gods of one's dawning years. Can that early impression survive the hard light of settled judgment? How many a figure which once loomed to us colossal has shrunk to most human dimensions in that searching light! To one it is the Byron of his youth that has thus wilted away; to another the Tennyson that has revealed unsuspected limitations. However, a final judgment may resolve that the divinity, after all, was there. It is an experiment nigh as dubious as the re-reading of young love-letters. These reflections are suggested to us by turning over the elaborate new edition of "Sartor Resartus," edited for Messrs. Black by Mr. J. A. S. Barrett. It is an excellent edition in most respects, with a quite admirable introduction; though the incessant foot-notes irritatingly insist on informing us about everything, from the situation of Downing-street to that of Otaheite. But what concerned us was apart from all editions. It was how Sartor would read, thus verily Resartus, by matured judgment, after having long lain on the shelf of reverencing memory.

On the whole, there was small need for fear. What it loses in perception of defects (and that mostly discounted by general knowledge of the Carlylean weaknesses) it gains by deeper perception of its fundamental depths. What first strikes you is the remaining evidences in it of what one might call the prehistoric Carlyle style. You had not remembered—rather, had not noticed this. At the outset of the book you find sentences of an almost flowing symmetry and orderliness, well-nigh balance, quite unlooked-for in the author of the French Revolution. Take the very first:

> Considering our present advanced state of culture, and how the Torch of Science has now been brandished and borne about, with more or less effect, for five thousand years and upwards; how, in these times especially, not only the torch still burns, and perhaps more fiercely than ever, but innumerable Rush-lights, and sulphur matches, kindled thereat, are also glancing in every direction, so that not the smallest cranny or dog-hole in Nature or Art can remain unilluminated—it might strike the reflective mind with some surprise that hitherto little or nothing of a fundamental character, whether in the way of philosophy or history, has been written on the subject of Clothes.

Had Carlyle never written but so, he would not have perturbed our fathers and grandfathers with such deep dismay,-not to say scandal, at his revolutionary assaults on the English tongue. But as he warms to his work, he falls into that "Babylonish dialect" which we recognise for genuine Carlylese. The phrase cleaves to it not inaptly for good no less than for ill. It has a certain Babylonian spaciousness of barbaric and primæval grandeur, amazing and imposing, even while it offends a Greek sense of form and clearness. On its ill side he has himself described it with that felicitous and aloof sense of self-criticism which some of the greatest authors possess—believing in themselves far too strongly not to be capable of amused laughter at themselves.

> Of his sentences perhaps not more than nine-tenths stand straight on their legs; the remainder are in quite angular attitudes, buttressed up by props (of parentheses and dashes), and ever with this or the other tag-rag hanging from them; a few even sprawl-out helplessly on all sides, quite broken-backed and dismembered.

That is as severe and true a criticism as could be passed on the mechanics of his style. A more damaging charge is the fact that his peculiarities are so largely imported. The other day we heard a man disrelish Carlyle's style on the ground that he (the speaker) "knew German." It is to be wished that Carlyle were less Germanic: the least tolerable of mannerisms are foreign mannerisms. But under this German vesture the body of his style is, after all, racily English. His way is largely the way of a man condensing remarks in a notebook, and makes for pregnancy. With all his juggling and sword-brandishing, Carlyle's manner is essentially pregnant, hieroglyphic; his packed and gnarled sentences, no less than his constant images, are in the nature of hieroglyphs; the mechanism of his style is indeed the complement of its internal character, and both are labour-saving devices, means for putting much in a little room.

The great passages fall on the ear as splendidly and authoritatively as of yore; they have taken no rust from the inclemency of time. If here and there one finds a passage stilted, an all too deliberate effect after poetic effects in prose, the best have yet the unsought eloquence and elevation of deep personal feeling. They roll like boulders down a mountain slope, with rough, thunderous jar and concussion, yet striking out a harmony in their rugged contact beyond the reach of shaped and quarried law. Fiery and fuliginous (to use his own favoured word), with rent and streaming storm-rack of turmoiled imagery, their splendour zig-zags against a ground of murky and jostling utterance, from which they emerge and into which they fall back. Or one might say these sudden and strongly contrasted passages of eloquence which fleck the tortured mass of his general speech are as the blue eye of the typhoon, opening a steady deep in the midst of the whirling blackness around. Such are some of those fragments in the "Everlasting Yea," or the emergence of Teufelsdrockh on the granite battlements of the Polar Sea.

But Sartor is nothing if not a semi-prophetic book, as phophecy goes nowadays: it is in this aspect that it appeals to or repels us; it is its gleams and rifts of truth that focus the attention. For here also Carlyle is every way the reverse of equable and self-contained, moving by stormful and uncertain energies, with sudden swirling sunward rushes, whence he swerves with baffled and beating pinions to collect himself for another upward dart. His teaching, tempestuous and fitful, abounds in cloven profundities of gloom, and luminous interpaces of height. By these, in the main, we must gauge him. Nor must we attribute to him more than he claimed for himself, or deny his limitations. To him Christianity was a dissolved or dissolving myth, the spirit of which survived, awaiting incarnation in some new and modern mythus. To supply that reincarnation he addressed himself; yet in the main awakened only a yearning and most justified dissatisfaction with the sordid age in which he lived, but failed to satisfy the yearning he created. "Carlyle," said Clough, "has led us all out into the wilderness and left us there." Many truths are to be found in him, in this Sartor above all; but

Digitized by Google

Truth herself shows flittingly through shifting vapours, doubtful if she were seen at all. In an age of the grossest materiality, no smug "scientific" explanations could loosen his clutch on the perpetual Pentecostal miracle of Nature. He saw and burningly proclaimed her to be manifestly wonderful and prophetic. No rationalism could shut from him the inwardness which was latent in all outwardness; externality almost ceased for him in the miraculous light which permeated and emanated from it. For this and things like these Sartor is most thankworthy. The maturer one is the more one discerns and honours these penetrant glimpses which for an instant make matter translucent. Yet glimpses they are, and instantaneous, transient. Perhaps they could not be otherwise—certainly not in Carlyle. Cloud-tossed and lightning-torn because himself could never get to himself any clear account of what he knew or believed as a whole; because his burning intuitions could never combine into any diffused radiance of system. And those who despise system, be sure, are those who cannot see life whole, but only by brief intensity of levin-flashes which leave behind momentary spaces of clear vision skirted by darkness and "the collied night." Such are apt to confound true system with the iron pedantry which narrows all truth within a brick-built Babel, circumvallated by courses of "logic formulæ"—as Carlyle himself would phrase it. "How paint to the sensual eye what passes in the Holy-of-Holies of Man's Soul; in what words, known to these profane times, speak even afar off of the unspeakable?" he asks. Which is most true; yet he who confines himself wholly to such swift-dislimning adumbrations of partly glimpsed truths, however super-sensual, cannot claim to be a complete teacher, even on our mundane and imperfect plane of completeness, where Christ Himself did not teach all things, leaving that to the spirit in each man's heart. So Carlyle is a teacher "as in a glass darkly," a teacher by fits and glimpses; from whom they will learn most who least attempt the vanity of systematising him, of "giving an account" of him. So we have seen a photograph of Vesuvius in eruption, where the tightly-defined edges of the voluming vapours were as strenuously false to the truth of nature as they were faithful to the rigid logic of the hard-eyed camera. These volcanic Carlylean shapes of truth you cannot photograph and reduce to linear definition, mingled as they are with scoriac showers of misperception and even untruth. For least of all men had this eruptive, prejudiced peasant any infallibility. An infallible Scotsman were too frightful a portent for the world or his country to endure. Often, indeed, would we fain display where Carlyle followed hot and fierce as any bloodhound the trail of truth, and where he stopped, suddenly baulked, as by that magic rock-door which shut out the lame boy who pursued the wake of the Pied Piper; but we withhold. For our business here has been a little semi-retrospective criticism, not to prophesy regarding a partial prophet.

FRANCIS THOMPSON.

Correspondence.

What is True Poetry?

SIR,—Your issue of June 29 affords much help towards the solution of this question.

In your article on Mr. Meredith's new volume you make it clear that a true poem must be pervaded through and through with a spirit of deep emotion. The heaven-born Promethean fire must not be wanting; else the reader is left cold, his pulses are not stirred, his interest is not quickened. True poetry, as Matthew Arnold teaches us, has a power to form, sustain, and delight our souls. It is evident, if it can do all this, that it must appeal to the emotions. It must be the medium by means of which the emotion is conveyed from the soul of the poet to our own.

There is a tendency in certain quarters to see very little merit in our modern poetry. But surely—to mention the name of one present-day poet—those who are acquainted at all with the poems of Mr. William Watson know how exquisitely he can give expression to his emotions. "Vita Nuova" may be referred to as an instance of his power in this respect.

I should like to quote the passage beginning:

Me the Sp z,
Me also, dimly with new life hath tou d,
And with regenerate hope, the salt of e;

but it is too long to give in a short letter.

In the current issue of the ACADEMY you quote the words of the Professor of Poetry at Oxford, in which he insists on the necessity of suggestiveness in poetry.

What is it that makes that phrase of Æschylus, which may be rendered "the myriad smile" (ἀνήριθμον γέλασμα) of ocean, a possession for ever to the lover of poetry? Is it not the suggestiveness of it? Does it not call up to our view the vast surface of the sea sparkling in the sunlight?

There is one more essential of true poetry: it is beauty. The poet can only successfully appeal to our emotions or suggest thoughts to us if his verses have a haunting melody and chasm of diction.—I am, etc.,

H. P. WRIGHT.

Elsdon, Otterburn, Northumberland.

"Australasia, Old and New."

SIR,—As I am only too pleased to find my book reviewed in a periodical of the literary standing of the ACADEMY, I am somewhat reluctant to say anything by way of complaint; but I think you will see that an injustice has been done me—unintentionally, of course—in your recent review, which says:

> Mr. Grey does not believe in Imperial Federation, and holds that Australia will become an independent nation. Putting aside the ingratitude of the idea, it is difficult to see how a few millions of white people in Australia, who do not number in all the Colonies—men, women, and children all told—as many as the inhabitants of London, would be able to resist the ambitions of Germany and France. Mr. Grey has a keen apprehension of the presence of those European Powers in Australasian waters, but he apparently does not see how utterly helpless the great island continent would be were it not for the British fleet.

The italics are mine. As this is exactly the reverse of what I do see, please permit me to quote from my book on the subject, as follows:

> The work of nation-building has just begun; many decades must pass before Australia is in a position of self-reliance; her present population, scarcely numbering five million souls, must increase to twenty or thirty millions of people, and enormous sums of money must be expended in perfecting a scheme of internal and external defence. But all these things will assuredly come to pass in the fulness of time; her geographical position and conditions differing so greatly from those of the Northern Hemisphere, will be special arguments to support her claims for complete control of her own affairs, internal as well as external, and no Statesman will be found to resist those claims whenever they are advanced, as they certainly will be, years, perhaps, before the present century draws to a close. . . . Therefore, Australia has much to do before she can dispense with the protection of Great Britain, and it would be madness to dream of doing that under existing circumstances. The danger of doing it is too evident for Australia to ignore her dependence upon the Mother Land. That she recognises the necessity of maintaining the connection is clear from the anxiety she displays with regard to the encroachments of Foreign Powers in the Pacific. On one hand she

Digitized by Google

THIRD EDITION.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

SONGS AND LYRICS.

By CHARLES WHITWORTH WYNNE, the Author of "Ad Astra."

THE FOLLOWING SELECTIONS ARE FROM "SONGS AND LYRICS":—

FROM THE LOVE POEMS.

THRO' THE PASS OF LLANBERIS.

Yon....at the end of the valley,
Storm-wrack and cloud before—
Thro' the wild pass of Llanberis
To the gleam of a southern shore.

So, thro' the gulfs of sorrow,
Thro' anguish of heart and mind,
One only hope to my journey,
One haven of peace I find.

Yet, if that hope should fail me,
That home in the valley fair,
Alone, 'mid the wastes of the mountains,
Must I wrestle with despair!

HAVE WE NOT MET?

Have we not met, and must we weep
Because our paths divide?
Have we not pass'd from steep to steep
Upon the mountain side?—
Our sun, if we had never met,
In passionless content had set.

Have we not met, and can we find
No antidote to pain?
Are thought and memory both resign'd?
Doth nothing sweet remain?
Thou wouldst not we had never met,
And thou been spared this wild regret?

Have we not met—what wouldst thou more,
The Paradisal flowers?
If Fate should not our love restore,
Eternity is ours!—
And in those happy fields are set
The long, lost hours of our regret.

WITHERED HOPES.

Last night my heart was as a fading Rose,
Which in an Urn of Tears I did dispose:
When Dawn looked down from out her pearly throne,
The Rose was left, but ah! the Scent was flown.

SHE WHOM THOU LOVEST.

O heart, my heart!
Why tost in tempest throe?
She, whom thou lovest,
Cares not for thy joy,
Cares not for thy woe,
Then let her go!

O beauteous Truth!
Why is thy heart so wrung?
She, whom thou lovedst,
Is false to thee and thine,
Is false to me and mine,
Then why repine?

O kindly stars!
Why shed thy tears for her?
Or is it mine own blinding pain
That sees tears in thy glistening rain?
Oh, join with me to forget!
Leave not a way for regret!
And yet....and yet!....

REJECTED.

You cast my soul to the four winds of heaven,
You hurl me, passionate, upon the sea of life—
And all that I in love have madly given
Comes back to me in strife!

FROM THE NATURE POEMS.

THE RING-DOVE.

'Mid beechy umbrage, bosky dell,
'Tis there the Ring-dove loves to dwell,
And, when the fiery noon is high,
Croon softly to the sapphire sky.

Like plashing waters heard at even,
In which the sunset lights are riven,
His mellow voice is soft and cool
As moonbeams on a silent pool.

Not here the upward-soaring lark
With quivering throat can pierce the dark;
The Nightingale might sing in vain
Within the Ring-dove's hush'd domain.

Thy song is like a Summer dream
Beside some gently-rilling stream—
A vale where quiet hearts may rest
And in Love's sanctity be blest.

Amid the lush and waving grass,
I watch the shadows as they pass,
And in thy leafy covert find
A solace to my wounded mind—

That Life is short, and Art is vain;
All unpremeditate thy strain!
That Love is long, and Virtue sure,
And wedded bliss is more and more.

TWILIGHT.

O mystic Hour! when day and night
Seem spell-bound with the fading light,
When hill and valley, dale and grove,
Bespeak none other voice but Love.

Recumbent on her couch of pine,
With languorous grace and dewy eyne,
The Queen of Heaven doth now unfold
Her fatal beauty limn'd in gold.

Whilst on the air the bat's bent wings
Add witchery to earthly things,
As, sailing with uneven flight,
He mocks the shadows of the night.

Now doth my spirit feel a part
Of ONE, Great, Universal Heart—
The bond of fellowship at least
'Twixt Man and Nature, bird and beast.

SUNDOWN.

The noises of day come out distinct and clear
While children's voices break the muffled roar
That rises from the village. Evermore
The babble of birds disturbs the dreaming ear.
The ring-dove gurgles from a coppice near,
The lark just flits above his wheaten floor,
And tired of climbing seeks his nestlings four,
Whilst swallows cleave the laden atmosphere.

The bloom of fruit is on the distant firs,
The valley fills with soft and filmy spray,
The breeze just fans the face and dies away,
And not a leaf within the forest stirs.
The sun goes down upon the throbbing air,
And leaves the hills more silent than they were.

ON DEATH.

Why shouldst thou fear, since Death must come?
Why, Mortal, shouldst thou fear the tomb?
Thou canst not one sweet minute gain,
Nor stay the Hand that stilleth pain!
Then bravely meet the silent Foe,—
If Foe He be, Who ends thy woe,—
For at the worst Forgetfulness,
And at the best great Happiness,
Will minister to thy distress,
And make the parting less and less!

NOTE.—A TENTH EDITION of "AD ASTRA," delicately bound, and printed on antique paper, is Now Ready. price 6s. net.

London: GRANT RICHARDS, 9, Henrietta Street, W.C.

Digitized by Google

regards with apprehension the possibility of France getting possession of the New Hebrides, and on the other she sees Germany permanently installed in New Guinea and Samoa. Left to herself just now, these two Powers would be a constant source of uneasiness to Australia, and that danger would be intensified if she had not the protection and assistance of Great Britain to rely on. Complete national independence will not be sought for, therefore, until Australia feels absolutely sure of her position from being able to defend herself against foreign attack, and when that stage of her development is reached the leave-taking between Great Britain and Australia will be one of mutual friendliness and best wishes on the part of the old nation and the new.

From the foregoing extract you will see, Mr. Editor, that there is no justification for the statement in your review that Mr. Grey "apparently does not see how utterly helpless the great island-continent would be were it not for the British fleet."—I am, etc.,

J. Grattan Grey.

National Liberal Club, Whitehall-place, S.W.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 93 (New Series).

Last week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best verses, not exceeding sixteen lines, in praise of the strawberry. We award it to Mr. Alfred Edward Wright, 21, Bentinck-street, Greenock, for the following:

Most welcome, palate-tempting loveliness!
Dear to the eye, refreshment of dull thought!
Shall we not linger o'er thee to express
The triple charm from nature's wildness caught?

Slow-tinted by the various moods that run
Through secret alchemy of tireless powers,
Like a fair jewel hung against the sun,
Thou comest from the tomb of faded flowers.

Thou dost recall the outworn breath of spring.
The soft compulsion of June's warm embrace,
And the choice air of freshness thou dost bring
Tells that the transient summer grows apace.

Much more our thoughts to careless hours invite,
And pleasant meetings by cool wood and field;
Where we may taste anew the brief delight
Of the full life which may such beauty yield.

Other verses received are as follows:

Dear crimson globule hiding there,
So coyly 'mid thy dark green leaves,
As luscious and as sweet as fair,
As they know well, the feathered thieves!

Plum, peach, and apricot must bow
Their dainty heads abashed to thee;
The ripest raspberry, I vow,
Shall never win a stave from me.

God's choicest gift thou art, my friend,
Beloved by all in every home;
And then how beautiful thy end,
To find a grave in creamy foam!

Oh! may we when life's sun has set,
Still meet thee in thy winsome guise,
And see thee, born sweeter yet,
In some enchanted Paradise!

[F. B. D., Torquay.]

When dainty June spreads out a shade
As fresh as Katie's grenadine,
And underneath the swaying green
Anette the damask cloth has laid;
When Bessie hints a thirsty smile,
I seek the luscious strawb'ry pile.

'Tis not alone his royal dress
Of scarlet set with beads of gold,
Nor perfume, fine as Rhenish old,
Nor frail white blossom's loveliness,
That bids me crown the strawb'ry fair—
He hath a charm more debonair.

He comes with dancing and delight,
When balls are many, eyes are bright,
With garden parties and—the rest;
In fine, when ladies look their best.

[R. O. S., London.]

Many rare fruits the June month giveth,
Myriad flowers she jubilant shows,
Flaunts to the sun her lilacs and lilies,
Paints the earth with her glorious rose:
Proud she is of her various beauties,
Sweet to smell and lovely to see,
But of her children none can challenge,
Strawberry red, thy peer to be.

Surely thou in the Garden of Eden
Hadst no place, else never had Eve
Yearned for the apple of doom and trouble—
Trouble eternal o'er which we grieve!
Had she but known thy luscious flavour—
Subtile and sensuous as finest wine—
Never an apple that grew had tempted
Eve to incur the wrath Divine.

[A. A. B., West Bromwich.]

To most men strawberries are a simple fruit:
To me they are an emblem, for to me
They conjure from the realms of memory
The spoiling of a flannel boating suit;
For there is that in their consistency
Softer than any strains of Phœbus' lute.

Now let the lyre reveal their hidden worth,
Now let the nations realise their scope—
Blushing as redly as the Rose of Hope,
Compressed, they give the finest stain on earth,
Which cannot be removed by any soap,
Nor rivalled by the witcheries of Perth.

Ah! if you doubt that modest-looking fruit
Conceals within its heart the sunset glow,
Array thee in a flannel boating-suit,
Sit on some ripe ones—and thou, too, shalt know.

[H. M. G., London.

S'welp me—strawb'ry,
But yer are the Best o' English fruit,
Bloomin' luscious,
Also pruscious,
Stoling garding loot.

Not me! Take cream!
Yer make me dream
O' Sal's rosy cheeks,
Red, delicious,
When she's vicious
'Cos I kisses seeks.

Yer more pretty red nor roses,
And yer taste more sweet
When yer stoling—(Lor! Sal blushes)
Yer and them's a treat.

[H. W. D. O., London.]

Twenty-nine other contributions received.

Competition No. 94 (New Series).

This week we offer a prize of One Guinea for the best quotation in prose or verse to illustrate the present state of the Liberal Party.

Rules.

Answers, addressed, "Literary Competition, The Academy, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, July 10. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the third page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon: otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

Digitized by Google

FROM J. NISBET & CO.'S LIST.

"The most moving book, without exception, that has been written about the war."—GLASGOW HERALD.

A WOMAN'S MEMORIES of the WAR.

By VIOLET BROOKE-HUNT. Crown 8vo. 5s.

"There is something particularly winning in the chronicle of this energetic, managing woman, her description of scenes at the front, her talks with the men.....in short, the picturesqueness, vividness, and unaffected pathos in all she relates wonderfully impresses the reader."—Dundee Advertiser.

TREASON AND PLOT:

Struggles for Catholic Supremacy in the Last Years of Queen Elizabeth.

By MARTIN HUME, Author of "The Great Lord Burghley," &c. Demy 8vo, 16s.

"A brilliant and interesting book."—Mr. W. L. COURTNEY, in the Daily Telegraph.

"To write the story of those years a better man than Major Hume could hardly have been chosen."
Athenæum.

BOLINGBROKE AND HIS TIMES. By WALTER SICHEL.

With Portraits. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

"At once erudite and brilliant.....the ablest defence of the policy of making peace at Utrecht yet written.....will take its place among the best political biographies in our language."—Speaker.

"We recognise the book as one of real importance, and one not to be neglected by any student of the eighteenth century."—Literature.

ITALY TO-DAY A Study of her Politics, her Position, her Society, and her Letters. By BOLTON KING, Author of "A History of Italian Unity," and THOMAS OKEY. With Maps. Demy 8vo, 12s. net.

"For the first time we have put before us in 'Italy To-Day' a thoroughly impartial, lucid, and comprehensive account of the social life and economic condition of Italy at the present time.....Will undoubtedly become one of the most widely read and highly valued volumes on Italian life and prospects."
World.

THE SOCIAL PROBLEM: Work and Life. By J. A. HOBSON.

Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"This is a work to be reckoned with by all economists and sociologists, and which every social reformer would do well to study with care."—Manchester Guardian.

London: J. NISBET & CO., LIMITED, 21, Berners Street, W.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S LIST.

"Fascinating, absorbing, unique."

GEORGE MOORE'S GREAT NOVEL,

SISTER TERESA, has just been published in Unwin's Green Cloth Library. Price 6s.

FIRST REVIEW.

The Daily Chronicle says: "A piece of sincere, strenuous, original art: the work of a mind unfeignedly devoted to a high ideal of truth and beauty."

A SIXPENNY EDITION.

EVELYN INNES. By George Moore.

A New Edition.

EVELYN INNES. By George Moore.

Entirely Rewritten.

RENAISSANCE TYPES. By William SAMUEL LILLY, Honorary Fellow of Peterhouse, Cambridge. Cloth gilt, 16s.

"Will be read with hearty interest by every reader into whose hands it falls."—Scotsman.

Over 200,000 sold of this Book.

QUINCEY ADAMS SAWYER and MASON'S CORNER FOLKS. A Picture of New England Home Life. By CHAS. FELTON PIDGIN. Cloth, 6s.

This is a great American novel, which has been selling enormously in the States, and is now issued for the first time in this country.

BERGEN WORTH. By Wallace Lloyd, Author of 'Houses of Glass,' &c. Cloth, 6s.

"A sensational story of life in Chicago during the railway riots of 1894, dealing with the struggles of a village blacksmith to live the Christ-life. The story abounds in realistic scenes and events."

THE LIFE of RICHARD COBDEN. By JOHN MORLEY. Cheap Edition. (Reformer's Bookshelf.) 2 vols., 3s. 6d. each.

PAUL BOURGET'S NEW NOVEL.

THE DISCIPLE. By the Author of "Outre Mer," &c. Cloth, 6s.

"A great, strong, powerful book."—Scotsman.

London: T. FISHER UNWIN, Paternoster Square, E.C.

AN AMERICAN TRANSPORT in the CRIMEAN WAR. By Capt. CODMAN. 198 pp. Price 3s. 6d.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON & Co.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS TO "THE ACADEMY,"

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

ON MONDAY NEXT.

THE EDINBURGH REVIEW.

No. 397. JULY, 1901. 8vo, price 6s.

I.—DRAKE and his SUCCESSORS.
II.—GREECE and ASIA.
III.—TOLSTOY: a Study.
IV.—TEMPORARY STARS.
V.—THE TIME SPIRIT of the NINETEENTH CENTURY.
VI.—NATIONAL PERSONALITY.
VII.—THE SITUATION in the FAR EAST.
VIII.—THE NORTH AMERICANS of YESTERDAY.
IX.—THE SPECTACULAR ELEMENT in DRAMA.
X.—SOUTH AFRICA.

ON MONDAY NEXT.

THE ENGLISH HISTORICAL REVIEW.

Edited by REGINALD L. POOLE, M.A., Ph.D.

No. 63. JULY, 1901. Royal 8vo, price 5s.

1. Articles.
WILLIAM STUBBS, BISHOP of OXFORD. Professor MAITLAND, LL.D.
THE MAKING of the NEW FOREST. By F. BARING.
THE FOREIGN POLICY of ENGLAND UNDER WALPOLE. By BASIL WILLIAMS. Part VI.
EUROPE and the OTTOMAN POWER BEFORE the NINETEENTH CENTURY. By W. MILLER.
MASSENA'S LINES of MARCH in PORTUGAL, and FRENCH ROUTES in NORTHERN SPAIN. By T. J. ANDREWS.
2. Notes and Documents.—3. Reviews of Books.—4. Notices of Periodical Publications.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN & Co.

SELECTIONS FROM

ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD'S PUBLICATIONS.

WORKS BY DR. MACLAREN.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 5s. each, post free.

THE GOD of the AMEN, and other Sermons.

THE WEARIED CHRIST, and other Sermons.

THE BEATITUDES, and other Sermons.

THE UNCHANGING CHRIST, and other Sermons.

THE HOLY of HOLIES. A Series of Sermons on the 14th, 15th, and 16th Chapters of the Gospel by John.

PAUL'S PRAYERS, and other Sermons.

CHRIST'S "MUSTS," and other Sermons.

London: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, Limited, 21 and 22, Furnival Street, Holborn, W.C.

DEIGHTON, BELL & CO.,

CAMBRIDGE.

JUST PUBLISHED.—Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

THE RISEN MASTER.

A SEQUEL TO

PASTOR PASTORUM,

By Rev. HENRY LATHAM, M.A.,
Master of Trinity Hall, Cambridge.

"We could find many things in the book to criticise, but these very things suggest devout thought—not flippant doubt. It has faults, but no book could do more to stimulate and corroborate faith. Our advice is to buy it and read it, to keep it and read it again."—Church Times.

"The book is written in the reverent spirit natural to a devout believer; and it is well that it so, for it is full of conjectures and theories, many of which, if made in at all a flippant and irreverent tone, would have certainly tended to startle and offend old-fashioned Christians, who think that speculations on such mysterious subjects are apt to be presumptuous and to lead to rationalism. We can scarcely, however, conceive the most conservative believer being hurt or offended at any theory that is broached in this book."—Church Quarterly Review.

"In saying that 'The Risen Master' is worthy of its predecessors we are giving it high praise. It is a model of what such a book should be, and is an expression of the Cambridge spirit and method at its best.....The whole book, indeed, seems to us a remarkable expression of a truly historical spirit, and serves to show that if the Resurrection story be not a true one, it is one of the most inexplicable instances of human delusion in the world's history."—Cambridge Review.

"It will stimulate the reader to ponder with fresh interest the marvellous narratives of the Resurrection, the mysteriousness of which it never seeks to explain away."—Pilot.

"Two plates, representing the exterior and interior of the Holy Sepulchre, contribute greatly to the elucidation of the writer's views on the Resurrection, and we should think this most interesting treatise on so vital an article of the creed must be a welcome addition to the Bible student's library."
Publishers' Circular.

"The argument is presented with great fulness and elaboration, and is withal most interesting and suggestive. The journey to Emmaus, the appearance at the Sea of Tiberias, the manifestation on the Mount, the appearance to James, the later appearances at Jerusalem, the Ascension, and the day of Pentecost form the theme of subsequent chapters. The book is able and suggestive and pervaded with a deeply religious spirit."—Primitive Methodist.

"Perhaps the impression made by this book upon us may best be described by saying that whilst before reading it we were inclined to acquiesce in the 'value judgment' view of Ritschl, and to say that all which could be known was that something had happened which convinced the first disciples that their Master had risen, but exactly what could not be said; we are now rather inclined to the view that an approximation to what actually happened can be known.....In the heartiest way we commend this book to all thoughtful Christian people."—Examiner.

"The whole book brings out the method in which during the forty days our Lord taught His disciples—not, as is often thought, the details of Church organisation, but the principles of Church life."—Churchwoman.

"Mr. Latham has unquestionably rendered a real service to all thoughtful students of the Gospel records. Those whose vocation is teaching will perhaps find less to help them in this volume than in 'Pastor Pastorum'; but in any case it will stimulate their thought and quicken their interest. It will help them to realise more vividly the wisdom and tenderness of the methods employed by Almighty God in the education of His children."
Guardian.

SECOND EDITION.

Demy 8vo, cloth, price 10s. net.

STUDIES OF ARIANISM.

Chiefly referring to the Character and Chronology of the Reaction which followed the Council of Nicæa.

By HENRY MELVILL GWATKIN, M.A.,
Dixie Professor of Ecclesiastical History, Cambridge.

"So even if this edition were a reprint of the first we should have great treasure. We should still have the only treatment of Arianism that combines utmost judgment with utmost scholarship in lucid language. But Prof. Gwatkin has wrought over the book and taken account of all the literature on the subject published since his first edition appeared in 1882."
Expository Times.

Crown 8vo, price 3s. 6d. net.

A NEW AND ILLUSTRATED EDITION.

RONALD AND I;

Or, Scenes and Characters from a Village of the Past.

By ALFRED PRETOR, M.A.,
Fellow of St. Catherine's College, Cambridge.

"Stories and sketches.....There is not one which is not of its kind perfect."—St. James's Gazette.

"A volume of clever sketches. Indeed there is more than cleverness in them."—Spectator.

"There is literature here, and that of the very best; witness 'The Cruel Crawling Foam.'"—Birkenhead News.

"We had finished Mr. Pretor's book, and been refreshed by the knowledge and humour and tenderness."—Literature.

NOW READY.

CATALOGUE of SECOND-HAND

BOOKS.—Theology—History—Biography—Law—Political Economy—Philosophy—Greek and Latin Classics—Mathematics—Natural Science—General Literature—Fine Arts and Illustrated Books.

ALSO

A HAND LIST of RECENT PURCHASES, GENERAL LITERATURE.

Cambridge: DEIGHTON, BELL & CO.
London: GEORGE BELL & SONS.

Digitized by Google

GREAT SUCCESS

OF

THE TATLER

No. 2 is better than No. 1.

☛ ON SALE TO-DAY ☚

No. 2

OF

THE TATLER

The New Society and Dramatic Paper.

In consequence of the great rush for No. 1, and the enormous number ordered by the Trade, we regret to say that some Newsagents were rather late in getting their supplies, and we fear that many persons failed to secure a copy. They can, however, obtain a copy of the SECOND NUMBER everywhere TO-DAY, although to-morrow may be too late.

Remember that
No. 2 is better than No. 1.

THE TATLER

An Up-to-Date Society Paper.

Society and the Stage Richly Illustrated Week by Week.

The Best Printing, The Best Paper, The Best Contents of any Paper of its kind.

Published every Wednesday, price 6d.

You can get No. 2 TO-DAY at any Newsagent's or at any Railway Bookstall.

Digitized by Google

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1523. Established 1869. 13 July, 1901. Price Threepence.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

We have already referred to the collotype reproduction of the First Folio of Shakespeare which is to be issued by the Clarendon Press. The Chatsworth copy has, by permission of the Duke of Devonshire, been deposited on loan in the Bodleian Library, and from it the reproduction is in progress at the Oxford University Press. This reproduction will be of the exact size of the original, with the necessary margin; and the whole of the 910 pages of the First Folio will be included in one volume. A brief introduction by Mr. Sidney Lee will be prefixed, giving bibliographical details, with as full a catalogue as practicable of all known copies of the First Folio. It is already certain that it will contain details of a much larger number of copies than that enumerated in any previous list. It is proposed to issue the volume by subscription in the first place. The subscription price for copies in full calf will be six guineas, and for copies in paper boards five guineas.

It is a curious fact that the writings of Newman, Pusey, Keble, Manning, and George Eliot are exciting a great deal of interest for the first time among French students of English literature. A recent work, admirably named L'Inquiétude Religieuse, by Father Henri Bremond, S.J., has recently met with official recognition, and been crowned by the French Academy. This work, written in a most charming style—which, with perfect originality, reminds us now of Taine in clearness, and now of Anatole France in its touches of humanity—ought to be read by everyone interested in the direction of French thought.

The author of the detective story, The Black Tortoise, which was published last March, is, we are informed, a Norwegian holding a high position in his own country. The book was published under the pseudonym of "Fredrick Viller," but the author is Mr. C. Sparre, a captain in the Norwegian Navy till last year, when he became a member of the present Liberal Government in Norway. The English version of the story was made by Mrs. H. L. Brækstad. Mr. Sparre has written a new story, The Mysterious Ship, which is now being translated into English.

Mr. W. B. Yeats, who is staying in the county Galway with friends, is at work upon a series of short poems dealing with events in the heroic age of Ireland.

Mr. C. A. Downer has prepared a volume upon Frédéric Mistral, the Poet of Provence, which treats fully of the poet's life and works, and also of the modern Provençal language and the movement known as the Félibrige.

"Yes, many long years hence, when all of us are gone, I can imagine that a little volume will be in circulation containing 'Rab and His Friends,' and 'Our Dogs,' and also, let us say, the 'Letters to Dr. Cairns,' and 'Queen Mary's Child-Garden,' and 'Jeems, the Doorkeeper,' and the paper called 'Mystifications,' and that called 'Pet Marjorie,' or 'Marjorie Fleming,' and that then readers, now unborn, thrilled by that peculiar touch which only things of heart and genius can give, will confess to the same charm that now fascinates us, and will think with interest of Dr. John Brown, of Edinburgh." So said Prof. Masson many years ago, and now Messrs. A. and C. Black are about to realise the Professor's anticipations by publishing a sixpenny edition of these papers.

The Connoisseur, a journal for art and curio collectors, is the title of a new illustrated shilling monthly periodical which is to be published by Messrs. Sampson Low and Co. in September. Among the subjects which will be dealt with in the first number are "An Account of the Collection of Sir Charles Tennant, Bart." ; "Some Missing Sir Joshuas" ; "The Art of Collecting Oak" ; "Hall-marks on Old Silver" ; "Engravings" ; "Violins" ; "Old Lace" ; "Medals," etc. There will be coloured plates, and other full-page illustrations, including a protrait of Sir Charles Tennant.

Messrs. Hutchinson and Co., the publishers of The Living Races of Mankind, are about to issue the first part of a companion work, to be called The Living Animals of the World, which will be issued in fortnightly parts. The new work will be a comprehensive Natural History, written by authorities, on what is claimed to be an entirely new plan. The illustrations, of which there will be about 1,000, including a large number of coloured plates, will be exclusively from photographs collected from all parts of the world.

Mr. Richard Whiteing was the leader of a debate at a recent meeting of the Pioneer Club on the subject, "Can the writer of fiction see too much of the world?" Mr. Whiteing was of opinion that the best writing came from the man or woman who saw not much, but deep and well, no matter how small his area. As examples, he cited the Brontës, Mr. Thomas Hardy, and Mr. Barrie among others, and showed that what they knew of the world as we mean it was very little indeed; yet how well each knew his own little world! Mr. Whiteing considered that Mr. Barrie's work had suffered from a widening knowledge of the world.

A man who could write a novel of No. 5, John-street experiences on a big scale is now on a visit to London, says the Daily Chronicle. This is a young American, Prof. Wyckoff, who left the Chair of Political Economy in Princeton University to wander over the continent of America as an ordinary job workman. He has suffered with the poor, frankly adopting their conditions of life, so that he might know how they live. His two books on Workers, and the series of illustrated articles by him in Scribner's Magazine, have served him as an introduction to many Englishmen, who are delighted to make personal acquaintance with their author.

Digitized by Google

By the death of Prof. Peter Guthrie Tait Edinburgh students have lost a great teacher. He was born in 1831, at Dalkeith; was First Senior Wrangler and First Smith's Prizeman in 1852. From 1860 up to last February he held the Natural Philosophy chair at Edinburgh. Everyone sympathised with him last year in the death of his son, Frederick, of the Black Watch regiment, who was killed at Koodoosberg Drift in February, 1900. Prof. Tait, as we have said, was a very fine teacher. In that character he is delightfully sketched by Mr. J. M. Barrie in his little book, An Edinburgh Eleven: Pencil Portraits from College Life. Mr. Barrie says:

> Turner is said by medicals to be the finest lecturer in the University. He will never be that so long as Tait is in the Natural Philosophy chair. Never, I think, can there have been a more superb demonstrator. I have his burly figure before me. The small twinkling eyes had a fascinating gleam in them; he could concentrate them until they held the object looked at; when they flashed round the room he seemed to have drawn a rapier. I have seen a man fall back in alarm under Tait's eyes, though there were a dozen benches between them. These eyes could be merry as a boy's, though, as when he turned a tube of water on students who would insist on crowding too near an experiment, for Tait's was the humour of high spirits. I could conceive him at marbles still, and feeling annoyed at defeat. He could not fancy anything much funnier than a man missing his chair. Outside his own subject, he is not, one feels, a six-footer. When Mr. R. L. Stevenson's memoir of the late Mr. Fleeming Jenkin was published, Tait said at great length that he did not like it; he would have had the sketch by a scientific man. But though scientists may be the only men nowadays who have anything to say, they are also the only men who can't say it. Scientific men out of their sphere know for a fact that novels are not true. So they draw back from novelists who write biography. Prof. Tait and Mr. Stevenson are both men of note, who walk different ways, and when they meet neither likes to take the curbstone. If they were tied together for life in a three-legged race, which would suffer the more?
>
> But if Tait's science weighs him to the earth, he has a genius for sticking to his subject, and I am lost in admiration every time I bring back his lectures. It comes as natural to his old students to say when they meet, "What a lecturer Tait was!" as to Englishmen to joke about the bagpipes. It is not possible to draw a perfect circle, Chrystal used to say, after drawing a very fine one. To the same extent, it was not possible for Tait never to fail in his experiments. The atmosphere would be too much for him once in a session, or there were other hostile influences at work. Tait warned us of these before proceeding to experiment, but we merely smiled. We believed in him as though he were a Bradshaw announcing that he would not be held responsible for possible errors.

In his last letter to Belinda, Arthur Pendennys is as wise and witty as ever. He deplores the fact, brought out by the Census returns, that we have among us a solid million of women in excess of men, and that they all seem to be writing garden books. Concerning The Crisis, he says: "Americans and English are different enough in many ways, but each has its Winston Churchill. The two young men ought to meet in the middle of the Atlantic and fight for the name. Meanwhile both benefit by the confusion. The Crisis is an American historical tale of the time of Lincoln, and is one of those books—which are getting far too numerous—that has sold sixty-five thousand copies. This means in America; but the publishers rarely say so I am afraid that in the case of The Crisis it will be found to be one of the novels that are without profit, save in their own country."

In our opinion the weather is becoming too hot for a discussion on the question "Can Literature Be Taught?" Nevertheless, it is being discussed in the Pilot, where Canon Ainger urbanely holds the scales between Mr. Andrew Lang, who says it cannot, and Mr. H. C. Beeching, who says it can. He says:

> On the one hand, I think Mr. Lang underrates the value, even the necessity, of notes, or instruction otherwise given, to a beginner in the subject. I am entirely with him in holding that the one sole object in studying good literature is to be able rightly and fully to admire and to enjoy it. But he seems to me to overlook the fact that unless a boy or girl understands the words they read, enjoyment is hindered and confused. And I think he over-estimates, not so much the average intelligence, but the average knowledge of the beginner. When a boy, reading "Macbeth," comes to the line:—
>
> To alter favour ever is to fear:
>
> if it conveys no meaning to him owing to the unfamiliarity of Shakespearean words or idioms, then he is so much the poorer for his ignorance—and it cannot be time wasted to remove his difficulty.
>
> On the other hand, I think Mr. Beeching has too much confidence in the ability of the teacher to create a taste for what is excellent where Nature has not so willed it. "To the mediocre," says Joubert, "the mediocre is excellent," and the hundreds of thousands who read and admire the novelist called X could by no amount of lecturing be persuaded that their idol was of clay. You may conduct a reader to the classics of our literature, but you cannot compel their enjoyment. . . . The germ of a literary sense and a literary bias is born with some persons and not with others. There seems little use in ignoring this fact. The literary sense will early stimulate literary curiosity—and the young student will read, right and left, for his own pleasure. He will taste this and that wine, this and that vintage, and will come to find out which is the best—and why certain poets and prose writers have come to be called "classics." There is no other way than this.

Mr. Alfred Nutt, also, joins in the debate, upholding, as ever, the research side of literature. Mr. Lang had said that the "only reason for reading Shakespeare is to be able to appreciate his poetry." Mr. Nutt exclaims:

> The only reason? Shakespeare is no absolutely isolated phenomenon; he stands in a given relation to the culture, the feelings, the manners of his time; he is influenced by his predecessors; he is influenced by and influences his contemporaries. It is surely as legitimate to study Shakespeare with a view to understanding the England and the Europe of the sixteenth century as it is, let us say, to study a rose with a view to understanding plant morphology, or the Jungfrau with a view to understanding the geology of the Alps. We do not assume that the botanist, by virtue of his study, becomes incapable of appreciating a garden of roses, or that the geologist becomes blind to the charm and majesty of mountains. Why should it be assumed, as Mr. Lang evidently does assume, that knowledge of the "history and evolution of literature" necessarily tends to deaden the appreciation of literature itself? I can imagine a boy or girl so afflicted by nature as to be unable to delight in the "Midsummer Night's Dream"; one is grieved, full of pity, as in the case of a blind or deaf child. I cannot imagine any human being so constituted as to be capable of appreciating the play, and, at the same time, capable of having his appreciative capacity destroyed by reading Mr. Gollancz's delightful introduction to it. If he were very dull, very limited in mental range, his appreciation might possibly be not heightened, but that it should be impaired—'tis unthinkable.

The literary world, in its two hemispheres, has heard with great regret of the death of Mr. W. J. Stillman, at the age of 74. It is but two months since we surveyed Mr. Stillman's long and varied career as artist, journalist, United States Consul, and Times correspondent, in connection with his Autobiography of a Journalist. He had met an infinite variety of men eminent in art, literature, and politics. Four years ago Mr. Stillman came to England from serving the Times in Italy, took a charming Surrey home, and gave himself leisure to write about squirrels. He was great in gardening, yet from his pen there kept flowing the evidences of his open-eyed, genial attention to the world's affairs. Not seldom he favoured us with a letter. A man of true culture, many enthusiasms, and sufficient achievement, Mr. Stillman was a man whom one misses.

Digitized by Google

THE New York Times' Saturday Review reports a curious literary case that has engaged the New York police-courts. It was that of a lady who had been arrested at the suit of her landlord for trying to defraud him of a board bill. The defendant pleaded that she had written an immortal work, or, if not quite that, a work which was to be "the book of the day." Although she had explained her ambitions and her intentions to her landlord, and had actually given him an order for the first payments on the unpublished and unaccepted work, he prosecuted her for removing herself and her belongings from his house without paying her bill. The magistrate decided that there was no evidence of intent to defraud on the part of the authoress. This implies a simple faith on the part of the authoress in her unborn book which is certainly pathetic. It is true that she declared that her expectations had been partly shared by the publishers to whom she had showed it. It seems to have been partly shared by the very landlord who has used her with such severity, since she quieted him for a time with assignments of her claims upon the sale. But the upshot of the war between faith and unfaith that went on within him was a determination to hale her before a magistrate. Seeing that she had no money, this seems to have been a rather wanton performance. He was a strange landlord to allow himself to be even temporarily appeased by the hypothecation of an unpublished work by an unknown author. "Was ever poet so trusted before?" was the admiring comment of one of the tribe on another's schedule in bankruptcy. But that was a small test of faith compared with a board bill which had been running for two years and had amounted to 951.16 dols. The chances that it will be paid from the profits of Clotilde Trevallion, one may safely say, are slender.

MR. F. T. BULLEN writes very interestingly in the Spectator on the books found in the forecastles of long-voyage ships. They are few, and they are miscellaneous; yet only once has Mr. Bullen been in a forecastle that had not a Bible and a copy of Shakespeare, "the property of some man who held on to them voyage after voyage with an almost superstitious regard." The forecastle readers number some characters among them, misers of their literary wealth. "I have in my mind's eye an old Danish shipmate who had a copy of a novel called Agnes Willoughby, which he would occasionally lend with a great deal of pomp and circumstance, but having lent it he could hardly tear himself away from the vicinity of the borrower until he had regained possession of it. His was a typical case. But he need not have been afraid, for there are few people in their own stratum of society who treat a book so humanely as do sailors. And there are none who more fully appreciate the reading to them of a good book, who remember better what they have heard, or comment more shrewdly upon it."

ANOTHER portrait: "One man, an American of great mental qualities, I especially remember, whose passion for reading was such that he would sit up the whole night with a favourite author, Dickens for preference, and bribe his watch mates heavily to take his duties for him, such as wheel or look-out, so that he might remain undisturbed. Bent nearly double in his bunk, the miserable lamp hung upon a surreptitiously shifted hook so as to bring it nearer him while still affording some light for his shipmates to rise or retire by, he made a pathetic picture of the pursuit of literature under difficulties, yet one familiar to all deep-water sailors." In conclusion, Mr. Bullen gives a poor account of the tramp steamer as a floating library. Very little reading is done by the crew, "the conditions are too onerous altogether—and so the seamen in these vessels become practically unread, since very little reading is done by any seaman temporarily ashore. The excellent libraries in the 'sailors' homes' are almost entirely neglected, and even seamen's reading-rooms connected with missions are mostly patronised by men who are not sailors at all."

THERE is nothing eighteenth century or Johnsonian about Mr. Le Gallienne. Nevertheless, by the invitation of Mr. Herbert Vivian, and the use of capital letters, he is made to appear as Ramblerish as possible in his essay on "The Desire of the Star for the Moth." One cannot imagine Johnson using the figure, or the inversion. M. Le Gallienne says:

> The Desire of the Moth for the Star has been made proverbial by a great Poet; but, so far as I am aware, no one has remarked that the Attraction is mutual, and that perhaps the Desire of the Star for the Moth in certain Cases is even more passionate than the Desire of the Moth for the Star.
>
> Of course, there are very big successful Stars who affect that the Hero-worshipper Moth is a Nuisance, and build themselves about with Bastions of Privacy, through which no Ray of their Shining can reach the most persevering Moth—but then, you see, they are so sure of their Moths. I wonder if the Time should come when the Flocks of little Pilgrims up to their dizzy Radiance begin to slacken, and the Roar of Moth-Wings outside their guarded Country-seats to grow fainter—and it has happened so with some very great Stars indeed!—if they would not become a little insecure in their Feeling of Starriness, and perhaps even at last unshutter a Window, and let slip a Beam of their celestial Selves; lest the Moths should grow discouraged, and perhaps cease coming at all.
>
> I have heard that some Stars of this Magnitude charge the Moth Half a Guinea for their Autographs—strictly, of course, for the Benefit of the Hospitals. Such Stars are, you can imagine, very sure of themselves. But there is another Kind of big Star that makes quite as fine a Blaze as those of which I have been speaking, yet is by no means so unsocial; on the Contrary, is smilingly, even eagerly accessible to every Moth that is so kind and appreciative as to take the Trouble to call with its Homage. It often, indeed, asks the Moth to stay for Lunch, and makes it promise to be sure to come again.
>
> For this Kind of Star Press-cutting Agencies were invented, and my Belief is that the Secret of its Affability lies in an hidden Dread within its Heart that it is not really a fixed Star at all, but only a Comet. It dare not, however, admit this, even in the Silence of its own Soul, so it seeks to drown the hideous Whisper in the murmurous Cloud of the Moths.

We wonder what Johnson and Boswell will make of this when they receive it from their Elysian newsagent? See our Competition column.

APROPOS of our article on Sartor Resartus last week, we may mention that Messrs. Macmillan have this week issued Sartor and Heroes and Hero-Worship, in one volume, in their excellent "Library of English Classics." These two works print well together, for they were associated in Carlyle's modest finances. Mr. A. W. Pollard, in his bibliographical note, quotes Carlyle's letter to his mother, written in 1841, in which he says: "I have bargained with Fraser for my lectures. They are now at press; that kept me so very busy. He would give me only £75—the dog—but then he undertakes a new edition of Sartor too (the former being sold), and gives me another £75 for that too. It is not bad, £150 of ready money—at least money without risk. I did not calculate on getting anything at present for Teufelsdroeckh. Poor Teufelsdroeckh, it seems very curious money should lie even in him. They trampled him into the gutters at his first appearance, but he rises up again—finds money bid for him."

Digitized by Google

Sartor had been written to be a magazine article, but it got out of hand and became a book. In July, 1831, Carlyle had written to his brother: "I am struggling forward with Dreck, sick enough but not in bad heart. I think the world will nowise be enraptured with this (medicinal) Devil's Dung; that the critical republic will cackle vituperatively or perhaps maintain total silence. A la bonne heure! It was the best I had in me; what God had given me, what the Devil shall not take away."

Sartor did ultimately appear in Fraser, to which magazine Carlyle sent it after a fruitless round of the publishers. Fraser took it doubtfully, and had reason to regret his bargain, for his desk was covered with letters of disapproval from the readers of the magazine. He refused to issue it in book form. Carlyle, however, had stipulated that the magazine printer should make up some thirty or forty complete copies as he printed it. The printer made fifty-eight copies, and thus Sartor first saw light as a "readable pamphlet of 107 pages, all made up without break." It is greatly to the credit of American readers that theirs were the first demands which brought a regular edition into being, the first American edition appearing in 1836. Two years later England followed suit with an edition by Saunders and Ottley, which Carlyle pronounced "dingy" and "ill-managed," but "correct, or nearly correct, as to printing."

THE July number of Pearson's Magazine contains the first instalment of a new serial story of Mr. H. G. Wells's, called "The Sea Lady." The theme is the arrival of a mermaid at a fashionable English watering-place—a mermaid who is bent on making her way into English society.

A VOLUME of selections from Dr. Weir Mitchell's previously published poems, a good part of which consists of dramatic dialogues and monologues, is in the press. One of his subjects is François Villon, another is Francis Drake.

Bibliographical.

THERE should be a large public for the coming new edition of Stevenson's Familiar Studies of Men and Books. This came out in 1882, and consisted of essays contributed to the Cornhill, Macmillan, and New Quarterly. It had, "by way of criticism," a preface, running to twenty pages, in which Stevenson reviewed his own work. His subjects, it will be remembered, were Victor Hugo, Robert Burns, Walt Whitman, Thoreau, Villon, Charles D'Orleans, Pepys, and John Knox, of whom, in this introduction, Stevenson said: "These were all men whom, for one reason or another, I loved; or when I did not love the men, my love was the greater to their books. I had read them and lived with them; for months they were continually in my thoughts. . . . and behold, when I came to write of them, my tone was sometimes hardly courteous and seldom wholly just." An edition of the Studies appeared in 1888, but the book seems not to have had anything like an extensive vogue. And yet Stevenson will probably live, in the end, rather in his essays and his verses than in his romantic fictions.

We ought not to be surprised at anything nowadays; but the announcement of an édition de luxe of Charles Kingsley's biography and works does give one pause. Is he, then, so very much read in these days? I should not have thought so. Of late years, of course, there have been reprints galore of the non-copyright tales—of Westward Ho! of Hypatia, of Alton Locke, of Yeast, and of Two Years Ago. But these have been mostly of the cheap, though handy, sort. The latest collected edition of the novels and poems was, I believe, that of 1896, when they were put into eleven volumes, which cost a guinea. Prior to that—in 1888-89—there was an edition of the novels, at three-and-sixpence each; and that, again, had been preceded—so far back as 1881-84—by the Eversley edition of the works at five shillings a volume, and an excellent edition that was. One may believe in the enduring qualities of at least Westward Ho! and Hypatia and the Water Babies, and even of Alton Locke and Yeast, which have a sort of historical interest; but Kingsley is the very last Victorian scribe whom I should have expected to find figuring in a de luxe edition.

The fact that The Cloister and the Hearth is to appear in an elaborately illustrated form suggests that Reade's romance is rising steadily in the estimation of the English public. In the last eight years or so it has appeared in half-a-dozen shapes. Thus, in 1893, it was brought out by Messrs. Chatto in four volumes. In the following year it was issued by the same firm at a shilling and at sixpence, in each case with a commendatory preface by Sir Walter Besant. That, I suppose, represented the highest tide of its popularity. Then, in 1895, came a three-and-sixpenny edition; in 1898, a reissue in four volumes at six shillings; and, last year, a 12mo edition at two and at three shillings net. We may assume, therefore, that The Cloister and the Hearth has been finally accepted as a classic; and it is not unlikely, I think, that there may be a gradual growth of renewed interest in some of Reade's other fictions, such as Griffith Gaunt.

In the "bibliographical note" which he has written for the latest reprint of Sartor Resartus (Macmillan), Mr. A. W. Pollard is a little less than fair to Mr. John Murray's "reader." He quotes that worthy as saying of Carlyle: "The author has no great tact; his wit is frequently heavy, and reminds one of the German baron who took to leaping on tables and answered that he was learning to be lively." Well, is not the "wit" of Carlyle "heavy"? He was a master of gloomy, saturnine humour, but for his "wit" what can be urged? Besides, Murray's "reader" said more than Mr. Pollard quotes in his "note." He observed: "The Author of Teufelsdröckh is a person of talent; his work displays here and there some felicity of thought and expression, considerable fancy and knowledge." That shows the "reader" was appreciative. It is true he added that "for a jeu d'esprit of that kind" Sartor was "too long," but I suspect he is not the only person who has been bored by it. As a matter of fact, though Sartor appeared serially in Fraser in 1833-34, it was not till 1838 that Carlyle could induce a London publisher to issue it in volume form.

I have on my table a one-volume story by Mr. G. A. Henty entitled A Hidden Foe. The date on the title-page is 1901, but nowhere in the book do I see any intimation of the fact that A Hidden Foe is not a new work. It was published originally, in two volumes, just ten years ago. The publishers, of course, were not called upon to volunteer this information, and if they are not advertising the book as new, they cannot be censured for not obtruding its age upon the public.

Mr. W. B. Yeats sets a good example in the preface to his just-issued Poems (Unwin). He says at the end: "'The Wanderings of Oisin' was published, with the lyrics now collected under the title 'Crossways,' in 1888; 'The Countess Cathleen,' with the lyrics now collected under the title of 'The Rose,' in 1891; and 'The Land of Heart's Desire' by itself in 1894. They were revised and reprinted in one volume in 1895, and again revised and reprinted in 1898." This is excellent. "Every author his own bibliographer"—that is an ideal to live up to.

THE BOOKWORM.

Digitized by Google

Reviews.

Essays in Sciolism.

Magic and Religion. By Andrew Lang. (Longmans. 10s. 6d. net.)

Mr. J. G. Frazer, as most people know, lately earned the gratitude of scholars by publishing in his fantastically-named book, The Golden Bough, a great mass of facts connected with the world-wide legend of the god of vegetation who dies only to rise again. Being, however, a man of science, he was careful to guard himself against the accusation of dogmatism on a subject so nebulous, and in the preface to his second edition spoke of his own hypotheses as "necessary, but often temporary, bridges built to connect isolated facts." Unfortunately, in the same edition, he put forth some new "bridges" of the most flimsy kind, whose only purpose seems to be to connect facts so far apart that there is really no reason for any connection between them at all. Two of the most fragile of these were the theory that magic has, in the history of civilisation, everywhere preceded religion, and that the Founder of Christianity was put to death as a mock king elected at a kind of Jewish saturnalia, at which two criminals were chosen, one for execution, and one for release. Neither of these theories would seem to call for any very detailed refutation. For while it is fairly plain to any student of the subject, that magic, or the compulsion of the spirit-world, has always existed by the side of religion or its propitiation, Mr. Frazer's explanation of the Crucifixion is fairly unthinkable. The ancient world did not come to a stop, as some seem to suppose, with the scene on Calvary; and if the Jews had been in the habit of celebrating any such annual orgy, some record of it would certainly have been preserved to us either by the Pagan historians, who looked on the Jew as "the enemy of the human race," or by the Christian writers, whose equally charitable opinion of him was based on merely theological grounds.

Such as they are, however, these two theories have given Mr. Andrew Lang his opportunity. Although an eminent and excessively busy man of letters, Mr. Lang has yet found time to dabble in such subjects as anthropology and folklore, and has even erected a theory of his own as to the origin of religion, which appears to most of us nearly as indefensible as Mr. Frazer's. This is, as summarised in his recent book, the Making of Religion, that man, even in his most primitive state, had a rude conception of a Supreme and moral Creator, and that most later faiths—he would, of course, except Christianity—are but corruptions of this sublime idea, brought about by admixtures of ghost-worship, and, perhaps, magic. Mr. Frazer's hypothetical bridges are, as may be seen, constructed without reference either to Mr. Lang's conclusions or his prepossessions, and Mr. Lang, therefore, found himself bound to expose the weakness of their foundations. The result was a good crop of magazine articles, which, with some additions and embellishments, now appear as the volume before us.

On the main point, we are, of course, very much in accord with Mr. Lang. When Mr. Frazer's theory of the Crucifixion was first "lifted" by the late Mr. Grant Allen, we felt compelled not only to refute it, but to expose (see the Academy of December 4, 1897) the misquotations on which it was founded. Yet we cannot think that Mr. Lang's method of dealing with it is wholly admirable. Although he pushes his enquiry into what he considers the genesis of the idea to almost intolerable length, he nowhere, so far as we can see, mentions the fact very frankly stated by Mr. Frazer. that he was first led to it by an article in Hermes, by Dr. Wendland, on "Jesus als Saturnalien-König." Nor do we think he is always quite fair to his opponent. Mr. Frazer tells us that his speculation, which he admits may not be fully warranted by the evidence, yet helps "to shed fresh light on some of the causes which contributed to the remarkably rapid diffusion of Christianity in Asia Minor"; and he claims that the death of Jesus, under the circumstances he imagines, would have been more impressive to an Eastern people than if He had died the death of an ordinary malefactor. "It shed," he says, in a somewhat rhetorical passage, "round the cross on Calvary a halo of divinity which multitudes saw and worshipped afar off; the blow struck on Golgotha set a thousand expectant strings vibrating, in unison, wherever men had heard the old, old story of the dying and risen God." The allusion is, of course, to the many gods of Western Asia—Thammuz Adonis, and the like—whom, on Mr. Frazer's hypothesis, the crucified Lord of Misrule at Jerusalem was supposed to represent. Yet Mr. Lang twists this into what he calls "Mr. Frazer's hypothesis as to the origin of the belief in the divinity of our Lord," and even into "Mr. Frazer's theory of the origin of the Nicene Creed." Little as we admire Mr. Frazer's theory, we admire still less the rhetoric that would make him say what he did not say, or the suggestion made in another place that he purposely consigned certain qualifications of his evidence to foot-notes, in order to hide them from that incurious person, "the general reader." We have often found Mr. Frazer inconsequent, but never disingenuous.

We pass willingly to the consideration of the essay on Magic and Religion, which gives its name to the whole book. Here, too, the main cause of dispute between Mr. Frazer and Mr. Lang seems to be a misunderstanding of what the former meant. Australia is the country specially quoted by Mr. Frazer in support of his theory that magic has preceded religion. He has again guarded himself by the definition of religion given above, but Mr. Lang replies that this "does not include all that we usually mean by religion." He then goes on to say that the belief in a Creator is a germ from which may spring [our italics] the ideas of duty towards, and an affection for, such a being, and that these are religious ideas. He has no difficulty in showing that such a belief has been attributed by many travellers to the native Australians; but does this get us much further forward? Mr. Frazer might well answer that it was indifferent to him whether the Australians believed in a Creator or not, because, while they trusted to the compulsion instead of the propitiation of the spirit-world, their belief led only to magic and not to religion. To this question Mr. Lang does not appear to address himself; and here, too, we believe that his case is more just than his advocacy. Yet he asks us whether we have not in all Mr. Frazer's book "to do with that method of arbitrary conjecture which has ruined so many laborious philosophies of religion," and tells us that it is "in the interest of the nascent science of religion" that he has to point out "errors of method that now prevail."

For our own part, the perusal of books like Mr. Lang's, and to a lesser extent Mr. Frazer's, makes one think that science is a word very loosely used in relation to them. Mr. Lang, indeed, airily tells us, in the present volume, that "we all know what we mean by science; science is 'organised common-sense.'" But we should ourselves prefer the closer definition that science is knowledge based upon ascertained facts, and most of the facts concerning the origins of religion are not ascertained at all. People in a low state of culture often hold the most confused and contradictory religious beliefs—as everyone knows who has ever tried to tackle on the subject an English peasant—and savages generally reply to every question that seems to them indifferent in the way that they think will please their interlocutors. Hence very little real evidence is attainable as to the beliefs of primitive man; while there has grown up a great mass of hearsay at the disposal of anyone who can read two or three of the easier European languages, to be hunted over for support for any wild theory an undisciplined imagination may conceive. It is, doubtless, for this reason that there now exists a whole family of studies calling themselves the "sciences" of anthropology, of religion, of folk-lore, and, to take the last instance, of gypsy-lore, which have nothing in common with real science but the name. It may, of course, be said that these do no harm except in the way of dissipation of energy, and may sometimes lead an inquiring spirit into studies which must be pursued by scientific methods, such as the decipherment of cuneiform and hieroglyphic texts. This is quite true; nor is there any way of reducing them to their proper proportion in the eyes of the uninstructed save by the establishment of such a State Academy of Sciences as is possessed by France, Germany, and nearly every country in Europe but our own.

Digitized by Google

Calverley.

The Complete Works of Charles Stuart Calverley. With a Biographical Notice by Sir Walter J. Sendall, G.C.M.G. Governor of British Guiana. (Bell. 6s. net.)

CALVERLEY in one handy volume, at a moderate price. It should soon be in the hands of all who love wit and scholarship, freshened with never-failing humour. Calverley's life-work sums up to a greater bulk than one would have surmised. But the greater part of it is comprised in the translations—the Virgil's Eclogues, the Odes of Horace, and the Theocritus—which are, of course, sterling work. Besides these, a few Latin poems, original and translated, and a handful of vers de société, are all that he has done. It is upon these light poems that his ultimate fame must rest; and in going through them one is struck by the fact how seldom the lyra elegantiarum, the tricksy lighter Muse, reaches its true mark. With most poets it is only a certain core of their work which satisfies the finer palate. But this seems specially the case when Puck's wings brush the lyre. But a handful of Hood is Hood's best; though a fairly large handful, it may be. Hood, however, jested for a living, and much must be laid to the score of that. Not so Moore, and Moore's lighter verse needs only less sifting than Hood's. Not so Calverley, and Calverley, unlike the other two, did not labour his powers by over-production. His verse, as we have said, is itself but a handful; yet even that handful needs to be sifted, and out of the sifting comes a small posy, merely, of pieces which show his gift perfect. But this attar of Calverley is attar of light verse, quite among the best of its kind in the language. This (we say unhesitatingly) comes of his scholarship. "What! Scholarship needed to write a skit or a copy of humorous verses?" guffaws the contemner of "useless classics" in education. Why, not absolutely needed, but exceedingly helpful. Has it ever struck you what a gallant proportion of the men who have won repute in this kind hail from our Universities? Praed, Calverley, Locker-Lampson, Traill, Owen Seaman—nay, Moore himself was a classical scholar, and one of his early exploits was a very Moore-ish version of Anacreon. Most accomplished classic of them all was Calverley, and his best comic verse is an advertisement of the fact. With all his overflowing wit and the metrical mastery he possessed as a poet, Hood lacked something which Calverley had (apart from native interior gift). That is the trained sense of form and finish; the dexterity which flings the verse into just the right form for suggesting and aiding the airy effect of the humour, which fledges and tips the line to carry the point of wit like an arrow-shaft; the felicitous turn which brings diction and metre pat on the quick of the jest, and tickles you to instant laughter. Of these qualities all feel the effect, but only a student of technique will realise the cunning art of them. Add to these the sense of clearness, of sparingness, the avoidance of the too-much; and you will realise what Calverley's light verse owed to his classical scholarship. Some of them he might have learned from earlier English serious poets; but the treasury of them in their unison is the classics. The craft he so dearly loved and so thoroughly knew in a Greek poem or an Horation Ode gave Calverley his mastery of measured laughter in English rhyme. Mastery—mastery of form and technique—is the thing which obviously differentiates him from most before him and many after him. Not from a popular education could you get a Calverley, though the aspirant had the wit of Butler and the humour of Rabelais. He might make you laugh consumedly, but never with the feathered dexterity and elegance which make epicurean laughter.

Take some concrete example of what we have said. "Forever" is a little gem as perfectly, lucidly, and compactly formed for its playful purpose as anything of Horace for its graver intent. The mould of the stanza delicately enhances the fun:

> Forever! What abysms of woe
> The word reveals, what frenzy, what > Despair! For ever (printed so)
> Did not.

How the antithetic and wilful bathos of the close is clenched by the capricious brevity of the last line! Even more dainty in its effect of whimsied humour is the semi-final stanza:

> Forever! Passion-fraught, it throws
> O'er the dim page a gloom, a glamour:
> It's sweet, it's strange; and I suppose
> It's grammar.

There is a like effect in a poem otherwise not so perfect and rounded, "On the Brink":

> I watch'd her as she stoop'd to pluck
> A wildflower in her hair to twine;
> And wish'd that it had been my luck
> To call her mine.
>
> Anon I heard her rate with mad,
> Mad words her babe within its cot;
> And felt particularly glad
> That it had not.

Mr. Owen Seaman and others have learned and copied with success this particular art which Calverley was first to invent—surprising it, perhaps, from the effect of the curt final line in Horatian Sapphics. That is a surmise; but that he gained it from his classic studies, we have no doubt. So close is the accomplished comic Muse to her laurelled sister. Congreve himself, while he is pouring forth his brilliant comic wit, stumbles (in "Love for Love"), apparently by sheer haphazard, upon a charming poetic image. "Thin partitions do the bounds divide," at times, of fine comic and fine serious verse. It is but a veering of mood, a turn of the wrist. Nay, Calverley once deliberately writes a humorous poem, "Contentment," "after the manner of Horace." He has done better when he was not avowedly imitating his master. But there is one stanza at his best, when he is describing the imperturbably contented:

> And when they wax a little gay,
> And chaff the public after luncheon,
> If they're confronted with a stray
> Policeman's truncheon.
>
> They gaze thereat with outstretched necks,
> And laughter which no threats can smother,
> And tell the horror-stricken X
> That he's another.

Digitized by Google

Alas! that the too successful crusade against musty Greek and Latin forbids us more than lightly to touch upon Calverley's actual inroad into the stately classic domain. Call "dead," forsooth, the language of "Carmen Sæculare"! How grandly classic the picture of the youthful undergraduate invading the tobacco-store of Bacon!

> Pervigil ecce Baco furvâ depromit ab arcâ
> Splendidius quiddam solito, plenumque saporem
> Laudat, et antiquâ jurat de stirpe Jamaicæ.
> O fumose puer, nimium ne credo Baconi:
> Manillas vocat; hoc prætexit nomine caules.

The delightful parody of the last two lines must thrill chucklingly the midriff of every scholar. Nor less accomplished in its way is the description of the billiard-votaries:

> Ilie petit virides (sed non e gramine) mensas,
> Pollicitus meliora patri, tormentaque flexus
> Per labyrintheos plus quam mortalia tentat,
> Acre tuens, loculisque pilas immittit et aufert.

This reads augustly poetic, but a crux indeed. The author comes to our help with a note no less beautiful in its mock-gravity than the text itself. With all the lumbering solemnity of the dear, pedantic scholiastic Latinity, he comments on tormenta plus quam mortalia:

> Eleganter, ut solet, Peile, "unearthly cannons." Perrecondita autem est quæstio de lusubus illorum temporum, neque in Smithii Dict. Class. satis elucidata. Consule omnino Kentf. de Bill.

And on loculis he comments: "Bene vertas 'pockets.'" So throughout the most dignified seeming of poetic diction disguises the most base and mechanical of modern ideas, or masks the most clamorous "howlers." Only such a scholarly humourist as Calverley could have done it; and to any man of classic training the result is a Roman banquet of fun.

Fun he has always at command: apart from that accomplished cunning of technique, that artful caprice, at which we have glanced, he can capture a sure laugh by sheer unexpectedness of humour, as throughout the delightful verses on the organ-grinder:

> Half-a-bar sets several couples
> Waltzing in convenient spots;
>
> Not with clumsy Jacks or Georges:
> Unprofaned by grasp of man
> Maidens speed those simple orgies,
> Betsey Jane with Betsey Ann.

This, with the gift which made him an admirable Latin versifier, made him a parodist. For Latin versifying is essentially an imitative art. Calverley is surely the first of parodists. He may almost be called the founder of a new dynasty in parody. To an extent not previously approached, his parodies are likewise criticisms, and very keen criticisms, of a poet's weaker side. One grudges to call them parodies, so close and refined is the imitation, so inclusively does he catch and reflect all the elements of a writer's style. Only the one or two best of the Rejected Addresses come near his work in this kind—surely the most stupid of all forms of humour as it is usually practised, a coarse exaggeration of some obvious feature, unharmonised by the subtler traits of style which really constitute the poet so belied. In that wonderful imitation of Browning, "The Cock and the Bull," no single peculiarity of "The Ring and the Book" is suffered to get obviously tyrannic and out of focus. The clipping of "the smaller parts of speech" is a trifle—very slightly—forced for effect of caricature; but the other mannerisms (tempting as they are for violent burlesque) maintain their due perspective until the close of the parody, where they are all purposely allowed to cumulate for a final climactic reductio ad absurdum. The less notable features receive their due place, and those which a common parodist would ignore, such as the burly use of strong, cudgel-like Anglo-Saxon words: the movement of the metre is accurately given, though the Browning blank-verse has no readily-caught rhythm like the Tennysonian, and it is just here that an ordinary travesty would come to grief. Calverley, in fact, does not travesty. His art is far too delicate for that. So in the parody of "The Brook," the finest stroke is not in the obvious burlesque, but the acute banter of a true Tennysonian mannerism, in the abrupt turn at the last:

> It was noised next noon
> That chickens had been miss'd at Syllabub Farm.

Yet the delicious skit on the pre-Raphaelite ballad is perhaps a travesty, but a travesty which hits the mark, and is irresistibly suggestive of the model, for all its wild fun. When one remembers William Morris's early ballad, with the absolutely unconnected and cryptic refrain, "Three red roses across the moon," one can but laugh approvingly at stanzas like these:

> The farmer's daughter hath ripe red lips;
> (Butter and eggs and a pound of cheese)
> If you try to approach her, away she skips
> Over tables and chairs with apparent ease.
>
> The farmer's daughter hath soft brown hair
> (Butter and eggs and a pound of cheese)
> And I met with a ballad, I can't say where,
> Which wholly consisted of lines like these.

As for 'Lovers: and a Reflection," quotation is a vanity, and praise a superfluity. In parody, Calverley (in fine) is Calverley, and Mr. Owen Seaman in his prophet.

With regard to the translations, we have one thing to say in mitigation of their conceded excellence; and it chiefly applies to the Virgilian Eclogues. Partly in the endeavour to render the Latin (as near as may be) line for line—and you can get more monosyllabic or disyllabic words in a line than you can polysyllabic; partly, no doubt, from his sturdy Yorkshire character, Calverley runs fatally to monosyllables and disyllables. He has whole layers of these short words (no poet can call them lines) packed like sardines in a tin; till the line is choked and loses motion, it has never an open pore for breath. The danger of our strong, expressive, homespun English will ever be that it is over-emphatic and curt—a procession of brief syllables hedged and impaled by thick consonants; even as our English landscape is intersected into a green chess-board by uncompromising rectangles of thorny fence. Calverley's Virgilian versions are heavy with chains of such clodhopping syllables. One sighs for the long trample of a few Latin-born words, shattering the Saxon ice, and restoring movement to the curdled line. But that protest uttered, we accept these also as treasurable things.

Raw Material.

Secret Chambers and Hiding Places. By Allan Fea (Bousfield. 10s. 6d. net.)

THERE is a practical romance about secret chambers which is pleasantly invigorating to the historical sense, for it is a romance of authentic fact. No doubt imagination, and particularly local imagination, has done wonderful things in the way of invention and embroidery, but where a secret chamber exists we may be sure there was a reason for it, which cannot always be said of the traditional ghost. We think, however, that Mr. Fea is too hard upon the ghost; we by no means agree that "the ancestral ghost has had his day, and to all intents and purposes is dead." We cannot afford to dismiss so lightly the unhappy haunter of familiar places.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Fea's industry has resulted in an interesting accumulation of facts concerning the secret chambers of something over two hundred houses, and this by no means exhausts the subject; we notice that he gives no instances in Dorset, and only four in Devon. But, where selection was necessary, he has selected judiciously, choosing as various types as possible, and giving a sufficiently clear idea of situation and method of construction. In such a book it was, no doubt, difficult to avoid scrappiness, and certainly Mr. Fea has made no effort to avoid it. A division of the material into counties would greatly have simplified its perusal, and we should have been spared leaps across half England in a paragraph; further, such an arrangement would have been a distinct aid to the reader's topographical realisation. In the matter of topography and colour, indeed, the book is curiously lacking; Mr. Fea has apparently been content to use his facts on their barest merits.

The great deviser of "Priests' Holes," which became so necessary when Elizabeth was on the trail of priests and recusants, was Nicholas Owen, nicknamed "Little John," a servant of Father Garnet. He appears to have spent the greater part of his life travelling from district to district, constructing hiding-places in the great Roman Catholic houses. This remarkable person possessed an industry which was equalled by his mechanical ingenuity; he both designed and constructed with his own hands more "holes" than history has record of. After the discovery of the Gunpowder Plot, he was arrested at Hindlip Hall, in Worcestershire, together with his master, on which occasion Cecil expressed the hope that "great booty of priests" might be secured through Owen's disclosures. But the rack failed to make the little Jesuit speak. "The man is dead—he died in our hands," was the report of the Governor of the Tower. There is a MS. in the British Museum which gives details of this search and capture, in which the author refers to Owen as he "who afterwards murdered himself in the Tower."

One cannot but wonder, in reading these records, how it was that the search parties were so often unsuccessful. One suspects that the members of those parties did not display the diligence for which their employers presumably paid them—else how account for Father Blount's escape from Scotney Castle? Says Mr. Fea:

> One Christmas night, towards the close of Elizabeth's reign, the castle was seized by a party of priest-hunters, who, with their usual mode of procedure, locked up the members of the family securely before starting on their operations. In the inner quadrangle of the mansion was a very remarkable and ingenious device. A large stone of the solid wall could be pushed aside. Though of immense weight, it was so nicely balanced that it required only a slight pressure on one side to effect an entrance to the hiding-place within. . . . Upon the approach of the enemy, Father Blount and his servant hastened to the courtyard and entered the vault; but in their hurry to close the weighty door a small portion of one of their girdles got jammed in, so that a part was visible from the outside. Fortunately for the fugitives, someone in the secret, in passing the spot, happened to catch sight of this tell-tale fragment and immediately cut it off, but as a particle still showed, they gently called to those within to endeavour to pull it in, which they eventually succeeded in doing.

The pursuers, we are told, hearing voices, rushed into the courtyard and commenced battering the walls to such purpose that those in the hiding-place had to put their combined weight against the door to keep it from yielding. Then the discouraged hunters went to sleep, apparently without setting any watch, and the good father made his escape by swimming the moat. Certainly the fugitives had vastly more intelligence than the pursuers!

But it is not for its stories that Mr. Fea's book is interesting; material is here for the fine purposes of romance, but the author does not supply the vivifying touch. The value of the work lies in its careful descriptions of hiding-places, and in a series of equally careful illustrations. One seems to have suddenly chanced upon a world full of mystery and intrigue, where staircases are as likely as not to be death-traps, and every panelled room has its weird suggestion. The "secret spring" becomes a fact in which we are constrained to believe, and hollow beams and hiding-holes count as commonplaces. Of the miniature hiding-places, we like that best at Bisham Abbey, in Berkshire, where, "behind a window shutter, in a small secret cavity in the wall, was found an ancient, tattered copybook," which was evidently the work of a slovenly scholar. Now, Lady Hoby, who once lived at Bisham Abbey, was said to have killed her son by too severe castigations, inflicted, says Mr. Fea, "for his obstinacy in learning to write." So by this curious discovery tradition was justified, and Lady Hoby was twice condemned.

Mr. Fea, of course, deals with many hiding-places which exist no longer; the introduction of "modern conveniences" has swept away secret chambers by the score, or converted them into linen cupboards or bath-rooms. But enough still remain to make further investigation desirable, and we envy the man who shall chance upon such a discovery as that made at Danby Hall, in Yorkshire:

> The hiding-place contained a large quantity of swords and pistols. Upon the blade of each sword the word "Shortly" was engraved. Upwards of fifty sets of harness of untanned leather of the early part of the eighteenth century were further discovered, all of them in so good a state of preservation that they were afterwards used as cart-horse gear upon the farm.

There is a good deal in the volume concerning the Stuarts, who had a way of needing hiding-places more than any other Royal house, but nothing that is new, and the final chapter, on the "Scottish Hiding-places of Prince Charles," is wholly unnecessary. That subject has been treated so often that only fresh information, or great skill of presentation, can justify its recurrence.

A Plea for Anarchy in Education.

The Curse of Education. By Harold Gorst. (Grant Richards. 2s. 6d.)

Mr. Gorst prepares us for a non-original contribution to educational theory by his definition of the term education "as the conventional mode of teaching and bringing up and of educating youth in this and other civilised countries." The whole body educational is diseased through and through, an abomination standing where it ought not, a danger to democracy, inimical to genius and talent. Were all schools swept away to-day, things would begin instantly to improve. Mr. Gorst is in love with anarchy; the rule of parents and schoolmaster is bad, then let us have no more of it; if we would only permit children to follow their bent, real education would thrust out the false. Instead of the examination of exceptions, of tendencies of noting how school systems have evolved from care for the type to care for the individual, of the relation between extra and intra school life, he bludgeons everything he meets with from school or University. Bad grammar, bad sense, bad psychology and philosophy meet us on every page. On page 15 we read: "Instruction consists in cramming and prescribing by a more or less pernicious method . . . a certain quantity of facts into all pupils, without distinction." Even the unconventional educated must find it difficult to understand how a fact can be prescribed into a pupil. On page 51, Mr. Gorst

Digitized by Google

—presumably conventional for once—tells us of the prigs, who vulgarise "the public service by dropping h's in the great Government Departments." Where else would Mr. Gorst have them dropped?

Another example of unconventional and vigorous English is, "But progress in ideas, or anything in the shape of moral revolution, has to undergo a thousandfold more tortuous process before it can filter through a convention." On page 47 we learn that "gracefulness . . . consists of natural muscular movement, untrammelled by self-consciousness or artifice." The psychologists may be glad to know that every time "a fact is imparted an idea is driven out." Fresh light is thrown on the depopulation of the rural districts by the author's discovery that French, shorthand, and mathematics are taught in the rural schools. The fact is new, the connection subtle. Given a boy, and no other book than a "Bradshaw," what would a genuine educationist do? Concoct a problem like this? "If the 11.40 express from Paddington travelled to Swindon at fifty miles an hour and broke down half way, at what o'clock would the 12.15 Parliamentary train overtake it?" Not a bit of it. "He would tell the boys to look out a good train from Birmingham to Newcastle. Each boy would be free to tackle the problem in his own fashion, and the task—if successfully accomplished—would do much towards developing the thinking faculties." The former of these two problems is an exercise in mental gymnastics, and mental gymnastics do not develop the thinking faculties, hence the preferableness of the latter problem, which does. Then there are platitudes and sometimes quite a fresh idea for those who have never thought about education at all. We select a few:

1. Some children develop later than others.
2. Above all things, real education would encourage the utilisation of the brain for purposes of thought and reflection.
3. A little arithmetic is also indispensable to the fulfilment of many of the commonest duties of everyday life.
4. We are most of us prigs, if we only knew it.

One gem more, and we have finished—a piece of sheer clairvoyance this time. If you are asked to meet a stranger from Eton and Trinity Hall who has come out tenth in the Mathematical Tripos, "you know exactly the kind of man to whom you are going to be introduced. He will have a very proper contempt for made-up ties, and will refuse to fasten the bottom button of his waistcoat."

After such a delightful little voyage, we trust Mr. Gorst will not be long before he again hoists the sails of his genius and once more puts out to sea.

The Beginning of Greek Culture.

The Oldest Civilisation of Greece. By H. R. Hall. (Nutt.)

Close on the heels of Prof. Ridgeway's first volume (for which see Academy of June 22, 1901) comes a work by an official in the Egyptian department of the British Museum on the same subject. Prehistoric Greece seems, indeed, to be monopolising the attention of archæologists at this moment, which is, doubtless, to be accounted for by Mr. Arthur Evans's discovery last year of the so-called Palace of Minos at Crete, with its hundreds of clay tablets written in a script still undecipherable. So much wild theorising—as was inevitable—has already followed this, that we welcome in advance the pronouncements of a scholar who warns us at the outset that archæology is not an exact science, and that a "working hypothesis" as to the origin of Greek culture is all that is at present possible.

Now, the working hypothesis favoured by Mr. Hall is briefly this: He thinks that, as the Stone Age died out in Europe, it was replaced along the Eastern Mediterranean, from Cyprus and Asia Minor to Sicily and Italy, by an independent culture based on the use of copper, which owed nothing to the older civilisations of Babylonia or Egypt. Although he hardly supports Prof. Sergi's theory of a "Mediterranean" race hailing from Central Africa, he thinks that the copper-users of Asia Minor, the Ægean Islands, and of Greece, all belonged to one non-Aryan people, which we may, if we please, call the Pelasgians, the Leleges of Asia Minor and the Eteokretans of Crete being of the same stock. This race was, according to him, conquered by Aryan tribes pushing down from the "flat steppes of Poland and Russia," and closely connected with the modern Celts. The mixture of blood produced what we call the Mycenæan civilisation, the remains of which are known to us by Schliemann's discoveries at Mycenæ and Tiryns, and those of Mr. Arthur Evans and Mr. Hogarth in Crete. This was distinguished by the use of bronze, the knowledge of which, he thinks, came ultimately from Babylonia by way of Asia Minor along with seal-cutting and other arts. Yet it remained exclusively European, and formed the foundation of all the future art of Greece. Its date can be fairly established by its relations with some of the Egyptian dynasties, as extending from 1700 to 1000 B.C., the civilisation of the copper-users going back for nearly a thousand years earlier; and the period of Cretan supremacy probably occupied the middle part of this period, or, in other words, the seventeenth to the fourteenth centuries B.C. The Mycenæan civilisation was suppressed for a time by the irruption of the Dorians, another branch of the Aryan race, armed with iron weapons; and in the period of decadence which resulted the Homeric poems were written. The decadence came to an end about the close of the eighth century B.C., when the Dorian element had become in great measure absorbed in the native population, and from this date the classical culture of Greece may be said to commence.

This seems to be a very reasonable and temperate solution of an extremely intricate question, and although Mr. Hall insists with rare modesty on its entirely provisional character—he declares that the decipherment of the Gnossian inscribed tablets might upset it in a week—it yet seems to the present writer, at all events, to be well and strongly founded. Incidentally, however, it runs counter to many earlier theories, and it is not likely, therefore, to pass at once without contradiction. It will certainly find no favour with those scholars—mostly Germans—who think that all beauty and originality came ultimately from the Semitic race: for Mr. Hall thinks the part played by the Phœnicians, to whom Mr. Gladstone, in his nebulous way, was inclined to ascribe the whole culture of Greece, was confined to the mere peddling of crockery and other goods between "Mycenæan" cities and Egypt. Nor does he give any countenance to those who think the Greek culture was in itself but the reflection of a higher civilisation claimed either for Asia or for Egypt. The geographical position of Greece, he admits, brought the Hellenes from the beginning into close contact with the alien civilisations of Babylonia and Egypt; but, except the matters noted above, she took nothing from either. The Mycenæan culture was but the Greek phase of the general European civilisation of the Bronze Age, and in those points in which it was superior to that of its neighbours it stood by its own strength alone. Hence it was that when the period of decadence produced by the turmoil of the Dorian invasion subsided, it was a purely Greek world that was re-born. "'Greek civilisation,' as we know it," says Mr. Hall, "is based almost entirely upon the civilisation of the Mycenæan period; the 'Greek art' which we know is no new inspiration, but descends from the art of Mycenæ." There only remains to be said that the book is well got-up and well illustrated.

Digitized by Google

Other New Books.

PREMIÈRES OF THE YEAR. By J. T. GREIN.

In the title of this collection of theatrical notices the word "year" is used rather loosely. As a matter of fact, the earliest of the notices is dated May, 1899, and the latest July, 1900. But then the volume does not profess to be a systematic and comprehensive record. It is made up, we believe, of articles contributed to a London Sunday paper and here arranged somewhat at haphazard. Mr. Grein might have put together a useful book of reference. This he has refrained from doing. But Premières of the Year, nevertheless, is not without a certain measure of interest for the devoted playgoer. It has breadth of view and frankness of expression. Mr. Grein is, we believe, of Anglo-Dutch parentage, and was educated mainly in Paris. During the last few years he has been domiciled in England, into which he has introduced, sometimes with more zeal than discretion, a number of foreign plays—Norwegian, Dutch, French, and German. There can be no question about his cosmopolitan standpoint. His criticism is, at least, not insular; it is the outcome of a study of more than one national stage. And that is a great matter. Too much of the theatrical criticism of this country is narrow, borné, founded on a knowledge and an experience alike limited. You cannot say that of Mr. Grein's utterances. They may strike you as prejudiced or even as misleading, but they are the deliverances of a man very well equipped for the business in hand. Mr. Grein has the further advantage of being untrammelled by the ordinary conventions of the Press. He writes in the first person, and he appends his signature to his work; he is not hampered by the restrictions of the editorial "we." He is an instructed man, and his judgments have honesty as well as vigour. His English is wonderfully good, seeing that he uses Dutch and French, we understand, with almost equal frequency. (John Macqueen.)

ESSAYS, DESCRIPTIVE AND BIOGRAPHICAL. By GRACE, LADY PRESTWICH.

Nearly half this volume is occupied by a memoir of the authoress, from the pen of her sister, Miss Louisa E. Milne. Lady Prestwich's very sweet-looking face adorns the frontispiece, and bespeaks clemency for the essays which follow. In truth, they are unpretentious papers enough, fugitive in character, and written in simple, unaffected style, with no special distinction, nor anything to call for censure. Those are best which possess some intrinsic interest of subject-matter, such as the "Evenings with Madame Mohl," or the account of a visit to Mantua during the Austrian occupation, while the Austro-Italian war was in progress. The latter, indeed, might have had an actual historical interest, had Lady Prestwich possessed the eye and mind which seize discerningly what is memorable, humanly or politically, in a city under such circumstances. But Mr. Meredith's Vittoria is a better and more pictorial historical document with regard to Mantua in the talons of the double-eagle than anything in this sketch. Here is a story, however, of a famous brigand's exploit in a town near Mantau, then held by an Austrian garrison. The curtain of the local theatre one evening delayed its ascent:

> When at last it was upraised, "Il Passatore" and his armed band occupied the stage, with muskets aimed at the affrighted audience. The chief stepped forward, and in courteous words informed the house that every door and outlet were secured, that those who sat still might rely upon his word that they would be safe and uninjured, but that the first to rise or move would be shot down. He next stated that he would levy a tax per head, which he then and there collected, taking care to extort a double contribution from the rich man, and a heavy ransom from the municipal authorities. . . . The gang made off with their booty unmolested.

It is a book not without interest, though of an impermanent kind. (Blackwood. 10s. 6d.)

GREAT MEN. By H. BEGBIE AND F. C. GOULD.

Though addressed in some prefatory verses "To the Children," it may be suspected that they are "children of a larger growth," for whom this production by the joint authors of The Political Struwwelpeter is intended. Mr. F. C. Gould's pencil (or rather pen) is nothing if not political; and here he has given us coloured cartoons of eminent politicians in various more or less appropriate characters. Mr. Harold Begbie supports him with verses studiously infantile in form, but eminently adult in their political allusions and studied smartness. Smart they really are, and decidedly clever; except towards the close, where the statesmen selected give less foothold for satire, and deficient opportunities for point (or rather "points," in the stage sense). Then, in the effort to make bricks without straw, the smartness becomes somewhat lame and strained. But in the earlier cases he makes his points well and briskly. Some of the illustrations are clever; for instance, Lord Roberts and Mr. John Morley. Lord Roberts is represented, in the coloured outline on black ground of a Grecian vase, as Hercules cleansing the Augean Stable; while behind him, in place of the lion-skin, hangs from a tree a boar-hide, the boar's head very cleverly fashioned into a semblance of Mr. Kruger. This great Boer's head, indeed, is one of the best things Mr. Gould has done. Mr. Morley figures as Oliver Cromwell, the mixture of the two personalities being dexterously managed. He is, of course, bidding them "take away this bauble" of Imperialism—a point so practised a political satirist as Mr. Gould could not miss. Mr. Morley being Cromwell, it was a matter of course that the ex-Premier and biographer of Napoleon should be presented after David's picture of the Emperor, endeavouring on a fiery rocking-horse to cross the obstructive Alps which separate him from the leadership of the Liberal Party. This is as well done as the unmanageable features of Lord Rosebery will admit, and the mingling of two divergent facial types is undeniably comic. Of Mr. Begbie's verse this may serve as a specimen, on Lord Rosebery:

> Up and down his gee-gee goes!
> Can he cross thus? Goodness knows!
> Ask him, and he winks an eye,
> Making, with a yawn, reply:—
> "Can I cross? I have a plan!
> Say I can't? Of Corsican!"
> O the moral all can tell:
> Confidence is very well,
> But no poor supplanted Esau
> Can get back his own by see-saw.

Mr. Begbie's verse, however, is done scant justice by quotation, and needs to be read as a whole, beside the pictures for which it is designed. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.)

THE YEAR BOOK OF PHOTOGRAPHY. EDITED BY P. R. SALMON.

We heard amateur photography recommended to a lady for "nerves" the other day, and truly there is no escape from photography any more than from cycling. The strongest give in at last. It is only by turning at intervals from Mr. J. T. Ashby's seductive paper, herein printed, on "Photography in the Woodlands," to those parts of the volume which seethe with "sulphocyanide of ammonia," "metabisulphite of potassium," and "hydroquinone," that we are able to preserve our resolution to defer the plunge until age has enlarged our leisure. We refer particularly to Mr. Ashby's paper, because it is the making of the volume. Chatty, humorous, and genuinely helpful, this little treatise on woodland work may be recommended to every amateur, and the more so because Mr. Ashby takes a thoroughly sane view of the true nature and limitations of photographic work. He is properly impatient of high-flown attempts to identify the aims of photography with those of pictorial art. "It should not," he insists, "be considered an excellence in a photograph that it resembles something else, as, for instance, an unfinished or otherwise imperfect work of manual art, such as a rough sketch, a sepia drawing, a charcoal rubbing, and the like. This is to degrade photography. For if its highest claim to consideration be the mere power of imitating the inferior or minor productions of another art, what is the value of that claim?" Mr. Ashby's own photographs, reproduced here, are striking examples of pure photography, in which the niceties of light and composition receive the fullest consideration. In "The Whispering Woodlands," "The Dead o' the Year," "Season of Mists," and "The Secret Ministry of Frost," we have four entirely different moods of Epping Forest.

Digitized by Google

Section 2 of the Year-Book consists of a useful photographic "Tourists' Companion and Holiday Guide." There are technical chapters on "The Carbon Process," "Double Transfer," etc. (Photographic News Office. 1st. net.)

Mr. Cosmo Hamilton's Impertinent Dialogues (Arrowsmith) are very amusing in their smart, flicky way. Their brevity stands them in good stead. "The Almost Inevitable Consequence" is a dialogue on the "island" in Piccadilly, opposite Bond-street. Willie's attempt to convoy Betty to the pavement ends in mud and despair: "Betty, once before I tried to cross the street with a woman. We parted for ever. If you still wish to be my wife, get into this cab and drive with me across the street." They drove. In "The Ego Epidemic" we find Sir Victor Majoribanks interviewing Lady Violet Turnhamgreen preparatory to a "grand dramatic and musical" in aid of sundry widows and orphans. "'Ullo Vi!" "Chin-chin, Vicky." "You are a brick to turn up so soon after my letter. . . . I want you, Pip Broadstairs, Mrs. Arthur Scarlett, the Duchess, Tiddley Rushbrook, and about thirty of the most popular professionals, all the ones who have been divorced, who are going to be divorced, and who can't get divorced, do you see!" "I'm on." Most of the "Dialogues" appeared in the World, where also most of the "Visits" of Elizabeth first saw the light.

Messrs. T. C. and E. C. Jack have issued the fifth and sixth volumes of their "Edinburgh Waverley" These contain The Antiquary. The second volume is embellished with an interesting miniature of Scott, painted in 1797. This miniature is the second authentic portrait of Scott known, and was sent by him to his wife two months before their marriage. It represents him in military uniform, and is fittingly reproduced in this volume, inasmuch as the last chapter was founded on an incident in his experience as a Yeomanry officer. The first volume has for frontispiece a photogravure of a portrait of George Constable, of whom Scott said, "He had many of those peculiarities of temper which long afterwards I tried to develop in the character of Jonathan Oldbuck."

Messrs. Chatto and Windus issue a new edition of the late James Payn's novel, The Family Scapegrace. It is no longer necessary to detail the excellence of Messrs. Bell and Son's "Cathedral Series"; to which are now added, Ely: Bath, Malmesbury, and Bradford-on-Avon; and Bristol.

Fiction.

Mrs. Green. By Evelyne E. Rynd. (Murray. 2s. 6d. net.)

This book consists of a series of sketches, giving, in the form of conversations, the views upon things and people generally, of a certain Mrs. Green, wife of a vicarage gardener, and herself the vicarage charwoman, and extra "help" in cases of emergency. The conversations are all more or less amusing, while two or three of them are distinctly clever, in the fashion of a clever poster, where the colours are essentially to catch the eye, and to force the attention not of the few but of the multitude. Nevertheless, on the whole, Mrs. Green is a fairly entertaining person. To take out of doors in summer weather and read in the shade she is by no means bad company, while upon the subject of "Canwassers" and "Politicks" her vigorous opinions actually verge towards profundity. As regards the last Elections, it is true, Mrs. Green was more or less nonplussed, not finding any appreciable difference between the views or promises of either side. She remained, however, staunch to the Conservative party, because "It's safer on the face of it," ses I, me speakin' for Green, as thinks with me in sech things; "for to let them stop him as 'as made their mistakes," ses I, "an' sees 'em. You needn't tell me as 'ow you won't make the same mistakes," ses I. "I knows you won't," ses I. "You'll make new ones, an' probbubly worse."

On the subject of lady canvassers, Mrs. Green's opinions are equally decided. Having inquired of one smiling lady who she was canvassing for, husband, brother, or lover, and hearing "only for a country," Mrs. Green waxes caustically eloquent. "Which thinks ser little of you," ses I, short, "that it gives a vote to a labourer in a lodgin' 'ouse a-bearnin' of 'alf-a-crown a week," ses I, "an' leaves you without."

The importance of light literature is curiously underrated. Yet the book that takes the mind off the burden and heaviness of life is of an incalculable value and refreshment. Mrs. Green is welcome, because though her humour is at no time either very subtle or very original, its comicalities are always good enough to rouse a passing sense of amusement, and here and there to convey an impression of considerable shrewdness as well.

The Hero. By William Somerset Maugham. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

Mr. Maugham's new book has more cleverness than the average reader is likely to see in it; for it is only mediocrally, if pleasantly, written, and the incidents are all extremely quiet and unexciting. The cleverness lies neither in the style nor in the situations, but in the unobtrusive success of its pyschology. Heredity as a ground plan for fiction is common enough, but in The Hero the pernicious inheritance comes not from the bad but from the good qualities, and in this fact lies both the original and interesting elements of the book; for in life the noblest characteristics are by no means the most useful. Life is undeniably brutal. To deal with the material part of it successfully, human nature requires a little of the brute also. Captain Parsons had none, and consequently could never permanently have escaped making a failure of his life. His father, Colonel Parsons, had been required to send his papers in, after a mistake due to his possessing more heart than head. "He acted like a gentleman and a Christian," and, in consequence, as an incompetent soldier. His son, during the South African campaign, retrieved the family self-respect, and after five years from home returned to marry Mary Clibborn, the fiancée of five years back, and already the idol of his simple, lonely parents. This is the whole situation, for to marry Mary, with her

Digitized by Google

"fine digestion and excellent conscience," had become literally impossible to James Parsons. The inherited sensibility of his father he possessed in an intensified degree. As a result, he could neither bring himself to break the hearts of his parents, nor to accept the smug, self-satisfied lady. The conclusion was, consequently, inevitable. The Hero is a thoughtful and interesting study of character and heredity.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE GRIP OF THE BOOKMAKER. BY PERCY WHITE.

The scope of this novel, by the light-hearted author of Mr. Bailey-Martin and The West End, is indicated by the title. Although Alf Harris, the famous bookmaker, has changed his name to Mortimer Gordon, and now lives in Rutland-square, the world will not let him bury his Harrisian past. His son hears of it, and to him the ex-bookmaker says: "If any chap tells you you're the son of Alf Harris, the bookmaker, knock him down where he stands." The son is prominent in the book. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

SEVERANCE. BY THOMAS COBB.

Mr. Cobb has written some half-dozen novels—bright, modern trifflings with life, readable, entertaining, and easily forgotten. Severance goes a little deeper than the others. In the beginning, Ballantyne arrives in London, after an absence of four years. He had gone away to forget a lady: he succeeded. He calls upon her the second day after his arrival, and learns that "Hugh and Dagma have had an unfortunate difference." That difference gives him occupation. (Lane. 6s.)

MY BRILLIANT CAREER. BY MILES FRANKLIN.

Miles Franklin is at this moment a young Bush-girl, barely twenty-one. So Mr. Harry Lawson tells us in his preface to her book. The monotony and hardship of Bush life have entered into this very young soul, and this is the expression of her observations and her revolt. It is certainly a document. The story is of sheep-farming in the solitudes, and "as real in its weariness and bitter heart-ache as the tall gum-trees among which I first saw the light." A Marie Bashkirtseff of the Bush! (Blackwood. 6s.)

BUSH-WHACKING, AND OTHER SKETCHES. BY HUGH CLIFFORD.

Mr. Clifford is one of our best writers of frontier sketches, his particular locality being the Malay Peninsula. But "the dim back-beyond, where no white man has hitherto set his foot," is the Eldorado of frontier men, and between the frontier and the unknown Mr. Clifford's sketches oscillate. We are on the Pahang river, or in Borneo, or we are on board a certain "Schooner with a Past." Mr. Clifford knows his backgrounds and his people, and we always find him interesting. (Blackwood. 6s.)

MARRABLE'S MAGNIFICENT IDEA. BY F. C. CONSTABLE.

Marrable may be magnificent, but Mr. Semple is delightful. Mr. Semple comes into £5,000, and feels that he can take out as many patents as he pleases. Taking out patents is what Mr. Semple lives for. "But, think, Dulcie," he exclaims to his wife, as they sit down to sausages in the City-road, "only think of our future now! Suppose, to begin with, I take out only fifty patents. We must be cautious, I confine myself to fifty. And suppose ten—no, suppose forty fail! You see how cautious I am? We assume forty fail! Then ten succeed. What follows? At the lowest computation, the most cautious computation, we are millionaires." (Blackwood. 6s.)

A HOUSE WITH A HISTORY. BY FLORENCE WARDEN.

An old house on the edge of the sea is always effective in a story. This one is an insignificant gabled house mixed up with laundry buildings. But it has its "history," which is developed in the fortunes of Nettie Linfield and her hypocritical old uncle, Samuel Patcham, who collects money from far and near to do a little good to others and a great deal of good to Samuel Patcham. Patcham found himself in the tightest of corners when, "there, on one side of him, locked out, was Dick Rasper, the man whose inheritance he had stolen a quarter of a century before, while, on the other side, locked in, was his wife's niece, Nettie, who knew enough about certain other misdeeds to get him a term of penal servitude." (White. 6s.)

A MILLIONAIRE'S LOVE STORY. BY GUY BOOTHBY.

"A certain paradoxical wit," says Mr. Boothby, "once remarked that George Kilvert was a man very much to be pitied, for the reason that he was too wealthy ever to experience the peculiar delight of wasting a sovereign." When Kilvert, senior, died he left his son "a million and a-half pounds." On his thirtieth birthday, the young man, leaving Victoria for the seaside, saw "a singularly beautiful woman" at the bookstall. He met her again at Beachcombe-on-Sea. Hence A Millionaire's Love Story. (White. 6s.)

PRINCE CHARMING. BY "RITA."

Another German Court story. Erinia is the name of the little kingdom, and Prince Charming is its heir. He is brought to a sense of his responsibilities by his love for an Irish fisher-girl, who outshines in grace and character the choicest flowers of Society. "Rita" calls it all a "Fantastic Episode in Court Dress." Not a bad story to read in a hammock and forget. (Sands. 6s.)

THE PRESUMPTION OF STANLEY HAY, M.P. BY NOWELL CAY.

"The story claims," we learn from an advance paragraph, "to offer in the guise of fiction some new and startling light on a recent royal 'tragedy.'" Here is a passage from page 224: "'Perhaps your Majesty is not aware that when your daughter was treacherously carried away from England she had already been made my wife by the most sacred rites of the Church?' 'I understood,' said the King, stifling a yawn, 'that her Serene Highness carried her mad escapade to the point of going through the marriage service with you, and allowing you to think that it was a real marriage.'" (Warne.)

NOBLER THAN REVENGE. BY ESMÉ STUART.

Village and squirearchical melodrama. The villain's name is, of course, James Felton; the hero's is Alec Beauworth, and the love of Ruby and the lands of Yewdale are at stake between them. Ruby gets lost in London, and eats the inevitable bun, and she and Alec are greatly helped by Bob Rabbits, the stable-boy, who exclaims "Ods Daggs!" whenever things take a turn. The story is thoroughly readable, and wholesome in its own familiar line. (John Long. 6s.)

THE LION'S BROOD. BY DUFFIELD OSBORNE.

In this story, by the author of The Spell of Ashtaroth and The Secret of the Crater, we are in the midst of the second Punic War and the clashing armies of Hannibal and Rome. The subject gives splendid opportunities for the description of hand-to-hand fighting, and these are not neglected. (Heinemann. 6s.)

Digitized by Google

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage, One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscription, prepaid (including postage) 17/6

„ Quarterly 5/0

„ Price for one issue /5

The One Thing Needful.

A GOOD book cannot be written without a previously found and strongly retained conception of its subject as a means of charm or service. In the writer this sentiment or conception is gusto. It may be the cold, tenacious gusto of a defender of the Belleville boiler; it may be the rich gusto of the historian, to whom the annals of some "old and haughty nation, proud in arms," have been committed; or it may be a gusto of sentiment, fusing trivial and comparatively unrelated matter in the heat of some persistent and interesting whim of association. Whatever the subject, it is only when this breath of life is breathed into it that a book becomes a living creature. Especially is this true of a subject which is in any degree a "made" one, and of which, therefore, the possibilities lie chiefly in the mind which has set it up as a subject at all. Mr. Gribble's subject in Lake Geneva and its Literary Landmarks (Constable) is of this order. He is careful to tell us that he is writing neither a complete history of Geneva nor a complete history of Genevan literature.

> What I have tried to write is an informal, anecdotal history of Geneva, with especial reference to the careers of the many eminent men of letters, natives or strangers, who have lived or sojourned there. Every continental traveller—and we are all continental travellers nowadays—finds his way sooner or later to Geneva; and it occurred to me that such travellers might be glad of a book which would remind them of what was most worth remembering about Bonivard, Calvin, Beza, Voltaire, Rousseau, Madame Necker, Madame de Staël, Horace Bénédict de Saussure, and other celebrated men and women, whether citizens or resident aliens, whose names are associated with the city and the lake. So far as I am aware, nothing of the sort exists in English. That seemed a sound reason for filling up the gap.

Here, then, we have a "made" subject. For, obviously, there are only remote and accidental connections between the men who happened to sojourn by the Lake of Geneva in the fifteenth century and those that were found there in the nineteenth. Some ties of race may be found here and there, but rarely are these significant. Bonivard and Byron are but casually linked by "The Prisoner of Chillon," written by Byron in ignorance of Bonivard's story. Calvin admonishing Bonivard for familiarity with a servant-maid, and imprisoning a Genevan hair-dresser for making a woman look too beautiful, stands in no obvious association with Voltaire luring the Genevans to the theatre, and himself standing in the wings to applaud with cracked, aged hands the efforts of the actors. Gibbon, looking on the Lake of Geneva on the night when he put the last touch to his immortal history, and Amiel looking on the same waters in the bitterness of intellectual sterility, have, after all, only the lake to draw them together. Milton goes to Geneva in 1639, and Gray goes exactly one hundred years later, but they are united no more by the Geneva they visited than the Cambridge where their geniuses had been nursed. Nor is it anything but the accident of place that brings together Rousseau and Wordsworth, Madame de Staël and Shelley, Addison and Chateaubriand in this book. All these people might be otherwise herded. A score of pretexts might be found, and one might then reduce the method to an absurdity by writing a book on the literary associations of Clapham Junction, in which one would gossip at large about all the celebrities that could be proved to have passed through that maze of "points" and platforms. But do not misunderstand us—we are not saying that Mr. Gribble's idea is absurd. We merely point out that this bringing together of people who, during five centuries, have lived in or visited Geneva is for the most part an arbitrary and artificial proceeding, and, consequently, that its successful exploitation depends on the author being very much in love with his subject, and seeing in it more than his readers do. But, alas! it is just this private and procreative gusto that we seem to miss in Mr. Gribble's book. No warmth of sentiment, no passion of place, no revelling in strange coincidence or contrast, are here to fuse these memories into a seeming drama. Geneva and its lake happen to exist, and a number of "celebrated men and women" happen to have been there. Hence it "occurs" to Mr. Gribble that people who go to Geneva "might be glad" of a big book which would "remind them" that other and more celebrated people have been there before them. So the book is written, and published, and here it is—a book with many good points, but without gusto.

Probably some critics will give Mr. Gribble liberal praise; and, if his book is read piecemeal, it is well deserving of that reward. It has few dull pages, and many bright ones. Mr. Gribble's account of Bonivard is interesting, his account of Gibbon is interesting, his defence of Madame de Warens is interesting. The book is full of interesting detail, and is not wanting in humour. But the abiding trouble is that there is no very dramatic reason why the reader should be attending to Bonivard, or Gibbon, or Madame de Warens; and when he has laid down the book his uppermost thought is—how much better it might have been done! For neither by the presence of some encircling poetic sentiment nor by executive thoroughness, springing from enthusiasm, does this book quite command a place on one's shelves. Let us take these points in order.

One would suppose that the great Lake of Geneva, the mirror of Mont Blanc and the filter of the Rhone, would count for something. There, at least, is permanence. There, flashing to-day in the sun, or reflecting the stars to-night, roll those glorious waters of which Byron could write:

> Clear, placid Leman! thy contrasted lake
> With the wild world I dwell in, is a thing
> Which warns me, with its stillness, to forsake
> Earth's troubled waters for a purer spring.
> This quiet sail is as a noiseless wing
> To waft me from distraction.

Never does a sail waft us from distraction in Mr. Gribble's pages. We see all the painful development of Geneva through centuries of bigotry and barbarism, we rub shoulders with theologians, citizens, refugees, professors, and poets, weltering on from chapter to chapter, and the world is too much with us. The lightning leaping along Jura, the snow melting in April, the twinkling lights of Geneva in the abysmal summer nights, the play of shadows on the grey cathedral; and all the pedigree of beauty in these scenes of beauty—all these go for nothing. Mr. Gribble gossips on about men and things, cracking his pleasant jokes from century to century. Yet here the theatre is as important as the actors. By one of Mr. Gribble's strange omissions, we have no mention of Sainte-Beuve's professorship at Lausanne. Yet from Sainte-Beuve Mr. Gribble might have learned to see Geneva as it should be seen by an historian of its people. Years later, in Paris, when he was writing his causerie on Madame de Staël, Sainte-Beuve could recall the environment of her brilliant gatherings at Coppet, on the western horn of the great lake-crescent. And his pen leaped forward in rapture; in a single page he gives us more of the sentiment of the place, and all it suggests, than does Mr. Gribble in his whole collection. For this reason, and to show by example what that missing element in Mr. Gribble's pages is, we will quote Sainte-Beuve's words in full, using, with slight modification, the not too satisfying translation that lies nearest:

Digitized by Google

> But the inexpressible charm of Coppet during these its most brilliant years, that which you would like to grasp, oh young hearts!—whether you be still young and fresh, or disillusioned and thirsting for an ideal which you can no longer hope to find; you who are still what is best in the world after genius, in that you have the power to admire it, and with tearful eyes to feel it—it is the seclusion, the interchange of thoughts and ideas among these guests, beneath the leafy shades, and the noonday talks by the brink of these lonely waters clothed with verdure. A frequent guest at Coppet, knowing my deep interest, told me: "One morning I had come out of doors early to enjoy the fresh air. I lay on the thick grass by a pond in a remote part of the park, gazing dreamily at the blue sky. Suddenly I heard voices, two persons drawing near and nearer, talking. The conversation was loud and excited, and of a private nature. I tried to make a noise to warn them of my presence, and as I hesitated to get up, they came so near that it was too late to interrupt, and I was obliged to remain and hear everything—reproaches, explanations, promises—unseen, and scarcely daring to breathe." "Happy man!" I said; "and whose were the two voices? and what did you hear?" Then, since the delicacy of the strolling guest evaded my questions, I was careful not to persist. Let us leave to romance, or to the poetic imagination of our descendants, the fresh colouring of such mysteries; we are still too close to them. Let time roll on, let the nimbus gather on the hills, let the hoary summer murmur forgetfully of long-past voices, and one day imagination can embellish it with the sorrows and the anguish of hearts in such Edens.

We do not ask Mr. Gribble to be a Sainte-Beuve, still less to dip his pen in purple ink; but from the above passage he has something to learn.

We have said that not only in thinness of imagination, but also in the matter of thoroughness, Mr. Gribble gives us cause to grieve. This will hardly be doubted when we mention that in a book on the literary associations of Geneva he has not so much as mentioned Ruskin, or Dickens, and has dismissed Amiel in a paragraph at once perfunctory and incorrect. Indeed, Mr. Gribble seems to have missed the very writers who could have helped him most. From both Ruskin and Amiel he could have learned to see the civic prowess and natural beauty of Geneva in one sweeping gaze. "On the other side of the high town," says Ruskin, > the houses stand closer, leaving yet space for a little sycamore-shaded walk, whence one looks down on the whole southern reach of the lake, opening wide to the horizon, and edged there like the sea, but in the summer sunshine looking as if it was the one well of blue which the sunbeams drank to make the sky of. Beyond it, ghostly ranges of incredible mountains—the Dent d'Oche, and first cliffs towards Fribourg, to the west, the long wave of Jura, fading into the air above Neuchatel. That was the view for full noon, when the lake was brightest and bluest. Then you fell down a perpendicular lane into the lower town, and you went to Mr. Bautte's.

"Then . . . you went to Mr. Bautte's." That little sentence enforces, pleasantly enough, all that we have said. Not less strange is the omission of Dickens, who took a house near Lausanne in 1846, and worked there for six months on Dombey and Son and a Christmas book, yet kept his eyes open in all directions. He witnessed the revolution at Geneva when the Federal Diet decreed the expulsion of the Jesuits, and describes it in his letters with delightful touches—all mixed up with "December's Dombey" which he could hardly write for lack of crowds in the streets.

As for Henri Friederich Amiel, whose Journal Intime began two years after Dickens's stay, he was the psychologist of Geneva and its lake. His Journal breathes of its vegetation, and of all the moods of its waters and mountains. An incorrigible spectator of life, he drew the minds of all countries and ages to his help, through books, as he strolled on the Salève. Once, sitting in his courtyard, and listening to the church bells, he fixed the moment thus:

> In my courtyard the ivy is green again, the chestnut tree is full of leaf, the Persian lilac beside the little fountain is flushed with red, and just about to flower; through the wide openings to the right and left of the College of Calvin I see the Salève above the trees of St. Antoine, the Voirons above the hill of Cologny. . . . All the bells are ringing. It is the hour of worship. A historical and religious impression mingles with the picturesque, the musical, the poetical impression of the scene. All the peoples of Christendom—all the churches scattered over the globe—are celebrating at this moment the glory of the Crucified.

It is for such large adumbrations as these that we look to Mr. Gribble in vain; and if we have pressed our charge it has been only to illustrate the thesis with which we began—a thesis which is of vastly greater importance than any single book. And after all one is moved to criticism far more strongly by a good book at fault than by a book that is merely worthless. Mr. Gribble's book is by no means worthless; but, all the same, we must regretfully count it among literary might-have-beens.

Things Seen.

The Observation Hive.

Over the door of the hut was written "Bees and Ants," and underneath an invitation to "come and see the Observation Hive." I paid threepence, and entered, for Maeterlinck's Life of the Bee was still fresh in my memory, and, led by him, I had gone with the bee into wonderland. Electric lamps hung from the roof of the hut throwing a dazzle of light on a movable frame standing upright upon a table. Covered with glass, a border of wood, around it, flat and shallow, at a distance the casual eye might have thought it was a picture in monochrome, a night-piece by some impressionist who sees Nature all in masses of black. But to look close was to discover that the night clouds were masses of bees, and the spots of light pieces of comb over which the bees moved slowly, ever busy, ever intent, unresting ignorant of satiety, indifferent to pleasure. The lamps glared upon them; far overhead, at intervals, the switch-back banged along with roar and scream; the band played popular airs; all the paraphernalia of amusement went restlessly on, and only the Great Wheel and the Bees seemed to be at work. "Of course you have read M. Maeterlinck's book about 'The Bee,'" I said to the young woman attendant. She shook her head, and began her exposition. "If you will look close to the frame," she said, "you will see the Queen Bee. She is larger than the others, and wherever she goes they turn their heads to her. No bee ever turns its back on the Queen. That little passage at the bottom of the hive leads to the open air where they gather honey all the day." She said no more, but I, thinking of Maeterlinck's magical prose, said: "It must be very interesting to follow the Life of the Bee from hour to hour." "Oh," she said, with finality, "it's my business. I like the ants better." She went to an ants' nest standing in the middle of the room under a glass case, selected an insect, and exhibited its strength by making it support a couple of coloured balls she held in her hand. "And that's their cemetery," she said, pointing to a little dun-coloured heap in a corner of the nest. "There isn't much anybody can tell me about ants." Bending, I peered again at the "busy and abominable" bees, then went outside. The band was playing "God Bless the Prince of Wales." I thought again of the Belgian poet-philosopher, and reflected that things—bees, for example—have just as much beauty and wonder as one brings to them. Which is not a new thought. Neither was the Pacific new when Cortes first looked upon it.

Digitized by Google

The Householder.

She was a dressmaker. Her husband was a clerk, and his calling was distasteful to him. An ardent Socialist, he gave much time and thought to speaking at mass-meetings and to lectures on social reform. Both husband and wife were clever, but the secret of success was not theirs.

She wrote one day, saying she had changed her address. I found that her new home consisted of one room. A huge dog and a cat lay on the hearth, some small birds hung in the window, a parrot's cage stood on the floor. Round the sides of the room and on the table were piled folded clothes, curtains, china, saucepans, etc., just the things she had been able to save from the wreck. Stately and tragic, she stood in the midst of the chaos. I sympathised with her, and she told me how unlikely it had once seemed that she would ever be in such squalor. Her father, she said, had held a good appointment in India, and she had been brought up in comfort. Soon after her marriage, things began to go wrong, and they grew gradually worse, until at last the furniture was seized for rent. "It is all dreadful," she said, "but the worst thing is, that my husband comes home night after night, throws himself into a chair, and wrings his hands. I can bear anything but that! If only he wouldn't wring his hands!"

Dilettante Verse.

The Horace Club, which has hitherto banqueted unseen, includes in its muster-roll of members, Mr. R. Asquith, Professor York Powell, Professor Courthope, Sir Rennell Rodd, Mr. Laurence Binyon, the Rev. H. C. Beeching, and Mr. Owen Seaman. Their common bond is, of course, the cult of Horace; and one rather gathers that their symposia are prefaced or accompanied by the reading of some little original poem, contributed by one of the members (after the manner of the Omar Khayyám Club), of which this volume is a sheaf. If there be one member whose own published work has any Horatian affinities, it is Mr. Owen Seaman: nor is it without disappointment that we find the Book of the Horace Club (B. H. Blackwell; Oxford) distinguished by his absence.

It might have been conjectured that the exercises of the club would be noted by some of the characteristics which are acknowledged as belonging to its Master: but this, it seems, we are not to expect. The only Horatian quality which the prefatory English (for there is also a prefatory Latin) poem claims for the poems as a whole is derivativeness. That Horace drew from Greek sources, and based himself on Greek models, is unquestioned. But surely, the most scratch collection of amateur present-day verse might be dedicated to Horace on the same plea; for it is the note of average verse to be derivative. Horace is immortal, despite, not because of, his derivativeness; and of the executive qualities which compensate for his derivativeness there should be some common trace (to however inferior a degree) uniting any collection of verse which enrolls itself under his ensign. But there is none. Of his neatness, his terseness, his finish, his form, his concinnitas (we have no quite adequate word for it), nothing is there as a common bond. Here and there a poem seeks after the Horatian quality; but the most are derived from all conceivable and often most anti-Horatian sources—one even from Browning. Nay, some sin against that brevity which is a prime Horatian attribute—marring by diffuseness what in little would have been a creditable poem. It is, in fact, just a scratch collection of poems; the most un-Horatian volume that ever took the Roman's name in vain, to our thinking.

If, however, we dismiss the title, it has more to say for itself. Some of the pieces are at least accomplished and scholarly verse. Quite one of the best, though nowise smacking of Horace, is Mr. H. Belloc's "The South Country":

The men that live in the South Country
 Are the kindest and most wise,
They get their laughter from the loud surf,
 And the faith in their happy eyes
Comes surely from our Sister the Spring
 When over the seas she flies;
The violets suddenly bloom at her feet,
 And she blesses us with surprise.

I never get between the pines,
 But I smell the Sussex air,
Nor I never come on a belt of sand
 But my home is there;
And along the sky the line of the downs
 So noble and so bare.

A lost thing could I never find,
 Nor a broken thing mend;
And I fear I shall be all alone
 When I get towards the end.
Who will there be to comfort me
 Or who will be my friend?

I will gather and carefully make my friends
 Of the men of the Sussex weald,
They watch the stars from silent folds,
 They stiffly plough the field.
By them and the God of the South Country
 My poor soul shall be healed.

If I ever become a rich man,
 Or if ever I grow to be old,
I will build a house with deep thatch
 To shelter me from the cold,
And there shall the Sussex songs be sung,
 And the story of Sussex told.

I will build my house in the high wood
 Within a walk of the sea,
And the men that were boys when I was a boy
 Shall sit and drink with me.

That is the style of our old ballads and songs, not at all of the polished Latin poet; but it is well done, with much of the large, breezy air and motion fitted to the theme. Mr. Belloc has before now shown an aptitude for the simpler kinds of song; and the whole poem from which we have quoted is equally good.

More in the finished style, appropriate to a Horace Club, is Professor J. S. Phillimore's "An August Day in Gardena":

A bloom o'ertides the forest sides
 Like Autumn on the grape;
Much light upon the mountain hides
 His starkly hammered shape.

High flies the wind and straight, he crisps
 Clear skies above the South;
Moon-coloured cloud in shuffled wisps
 Unrolls before his mouth.

Digitized by Google

O'er North wind loud and lucent cloud
The master sun supreme,
Holds all a happy valley bowed
Enchanted in a dream:

Dream such as human hearts indulge
When, with a sudden birth,
Silence and solitude divulge
The secret of the earth.

The first two stanzas are very good, with happily wrought phrase: that

Crisps
Clear skies reminds one of Shakespeare's

Below crisp heaven;

one of the many proofs that the great poet had what would now be thought an efficient knowledge of Latin, whatever the oppressively learned Jonson might think of it. For obviously Shakespeare uses the adjective in its original Latin sense of glittering or keenly shining. Horatian in neatness, but lineal from Calverley, is Mr. J. Williams's "Crushing Exposure." It belongs to the frivolous muse:

'Twas in Throgmorton Street we met,
We were two fools and one promoter,
And Jones and I shall ne'er forget
Floater.

Yes, Floater was his name; he penned
A very readable prospectus,
But that was just what in the end
Wrecked us.

The public bit and read about
The chances of a record crushing,
And things that Floater wrote without Blushing.

The shares rose first, and there was fun
For us and Floater for a fortnight,
Until they fell a point in one
Short night.

Then Floater sought to save his skin
By imitating Jones's penmark,
And Floater last was heard of in Denmark.

We could exchange a good many of the serious attempts in the volume for other verses as deft as these. Mr. Williams would seem to have a pretty faculty for the muse that flourishes so well at the Universities. Mr. Beeching's contributions are scarce on a level with his finest work, though they show the hand of the craftsman. "Bembridge Harbour in January" is perhaps the best:

The sky, a liquid crystal, flowed
O'er sea and land, till pure from stain.
And jewel-clear their colour glowed
As in a glass of Claude Lorraine.

The water, like a sheet of steel,
Mirrored the moveless swans afloat,
The solemn Sabbath-keeping wheel,
The masts of many a fishing-boat.

Around the harbour, spire and tree
Were etched against the vaulted blue;
Across the strait were plain to sea
The trees and spires of Portsmouth too.

So still the scene was, so refined,
It seemed a sleight of magic art,
Till in a gust of sudden wind
The scent of coltsfoot cheered my heart.

That is good, though impoverished by hackneyed similes, such as "like a sheet of steel." A sufficiently varied volume, as the reader will perceive, the Book of the Horace Club has matter worth the reading, if, as a whole, it does not rank above the ordinary gathering of dilettante verse.

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

Arvède Barine has written a charming and unpretentious book about the ever delightful St. Francis of Assisi. It is certainly very slight, and cannot compare with Mrs. Oliphant's book on the subject for the reason that Mrs. Oliphant brought to bear upon it a greater tenderness, the novelist's more romantic and sympathetic temperament, a wider and more generous appreciation; but within its limits it is a strong, a delicate, and gracious tribute to the undiminished charm of one of the few really lovely souls mediæval Catholicism produced. There is a subtle touch in the wise association of the Minor Brothers with revolutionary socialism. The chivalrous and ardent Francis preached the mild and utopian socialism of his Master, and for considerably less to-day men are looked upon as mad or wicked. Go among the millionaires of Christian Europe or America and ask them to espouse Lady Poverty and give their millions to the amelioration of the human race, see how you will be received, and read the edifying remarks that will be made about you in the newspapers. And yet the wealthy, purse-proud, birth-proud Anglo-Saxon, and the wealthy, purse-proud, birth-proud French Catholic have a like fatuous and insane pretension to call themselves Christian. Talking over this matter once at Arvède Barine's table we all decided that the nearest approach to a Christian in modern Europe is Tolstoi, and he, imperfect and unsatisfactory as he is, has been excommunicated. What would have happened had he been something of a real Christian like Francis of Assisi? Arvède Barine has added to her charming study of a most charming saint a finished translation of the "Legend of the Three Companions."

La Comtesse Mathieu de Noailles has published a volume of poetry which it is the fashion to admire. There is a pretty materialistic sentiment for nature revealed in these poems. The diction is fine and polished, suggestive, and at times spontaneous, but it is strange to read an entire volume destitute of ideas, of soul, of light. It is just the sort of poetry a poetic little horse or a goat cast upon the bosom of Nature might be supposed to write. The appreciation of nature which is keen is exclusively animal. One cannot precisely say that it is perverse, it is so faithfully the pony's point of view. To young girls it preaches a morality one would qualify as infamous from a more civilised pen. But Madame de Noailles is a Brancovan, a Roumanian descended from Musurus, a Turco-Greek—hardly a creature of our modern civilisation. Her face is quite Turkish, a little wittier and more expressive than our notion of the harem visage, and she accentuates this Oriental caste of feature by a gold band worn over her brow. I have heard her recite her own verses at parties, and her manner is certainly not civilised. But what will you? She is an Eastern princess mislaid in France in the twentieth century and has married a French nobleman, consequently in these democratic days she may tranquilly drive a coach and four through the walls of conventionality, over the carcase of expiring respectability. And when she tells young girls in verse, with decorative coarseness, that the evening is warm and they should go forth into the woods and take the first lover handy, that being the sole lesson of life, well, we explain it to ourselves as the sort of thing an Eastern princess might be expected to say. The main thing is that she says it in excellent French and with a strongly developed animal instinct for poetry. There is not an image, an idea in all her volume of Cœur Innombrable, but there are many pretty and memorable lines, many charming pictures of Nature in its various physical moods, but nothing of its subtlety.

Digitized by Google

M. Charles Legras has written a book that will interest many English authors: Nos Contemporains Anglais chez Eux. The title is somewhat misleading. Why should English contemporaries be exclusively culled among the scribbling class? There are princes, aristocrats, generals, admirals, members of the Houses of Lords and Commons, acrobats, prize-fighters, lawyers, shopkeepers, cricket players, publishers, millionaires, philanthropists, stump-orators, preachers, sweaters, publicans, and sinners, even more representative than the humble scribblers. But M. Legras interests himself only in writers and dramatists. His treatment of this class is perfectly amiable, but lamentably superficial. Most of M. Legras' appreciations saw the light in the pages of the Journal des Débats, a defunct journal. He seems to have written chiefly of writers he has known, and those he does not know personally are of no consequence in his esteem. He admires George Moore, because George Moore admires the French, and has the naïveté to say that only distinguished geniuses like himself can appreciate Balzac. I have read in English so many wittier and more telling things about the irrepressible Miss Marie Corelli, that it comes rather as a shock to find a Frenchman's paper on that thrilling subject so flat and spiritless. But while not greatly interested in these mild and thin studies of our scribbling geniuses (much resembling the World's Celebrities at Home, and hardly worth reprinting), I was much amused at M. Legras' sharp taunt against the English historians. Reading it, one would think the French were invariably generous and impartial to their enemies. I was taught history in a French school, but never learnt more than the names of Agincourt, Creçy and Poictiers. The English are far fairer to their national enemy than the French, for no Frenchman in the same circumstances would have written Lord Rosebery's book on Napoleon.

H. L.

Confessio Amantis.

THERE was once a man who wished to show his heart to a woman. Now it is a rule of the men-folk that, whether a woman shows her heart to a man, which happens sometimes, or keeps some odd ends or corners for herself, which is the ordinary case, a man should never show more than a half or at most three-quarters even to the woman of his choice. Therefore they were very afraid for the man, and adjured him under all conceivable circumstances "to keep something up his sleeve," as is the jargon of their caste. But the man was obstinate and went his own way. And first he showed a woman half his heart, and she laughed at him. And then in the second place he showed a woman three-quarters of his heart, and she wept her lost illusions. And then, because the man was impatient and felt that confession was good for his soul, he showed his whole heart to a woman. The third woman neither laughed nor broke her heart. She only tried to understand and not lose her ideals.

Nevertheless, whether he or she were the happier for his self-revelation is a problem which lies on the knees of the jealous gods. For in this world to speak or to live without reserve is only possible for the child, or the genius, or the fool.

Correspondence.

"Sartor" Re-Read.

SIR,—In the ACADEMY of July 6, Mr. Francis Thompson has an article under this title. He commences by stating that it is a dubious experiment to re-read an author who has been one of the authentic gods of one's youth. "Nigh as dubious as the re-reading of young love-letters," he says. Surely this is hardly the case; or suppose Shakespeare had been our youthful ideal, should we later on return to him with a "tremour," doubtful whether the greatness of Hamlet would still remain when subjected to the "searching light" of "settled judgment"? And to many men Sartor Resartus is much more than Hamlet. To many it is a book to live by; with Truth, not seen "flittingly through shifting vapours, doubtful if she were seen at all," but clearly and helpfully evident throughout. Is it not possible that the critic, with his active "Greek sense of form and clearness," may be so concerned at the "rough, thunderous jar and concussion of phrases" in the "tortured mass" of Carlyle's general speech, that he occasionally passes over the full significance of them? In short, sir, will you allow me to make a mild protest against Mr. Thompson's "semi-retrospective criticism," which seems a little too hard upon one of the greatest prophets of the last century?—I am, etc.,

HERBERT M. GREEN.

39, Oakfield-rd., Stroud Green, N.

"What is True Poetry?"

SIR,—I was interested in Mr. Wright's letter of last week, but think the matter is open to more definite statement. A brief analysis of the psychic causes which give rise to that somewhat complex activity that we usually look upon as an operation of the poetical faculty may do something towards determining the basis upon which true poetry ultimately rests.

The normal processes of the intellect (e.g., in mathematical or physical research) are essentially analytical in character, and proceed upon lines laid down in accordance with certain invariable laws (logical canons, mathematical postulates, axioms, etc.). When, however, the intellect comes under the domination of the emotions (not the mere momentary ebullitions, but the permanent sensibility, psychologically understood, by the term) its usual procedure is radically changed. Its actions are arbitrary, and no longer come within the scope of determinable laws. It aims at synthesis. It seizes upon and subdues to its own purpose and to a common harmony things in themselves so dissimilar as to reveal to logical inspection absolutely no correspondence.

> A land
> Where music and moonlight and feeling are one.
> [Swinburne.]
>
> From two sounds,
> Not a third, but a star.
> [Browning.]

What justification, then, have these new processes of the intellect when under the domination of the emotions? Absolutely none, save to other minds in syntony.

> The world may reason and welcome, 'tis we musicians know.
> [Browning.]

We have here, then, the two forces, of whose concerted action poetry is the outcome—the emotion which urges—the intellect which is acted upon. In a certain case the intellect may possibly resent the sway of the emotions, and may usurp more than a due share of the partnership, in which instance, probably, versified prose or metrical logic is the result; in another case, the emotions may come to the top, and the intellect be too pigmy to bear the weight, with the sequel of flabby, incoherent verse, faulty and insufficient. When the two elements are well balanced we get true poetry; further, in proportion to their harmonious development, we get great poetry.—I am, etc.,

Digitized by Google

T. W. Cole.

21, Coleford-road Wandsworth, S.W.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 94 (New Series).

Last week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best quotation in prose or verse applicable to the present state of the Liberal Party. We award the prize to Mr. William Ashton Tonge, Stanecliffe, Disley, for the following:

"We must all hang together, or assuredly we shall all hang separately."—Franklin (at the signing of the Declaration of American Independence, July 4, 1776).

Other replies are as follows:

"As sheep having no shepherd."—St. Matthew ix. 36.
[A. F., Exmouth.]

"The fallyng out of faithfull frends is the renewyng of love."—Richard Edwards. [A. A. B., West Bromwich.]

"A party is perpetually corrupted by personality. Parties of principle . . . degenerate into personalities."—Emerson.
[H. J., Hadley Wood.]

"Like an angry hive of bees
That want their leader, scatter up and down,
And care not who they sting."—Shakespeare.
[F R. C., London.]

"All mimsy were the borogoves,
And the mome raths outgrabe."—Lewis Carroll.
[H. R. C., Egham.]

"Tho' much is taken much abides: and tho'
We are not now that strength which in old days
Moved earth and heaven; that which we are, we are;
One equal temper of heroic hearts,
Made weak by time and fate, but strong in will
To strive, to seek, to find, and not to yield."—Tennyson.
[R. F. McC., Whitby.]

"Then he asked them, saying: 'Where did you lie the last night?' They said, 'With the shepherds upon the Delectable Mountains.' He asked them then, 'If they had not of those shepherds a note of direction for the way?' They answered, 'Yes.' 'But did you,' said he, 'when you were at a stand, pluck out and read your note?' They answered, 'No.' He asked them, 'Why?' They said they forgot. He asked them, however, 'if the shepherds did not bid them beware of the Flatterer?' They answered, 'Yes: but we did not imagine,' said they, 'that this fine-spoken man had been he.'"—Bunyan. [J. T. P., Brighton.]

"All those instances to be found in history, whether real or fabulous, of a doubtful public spirit, at which morality is perplexed and reason is staggered, are their chosen and almost sole examples for instruction."—Burke. [L. R. G. W., Richmond.]

"Alas! the worn and broken board,
How can it bear the painter's dye?
The harp of strained and tuneless chord,
How to the minstrel's skill reply." Scott.
[A. G., Cheltenham.]

"To be or not to be: that is the question."—Shakespeare.
[H. S., London.]

"Mistaken men, and patriots in their hearts—
Not wicked, but deduced by impious arts."—Dryden.
[E. B., Liverpool.]

"Restless, unfixed in principles and place,
In power unpleased, impatient of disgrace."—Dryden.
[E. G. B., Liverpool.]

"All of us have cause
To wail the dimming of our shining star;
But none can cure their harms by wailing them."—Shakespeare.
[S. A., Stoke-on-Trent.]

"Lead me, O Zeus, and thou, O Destiny,
The way that I am bid by you to go:
To follow I am ready. If I choose not,
I make myself a wretch: and still must follow."—Cleanthes.
[A. S. H., Dalkeith.]

"The late dissension grown betwixt the peers
Burns under feigned ashes of false love,
And will at last break out into a flame:
As fester'd members rot but by degree,
Till bones and flesh and sinews fall away,
So will this base and envious discord breed."—Shakespeare.
[G. W. H., West Didsbury.]

"Look around you. Your world-hosts are all in mutiny, in confusion, destitution; on the eve of fiery wreck and madness! . . . Ye shall reduce them to order: begin reducing them. To order, to just subordination: noble loyalty in return for noble guidance. Their souls are driven nigh mad: let yours be sane and ever saner. Not as a bewildered, bewildering mob; but as a firm regimented mass, with real captains over them, will these men march any more. All human interests, combined human endeavours, and social growths in this world have, at a certain stage of their development, required organising: and Work, the grandest of human interests, does now require it. God knows the task will be hard: but no noble task was ever easy. This task will wear away your lives, and the lives of your sons . . . but for what purpose if not for tasks like this were lives given to men?" Thomas Carlyle. [Z. McC., Whitby.]

Seven other replies received.

Competition No 95 (New Series).

On page 25 will be found an extract from a paper contributed to the new Rambler by Mr. Richard Le Gallienne, entitled "The Desire of the Star for the Moth." Assuming that James Boswell reads this essay to Dr. Samuel Johnson in the Elysian fields, it is probable that an interesting conversation between this Great Star (the Doctor) and this Great Moth Bozzy will ensue. For the best imaginative report of their remarks on Mr. Le Gallienne's substance and style we offer a prize of One Guinea. Contributions should be in the form of dramatic dialogue, and should not exceed 300 words.

Rules.

Answers, addressed, "Literary Competition, The Academy, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, July 17. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

DARLINGTONS' HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S.
Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING; A. W. KINGLAKE; and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST. THE CHANNEL ISLANDS
THE NORFOLK BROADS. THE ISLE OF WIGHT.
BRECON and its BEACONS. THE WYE VALLEY.
ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW. THE SEVERN VALLEY.
BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.
BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.
LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR, LLANFAIRFECHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON.
ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.
CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, & FESTINIOG.
BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and PWLLHELI.
MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, & CHELTENHAM.
LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES
NORWICH, LOWESTOFT, YARMOUTH, and the NORFOLK BROADS.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading Hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.
"It very emphatically tops them all."—Daily Graphic.
"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 5s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS.

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.
London: Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent & Co., Ltd.
The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers'.
Paris and New York: Brentano's.

Digitized by Google

WILFRID M. VOYNICH.

THIRD LIST OF BOOKS.

Royal 8vo, pp. 279-438, and Plates XVII. to XXXVIII.

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS: MUSIC, EARLY PRINTED BOOKS, BINDINGS, BOOKS on AGRICULTURE, AMERICANA, &c.—Price 2s. 6d. post free.

CATALOGUE No. I. out of print. CATALOGUE No. II., 2s. 6d., may be had, post free, on application at 1, SOHO SQUARE, W.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
Importers of Foreign Books,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden; and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.
CATALOGUES post free on application.

BAEDEKER'S & BADDELEY'S TOURISTS' GUIDE BOOKS.
New fully detailed CATALOGUE sent post free on application.
DULAU & Co., 37, Soho Square, London, W.

BOOKS WANTED.—25s. each given. "Bells and Pomegranates," 1841; Jackson's "Old Paris," 1878; Jorrock's "Jaunts," 1843; "Alice in Wonderland," 1866; Moore's "Alps in 1864"; Cook's "Foxhunting," 1826; George Meredith's Poems, 1851; Scrope, "Salmon Fishing," 1843. 2,000 other Books wanted. List post free.—BAKER'S Great Bookshop, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

DAILY SEA TRIPS.
NEW PALACE STEAMERS.

From Old Swan Pier, London Bridge.

"ROYAL SOVEREIGN,"
Daily at 9.20 a.m. for MARGATE and RAMSGATE.

"KOH-I-NOOR."
Daily (Tuesdays and Fridays excepted) at 8.50 a.m. for SOUTHEND and MARGATE.

SUNDAYS: Special Train to Gravesend from Victoria at 9.30 a.m.

HUSBANDS' BOAT ("Koh-i-Noor") to Margate on Saturdays, from Old Swan Pier at 1.50 p.m.

"LA MARGUERITE," from TILBURY.

BOULOGNE and BACK, Mondays and Wednesdays. Special Train leaves Fenchurch Street Station at 6.15 a.m., St. Pancras 6 a.m.

OSTEND and BACK, Tuesdays. Special Train leaves Fenchurch Street Station at 6.15 a.m., St. Pancras 6 a.m.

CALAIS and BACK, Thursdays, calling at Southend and MARGATE. Special Train leaves Fenchurch Street Station at 7.30 a.m., St. Pancras 7.5 a.m.

MARGATE and BACK, Saturdays and Sundays, calling at Southend. Special Trains leave Fenchurch Street Station 9.35 and 9.45 a.m., St. Pancras 9.40 a.m.

T. E. BARLOW, Director and Manager.
50, King William Street, E.C.
When writing for tickets, quote this paper.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.
EPPS'S GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.
COCOA
BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS
2% on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2%
DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS
2½% on Deposits, repayable on demand. 2½%
STOCKS AND SHARES.
Stocks and Shares Purchased and Sold for Customers.
The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.
Telephone, No. 5, Holborn.
Telegraphic Address, "BIRKBECK OXDON."

THE CHARTERHOUSE, E.C.
OLD MORALITY PLAY.
SECOND PERFORMANCE, SATURDAY, July 20th, at 4.30 o'clock. Prices: 5s., 3s., 2s. Tickets can only be had of the Elizabethan Stage Society, 90, College Street, Chelsea, S.W.—A Third and Last Representation will be given on Saturday, July 27th.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE of WALES, ABERYSTWYTH.
PROFESSORSHIP OF ENGLISH LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE.
The Council invite APPLICATIONS for the CHAIR of PROFESSORSHIP of ENGLISH LANGUAGE and LITERATURE at the above College.
Applications, together with Testimonials, must be in the hands of the undersigned (from whom further particulars may be obtained) not later than Saturday, September 7th, 1901.
T. MORTIMER GREEN, Registrar.
July, 1901.

TYPE-WRITING.—Authors' MSS., neat, prompt, accurate, 10d. per 1,000 words. Duplicates, Translations, French Correspondence, and Literary or Technical Work.—Mrs. MICHEL, 31, Craven Street, Charing Cross.

GENERAL STEAM NAVIGN. CO.

LONDON AND EDINBURGH.
Every Wednesday and Saturday from each end.
FARES—Chief Cabin, 22s.; Return, 34s.
Fore Cabin, 16s.; Return, 24s. 6d.

The "SEANEW," one of the finest and fastest steamers on the Coast, is now on the Edinburgh route.

HIGHLAND TOURS.

6-day Tour	...	...	£3	14	6
9 "	..	...	5	0	0
12 "	...	...	6	5	6
13 "	...	...	6	12	6
16 "	...	...	7	19	6
17 "	...	...	8	5	0

6s. less if "Lord of the Isles" Coupon not required.

Including 1st Class passage to Edinburgh and back, with meals on board, and carriage of bicycle, hotel accommodation (with board) in the Highlands, and Trip, 1st Class, viâ Loch Fyne and the Kyles of Bute, from Inveraray to Glasgow by the magnificent new Royal Mail Steamer, "Lord of the Isles," with dinner on board, and carriage of bicycle. These tours have been designed primarily to meet the wants of cyclists, but are equally suitable to ordinary tourists and holiday makers.

Route, Map, Itineraries, and all information on application.

WEEK-END EXCURSION TO OSTEND.

Excursionists leave London by the Boat on Saturday at 4 p.m., and return from Ostend by the boat, leaving there on Sunday at 3 p.m. Passengers sleep on board going and returning, and besides a pleasant sea trip, largely by daylight, have the opportunity of spending a large part of Sunday in this famous Continental seaside resort.

FARES—Chief Cabin, 7s. 6d., or 6s. for Forward Sleeping Berth. Return Tickets, 10s. 6d. or 9s.

Company's Illustrated Guide free, on application to Chief Office. By Post, 2d

SOUTHEND, MARGATE, RAMSGATE
By the Magnificent Steamer "EAGLE."
From LONDON BRIDGE WHARF, at 9.10 a.m.; Greenwich, 9.30; Woolwich (South), 9.50; and Tilbury Pier, 11.0 a.m. DAILY.

Fares (Saloon), return, for the Season:
Southend 3s. 0d.
Margate 4s. 6d.
Ramsgate 5s. 0d.

Special train from Fenchurch Street Station, at 10.15. Fares 6d. extra.

SPECIAL DAY EXCURSIONS to MARGATE and RAMSGATE, from LONDON BRIDGE WHARF, at 8.45 or 9.10 a.m.; Greenwich, 9.30; and Woolwich, 9.50 a.m., on TUESDAYS, Wednesdays, Thursdays, and Fridays only. Return fare (day of issue only), 3s. 6d.

Express Boat direct to Margate and Ramsgate DAILY, from London Bridge Wharf, at 8.45 a.m. Fares as above.

YARMOUTH.
From LONDON BRIDGE WHARF, at 8.30 a.m. DAILY (Sundays excepted).
Fares.—Return for the season, 6s. 6d. or 8s.
From FENCHURCH STREET, at 9.13 a.m., viâ Tilbury.
Return for the season, 7s. or 8s. 6d.
Steamers call at Greenwich and South Woolwich.
55, Great Tower Street.
When writing for tickets, quote this paper.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY
(LIMITED).

ENLARGED AND CLASSIFIED CATALOGUE
(Over 500 pages, 8vo, bound in green cloth).

All the Principal Works in Circulation at the Library
ARRANGED under SUBJECTS.

Forming a Comprehensive Guide to Notable Publications in most Branches of Literature.

Books of Permanent Interest on POLITICAL and SOCIAL TOPICS, the ARMY, NAVY, ARTS, SCIENCE, PHILOSOPHY, SPORT, THEOLOGY, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, and FICTION. Price 1s. 6d.

Also a FOREIGN CATALOGUE, containing BOOKS in FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, RUSSIAN, and SPANISH.
Price 1s. 6d.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY,
30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET;
241, Brompton Road; and
48, Queen Victoria Street, London.

'Twixt Plate and Lip;
OR,
The Common Sense of Eating.

A HEALTH HAND-BOOK FOR EVERY DAY,
WITH SPECIAL ADVICE AS TO DIET AND REGIMEN IN HEALTH AND SICKNESS,
A POPULAR SUMMARY OF THE SYMPTOMS OF DYSPEPSIA AND INDIGESTION,
AND A NOTE ON THE SCIENTIFIC AND RATIONAL TREATMENT OF THOSE AILMENTS.

12th EDITION.

 This little book may be recommended to the general reader as a sound and safe guide to the common sense management of the stomach. The Publishers, at 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, will be pleased to send a free copy to any reader of the Academy. Early application necessary.

LONDON:
46, HOLBORN VIADUCT, E.C.

Digitized by Google

NOW READY.

THE BREAD LINE.

A STORY OF A PAPER

By ALBERT BIGELOW PAINE.

Crown 8vo, 5s.

"Most amusing The various types of sanguine temperament who compose the dramatis personæ are cleverly drawn, and the exposure of the false analogy on which they had built their dreams of fortune is most dramatically contrived."—Spectator.

"An ingenious tale, may be heartily recommended."—Scotsman.

"A grim story in its way, but wonderfully relieved by the good humour and good nature of the four adventurers, and by a slight yet entirely charming love duet."—Glasgow Herald.

"Well done and amusing."—Outlook.

London: KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER & CO., LTD., Charing Cross Road, W.C.

THE MAN OF KERIOTH,

And Other Poems. By GASCOIGNE MACKIE, Author of "Charmides." Half-parchment, fcap. 8vo, 5s. net.

"Mr. Gascoigne Mackie's volume contains some charming verses."
The DAILY CHRONICLE.

"There is a vein of fine gold in a little volume called 'The Man of Kerioth,' by Gascoigne Mackie. . . . He has imagination, a sense of emotional rhythm, an eye for verbal beauty, and a power of dramatic vision."—The STAR.

London: GRANT RICHARDS, 9, Henrietta Street, W.C.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

6s., claret roan, gilt, Illustrated.

LONDON IN THE TIME OF THE DIAMOND JUBILEE.

London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING, A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.
THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.
THE NORFOLK BROADS.
THE ISLE OF WIGHT.
BRECON and its BEACONS.
THE WYE VALLEY.
ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.
THE SEVERN VALLEY.
BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.
BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.
LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR, LLANFAIRFECHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON.
ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.
CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, & FESTINIOG.
BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and PWLLHELI.
MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, & CHELTENHAM.
LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.
NORWICH, LOWESTOFT, YARMOUTH, and the NORFOLK BROADS.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.

"It very emphatically tops them all."—Daily Graphic.

"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 5s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT, & Co. Ltd., The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers.

Paris and New York: BRENTANO'S.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

"THINGS THAT ARE MADE." Devotional Meditations in the Haunts of Nature. By Rev. A. J. BAMFORD, B.A., of Royton.

Now Ready, Second Edition, crown 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d., post free.

THE CHARTER of the CHURCH. Lectures on the Principle of Nonconformity. By P. T. FORSYTH, M.A., D.D.

"Explains the position of religious dissent with great force and eloquence."—Manchester Guardian.

London: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, LTD., 21 and 22, Furnival Street, E.C.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

TO

"THE ACADEMY,"

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S LIST.

George Moore's Sister Teresa.
George Moore's Sister Teresa.
George Moore's Great Novel,
SISTER TERESA, is Now Ready, and is published in Unwin's Green Cloth Library, price 6s.—A Sixpenny Edition of EVELYN INNES, by the same Author, has just been published, and is on sale at the Booksellers'.
George Moore's Sister Teresa.
George Moore's Sister Teresa.

Over 200,000 sold of this Book.

QUINCY ADAMS SAWYER and MASON'S CORNER FOLKS. A Picture of New England Home Life. By CHAS. FELTON PIDGIN. Cloth, 6s.

This is a great American novel, which has been selling enormously in the States, and is now issued for the first time in this country.

BERGEN WORTH. By Wallace LLOYD, Author of "Houses of Glass," &c. Cloth, 6s.

"A sensational story of life in Chicago during the railway riots of 1894, dealing with the struggles of a village blacksmith to live the Christ-life. The story abounds in realistic scenes and events."

BOOKS FOR SUMMER READING.

THE GODS, SOME MORTALS, and LORD WICKENHAM. By JOHN OLIVER HOBBES.

ANOTHER ENGLISHWOMAN'S LOVE-LETTERS. By BARRY PAIN.

THE LETTERS of HER MOTHER to ELIZABETH. By —. Cloth, 2s. each; paper, 1s. each.

London: T. FISHER UNWIN, Paternoster Square, E.C.

MR. EPICTETUS, JUN., HIS BOOK.

Wherein is set forth a Common-Sense Philosophy for the Conduct of Life. Specially Written for Unsophisticated and Simple-minded Folk, and for those who ignore every form of Conventional Religion. A Theme for the Twentieth Century and until the Millennium shall Dawn.

By BENJAMIN WALKER.

Now ready, cloth, price 3s. 6d., post free.

JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate and Ridgefield, Manchester. London: 29 and 30, Shoe Lane, E.C.

THE EARLY STARS. By Albert KINROSS, Author of "An Opera and Lady Grasmere," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. "The boyhood of Phil is charmingly described."—Spectator. "The scene-painting, whether in the country or the town, or at the seaside boarding-house, is admirably done, and the writing is always brisk and capable."—Outlook. "Interesting and flesh-and-blood personages."—County Gentleman. "Always interesting and sometimes thrilling."—Bradford Observer.

Bristol: J. W. ARROWSMITH. London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & Co.

SELECTIONS FROM

ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD'S PUBLICATIONS.

WORKS BY DR. MACLAREN.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 5s. each, post free.

THE GOD of the AMEN, and other Sermons.

THE WEARIED CHRIST, and other Sermons.

THE BEATITUDES, and other Sermons.

THE UNCHANGING CHRIST, and other Sermons.

THE HOLY of HOLIES. A Series of Sermons on the 14th, 15th, and 16th Chapters of the Gospel by John.

PAUL'S PRAYERS, and other Sermons.

CHRIST'S "MUSTS," and other Ser- mons.

London: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, Limited, 21 and 22, Furnival Street, Holborn, W.C.

Digitized by Google

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1524. Established 1869. 20 July, 1901. Price Threepence.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

Mr. John Stanhope Arkwright, M.P., author of a volume of poems called The Last Muster, has entered into partnership with Mr. R. Brimley Johnson. The title of the firm will remain unchanged.

A correspondent writes: "A reading of Mr. Conrad's and Mr. Hueffer's new novel, The Inheritors, suggests that a very good subject, The Collaborators, remains to be handled by some clever writer. There are probably twenty-five methods of collaboration. But it is safe to say that the public's innocent picture of Mr. 'A' writing one set of chapters and Mr. 'B' another set, and the whole being sandwiched together by joint agreement, is the method of romance. As to The Inheritors, perhaps we shall not be far wrong if we take it that the younger author contributes the central idea, the plot, and general situation, and first works out the various scenes in the rough, and that the elder man, bringing his experience of life and insight to bear, by a series of slight touches, recastings, and deletions, gives the whole book that style, intention, and atmosphere which the public has already seized in his former works as defining his judgment of life."

The "Local Notes and Queries" column of the Nottinghamshire Guardian has run longer than any other such feature in a provincial newspaper. The conductor throughout this run of more than twenty-one years and a-half has been Mr. J. Potter Briscoe, F.R.H.S., City Librarian of Nottingham, and the editor of "The Bibelots." That gentleman will close his long connection with the newspaper mentioned at the close of this month.

Under the heading, "Counsel in Season," Mr. Max Beerbohm discourses on holiday reading in the August Pall Mall Magazine. After much expansion and some paradox, he offers the reader his private "tip." It is this:

> There is one author on whom you may rely implicitly. I refer to him of whom, throughout the past twenty years or so, the reviewers, with one accord, have been predicating that "he always writes like a gentleman." A monotonous chorus? But, indeed, there is nothing else for the poor reviewers to say. They cannot say "he writes like a profoundly thoughtful gentleman," or "like a foolish gentleman," or "like a witty gentleman," or "like a dull gentleman." Indeed, "gentlemanly" is the only epithet they could well apply to him, and that were tautological. If you have read one of Mr. Norris's novels, you will admit that it responded exactly to all the negative requirements of the holiday mood. And you may take my word for it that all his other novels are of precisely the same kind—not better, not worse, and neither bad nor good. In a garden, or on the deck of a ship, or on the terrace of a casino—wherever you be lolling, hale and hearty, away from your usual environment—these, I assure you, are the very books you need, and are the only books you need.

"Society Croakers" is the title of Article VIII. in the Quarterly Review. We turned with some interest to see the books that were reviewed under that title. They are:

> A Portion of a Journal kept by Thomas Raikes, Esq., from 1831 to 1847. Two vols. London: Longmans, 1858.
> Greville Memoirs. Second Series (1837 to 1852). Three vols. London: Longmans, 1885.
> A Memoir of H.R.H. Princess Mary Adelaide Duchess of Teck. By C. Kinloch Cooke. Two vols. London: John Murray, 1900.
> Notes from a Diary (1851 to 1891). By Rt. Hon. Sir Mountstuart E. Grant Duff. Ten vols. London: John Murray, 1897-1901.
> Notes from my Journal. By the late Lord Ossington. London: John Murray, 1900.
> Seventy Years in Westminster. By the late Rt. Hon. Sir John Mowbray, Bart., M.P. Edited by his daughter. London and Edinburgh: Blackwood, 1901.

One, it will be observed, was published in 1858, another in 1885

"I happened to turn up the other day," says "O. O." in the Sketch, "Mr. Henley's criticism of The Return of the Native, published in the Academy at the time when it first appeared, in 1879. Mr. Henley complains that in all Mr. Hardy's work 'there is a certain Hugoesque quality of insincerity, that, rare artist as he is, there is something wanting in his personality, and he is not quite a great man.' The Return of the Native Mr. Henley pronounces 'not by any means so good a book as A Pair of Blue Eyes. The story is a sad one, but the sadness is unnecessary and uncalled for. In one scene—the scene where Clym is informed of the way of his mother's death—Mr. Hardy rises to the situation, and does nobly. But elsewhere he is only excessively clever and earnest and disappointing.' I imagine," adds "O. O.," "that very few critics, perhaps not even Mr. Henley himself, would now subscribe to this judgment."

Mr. H. C. Marillier has written an account of University journalism. It will be called University Magazines and their Makers.

The first volume of Messrs. Dent's edition of Hazlitt, containing, in addition to Mr. Henley's introduction, "The Round Table," "Characters of Shakespeare's Plays," and "A Letter to William Gifford, Esq.," will be published in October, and it is hoped that the whole work will be completed in twelve monthly volumes.

The new number of the Revue de Paris contains a story by Mr. Frank Harris called "Profits et Pertes." It begins: "Le grand magasin de tissus en tous genres était silencieux et plein d'ombre." But the French, we discovered later, is not Mr. Harris's. A note at the end says: "Traduit de l'anglais par Henry D. Davray."

We understand that Messrs. Meehan, the Bath booksellers, have in contemplation the early publication of an important work on The Famous Houses of Bath and

Digitized by Google

District. The work is the result of many years' labour and investigation on the part of Mr. J. F. Meehan, who has spared neither time nor expense in collecting together material for what must ultimately be a most important local publication. Bath and the immediate neighbourhood teem with recollections of historic personages who have dwelt therein, and Mr. Meehan has consequently compiled what is likely to be an invaluable work of local reference and general interest. The work will have an appreciative introduction by the Marquis of Dufferin and Ava, and will be strictly limited to 500 copies. A good proportion of the edition has been already privately subscribed for, the subscribers including many distinguished names.

An Italian journalist recently had a conversation with M. Zola. A portion of the interview has been telegraphed to the Daily News by that journal's Naples correspondent, from which we take the following:

> "I do not believe in absolute felicity, which is not attainable; but I believe that all social injustices might be attenuated, and, therefore, I trust to science to create a sentiment of truth. I have a great veneration for Tolstoy, but I do not agree with him on one important point. He rests on the Gospel. Now, the Gospel is also to me very beautiful, but I believe that future morality must be founded on scientific psychology. The Affaire has taught me that it is necessary to reconstruct the moral question from its very base, and my next romance, Vérité, will tend to that. In it I shall study primary and secondary instruction in France. I shall be active between pupils and masters, and shall explain my ideas on the education problem. In the first part I shall describe the sad effects of present-day education; in the second, education as it ought to be. My next work will be Justice. It will treat of a judicial error; but I shall try not to make any allusion to the Affaire. The action will not take place in military circles. It will give me a motive to show my supreme ideal—the end of war, the victory of the spirit of justice over militarism, the United States of Europe, the dream of Victor Hugo. You will be astonished that I join Hugo," M. Zola said, laughing. "I am, perhaps, more romantic than you thought."

The popular novel is being studied with great interest by critics who love it not but recognise its significance. A writer in the new Quarterly, who takes The Christian, The Master Christian, and that clever book, Colloquies of Criticism, and other works, as his text, remarks that the relation between the merit of novels and their popularity has never been so anomalous and so independent of literary standards as it is in England to-day. He proceeds to inquire into the relation which has usually subsisted in the past between merit and popularity, and comes to the following useful, though familiar, conclusion: That "though literature of certain kinds may possess within its own limits the highest and most lasting merit, and may yet appeal only to a small and exclusive circle, the greatest literature of all, while appealing to the best judges, appeals to the mass of ordinary readers also, and shows its degree of greatness by the extent that it does so." Until recently these conditions held, and Dickens, Thackeray, and George Eliot swayed alike the critics and the multitude:

> Now let us compare the past condition with the present. To events of the kind of which we are about to speak it is impossible to assign any exact date; but we may say with sufficient accuracy that about twenty years ago a change began to come over the public taste, which has, year by year since then, been growing more marked and remarkable, until now, to many observers, it seems nothing short of a revolution. Putting aside that enormous majority of novels which secure little attention either from the few or the many, and confining ourselves to those which, to some appreciable degree, have gained the approval of one class or the other, we shall find the peculiar characteristic of the existing situation to be this: that whereas formerly the novels which had most readers were those which, in the opinion of all competent judges, were the best, those which notoriously have the most readers now are those which, in the opinion of all competent judges, are among the worst: that others, which all competent judges place highest as literature amongst the works of existing novelists, are, of the contemporary novels which can be called popular at all, those whose popularity is confined to the narrowest circle; whilst between these two groups there is another composed of novels, incomparably better, but very much less popular, than the worst; and incomparably worst, but very much more popular, than the best.

Having pointed out that in all the great novelists we find profound and accurate knowledge of life or a part of life, sympathetic insight, and some quality of philosophic thought, the writer proceeds to examine the two novels already named. Their fate at his hands may be guessed. In summing up their authors' achievements, he says:

> Miss Corelli and Mr. Caine have, in fact, to a remarkable degree, the talents which enable the story-teller to entertain and excite the partially educated in their lighter moments, combined with an assumption of the profoundest knowledge of the subjects in regard to which such readers are most curious in their more serious moods. The same combination of talents may be seen in the "cheap Jack" at a fair, who first attracts a crowd by his eloquence and then sells sovereigns at a shilling, and five-shilling knives for sixpence. There is genuine talent in his persuasiveness, though there is no value in his wares.
>
> We thus see that, though the most popular novels of the present day are signally deficient in any one of those qualities which make the works of great novelists great, they undoubtedly possess certain of the lower qualities without which no great novels would be popular, combined with qualities which, although they are in reality of minor importance, are mistaken for the highest and greatest by a vast and half-educated public. We are, therefore, brought after all to the reassuring conclusion that the literary instincts of the public are still, in themselves, normal; and the greatest novels would still be the most popular if it were not for this fact, that the majority of novel-readers to-day happen to belong to a new and unexampled class, which has not as yet acquired the taste and knowledge that might enable it to discover what greatness in literature is.

In conclusion, the Quarterly reviewer fixes on the conversion of the reading public in England "from what was once an aristocracy into a huge heterogeneous democracy," as the great explanatory fact. He adds that the saviours of fiction will be found among those novelists who can resist the demoralising influences which such a public presents, and also those who have been rendered by circumstances independent of its pecuniary patronage.

In an article in the July North American Review, Mr. W. D. Howells pursues a train of thought suggested to him by a perusal of Mrs. Humphry Ward's Eleanor. He is led to see, or think he sees, certain special differences between English and American fiction, and these he endeavours to state. We have not space to quote them in full, still less to show how Mr. Howells derives his ideas from Eleanor, but the following suggestive passage will serve to show his tone of thought:

> The usual incidents of fiction have not, in the best American novelists, been the prime concern, but the subliminal effect of those incidents. Love itself, which is the meat and drink of fiction, is treated less as a passional than as a psychological phenomenon.
>
> Long ago the more artistic of our novelists perceived that the important matter was not what the lovers suffered or enjoyed in getting married, or whether they got married at all or not, but what sort of man and maid their love found them out to be, and how, under its influence, the mutual chemistry of their natures interacted.

Digitized by Google

All the problems, in any case, are incomparably simplified for the English novelist by the definite English conditions. One can no longer call them fixed; but they are still definite, and in a certain way character proceeds from them—the character of a gentleman, a business man, an artisan, a servant, a labourer.

Each of these has his being in a way so different from the others, that he is a definitely different creature; and when through some chance, some perverse mixture of the elements, the conditions are traversed, and the character bred of one shows itself in another, it has a stronger relief from the alien background.

But, ordinarily, the Englishman feels, thinks, and acts from his class; when you name his class you measurably state him; and you have rather to do with what he does than with what he is. The result in fiction is a multiplicity of incidents and persons; you have breadth rather than depth.

Possibly we touch here a fundamental variance of the English and American life. In former times we Americans were accused of being curious, over-curious, of being insatiable and impertinent questioners of strangers. It may be, however, that we were not so, but that the most penetrating difference between us and the English is that they are social and we are personal.

Their talk is of incidents; ours of interests. Their denser life, we will say, satisfies them with superficial contrasts, while in our thinner and more homogeneous society the contrasts that satisfy are subliminal. This theory would account for their breadth and our depth without mortifying the self-love of either, which I should like to spare in our case if not in theirs.

Our personality is the consequence of our historic sparsity, and it survives beyond its time because the nature of our contiguity is still such as to fix a man's mind strongly upon himself, and to render him restless till he has ascertained how far all other men are like him. We are prodigiously homogeneous, though in the absence of classification we seem so chaotic. We shall change, probably, and then the character of our fiction, our art of representing life, will change too. Very likely it will become more superficial and less subliminal; it will lose in depth as it gains in breadth. As yet, its attempts to be broad, to be society fiction, have resulted in a shallowness which is not suggestive of breadth.

Mr. Richard Le Gallienne has been warbling, in the New York Journal Saturday Review, about the Summer Girl:

What was she reading, the Summer Girl,
As she sat there alone by the sea?
Was it Shakespeare, or Dante,
Guido Cavalcanti?
Or a novel by you—or by me?

What was she reading, the Summer Girl,
As she laid down her book in the sand?
Was it Caine or Corelli,
Or perhaps Mrs. Ella
Wheeler Wilcox, that slipped from her hand?

Etc.

From the same paper we gather some particulars about the Summer Author. He is beginning to be paragraphed on both sides of the Atlantic. The Summer Author is the author who has done well during the winter, and is now lying in a hammock. It is deemed most important that the public should know where its literary entertainers are during July and August, and how they are being tanned and ripened for the next book market. In Boston, particularly, they believe in literature by sequestration. Compare the following with all you remember of Oliver Goldsmith:

The best selling book in Boston during the past month was A Carolina Cavalier, by George Cary Eggleston.

It is like the story of Eben Holden over again. Two years ago Irving Bacheller got a leave of absence from his New York paper, sequestered himself in the woods up in New York State, and soon blossomed forth as the most popular author of the day.

It is only about a year ago that Mr. Eggleston was in the grind of metropolitan newspaper work. It is not known that he even had the opportunity of sequestering himself in order to write his book. It was brought out last spring by the Lothrops, of Boston, the publishers of Eben Holden, and the sales of A Carolina Cavalier have been increasing every month.

Mr. Eggleston now has the luxury of spending an entire Summer at Lake George, far away from the hot, bustling editorial rooms on Park Row. But it is not an idle luxury that Mr. Eggleston is enjoying this Summer. He is too well trained a newspaper man for that. He is now writing a book for boys and a romance of the Civil War.

Again, we read:

Col. Charles Ledyard Norton, the popular writer of boys' books, is passing the Summer in a most delightful way at Sandwich, on Cape Cod. In his spare time, between chapters of his new book of adventure about the Barbary War, he is building a houseboat. He expects to live in it the latter part of the Summer and be towed from point to point along the New England coast.

Who wouldn't be an author?

A very fine copy of the First Folio Shakespeare has just changed hands at Christie's. The copy measures $12\frac{5}{8}$ in. by $8\frac{1}{4}$ in., and it is practically perfect. The Daily News thus describes its condition and its sale: "No letter of text is lacking; and, but for the bottom corners of four leaves being slightly repaired, and the portrait after Droeshout rubbed in places, its condition is good, though not so good, perhaps, as that of the 1899 example. On the other hand, its value is decreased by reason of the modern morocco binding. The opening offer of £500—more than it was worth thirty years ago—came from Messrs. Pickering; then one of £800 from Mr. Quaritch. By Messrs. Hornstein, Sabin, and others it was carried to £1,500. Thereafter the contest was between Pickering and Quaritch. Although in 1899 the late Mr. Bernard Quaritch wrote that the copy which then brought £1,700 was worth no more than £1,100, his son was yesterday the final bidder at £1,720—a record sum. An astute collector declared that if the finer 1899 example were again offered, £2,000 would hardly purchase it."

Prof. Richard Lodge, of Edinburgh University, has issued, through Mr. James Thin, of that city, the text of the lecture which he delivered last October at the inauguration of the Fraser Professorship of Ancient History and Palæography. The student, he said, "should desire to have a wide outlook over History as a whole; no part of the story of human progress or decline should be a complete blank to him. But he should also make a minute study of some particular period or subject, tracing his knowledge back to the original sources, and subjecting them to the most minute examination. Without such an intensive study of some part of History, his mastery of the general course of History will always be somewhat superficial and unreal, and the value of one such piece of original work to his wider reading will be inestimable. It will give him a keenness of insight and a security of judgment unattainable in any other way."

Mr. G. S. Street has been applying these principles by a careful examination of the old Betting Books at Brooks's Club, and he publishes his "finds" in the North American Review. They are of great interest. The entries are all contained in one book the size of an ordinary thick notebook. "It was a joy to me," says Mr. Street, "to observe the various handwritings—the easy, rapid writing of men who wrote a good deal; the clumsy, laborious writing of fingers more familiar with guns and bridle-reins; the hasty scrawl of the man who was in a hurry to be at play; sometimes the fantastic scrawl of the man who had plainly dined. Charles Fox's fist changes in the progress of the book from a rather round and boyish form to an elegant and running hand—an improvement no doubt produced by the lessons we know he took from a writing-master. He and Fitzpatrick used the book most constantly; after 1780, Sheridan's nimble flourish decorates a good many pages. I preserve spelling and other accidents, and refrain from impertinent and unnecessary 'sics.' The majority of the bets are not signed or initialled, nor is the settlement recorded: Sheridan (in pride, it may have been, of winning or paying) seems first to have introduced the latter custom."

Digitized by Google

From Mr. Street's numerous selections we take the following:

> 1771. April 16th. L^d. Ossory betts Mr. C. Fox 100 Guineas to 10 that Doctor North is not Bishop of Durham this day two months, provided the present Bishop dies within that time.
>
> 1771. June 22nd. Mr. William Hanger bets Mr. Lee Twenty Guineas to 25 that M^lle. Heinel does not dance in England at the Opera House next month.
>
> Mr. Boothby gave Mr. Fawkener five Guineas to receive One Hundred if the Duke of Queensbury dies before half an Hour after five of the afternoon of the 27 of June 1773. June 27: 1772.
>
> 2nd March 1774. Lord Northington betts Mr. Plumer 300 Guineas: to 50: that either the Duke of Devonshire, Lord Cholmondeley, Mr. Hanger, or Mr. Plumer is married before His Lordship.

Bibliographical.

THE complete and uniform edition of Hazlitt's works is, it seems, to run to twelve volumes, and to include everything except the Life of Napoleon, "now quite obsolete." But, though obsolete in a sense, has not that Life, nevertheless, a good deal of literary interest? I miss, too, from the list of the works which the edition is to contain The Character of William Cobbett (1835), though no doubt it is intended to find room for it. The Characters of Shakespeare's Plays is, in the list, left undated. The date, of course, is 1817 (followed by editions in 1818, 1848, and 1854). The date of The Dramatic Literature of the Life of Elizabeth is wrongly given; it should be 1820-21. Among the most popular of Hazlitt's writings, it would seem, have been the Table Talk (1821-22), which was reprinted in 1825, 1845, and 1869, and the Round Table (1817), reprinted in 1841 (third edition), 1869, and 1871. The Plain Speaker (1826) was reprinted in 1851-52 and 1870. Messrs. Dent intend, I see, to reprint the Liber Amoris, and I suppose they could not do otherwise. The book is extant, and, though it is discreditable to its author, cannot be put out of sight.

Mr. Shorter's production of his Tatler has brought with it a crop of references to Steele's historic periodical, but I have seen no allusion anywhere to a publication called The Tatler, which appeared in London in 1830-32. This started on September 4, 1830, as a "daily journal of literature and the stage," consisted of four quarto pages only, and cost twopence. In this form it lasted till March 31, 1832, though it had in the interval altered its designation to "a daily journal of literature, fine arts, music, and the stage," and though on and after August 20, 1831, the price fell to one penny, from April 4, 1832, to October 6, 1832, the paper was published only three times a week. It was octavo in size, and, beginning with eight pages, ended with sixteen. On the last-named date, apparently, it expired. As originally started, it was devoted almost wholly to the tastes of the reading man and the playgoing man. Towards the end of its career it became more broad and varied in its interests. There were, of course, no pictorial illustrations; but the letterpress was by no means unattractive.

Who shall decide when anecdotists disagree? "An Octogenarian," writing in the Cornhill, sets himself to correct the "accepted and quite erroneous" story to the effect that on one occasion in Paris, Rogers and Luttrell being at the Louvre together, a party of English ladies hailed the latter, and he stopped to speak to them. Rejoining Rogers, he was asked, "Who were they?" and replied, "I don't know; they asked if my name was Luttrell." "And was it?" "This in the mouth of Rogers would," says the "Octogenarian," "have been a cruel sneer, Mr. Luttrell being a natural son. The true version of the incident, as I heard it numerous times from Mr. Rogers himself, he gave as a glaring instance of Lord Dudley's well-known absence of mind. It was he, and not Rogers, who was with Luttrell at the Louvre; the ladies had asked the latter 'if my name was not Holland?' And Lord Dudley had said, 'And was it?' in sheer absent-mindedness." Now, I am sure the "Octogenarian" writes in the best of faith; but if you will turn over the pages of Planché's Recollections and Reflections you will find that writer asserting, also on the authority of Rogers, that the absent-minded beggar in this instance was "Maltby, the brother of the bishop." It was the banker-poet, according to Planché, who was asked if his name was Rogers, and it was Maltby who remarked, "And was it?"

The promised book on University Magazines and their Makers will be very welcome. The subject has not yet been systematically treated. Mr. Whibley did something for Cambridge periodicals in the introduction to his In Cap and Gown: Three Centuries of Cambridge Wit (1889), and in 1890 we had a book of Echoes from the Oxford Magazine: Being Reprints of Seven Years. Obviously, however, there is very much more room to cover, and the result cannot but be interesting. As Mr. Whibley truly observes, "Youth is the age of literary experiment, and a large number of those whose names have in later years become famous have won their spurs in the field of literature as undergraduates." Meanwhile, what is wanted badly is a History of English Periodicals," excluding newspapers, and giving prominence to the quarterlies and monthlies. Such a History, conscientiously done, would be a very valuable aid to the study of our literature during the past two centuries. It might be undertaken by a syndicate of experts.

The announcement of a forthcoming novel by Mr. Hamilton Aïdé carries the mind back a good many years—to the first appearance of such once-popular stories as Carr of Carrlyon, Confidences, Poet and Peer, Rita, and so forth. Mr. Aïdé is a notable example of mental energy in the autumn of life. He published a novel, Jane Treachel, so recently as two years ago (1899), and it had been preceded in 1895 by Elizabeth's Pretenders. One remembers very well his play of "Philip," produced by Irving in 1872, and his comedy, called "A Nine Days' Wonder," brought out by John Hare and the Kendals in 1874. It was, however, a little surprising to find him, in 1890, suddenly returning to the footlights with the adaptation which he called "Dr. Bill." Mr. Aïdé has written some smooth and pleasing verse, but was not thought worthy of inclusion in that omnium gatherum of Mr. Alfred Miles—The Poets and the Poetry of the Century.

I notice that Mr. Alfred Austin is described, on the cover of the new number of the North American Review, as "Poet Laureate of England." It is a pity that our Transatlantic brethren should be thus misled. We, over here, know that such a functionary as "Poet Laureate of England" does not exist. In this country the Poet Laureate is a salaried member of the Royal Household—that, and nothing more or less. His name and emoluments figure in the official lists of that Household. The appointment is a Court appointment; it has no national bearing or significance whatever. It so happens that the post was filled in succession by three notable men—two of them men of genius—Southey, Wordsworth, and Tennyson, and that fact has given to the office an altogether factitious interest and importance. England makes her own Poets Laureate; they are not appointed by Government.

THE BOOKWORM.

Digitized by Google

Reviews.

Some Old Tendencies.

Main Currents in Nineteenth Century Literature. By George Brandes. In 6 vols. Vol. I.: The Emigrant Literature. (Heinemann. 6s. net.)

THIS Emigrant Literature is the first volume of what will undoubtedly be an important critical work, by an author who has won recognition in England through his exhaustive study on Shakespeare, and his volume on Ibsen and Björnson. It deals with what the author considers the wellspring of nineteenth century literature, in the work of those French writers who fled into many countries from before the guillotine of the Revolution and the grape-shot of Napoleon, drawn back in the track of the Restoration to renew literary France. The book is exceedingly well written, clearly planned, full of insight, and of unfailing interest. It certainly gives promise that the series will be of more than ordinary value to critical students. Of the points which we notice for animadversion, one concerns the translation. Why is it styled "The Emigrant Literature"? In English, the French word émigré at once denotes an exile of the Revolution and Napoleonic reign, without the need of explanation or qualifying term: it is appropriated to that purpose. But emigrant may signify an Englishman in America, a Chinese in Australia: it has no specialised application. The translator is so conscious of this that the French exiles are throughout the book called émigrés. Why did he not speak of "The Emigré Literature," or else of emigrants? The inconsistency is itself an argument against the title, which should (as we suggest) have been "The Emigré Literature." For the author himself our chief complaint is that he is too uncompromisingly partisan. He is all that we understand by Continental Liberalism—anti-clerical, materialistic, rationalistic; and he carries all this into the very roots and conception of his book. It is taken for granted that a writer approaches salvation in proportion as he approaches the standpoint of modern materialistic science, and the cognate philosophies which exclude the supernatural element from life—plus the emotional and other qualities which distinguish nineteenth century rationalism from the cold and narrow rationalism of the eighteenth century. His views dominate the whole book, colouring even the casual comment on Chateaubriand's mother: "God-fearing to the highest degree, a church-goer, and a patroness of priests." The result is that such as do not sympathise with the writer's views have frequently to pause and redraw the picture in a fresh perspective, before they can realise what it is in itself, apart from its painter's peculiarity of vision. In a critical study of literature, it were to be wished the author could have abstained from weaving strong personal preconceptions of this kind into the warp and woof of his fabric.

Another point is of slight importance in the present volume, though it remains to be seen how far it may affect the subsequent volume on Naturalism in England, of which "Byron and his contemporaries" are to be the theme. That very description of the intended fourth volume indicates what we mean. Mr. Brandes, apparently, is still influenced by the once universal Continental illusion as to the toweringly ascendant position of Byron in English poetry. In France the importance and independence of Wordsworth, Shelley, and Keats are beginning to be understood, thanks to M. Paul Bourget and others. But for the most part Continental writers can scarce realise that a figure which means so much to their poetry means so little to ours. Mr. Brandes, for example, instances among those influenced by Rousseau, in France Chateaubriand and others, in Germany Tieck, and "in England Byron." Yet whatever he owed to Chateaubriand, Byron probably had little direct influence from Rousseau. That fourth canto of Childe Harold, with its Nature-rhapsodies, of which Mr. Brandes is probably thinking, drew that enthusiasm from Shelley, who in his turn drank from Wordsworth, while Wordsworth was influenced by Rousseau—directly or indirectly. It is through Wordsworth rather than Byron that the Nature-loving influence of Rousseau begins to circulate in English poetry. Yet the author's estimate of Byron is quite correct for the general purposes of his book; since in relation to the Continent Byron alone among English poets is of importance. He created or recreated the literatures of three great Continental countries at a decisive epoch. How make those countries understand the amazing truth, that the magician who did this had no influence whatever on the poetry of his own land? Wordsworth and Coleridge were before him; Shelley, Keats, Tennyson, and the rest who came after him, followed totally antagonistic inspiration. Of the swarm who wore their literary shirt-collars in the Byronic fashion, not one has survived as a poet. It is one of the most remarkable phenomena in literature, this contrast between Byron abroad and Byron at home. And it will be a curious experience (if the description of Mr. Brandes's fourth volume should correspond to the contents) to see our greatest modern poets treated as "Byron's contemporaries."

The émigrés writers with whom this first volume deals are Chateaubriand, Sénancour, Nodier, Constant, Madame de Staël, and Barante. Of these the author's predilections and space are given chiefly to Madame de Staël, because she alone, he considers, was in some measure a prophet, and not merely a precursor, of the fuller day which was to come. But from the standpoint of literary power Chateaubriand seems to us the greatest of the group—a group, when all is said, somewhat futile and manqué, whose aureole is steadily fading in the process of the years. Would Mr. Brandes, one inclines to wonder, have been altogether so enthusiastic about the De Staël (whom he calls the precursor of George Sand) if she had not written De L'Allemagne? At any rate, it brings Chateaubriand closer to Englishmen that he was for a time a refugee in England, as previously a wanderer in America; and that the record of the American sojourn, in particular, is writ large across his work. So, too, was Constant for a time a student at Edinburgh, being besides that rare thing, a French Protestant. But Chateaubriand has a further interest for Englishmen, in his relation to Byron. If we, better than the Continent, estimate Byron's actual place in our literature, we have less conception how far he was from being original in that "pageant of his bleeding heart." To Chateaubriand belongs the credit—we could well-nigh say discredit—of the idea. But Chateaubriand to most Englishmen suggests the Génie du Christianisme: few have opened Réné or Atala. It is there you find the sources of Byron. This brilliant young Frenchman was very unhappy and very discontented, for a great variety of reasons. He was tired of everything; his fellow-men were not geniuses like himself, and he was elaborately conscious of the fact; he possessed the fatal gift of making women fall in love with him, but could not really love them back, though he tried hard—which made him feel very sorry for the women, because they lost so much. Especially he was deeply, tenderly sorry for himself. But instead of reflecting that there must be something profoundly wrong with his heart, and trying what might be done to remedy it, he hit upon a beautiful new idea. Since he was so hopelessly above his fellow-men, it must be his duty to become a missionary, and by the exhibition of himself lift other men to the same heights of superior misery. That was not quite his own account of it. He said that he wrote to warn others against such a perilous state, and inculcate the necessity of religion. One is inclined to repeat Mr. Burchell's famous ejaculation. The actual effect of such exhibitions is to make egregious young men admire and long to imitate the author. It is not eloquent generalities about the need of religion which will undo the total atmosphere of such a book.

Digitized by Google

Anyway, what he did was to start the new fashion—which soon grew amazingly popular—for a man of genius to show his sores in the market-place, asking Hob and Dick to drop a tear—and a sixpence—into the ready hat. Byron saw his chance to set the new fashion in England. He, too, was unhappy, he had as fine sores as any Frenchman of them all. And the exhibition was unanimously voted superior to the original, even by the French themselves. The fashion was passing in England, happily; one would not like to think it could be otherwise. Even our Hamlets are sane and manly beside these Continental writers. In a Frenchman, still more a Frenchwoman, the thing seems less obnoxious—because they are "built that way."

Chateaubriand, it must be confessed, carries it off gallantly. If he lacks the Byronic directness, the Byronic compression, the scathing Byronic wit and scorn, he has a lyric eloquence of the most brilliant kind, above that of Byron, to our thinking, and often approaching the verge of poetry. His descriptions of North American scenery in Atala, for instance, are such as had not been read in French literature up to that time. The passion is genuine and tempestuous, despite the theatrical pose of the chief figure. In Réné one finds an extraordinary number of the characteristics we are accustomed to suppose original with Byron. The weariness of life and all things in life, the incredulity, the cynicism. "All my life long," cries Réné, "I have had a widespread, and yet insignificantly small world before my eyes, and at my side a yawning abyss." Such utterances, which might have come out of Childe Harold, are constant. Disgust of life, the folly of believing in happiness, these sentiments pervade the book. Even the device of assigning to the hero the guilt of unnatural passion has passed from Réné into Manfred, as perhaps (with differing sentiments) it passed from Byron to Shelley.

It needed genius to make universally acceptable these tales which are in effect so many portraitures of one man. So it is with Sénancour, Constant, Madame de Staël. All these men and women most characteristically make themselves the heroes (or heroines) of their own books: too egotistic to be genuine novelists, they write what are really romances on the Fortunes of Me. Constant not only portrays himself, but his passion for Madame de Staël—or rather her passion for him. He is in some degree a kind of Sentimental Tommy, encouraging a woman's love, which he is finally too cold or too shallow to return, and then making "copy" of it. For the De Staël was deep in love with him, and never got over or forgave his desertion. Her feelings at reading her own love-story in a book by the faithless lover can be imagined. It is gratifying to know that one at least of this school was capable of actual love. Nothing is more notable and miserable in the history of these writers than their general incapacity for honest sexual love. About it they are for ever writing; but they cannot live it. Still, with all their futilities, their discontent with the old, and incapacity to evolve anything new, their reaction towards faiths and aspirations in which they do not really believe, there is in them the redeeming quality of genius. Where they have sowed, others reap: they prepare the way for the Romantics, for Hugo, De Musset, and all the fertile movement which followed. Above all, as we have said, Chateaubriaud has Byron for his scholar, and through Byron leads on the new outburst of French literature. Mr. Brandes, who has more sympathy with them than we can feel ourselves, has done them excellent justice in a book which makes us look forward hopefully to its successors.

Recent Verse.

Songs of Lucilla. (Elkin Mathews. 3s. 6d. net.)

The Man of Kerioth. By Gascoigne Mackie. (Grant Richards. 5s. net.)

The Oxford Year. By J. Williams. (Simpkin Marshall; Oxford: R. H. Blackwell. 3s. 6d. net.)

Nature Songs. By Emily Read. (Wells Gardner. 2s. 6d.)

It is probably an understatement to say that some score of volumes of poetry are issued quarterly from the press. It is, probably, indeed, a large understatement. Yet consider what it means. It is nothing less than portentous. The vanity, the overweening self-estimate, the half-education—in some cases; in others, the ill-digested and over-education, hypnotising a man into weak imitation of what he has admired; the hundred-and-one forms of feebleness which persuade a man to publish what he should have kept concealed in his drawer. Yet there is somewhat to be said for him. Because the only final test and tribunal is the test and tribunal of publication. For good or for evil, a man's friends may be incompetent judges. A true poet may move in an unliterary circle. A literary circle may be over-lenient in its judgment of a friend's work. The one sure thing is that a volume given to the world will ultimately find its natural level—be it negligently pushed, or boomed with all the resources of the most up-to-date publisher. That is the trial by combat, which every versifier has the right to challenge, and by the final issue of which he must abide. But it is a cruel ordeal, no less for the judges than the challenger. Their judgment may be reversed by that court of appeal—posterity. And the challenger may die—as Keats died—fatally ignorant as to the ultimate issue of his challenge. A man very sure of himself may expect with calmness the final result; or, better still, remain quietly content with the knowledge that he has done what was given him to do, and unheeding of the issue. But for the judges it is a position invidious indeed. The marvel, on the whole, is, that they seldom investigate any batch of verse without finding some occasion for praise, if nothing which touches the higher levels of poetry.

There is just now a surprising amount of verse which can fairly be pronounced accomplished; and the collection now under our notice is no exception to the rule. The author of Songs of Lucilla, by a species of modesty rare in these days, chooses to remain anonymous. He has published too much, and a choicer selection would have made a better impression. But he has good power of word-painting; and, his strength lying in this descriptive faculty, his gift is best seen in his poems on pictures. "La Nascita di Venere" (on Botticelli's great picture of Venus rising from the waves) is a typical example:

Prince of the painters' perished brotherhood,
Who lavished on their art the purple dye
Of pansies, and the rose's crimson blood,
How like a vapour does thy Venus rise!—
Not veiled yet by the fluttering draperies!—

All white and shimmering, from the waves wind-curled,
New-woke, and wondering of the things to be,
Like thine own mystic mediæval world;
Indeed an Aphrodite,—but not she
Who sprang, undying, from the deathless sea:—

But mild of mien, and pensive-souled, and sad,
As the Maid-mother of the Christ thorn-crowned
As though, wide-eyed, some wistful dream she had,
And in her ear still were the small shrill sound
The swallows make, as swift they circle round!—

The breezes blow about her salt, and sweet,
With floating foam, and flowers flung in the air,
And like loose fetters, falling to her feet—
A burden for the form a shell can bear—
Hang half the sun's rays plaited in her hair!

Digitized by Google

Sculptors in stone have imaged her, sea-born,
And Love's frail mould, to be immortal, made,
But thou hast made her as the misty morn,
And as the subtle-shifting light and shade,
And as a perfect-petalled flower, to fade!

That is good, and there is much more of equal merit. Descriptive verse is not the highest kind of verse; but within these limits the anonymous author has considerable faculty.

A more distinctive and personal descriptive touch belongs to Mr. Gascoigne Mackie's Man of Kerioth. The Man of Kerioth is Judas Iscariot; and the poem which bears this name is notable for the strong and incisive imagery and phrase by which the descriptive portions are bitten in. For example:

Above my doubting steps in darkness bowed
A thunder-belted region black with rain:
Stabbed, like a wounded bull, the plunging cloud,
Staggered, and shook the plain.

A strong wind blew. And then, a wave of heat
Touched me: and even while I fled appalled,
There fell a crimson shadow at my feet:
I heard my own name called.

Then came I to a tract where no storm was,
But silence only: yet my every breath
In that waste land through which I had to pass
Was lonelier than death.

Lo! by a stream blotted and streaked with blood,
A stream that neither flowed nor seemed at rest,
Grey as a stone, a silent figure stood,
With beard upon his breast.

Beside him lay a reed-crate and a cruse,
Shaped like a purse of potter's earthenware:
One arm muffled his brows; a knotted bruise
Showed, where his neck was bare.

The other arm behind him on the rack
Stretch'd, as who flings away a thing bewitched:
And like a star-fish turned upon its back,
His groping fingers twitched.

There is no little imaginative strength in this description. The image of the "plunging cloud" which,

. . . . like a wounded bull, . . .
Staggered, and shook the plain.

is bold and original, if, perhaps, with a very slight tendency to violence in the wording as a whole. But the other image of Iscariot's twitching fingers,

Like a star-fish turned upon its back, is original, strong, and vivid in a remarkable degree. Mr. Mackie has every reason to hope that he will one day arrive at work of unmistakable individual achievement. This book exhibits most attractive flashes of promise.

Of more varied kind is Mr. J. Williams's The Oxford Year. It opens with a series of descriptive sonnets, all informed with Oxford scenery and associations, and all having a certain quiet grace and prettiness, if not rising to the difficult level of beauty.

Here is one—"September":

I offer thee a picture wrought in rime,
By autumn painted on a Berkshire down,
When Nature circles with her golden crown
Majestic heads of rowan and of lime.
Faint fall the sheep-bells with their mournful chime,
Half silenced by the curfew of the town,
That seems to ring the knell of old renown,
Cheated of immortality by time.
Rooks whirl between the spires of Abingdon,
And clumps of Wittenham towards stubbles crossed,
By paths that swerve through haspless gates ajar.
The day is past, the twilight is begun,
With it the souls that we have loved and lost
Look from the bastions of the evening star.

The mention of Berkshire reminds us that we were too hasty in saying the sonnets were "all" redolent of Oxford. Why, by the way, does Mr. Williams say "wrought in rime"? So far as the poem shows, there is no touch of frost on the landscape described, nor would frost be timely in September. If he mean rhyme, why did he adopt an archaic spelling so fraught (in this instance) with dangerous ambiguity? Presently, however, his muse changes her note for the tune to which, since Calverley, so many University rhymers have danced. We cannot say that he takes an eminent place in that illustrious band of which Mr. Owen Seaman is the latest. Here, again, he has a pretty gift rather than first-rate and finished quality. Here is one of his trifles:

The Smug.

He dwelt amid untrodden ways,
Beside the stream of Cher,
A smug whom there were few to praise,
But many more to bar.

"A violet by a mossy stone
Half hidden from the eye,"
Was scarcely the description one
Would recognise him by.

He lived unknown, and few could know
If he would sink or swim;
But he is ploughed in Smalls, and oh,
The difference to him!

A longer effect in a somewhat different kind is "St. Scholastica's Day," which begins:

Into the Mermaid Tavern,
Nigh unto Carfax, reeled
Walter de Springheuse of Merton
And Roger de Chesterfield.

These are amusing bagatelles for an idle moment in an idle way; but they have nothing of permanency in them, even after the manner of their fugitive kind. Yet the volume has attraction enough in its ephemeral way, and makes good desultory reading.

Miss (or should it be Mrs.?) Emily Read belongs to a very different kind. Her Nature Songs have a considerable share of poetic feeling, and a certain reflective quality; but they show a crude want of technique. Perhaps her "Rondel" shows her at the best:

Sick? Sorry? Understand
Nature hath cures for thee;
Thy comfort she hath planned,
And here are simples three.

Let slip the warm, dry sand
Cold fingers through, and see!
Sick? Sorry? Understand
Nature hath cures for thee.

Or cool thy burning hand
In grassy, dewy lea;
Or twist each golden strand
Of child-hair curling free.
Sick? Sorry? Understand
Nature hath cures for thee.

That is pretty, in a not very distinguished or expert way. But as a rule she is insistently feminine in her manner. It is not merely that she is feminine in quality—that were a merit rather than blame. But she will use feminine colloquialities and trivialities of phrase altogether destructive of the poetic atmosphere—indeed, one might go nigh to call them infantilities. They remind one of the baby-eyes which a certain type of woman cultivates as girlish and appealing to mankind. One's only wonder is that a woman with the power to think and feel should dress her subject-matter in phrase so immature and recognisably bread-and-butterish. Two poems derive all their imagery from the milliner's shop. A couple of stanzas may suffice:

Now sing the birds, and shines the sun,
And Spring, she has come back,
And busily she has begun
Her wardrobe to unpack.

Digitized by Google

Fast-shut in buds of every tree,
She's squeezed her garments bright,
A marvel does it seem to me
That they are packed so tight.

Miss Read is typical of a class, above which much of her substance entitles her to rise: therefore we have dwelt at some length on her book. On the whole, we may be thankful that a certain handful of verse shows worth reading among the voluminous output of an unsparing press.

Uncle Henry's Opinions.

Robert Buchanan: a Critical Appreciation, and Other Essays. By Henry Murray. (Philip Wellby. 5s. net.)

Mr. Murray signs himself, "Your affectionate uncle, Henry," in the letter to a young poet, which concludes the vigorous volume before us, and we can but hope that Nephew Arthur's illusion about "that wonderful and worshipful personage, a writer of books," served as a fire-screen while he read this document. For Mr. Murray echoes the bad old cant, that "imaginative literature is dead in England":

> The old beliefs which gave warmth and colour to life are dispelled. Man is no longer the most enthralling of all problems. . . . but a combination of salts and gases. . . . The once illimitable earth has dwindled to the dimensions of an orange slung in a network of rails and wires. We have shorn man of eternity, and we are taking from him time and space. . . . You will not find Utopia or Brobdingnag on my chart, and might as well look for a naiad in the pools of Thessaly as for a fairy in the woods of Warwickshire.

Therefore, let Nephew Arthur remember that religions are not necessary to literature, though they have provided materials for it. Emotion is the mother of literature, and emotion is as eternal as life and growth. The earth on whose breast the ice-floes groan which sent back Nansen from the Pole is not less majestic than that which was known of Agamemnon. There is no Iphigenia, the price of whose stainless life would open to any Fram the stubborn rigidness of an ocean turned to a stone. Wherefore seek Utopia and Brobdingnag? The former is, after all, only an England moulded to a heart's desire, the latter a satirical invention to cure megalomania. If it were not for the eternal feminine in Glumdalclitch, who would visit Brobdingnag? and woman, maugre the Henry Murrays of this world, is still abundantly with us. Why seek the naiad or the pixie in Thessaly, or elsewhere? They taught no mystery, those fair naked women, which is not hidden in every lovely face that flits past in boats on the Thames. One or many, good or evil, man's conception of a god has ever been man or woman, or the likeness of things in the wood or the water.

Still remains the announcement, "Imaginative literature is dead in England." Fortunately, the cry of "Ichabod" does not expel a glory that has decided to remain. This Ichabod is against the sun in heaven. The short story has never been more finely wrought in England than to-day. It has gathered in the treasures of folk-lore; it is a granary of old beliefs. Never has the long story been more forthright than to-day. Though in mechanism it displays the old vices of artificiality, it preserves the common speech, and recognises intimacies of thought that were once equally lost in exaggerated sentimentality and noisy bluffness. Every reviewer of power to choose, regardless of name and intent on worth, can mention a score of contemporary writers who have struck off chapters which enhanced the intensity of the reader's life.

One follows Uncle Henry more willingly in his long essay on Robert Buchanan, whom he knew and loved, and places with Tennyson and Browning. He is impressed with Buchanan's bold arraignment of Christ, whom he dared to figure as the Wandering Jew haunting "the sad world the shadowy wraith of a beautiful dream and a great lost purpose, feebly wandering towards final dissolution and oblivion." Buchanan as a magical melodist in verse is hard to accept. Such a line as this:

But Jove sitteth cold on his cloud-shrouded throne, in a poem quoted by Mr. Murray to demonstrate the poet's gift of melody, has an unspontaneous ugliness which forbids the idea that it is a careless line such as are met with in Shelley's works. Beauty of form is most realisable by those who passionately love it, and Buchanan did not do literary jerry-building on the ruins of such a passion. 1870 saw him pensioned, yet one reads that he wrote more than thirty of his often mediocre novels, and "camel-loads of critical, polemical, and sociological etceteras." Why? The answer is with Mammon. Necessity is acquitted. Poet, however, he certainly was. Elegiac feeling makes no more instant communication with the reader than in the words:

Ay, Mary, it is bitter
He took with him, to heav'n, no wealth I gave.

To Mr. Swinburne Mr. Murray is unjust. He recognises the poet's mastery of music, but he reduces all that he "has ever had to express" to the lines:

What ailed us, oh gods, to desert you
For creeds that refuse and restrain?
Come down and redeem us from virtue,
Our Lady of Pain.

One suspects Mr. Murray to be of those who judge of poetry as of porridge. Mr. Swinburne fails of farinaceousness. "His career has been a long exercise in the art of sinking." The grave beauty of Swinburne the elegist, the radiant splendour of Swinburne the eulogist of the sea, the grace of Swinburne the poet of childhood, sink in that sinking. But it is the critic who sinks.

Interesting Mr. Murray remains even when he exasperates. He is clever in comparative criticism and writes sagaciously on volumes that lie open before him. On a closed book about which he has recollections beware of him. We have vainly consulted three editions of Adonais for a variant of a line which he offers in support of the assertion that Shelley "drifted at least as far as Theism."

Poor Barbara!

The Use of Words in Reasoning. By Alfred Sidgwick. (Black. 7s. 6d. net.)

Were words definite in meaning, and independent of their context, then formal logic—"the science which is concerned with the form as distinguished from the matter of thought"—would be simply a branch of pure mathematics, and its conclusions would enjoy the same universal validity. But, notwithstanding the above definition, no logic can be completely formal unless it is wholly symbolic, and symbolic logic has, of necessity, very little to do with the processes of thought, and cannot carry us far in distinguishing between good and bad reasoning. The interest to-day of formal logic is historical; it is almost impossible, for instance, to enter into sympathetic relations with the philosophers of the Middle Age without some knowledge of the Aristotelian system. No one can deny its childlike charm, and its entire innocency of all complexity makes it a delightful diversion for undergraduates and others during their period of tutelage. When, however, it is found necessary to disengage the fallacies from a political speech, or to re-examine the data of an argument, the formal logician must summon other genii to his aid than those enshrined in the famous syllogistic mnemonic.

Digitized by Google

How preposterous it seems that the two assertions, "Luxury is condemned." and "All unicorns are like goats," are to the formal logician identical propositions. The real interest of the first assertion lies in the definition of the term luxury; and the difficulty of discovering common standing-ground is realised when we examine positions taken up respectively by acute thinkers like Henry Sidgwick and Mr. Leslie Stephen, both of whom have, as it happens, made careful surveys and plans of this very generalisation. Even when the significance, partial or full, of the word is known, there is still need to correlate the two class names "luxury" and "is condemned"; and it is just here where formal logic breaks down completely. The other assertion is wholly unintelligible to the naturalist, who, not possessing acquaintance with the technical and highly abstract language of formal logicians, would affirm that it is not a question of All Sis P, but a much simpler one, the existence or non-existence of unicorns. It is thus clear that in ignoring meaning and context we work in vacuo, and in making an unnatural divorce between form and subject-matter we are driven to an abstractness of expression which cannot be, by virtue of its abstractness, applied to concrete cases. The marvel is, that this study is retained at the Universities, where the Ptolemaic astronomy and mediæval physics have long been abandoned for post-renaissance science.

Mr. Carveth Read, in a passage which is quoted in this volume, observes in his Logic that: "A man who reasons deliberately manages it better after studying logic than he could before—if he tries to, and if he has not a perverse liking for sophistry, and if he has the sense to know when formalities are out of place." The reader is referred to p. 336 sqq. to learn how Mr. Sidgwick meets this statement; we quote it because it illustrates both the weakness and strength of formal logic. Who is foolish enough to question that a training in formal logic will not do some good? To those who know nothing of modern chemistry, a course of lectures in phlogiston—granting that a series of lectures on a non-entity is conceivable—would undoubtedly give training for the mind. What, however, we are concerned to know is whether this way of learning to think is not arbitrary and unnecessarily technical? Why should not a student be encouraged to set about the detection of error in his own way? Let him begin by analysing at first something quite easy, a speech by a Cabinet Minister, a popular saying, an epigram, and when he is more or less competent to deal with the class-name, and with simple inferences, he might pass on to the examination of Mr. Bernard Shaw's prefaces, to Mr. Herbert Spencer's and Mr. Leslie Stephen's writings, and other works in which appeal is constantly made to the reason. The strength of the formal position is that, once admit the right of the student to bring all his knowledge and thought to bear on the assertion itself as well as on the form of the sentence, then logic as an independent technical science disappears. Although Mr. Sidgwick states the case against formal logic with most convincing arguments, yet he seems to cling to a "compromise"—to believe, that is, that logic as a science for helping us to detect error could still be clearly delimited from other purely scientific and mathematical provinces of knowledge. The only way of retaining logic as a separate technical study is to keep it as formal as possible; and refusal to budge from this position shows a natural cunning on the part of the logicians which the practice of their profession would not lead us to expect. Whether, however, we are formalists with Dr. Keynes, or anti-formalists with Mr. Sidgwick, a few more volumes built up as skilfully as the present will bring out the loss and gain in the orthodox and highly artificial method of developing the logical faculty.

Other New Books.

IMPERIAL LONDON. BY ARTHUR H. BEAVAN.

This is a book about London, of the old-fashioned, plodding, pleasant sort. It can hardly be called superfluous, because although such books greatly abound, many of them are quite out of date. Mr. Beavan's book takes after Charles Knight's London, the same general classification being used; instead of a topographical progress through the town, such as Thornbury adopts in his Old and New London, we have chapters on various aspects of London; as, for example, "Official, Legislative, and Diplomatic London," "Legal London," "Mercantile London," "Literary, Artistic, and Scientific London." Each of these aspects is dealt with more or less completely—less in the case of "Journalistic London," this chapter resolving itself into an account of the Daily Telegraph. Such books as this are useful and entertaining in their way. They may or may not give you the fact you want. Mr. Beavan's book would be an admirable gift to a young man newly arrived in London, though it will not do anything to form his literary style. The pages are sown with small inelegances. You have a paragraph beginning: "Still more peculiar a region is a thoroughfare leading to the Waterloo-road"; and crude observations like this: "Delightful bits for any artists of the Herbert Railton order." Mr. Beavan is of those who must prefix the adverb "literally" to unsuitable verbs. If a street swarms with poor people, he writes "literally swarms." Why literally? But we grant the difficulty of sustaining an elegant style in a work such as this, in which a fragment of Roman Wall and the dead-meat market on Christmas Eve rank as "sights" of London. We can testify to Mr. Beavan's industry and general accuracy. He seems to have collected much of his information at first hand, and hence some of it is decidedly fresh. Mr. Beavan speaks of the marching of the Grenadier Guards to the Bank of England every evening as a thing of the past. "They now come by train to the Bank." Here Mr. Beavan is either inaccurate or very up-to-date, for we have seen the Grenadiers in Queen Victoria-street rather recently. A word of praise should be given to the externals of the volume, which, from the scarlet cover to the type, are bold and handsome. (Dent. 12s. 6d.)

BELGIUM AND THE BELGIANS. BY CYRIL SCUDAMORE.

The purpose of this very good, well-informed, and readable book is not (as Mr. Scudamore says) that of a guide-book. The guide-book we have with us always, manifold and mostly excellent. The design is rather to supply information about the humanity of the country, which the guide-book omits, than about the topography of the country, in which the guide-book is strong. We are told about the government of the land, its education and religious bodies, its military system (one of the most miniature in Europe, as is well known), its political parties, which are important, strongly marked, and of more than Belgian interest; its folk-lore, its towns, and its aspect as a holiday-ground.

Probably the name of no foreign country so unremote and familiar conveys so vague a notion to the untravelled Englishman as Belgium. Say. "Flanders," and at once he has certain definite, if not very modern, associations, derived from history and yet more from romance. But Belgium he scarce realises to be mainly Flanders. Even when he grasps it as Flanders, he thinks only of broad, flat, fair fields, intersected with water-courses, with frequent towns; and broad, flat, fair faces, with thick-set figures.

But besides this typical Flemish humanity, there is the Walloon race, tall, dark, lithe, black and bright-eyed, resembling the southern Spaniard, and probably of kindred pre-Aryan origin (like the dark Welshman); or, yet again

Digitized by Google

(and these are the majority) less dark, and of Celtic race. Their tongue is Celtic-Latin; their beauties, frail, dark-eyed, animated, contrast with the fair-skinned, soft-eyed Flemish girl, and her brown, clustering locks. Nay, even your true Fleming is of two types: besides the broad shouldered, not over-tall, round-faced man, with high cheek-bones and large nose, whom we think of when we say Fleming," there is a long-faced man, with long, straight nose, and tall figure. The women dress nearly as well as Frenchwomen, the poorer girls making their own dresses with excellent taste. In Bruges, on market-days, you may still see the short, striped skirt and coloured head-dress of the last century, nor is the wooden shoe yet extinct in the Flemish parts of Belgium. All this, with the adherence of the Flemings to their ancient repute for copious drinking, and much more of great interest, you may learn from Mr. Scudamore's pages. (Blackwood. 6s.)

WAGNER, BAYREUTH, AND THE FESTIVAL PLAYS. BY FRANCES GERARD.

This small volume, by the lady who is already known as the historian of that strange, unfortunate, semi-poet on a throne, Ludwig II. of Bavaria, Wagner's patron, who alone made Bayreuth (the Wagnerian Bayreuth) possible, comes out with timely promptitude to catch visitors to the Wagner Festival at Bayreuth just beginning. It opens with a history of Bayreuth itself, not forgetting the White Lady (a genuine orthodox White Lady of the typical ancient kind) of the little Neue Schloss. In due sequence come chapters on the Festival Playhouse, the "Niebelungen Lied," and Wagner's musical setting of it, "Parsifal," and the legend of the Holy Grail as it appears in the old romances or myths. It is a very useful introduction to the whole subject, and will be found by the average Pilgrim to Bayreuth just the thing he wants. Written in a popular and easy style, its chief defect is a too feminine emotionality and strain after the picturesque—a touch of "gush," in fact, though of the modern order, plentifully bestuck with artistic and poetic trimmings. This, though we could cheerfully spare it, will, doubtless, make for general acceptability. (Jarrold. 3s. 6d.)

THE STORY OF BOOKS. BY GERTRUDE B. RAWLINGS.

This little volume belongs to "The Library of Useful Stories," and is a good specimen of the popularisation of literature. It deals chiefly with the history of modern books—understanding by the term "modern" the period from the Middle Ages onward. Indeed, with early printing the book ends, save for a chapter on bookbinding, and one on the production of books (from a technical standpoint) at the present day. Facsimiles of pages from some of the most famous early books add to the interest of the volume. Among these is an exquisite page from the famous Irish Book of Kells, one of the most beautiful decorative books ever produced, a treasure and treasury of labour, fine taste, fancy, and skill. Not so much can be said of Caxton or his follower, Wynkyn de Worde; whose productions are merely rare and curious as examples of the first printing-press in England. One rude cut, from Caxton's Catho, of boys learning their grammar, is a curious picture of the truly awful sway exercised by a mediæval teacher. The unhappy scholars, so far as one can discern from the illustration, are reciting their lesson humbly on their knees; while the master sits royally in his chair, with uplifted admonitory finger, and in his right hand the birch—a goodly birch, of the proportions of a besom—reposes sceptre-wise on his shoulder. No pupil but must behold and tremble. The second chapter gives extraordinary details on the grossly indifferent treatment of books in many monasteries—chiefly Eastern—which had fallen from their pristine literary activity, and the curious recoveries of MSS. from the base uses to which they had sunk.

An unpretending and efficient little book. (Newnes. 1s.)

MEMORIALS OF THE DUTTONS, OF DUTTON IN CHESHIRE.

This very handsome and bulky volume has been prepared at the instance of Lord Sherborne, and gives the history of one of the chief and oldest Cheshire families, from the Conquest to 1784, including the branches in Gloucestershire and elsewhere. It has sixteen portraits and other illustrations, with four folding-pedigrees. Among other curious and interesting matter, the book contains elaborate details, from contemporary depositions, of two famous duels—that between Sir Hatton Cheke and Sir Thomas Dutton, on Calais Sands (which Carlyle has described), and the great duel between Lord Mohun and the Duke of Hamilton (who was also Baron of Dutton), immortalised by Thackeray in Esmond. A valuable and interesting compilation. (Sotheran. £2 2s. net.)

BIRD WATCHING. BY EDMUND SELOUS.

It would be impossible to write a dull book on this subject—the birds themselves would see to that—and Mr. Selous has written quite an interesting one, although we fancy it is much too long. Its results could have been concentrated into smaller compass, with no loss, but rather gain, of effect. Since M. Maeterlinck has shown us what can be done in studying the bee, we could wish that Mr. Selous had dived deeper into the domestic economy of some of his friends. He is too diffuse, too much dispersed over the whole feathered world, and he is too fond of his little jokes. Here is a specimen of Mr. Selous's descriptive manner:

> The way in which the male cormorant makes love to the female is as follows. Either at once from where he stands, or after first waddling a step or two, he makes an impressive jump or hop towards her, and stretching his long neck straight up, or even a little backwards, he at the same time throws back his head so that it is in one line with it, and opens his beak rather widely. In a second or so he closes it, and then he opens and shuts it again several times in succession, rather more quickly. Then he sinks forward with his breast on the rock, so that he lies all along it, and fanning out his small stiff tail, bends it over his back, whilst at the same time stretching his head and neck backwards towards it till, with his beak, he sometimes seizes and apparently plays with the feathers. In this attitude he may remain for some seconds, more or less, having all the while a languishing or ecstatic expression, after which he brings his head forward again, and then repeats the performance some three or four, or, perhaps, half-a-dozen times. This would seem to be the full courting display, the complete figure, so to speak, but it is not always fully gone through.

We wish that more students of bird-life would leave their homes armed only with binoculars. The illustrations of this book, which is one of the "Haddon Hall" series, are excellent. (Dent. 7s. 6d. net.)

BRITISH TREES. BY THE HON. STANHOPE TOLLEMACHE.

This is a disappointing book. Considering the skill with which photographs can now be reproduced for the purposes of illustration it is practically a failure; for many of these plates give only the shape of the tree and help one not at all to the character of its leaves. The notes accompanying the illustrations are very brief. Altogether we are sorry to have to condemn it as insufficiently considered. (Sampson Low. 14s. net.)

FLOWERS AND GARDENS. BY FORBES WATSON.

Mr. Watson died in 1869, at the age of twenty-nine—an age difficult to believe, when one looks upon the portrait that serves as frontispiece to this book; and the present work was published a year or so after his death. It has now been republished, in response to the current craving for works on flowers; and we are glad that it has, for its pages contain some thoughtful and beautiful writing. The author, who was a doctor by profession, was a botanist rather than a gardener, and a lover of flowers before all. One flower meant as much to him as many, and this book consists practically of a series of meditations on single flowers, the peculiar beauty and character of each being unfolded by the writer. If Mr. Watson reminds us of any one, it is Ruskin—not so much in style as in method. Canon Ellacombe prefaces the book very gracefully. (Lane. 5s. net.)

Digitized by Google

GREAT BATTLES OF THE WORLD. BY STEPHEN CRANE.

The late Stephen Crane's surprising analysis of the passion of war, in his Red Badge of Courage, and other stories, led an American editor to commission him to write the descriptions of certain historic contests. This book is the result. It is not Mr. Crane at his best; indeed, it is hardly Mr. Crane at all. The writing has spirit, and a very fair general impression of the character of each battle is imparted, because Mr. Crane was a good journalist who could execute orders; but his peculiar quality, his psychological intensity, is lacking; nor, in fact, could it well be present, in accordance with the historical scheme of the work. (Chapman and Hall. 6s.)

The compilation of The Harrow School Register, of which a second edition, brought up to date, has just been issued by Messrs. Longmans, was a work of more difficulty than might be supposed, owing to the different degrees of clearness and completeness attained by successive headmasters in keeping the lists. Byron's headmaster, Dr. Drury, entered only the surnames, whereas Dr. Longley improved on him by giving the names in full, and adding notes. Dr. Wordsworth did still better, and from Dr. Vaughan's time the lists have been admirably kept. The names of more than 1,000 boys who have joined the school since 1893 are added in this edition. The following entry under Easter—Midsummer, 1801, will interest our readers:

> BYRON, GEORGE GORDON, LORD (Drurics and Mr. Evans') son of Capt. J. Byron. Succ. as 6th Baron, 1798; Monitor, 1804; left, 1805; the Poet; in 1805 he arranged a cricket match, the teams for which were principally composed of past and present Etonians and Harrovians respectively, and this was undoubtedly the origin of the Eton and Harrow matches. Died at Missolonghi April 19th, 1824.

Mr. R. Courtney Welch edited the first edition. Mr. M. G. Daugleish edits the second.

Mr. Murray has been re-issuing his students' histories. Following new and improved editions of the well-known Greece and Rome, we now have a new and enlarged edition of the History of English Literature (7s. 6d.), first drawn up by Mr. Thomas B. Shaw. The book has been re-written completely, and of course revised in the light of the latest research. The second chapter, on Chaucer, has been written by Prof. W. P. Ker. The book closes with a three-page account of Stevenson. We do not think that any safer or more complete manual of its kind exists.

The French Stonehenge (Bemrose), by Mr. T. Cato Worsfold, is a learned, and at the same time inspiring, little account of the great ruins at Carnac and in the islands of the Morbihan Archipelago. Particularly interesting are his statements showing how these dateless stones still influence the Breton peasantry, either through legend or in the actualities of life. Thus, the great "Dolmen des Marchands," near Locmariaquer, is full of curious tracery, and the same form of decoration is still to be found on the dresses worn by women on feast days.

Fiction.

Sister Teresa. By George Moore. (Unwin. 6s.)

As the author admits in his prefatory note, this is not a novel. It is only a continuation, a part, of Evelyn Innes, and though it is by far the best part of Evelyn Innes, one experiences a difficulty in reviewing it separately from the rest of the book. The time to review will be when the two parts, further shortened, are issued together. Sister Teresa narrates how Evelyn Innes, after a febrile and tempestuous career of art and pleasure, takes the veil in a Passionist convent at Wimbledon. The great merit of the book, overshadowing all minor merits and all defects, springs once more from Mr. Moore's singular and intense faculty of putting himself into a character, and of "getting up" the details of an environment. He has done it before, in Esther Waters, and particularly in A Mummer's Wife, but we do not think that he has ever succeeded more completely than in Sister Teresa. The nun, the convent, are realised for us in an almost absolute sense. There is more than the artistic presentment of an array of picturesque facts, there is an edifice of spiritual, innermost vitality reared upon the factual basis. The characters seldom open their mouths without uttering what we feel they must have uttered. Thus, when the aged Prioress first addresses Evelyn as Teresa, she says: "I felt I should like to call you Teresa, and you will prove yourself worthy of the name, my dear child." And one can hear the Prioress using precisely those phrases. This Prioress is the dominating individuality of the book, and the author in portraying her has many touches of pure insight. Meditating on Evelyn's grief and unsettlement, "the Prioress remembered the great relief that the mere putting on of the habit brings to the soul; and she rose from her knees quite determined" that Evelyn should be allowed to take the veil.

It is this stark imaginative power which alone gives the book its sanction; but the book has other qualities, less intrinsic, yet not to be ignored. The whole conception is coloured by a profound appreciation of beauty. In order to perceive how much of sheer beauty the book contains, one should read a masterpiece of a different sort, Diderot's La Religieuse, equally true, equally convincing, but repellent, bitter, and inexpressibly sinister. Two pictures of conventual life could scarcely be more at variance than these, yet the facts, save for a few gross details, are the same in each; there is the same pettiness, paltriness, hair-splitting, hysteria, arid ritualism. The difference arises partly from Mr. Moore's continual effort after sympathetic comprehension, and partly from his determination to find beauty. And let us say that the honest search for beauty is always rewarded. The book is pervaded by a melancholy sense of the beautiful. This is especially true of the conclusion. Immediately before the end, one is sure that Evelyn will die; one sees no other end than this sad end; but Mr. Moore discloses an end still sadder.

Evelyn Innes showed the inception of a development in the author's style of writing. In Sister Teresa the development is continued. Mr. Moore is still ungrammatical, and loose in his constructions, and he has even lost some of his former force; but he has acquired a mellowness and a curious, wistful, chant-like quality which are very persuasive. One is struck again and again by the fitness and charm of his similes; the writing abounds in similes. Here is one:

> "Does another quest lie before me?" She tried to stifle the thought, but it cried across her life like a curlew across waste lands.

We think there are traces everywhere of a certain affectation of Celticism. Mr. Moore's recently-found Celtic aspirations are, of course, notorious; he has not succeeded in keeping them out of his novel. There is a passage on p. 66: "He must go with her to the pure country, to the woods and to the places where the invisible ones whom the Druids knew," etc. "Wandering in the woods and underneath the boughs, we shall know that the great immortal presences are by us," etc.—which annoys us, because it seems so obviously a homage ineffectively paid to Mr. W. B. Yeats. We do not believe that Mr. Moore's enchanted eyes

Digitized by Google

Have seen immortal, mild, proud shadows walk.

And we regard it as an indiscretion on his part to try to re-write Mr. Yeats's poetry in prose. If he will remain merely Mr. Moore, novelist pure and simple, we shall be content.

King's End. By Alice Brown. (Constable.)

We care not who knows that we have read Miss (?) Brown's book with a great deal of pleasure. There is room for stories dealing with the rural types of America in the admirable manner of Miss Mary E. Wilkins, and this is a good one.

Here are the Elder and paralysed Mrs. Horner:

> The Elder stopped on the threshold, and her eyes met his in a fiery volley.
>
> "Woman," he said, not with authority, but an appealing kindliness, "arise and walk!"
>
> Mrs. Horner gave an inarticulate snort, full of rage and wretchedness.
>
> "Don't you call me woman!' she retorted. "I've told ye that afore."

Here is Big Joan, with a crucifix at her neck and St. Joseph in her pocket:

> The heifer was not Joan's business, nor, since he rejected her counsel, was he. So she gave a glance at the moon, quite as if she were on equal terms with it, [and] remarked, "Nice, ain't it? Light as cork!" and returned to the house.

Here is Nancy, in the last stage of her religious enthusiasm, in conversation with the man who cured her:

> But Nancy shivered back to her grief. "I have committed the unpardonable sin," she repeated.
>
> "That's all right. Just like you, too! You wouldn't be contented with arson or murder; no makeshifts for a girl like you!"

And here, finally, is Martin once more with the spirited little old lady who was his mother:

> "Martin," said she, quite humbly, offering her trumpet, "you ain't up to anything you couldn't let your father know, now be you?"
>
> He was about to put her jeeringly off, according to their mutual habit of play; but suddenly he became aware that this was not tyranny calling from her eyes. It was a quivering apprehension. He spoke gently into the tube: "Now, mother, you just treat me as if I was a white man! I'm as good as you are."
>
> The little old lady sighed. "You ain't got anyways tangled up with that creatur'?" she insisted.
>
> "I just took her for a ride. I had to, didn't I, to plague you, after you'd been cross to her? Now, mother, you be a decent old lady, and I'll have Nancy writing her name with a J before Thanksgiving."

She was, and he did. And the stages by which he mastered her are here recorded, together with some other actions and passions of which King's End was the theatre.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

A Woman Alone. By Mrs. W. K. Clifford.

This volume contains three stories, by the author of Aunt Anne. The longest, which fills two-thirds of the book, is the tale of an unhappy marriage. The man should never have married, and, having discovered his mistake, he disappears for years. The end is tragic. One of the other stories is concerned with some of the subsidiary characters of the longer story. (Methuen. 6s.)

A Great Lady. By Adeline Sergeant.

Anthony Scholes, a musician, was engaged to go to Kenwardine Castle in the Highlands to teach Isabel Stanton, still in the schoolroom, music. There the story, bright and readable, moving in high circles, passes. Lady Altonbury wishes Erminia to marry Captain Cartaret, heir to a dukedom, with estates in three counties, and a rent-roll of, at least, fifty thousand a year. "You were cut out for a great lady's rôle, Erminia, it is your métier, and a great lady you must be." "Must I?" (Methuen. 6s.)

John Topp: Pirate. By Weatherby Chesney.

Adventures by sea. The first chapter is of school days and yarning sailors, but with p. 42 we reach a low-roofed parlour in Wapping, "with a gnarled old ship-master, whom we found drinking strong ale with a toast in it, and crunching raw onions as though they were aromatic sweetmeats.

"'Want to go to sea, eh?' he growled. 'Well, it's a dog's life at first.'" And so on. (Methuen. 6s.)

Bergen Worth. By Wallace Lloyd.

About a village blacksmith "who endeavoured to realise the ideal of the Christ life." The story opens in Chicago during the railway riots of 1894. One of the blacksmith's speeches is given at length, and we are told that the audience "were spellbound by his wonderful enthusiasm, electrified by earnestness and intensity. . . . The words came from the depth of his soul and went to theirs." (Unwin. 6s.)

Quincy Adams Sawyer. By C. F. Pidgin.

A novel of New England home life, which, according to report, has had a large sale in America. It contains, by way of frontispiece, a large, delightful map of the village where the story is laid. In a preface the author, after stating that "the heroes of English novels are nearly all dukes, marquises, earls, or barons," remarks: "I see no reason why the heroes of American novels, barring the single matter of hereditary titles, should not compare favourably as regards gentlemanly attributes with their English cousins across the sea." (Unwin. 6s.)

Her Grace's Secret. By Violet Tweedale.

From Chapter I.: "The old Duke of Glenroy stood looking out upon the peaceful scene, though the roar of the traffic in the Champs Elysées was still very audible to him." From Chapter II.: "Lord Arlington sat in his room in the great rambling family mansion known to the world of London as Glenroy House." From Chapter XVI.: "A night or two before the great ball which was to wind up the season at Glenroy House, Arlington was sitting talking to Lilah, Princess Carolin, in her dainty suite of rooms in Claridge's Hotel." (Hutchinson. 6s.)

The Broad Road That Stretches. By Cecil Hartley.

Ten Adventures, with such titles as "The Adventure of the Embarrassed Gentleman"; "The Adventure of the Man Loaded with Mischief"; "The Adventure of the Confraternity of the Gay Science." It is written with some pretensions to style. Here is a passage: "All roads, except the known one, lead to the Delectable Land. Cudgel your brains for a moving discourse to thrill your Desdemona withal, and 'tis ten to one she will find her home affairs more engrossing." (Burleigh. 3s. 6d.)

Digitized by Google

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage, One Halfpenny, Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscription, prepaid (including postage) 17/6

„ Quarterly 5/0

„ Price for one issue /5

Concerning an Essayist.

MR. NIMMO has sent us two of Alexander Smith's books, A Summer in Skye and Dreamthorp. We do not know why he has done this, and the heat forbids any bustling inquiry. The first volume is issued without a date on its title-page, the second is dated 1888. Perhaps Mr. Nimmo is merely trying to communicate a thrill to old stock. It matters not; it is good old stock, and we are obliged to him. There will be no thrill; the London season is not yet over, and August is reserved for Mr. Hall Caine. Yet this is the psychological moment in which to publish books of wise and restful essays. Unhappily, the psychological moment for writing such essays does not seem to present itself in these days, when books are written by contract, and are engineered like Consols. Hence our gratitude for two volumes written by an author who died in 1867. All but fabulous date—what memories of swelling chignons and subsiding crinolines it stirs! In 1867 telegrams cost a shilling, postage stamps were red, maidservants talked of murders by the hour, and years were to elapse before Compulsory Education, discount on books, and Tit-Bits were to burst upon the country. In 1867 Robert Louis Stevenson entered Edinburgh University. The literary world conceive the difference! For our part, we did not then dream there was such an annexe to a world of sun and snow and sparrows. Yet in 1867 Alexander Smith died of literary over-work, in Edinburgh, at the age of 37.

That is a tragic age at which to die. A writer of any health may hope to live much longer. The impulsive, oft-renewed interests of the journalist make for length of days, if his life be fairly correct, and Smith's life was very correct. Born in rather humble circumstances, yet of good lineage (his mother was a Flora Macdonald, and belonged to the family of the Highland heroine), he was put to learn "pattern making." Spurning this, and pushing his intellectual way, he obtained in 1854 the secretaryship of Edinburgh University, on a salary of £150 a year. This was increased later to £200 a year by his acceptance of some additional work. A secretaryship worth £200 a year is exactly the stand-by which we would like the budding literateur to secure in these days; but, too often, he is found resigning a comfortable post in order to "take definitely to literature." A serious mistake. Smith stuck to his routine, which, however, tended to grow more irksome. A certain inability on the part of the authorities to distinguish with nicety between the duties proper to be performed by a poet-secretary and those assignable to a hall porter did not add to the pleasantness of his life. But he had an easy disposition and a good wife. Every summer the whole family went off to Skye, where Smith looked about him with seeing eyes, and talked with shepherds and crofters on the hills until these lonely men came to love his re-appearance. Meanwhile he had become a poet, and a selling poet. Ten thousand of his Life Drama sold within a year of publication. With Sydney Dobell he wrote sonnets on the Crimean War. His derivations were from Keats and Tennyson, and they were so clear that he had to fight for his literary character. Forster, of the Examiner, was one of his backers, and a eulogy of his drew a passing remark from Matthew Arnold in one of his early letters. As a poet, Smith was killed by a phrase. No, not killed, only scotched, for we hear that a new edition of his poems is even now being prepared. The unwearying benevolence of our generation no sooner perceives that an author has missed immortality than it confers on him the alms of republication.

The phrase was "Spasmodic." Smith was the head of the "Spasmodic School" of poetry. Curiously enough, the coiner of this phrase, Professor Aytoun, was the man who advised Smith to try his hand on the less exacting and more lucrative work of journalism and magazine writing. He told him that he could help him with Blackwood, and he was as good as his word. But Smith was soon caught in the whirlpool of petty, paying journalism, so that even Blackwood was neglected for newspapers whose files can only be found in Edinburgh and at the British Museum. It was on this obscure but serviceable work that Alexander Smith wore himself away. In the process he enjoyed life, and was himself enjoyable, being a man of great goodness of heart, simplicity, and kindliness. But the needs of his family and an ardent temperament led him to abuse his strength. There was a peculiarity about his breakdown. Outwardly, and in his usual feelings, he remained a man of almost burly health. His cheek was not wasted, nor his eyes sunken; nor did bilious attacks ensure his safety by their recurrence. But he suffered from queer nervous delusions. He would suddenly lose the feeling of support on the ground and tremble for his balance. He made no secret of these curious feelings, and his friends chaffed him about them. If a man in apparently rude health tells you that as he walked up the Cannon-gate he felt that thoroughfare sink beneath him, and that he had to jump into a cab to make sure that he was on terra firma, you would smile. Smith's friends smiled until he was announced to be seriously ill. Typhoid and diphtheria had conspired to overthrow him, and, in spite of the best Edinburgh medical attention, they prevailed.

Not long before his death Alexander Smith had produced the two books by which he is, perhaps, best known to-day—his Dreamthorp, a book of essays, and his Summer in Skye, a book of impressionist topography. There are still people who keep Dreamthorp on their shelves and quietly swear by it. Robert Louis Stevenson has somewhere left on record his indebtedness to the Summer in Skye. In truth, they are pleasant books, and particularly in mid July. Riding on an omnibus along Oxford-street the other day, with the brass balustrade of a preceding Bayswater omnibus burning persistently in our view, and with bonnetted horses pounding past in the intolerable glare and heat, we opened the Summer in Skye, and cooled our eyes on the sentence in which, after a fine description of Edinburgh, Smith sketches what is to follow:

> Our course will lead us by ancient battlefields, by castles standing in hearing of the surge; by the bases of mighty mountains, along the wanderings of hollow glens; and, if the weather holds, we may see the keen ridges of Blaavin and the Cuchullin hills; listen to a legend old as Ossian, while sitting on the broken stairs of the castle of Duntulm, beaten for centuries by the salt lake and the wind; and in the pauses of ghostly talk in the long autumn nights, when the rain is on the hills, we may hear—more wonderful than any legend, carrying you away to misty regions and half-forgotten times—the music which haunted the Berserkers of old, the thunder of the northern sea!

How pleasant were our glimpses, in Oxford-street, of the bay of Uig, and of Minch and Harris, rising like blue clouds on the horizon; of the Cuchullin hills, pale in the morning, purple in the evening; of queer little fishing hamlets, infrequent steamboats; and brief squalls in which the rain advanced over loch and moorland like a wall of water. Nor does Smith fail us with his human types—John Kelly, the lonely, irascible shepherd who drank whiskey, silently, by the bottle; Lachlan, the crofter of Dunsciach, whose merry wit secured him the prettiest partners in a dance even in middle age; Angus-with-the dogs, who was never seen without his gun and two terriers, and was "continually passing over the country like the shadow of a cloud." We do not wonder that Stevenson loved a book filled with these silent people and peopled silences.

Digitized by Google

The relation between A Summer in Skye and Dreamthorp seems to us very interesting. Dreamthorp is a book of essays on familiar essay subjects: on "The Writing of Essays," "Death and Dying," "Men of Letters," "The Importance of a Man to Himself," "Vagabonds," etc. Of the two, it is the better-known product of Smith's pen. As we have said, there are people who are very fond of Dreamthorp. Our own opinion is that it is less successful than the Skye book. Smith was sufficiently matured to describe with charm and point his travels in the Hebrides, but not sufficiently matured to write at large about life. Writing at large about life is your essayist's rôle, and one indispensable condition of his success is that he shall be an adult. Now, a man is not a mental adult until he is forty. Only at forty is his mind brought to that fulness and "set" which give to his lightest opinions the air of personal finality, which, along with other qualities, is so necessary to their endurance. The very fact that the essayist undertakes to talk at large about life makes it imperative that amid so much liberty and whim we shall see a grown mind at work. It is not orthodoxy or accuracy that is needed, but ripeness, colour. To talk at large about life, a man must have found himself. A matured man is interesting. One can refer his very absurdities back to the world that has moulded him to what he is. But a youth on the hearthrug is insufferable. Take up Montague, Lamb, Hazlitt, and in their lightest expatiations you will find we know not what stamp of adultness. None of these began to talk at large about life until they were forty. La Bruyère published his Caractères at the age of forty-three. Stevenson, on the other hand, wrote his essays in his thirties, and we suppose that we shall be reproached if we suggest that with all their charm and radiance and grace of style they are yet wanting in that adultness, that quiet plantigrade force which, we say, is one of the essentials of the perfect essay. Goethe said of Byron: "The moment he begins to reflect he is a child." Well, Byron died at thirty-six. His powers of reflection were certainly not those of a child; they were prodigious in their activity and daring, and they produced hundreds of observations which serve reflecting men to-day. But his were not co-ordinated reflections, or, rather, they were co-ordinated by nothing more authoritative than his own progressing mind. Yet he was maturing rapidly. From youth we must expect only the wisdom which is captured as beauty. Keats and Shelley were not prodigies in that they were young: for they captured truth only as beauty.

The noticeable thing about Dreamthorp is that it just misses the sanction of maturity. Many of its pages are full of charm, you may call them memorable if you will, but they want this quality which Shelley, Keats, and Byron did not live to need, but which is the very charter of the great essayists. There is a whole corpus of thoughts, methods of thought, devices of expression and what not, which are characteristic of those who prematurely talk at large about life. In Dreamthorp, written when Smith was thirty-three, they are not so patent as in the regular amateur essay. But they are there all the same, those unmistakable traces of pap. We will not search for the clearest examples, but will take two passages nearly at random, and on them risk our judgment. The first is from "Death and Dying."

> Death is the ugly fact which nature has to hide, and she hides it well. Human life were otherwise an impossibility. The pantomime runs on merrily enough; but when once Harlequin lifts his vizor, Columbine disappears, the jest is frozen on the Clown's lips, and the hand of the filching Pantaloon is arrested in the act. Wherever death looks, there is silence and trembling. But although on every man he will one day or another look, he is coy of revealing himself till the appointed time. He makes his approaches like an Indian warrior, under covers and ambushes. We have our parts to play, and He remains hooded till they are played out. We are agitated by our passions, we busily pursue our ambitions, we are acquiring money or reputation, and all at once, in the centre of our desires, we discover the "Shadow feared of man." And so nature fools the poor human mortal evermore. When she means to be deadly, she dresses her face in smiles; when she selects a victim, she sends him a poisoned rose. There is no pleasure, no shape of good fortune, no form of glory in which death has not hid himself, and waited silently for his prey.

Does the reader not perceive in these carefully sustained and, so to speak, gracefully eked out sentences, with their familiar generalities, the mark of the man of thirty-three who is not yet ready to talk at large about life? A young writer is not able to put sufficient thought into a page. He is not full enough, not strong enough; and even if he have wisdom and information and thoughts to play with, he cannot command that tone of the ripened man that goes home. Our second passage is of a very familiar type, and occurs in "A Shelf in my Bookcase." It refers to Boswell's Life of Johnson:

> This book has arrested, as never book did before, time and decay. Bozzy is really a wizard: he makes the sun stand still. Till his work is done, the future stands respectfully aloof. Out of ever-shifting time he has made fixed and permanent certain years, and in these Johnson talks and argues, while Burke listens, and Reynolds takes snuff, and Goldsmith, with hollowed hand, whispers a sly remark to his neighbour. There have they sat, these ghosts, for seventy years now, looked at and listened to by the passing generations; and there they still sit, the one voice going on! Smile at Boswell as we may, he was a spiritual phenomenon quite as rare as Johnson. More than most he deserves our gratitude. Let us hope that when next Heaven sends England a man like Johnson, a companion and listener like Boswell will be provided. The Literary Club sits for ever. What if the Mermaid were in like eternal session, with Shakespeare's laughter ringing through the fire and hail of wit!

On this we will only remark that if we were to offer a prize for the best essay on the same subject we should expect to find a passage of this kind in sixty per cent. of the essays sent to us. The device is not at all objectionable; but young essayists, and old men who take to essay writing, wallow in it. Talking too much at large himself (and without the sanction which he urges on others) the present writer has exhausted his space, and has almost certainly done some little injustice to Alexander Smith. This brave and genial man had but thirty-seven years in which to know life and write about it, and he did sound work. A young writer will do well to make his acquaintance, and keep it.

Digitized by Google

Things Seen.

Progress.

On three sides the heather sweeps up to the walls of the little inn, but on the fourth a narrow strip has been fenced off from the moorland, and in the middle of it stands a flaring notice-board, lettered hideously in red and yellow, "Nonpareil Beer-Garden." The garden is represented by two bare grass-plots marked off with white stones, four starveling laurels in tubs (one at each corner), and under the laurels four trestle tables with rude wooden benches.

Here, one summer morning, I lounged on a seat under the notice-board, and looked lazily across the heather, dark and bright with racing cloud-shadows, down to the city, that was only a blur of smoke, with the gilded vane of a spire shining through. The proprietor, an apple-cheeked old gentleman, with grey hair and very bright eyes, brought out a tray and glasses and we drifted into conversation.

No, he didn't find it lonely up here. There were always visitors coming up from the town, and then he read a great deal. Two penny weekly papers he shared with a neighbour, and he took in a halfpenny daily besides. That was the way to pass the time. "Why, this garden, now," he said, looking round proudly; "I got the idea of it from reading about those cafés on the Continent. It's been a big success, I tell you. Next year I'll plant more laurels, and I'm thinking of buying a gramophone—I'm for progress, I am"—he wound up, emphatically. I looked at the ricketty tables and the shrivelled laurels, and then out beyond them, to the miles of waving heather with the moorfowl wheeling and crying in the sunshine—and I wondered.

Sentiment.

The last rattle of the train died away in the distance, and I stepped down the hill, drawing in great breaths of the keen salt air. In front the land rose and fell in long monotonous ridges, the roadside poplars were warped and stunted, and the long lines of telegraph wires running down to the cable station thrummed mournfully overhead.

The big raw-boned farmer who was my guide strode on ahead, flinging back an occasional remark over his shoulder. His conversation was all of crops and prices, of a horse he had bought for twenty pounds: shrewd and intelligent as far as it went, but certainly narrow. In practical affairs I knew him to be capable and resolute, one of a race of notable agriculturists, but of any trace of sentiment or romance I judged him guiltless. And then in the dusk we came to the little cemetery. It stood on a spit of land that ran far out to sea, and seemed in the half-light to be deserted and uncared for. Long rows of gulls perched solemnly on the mouldering tombstones, and the big rollers sweeping in beat noisily on the wall, drenching the seaward graves in showers of spray.

Here were buried the heroes of the countryside; the men who had plucked the land back from the jaws of the sea, who had turned the sandhills into cornfields, drained the marshes, and beaten back, inch by inch, the invading waves. My companion paused for a moment over a battered inscription: "He was drowned trying to save his lambs in the big gale of '81," he said slowly; another had driven a road across the big swamp near the railway station; a third, who lay beside him, had turned thirty acres of sand and heather into a thriving farm—and recounting these simple histories, there was a thrill in his voice I had not heard before.

As we turned to go, he laid a hand on my arm and pointed back: "As if they were alive," he whispered. Following his glance, I saw the ordered lines of tombstones, drawn up like soldiers on parade, all facing the sea.

The Fallow Fields of Fiction.

III.

In previous articles we have attempted to show that much of modern life is ignored by the novelist, who, pre-occupied with love-affairs, persists in wholly disregarding the organic existence of communities, and we have given an illustration, in the shape of a brief description of an imaginary story, called The Cathedral, of the sort of novel, dealing with life in the communal mass, which might be written, but is not written—at any rate in England. Lest that illustration may be considered too grandiose and exceptional to rank as a fair average example (we admit that it is almost unique), we propose now to give one or two other instances of rich life-ore from which a new fiction might be "got" by any novelist who does not deem himself bound to do nothing that has not been done before.

We were going through a famous park a few weeks since, and the road, leaving the park, ascended to a high bridge, and gave a surprisingly sudden view of the London and North Western main line. To the right, the quadruple "way," proudly styled "permanent," stretched for a thousand yards in an absolutely straight line to the next bridge, where it vanished on a curve: and the thousand yards looked like a hundred. To the left lay the station, a country-side station, but spacious and commanding, like everything on the North Western, specklessly clean, painfully in order—not a truck or a fire-bucket out of place. Four enamelled signs, white on a profound blue, proclaimed the legend, "Cheddington,' at distances mathematically calculated. As we looked on the complex and immense apparatus of rails and wires and posts and levers and platforms and granite chippings, lifeless, and apparently deserted in the fierce sunshine of the summer afternoon, the romance, the humanity, and the passions of a great railway system seemed to rise up and overwhelm us. We thought of Kipling's line, as essential truth:

Romance brought up the nine-fifteen.

We thought, too, of a little German frau whom we had once known, whose chief pride was that her husband, an Englishman, was a booking-clerk at Paddington. No one ever saw that husband, because he was always giving out tickets for the Thames Valley, Devonshire, and Wales. Imprisoned in a cabinet from morn till night, he selected with unerring precision magic bits of cardboard from hundreds of square holes, so that people, labelled with these, might be carried, like parcels, from one spot on the earth's surface to another. At night he went home to his loving wife, and during the day his wife walked about in the radiance reflected from his singular calling. And the curious, the interesting, thing is, that her acquaintances accepted her pride in this clerkship as justifiable and proper. It did give her a distinction lacking to other fraus of her status, and no one mentioned her without mentioning that her husband was a booking-clerk at Paddington. Here was another aspect of a great railway system. We thought, also, of the departures of the Scotch expresses from Euston in the last race to the north: twenty thousand pounds' worth of rolling-stock upstanding motionless till the second's-hand of the stationmaster's chronometer showed precisely, to the least infinitesimal fraction, ten o'clock; the calm and yet self-conscious step of the young engineer, in blue, with a bowler-hat, as he made his way to the engine and assumed command for those breathless journeys over the wise greybeard who had driven engines before he was born; the expectant hush, the final slam, whistle, and flag-waving, and then the slow and stately withdrawal from the precincts of the station. So that was the Scotch express! It was nothing after all! And yet what could be more impressive, romantic? Can one wonder that Reuter and the Central News followed it mile by mile, and as July advanced to August the record of its feats got nearer to the middle page of the newspaper, and the top of the column in that page? We thought, too, of a conversation we had had with a porter on a tiny branch line about the grand altercation between directors and men at Stockport, and with what a sad, shrewd air he gave up the men for lost. "The directors won't stand no nonsense." The directors—his accent as he spoke that word, with a kind of fearful pride in those terrible autocrats—his accent alone was worth a paragraph. And is not the whole system worth a novel, worth a whole school of novels? Despite the recent indictment by Mr. H. G. Wells, a railway corporation like the London and North Western represents the limit of modern powers of organisation. It is "made like a gun," disciplined like the British navy, and fifteen thousand pounds of net profit trickle into Euston every day! It glitters with the pride of life—it is as proud of itself as a girl in a new frock, or a certain regiment of Lancers. It is "crack." It throbs from end to end with "the human interest," you simply can't get away from humanity on a railway: Look into the cabin at the level crossing, where the venerable and maimed porter ends his days; look at the director's mansion, park, yacht, private car; look at the maiden lady at Cheltenham, whose happiness for the next twelve months depends on whether the company pays seven or seven-and-a-half! Crude contrasts, you say! Just so: a contrast cannot be too crude; the biggest effects are always crude. What we want is a little more crudeness and a little less fining and refining. Lord, give us plot: that is what the modern fashionable novelist should pray. We can fancy Providence directing him to a railway, and him protesting that there is no love in a railway system—as if Cupid was not seated on every signal-post! But of course he would not perceive these Cupids unless the General Manager fell in love with the signalman's daughter!

Digitized by Google

So much for railways. Take a parish council. We know a village which is dominated by a single landowner, a plain man, who, by inheritance and purchase, has added acre to acre till he farms, personally farms, a superficies of mother-earth three times the size of the City of London. He owns all the houses in the village, and he employs nearly all the men in the village, directly or indirectly. And yet he is such a very plain man that once when he asked us our profession he exclaimed, on our reply: "An author, what's that?" Now there was an election of the parish council in that village, eight seats and nine nominations. The great landlord was among the candidates. The milkman, the grocer, a little farmer, a horse-dealer, and three others were elected, and the great landlord was placed ninth. The thing was reported in three lines in the local newspaper. But what intense dramatic significance in that silent rebuke so effectively administered by the village to its lord! Can you not imagine him lying awake at night and trying to laugh off the unanswerable verdict of the ballot-box? If such things happen elsewhere, one may assume that they happen also in Wessex, and that Mr. Hardy knows of them. Yet none could guess from the noble series of Wessex novels that Wessex had any corporate life within its borders. Why should this be so? If any man asserts that corporate life is not a fit subject for fiction, we merely and flatly traverse the statement. We feel that it is, and we are convinced that, for example, the incident which we have briefly narrated contains the basis of an admirable short story; also that Balzac would have written that story had time and circumstances permitted. Go a step higher, and take the municipal life of an industrial town. If you wish to see a town alive, strenuously alive beneath a calm surface, see it immediately before the decennial assessment for local taxes. Then you will have glimpses of a thousand intrigues, knotted, interwoven, inexpressibly mixed, and all circling round the solitary and awful figure of the assessor. How difficult it is to believe, in these tense days, that the assessor is a human being like yourself; that he is not a sort of blind god! We remember the wind of rage and exasperation that roared through a town when it turned out that the assessment of the house of the assessor's brother had been lowered, while that of a precisely similar house next door was unaltered. And yet not a house-owner in the town—not a churchwarden, a local preacher, a magistrate, or Sunday-school superintendent—but had been ready to jeopardise his immortal soul if, by so doing, he could have got five pounds off his house or factory! If the principal aim of the novel should be, as it is, to show forth character under circumstances of drama, there are few phenomena that could surpass in suitability for it the assessment of property in a town that sends a Radical to Parliament.

We might roam further, and discover many more fallow-fields which await their tillage. But space forbids, and if we have not already said enough to prove our point, we could never prove it, and we have spoken in vain. Naturally, the literary superstition that a man ceases to be interesting when he ceases to be idle (in the ordinary sense of the word "idle"), and that the novelist must not follow him into the serious affairs of his life, the affairs which force him into this community or that, the affairs which will absorb him long after he has forgotten that he ever kissed a girl behind a haystack or said Bo! to another gander—this superstition will expire slowly. Still, we think it will expire.

In conclusion, let us repeat what we stated in our first article, namely, that we have no wish to deride Love, either as an activity of man or as a subject of the novelist's art. We think it is the best. But we emphatically demur to the proposition that Love is Life. It is a part of Life, and of most lives only a very small part.

E. A. B.

Do Readers Read?

THE above question is one that suggests itself from time to time, when the immense supply of literature and the attainments of the average man or woman happen to be presented to the mind at the same moment. Do people really read? And how much, and how well? These questions are considered in an interesting paper in the New York Critic, written by Mr. Arthur E. Bostwick, who supports his views by some rather extraordinary statistics. We have not space to print either the whole of his arguments or the whole of his figures; but the following portions of his article are interesting.

Those who are interested in the proper use of our libraries are asking continually, "What do readers read?" and the tables of class-percentages in the annual reports of those institutions show that librarians are at least making an attempt to satisfy these queries. But a question that is still more fundamental and quite as vital is: "Do readers read at all?" This is not a paradox, but a common-sense question, as the following suggestive little incident will show. The librarian-in-charge of a crowded branch circulating-library in New York City had occasion to talk, not long ago, to one of her "star" borrowers, a youth who had taken out his two good books a week regularly for nearly a year, and whom she had looked upon as a model—so much so that she had never thought it necessary to advise with him regarding his reading. In response to a question, this lad made answer somewhat as follows: "Yes, ma'am, I'm doing pretty well with my reading. I think I should get on nicely if I could only once manage to read a book through; but somehow I can't seem to do it." This boy had actually taken to his home nearly a hundred books, returning each regularly and borrowing another, without reading to the end of a single one of them.

Digitized by Google

That this case is not isolated and abnormal, but is typical of the way in which a large class of readers treat books, there is, as we shall see, only too much reason to believe.

The facts are peculiarly hard to get at. At first sight there would seem to be no way to find out whether the books that our libraries circulate have been read through from cover to cover, or only half through, or not at all. To be sure, each borrower might be questioned on the subject as he returned his book, but this method would be resented as inquisitorial, and, after all, there would be no certainty that the data so gathered were true. By counting the stamps on the library book-card or dating-slip we can tell how many times a book has been borrowed, but this gives us no information about whether it has or has not been read. Fortunately for our present purpose, however, many works are published in a series of volumes, each of which is charged separately, and an examination of the different slips will tell us whether or not the whole work has been read through by all those who borrowed it. If, for instance, in a two-volume work each volume has gone out twenty times, twenty borrowers either have read it through or have stopped somewhere in the second volume, while if the first volume is charged twenty times and the second only fourteen, it is certain that six of those who took out the first volume did not get as far as the second. In works of more than two volumes we can tell with still greater accuracy at what point the reader's interest was insufficient to carry him further.

Such an investigation has been made of all works in more than one volume contained in seven branches of the Brooklyn Public Library, and with very few exceptions it has been found that each successive volume in a series has been read by fewer persons than the one immediately preceding. What is true of books in more than one volume is presumably also true, although perhaps in a less degree, of one-volume works, although we have no means of showing it directly. Among the readers of every book, then, there are generally some who, for one reason or other, do not read it to the end. Our question, "Do readers read?" is thus answered in the negative for a large number of cases. The supplementary question, "Why do not readers read?" occurs at once, but an attempt to answer it would take us rather too deeply into psychology. Whether this tendency to leave the latter part of books unread is increasing or not we can tell only by repeating the present investigation at intervals of a year or more. The probability is that it is due to pure lack of interest. For some reason or other, many persons begin to read books that fail to hold their attention. In a large number of cases this is doubtless due to a feeling that one "ought to read" certain books and certain classes of books. A sense of duty carries the reader part way through his task, but he weakens before he has finished it.

This shows how necessary it is to stimulate one's general interest in a subject before advising him to read a book that is not itself calculated to arouse and sustain that interest. Possibly the modern newspaper habit, with its encouragement of slipshod reading, may play its part in producing the general result, and doubtless a careful detailed investigation would reveal still other partial causes, but the chief and determining cause must be lack of interest. And it is to be feared that instead of taking measures to arouse a permanent interest in good literature, which would in itself lead to the reading of standard works and would sustain the reader until he had finished his task, we have often tried to replace such an interest by a fictitious and temporary stimulus, due to appeals to duty, or to that vague and confused idea that one should "improve one's mind," unaccompanied by any definite plan of ways and means. There is no more powerful moral motor than duty, but it loses its force when we try to apply it to cases that lie without the province of ethics. The man who has no permanent interest in historical literature, and who is impelled to begin a six-volume history because he conceives it to be his "duty" to read it, is apt to conclude, before he has finished the second volume, that his is a case where inclination (or in this instance disinclination) is the proper guide.

That the falling off from beginning to end in long works is striking would appear from the following figures showing the borrowings of separate works in numerous volumes:

	Vol. I.	Vol. II.	Vol. III.	Vol. IV.	Vol. V.	Vol. VI.
History.
Bancroft, "United States"	22	10	6	8	10	8
Hume, "England"	24	7	5	2	1	1
Gibbon, "Rome"	38	12	7	3	4	6
Motley, "United Netherlands"	7	1	1	1
Prescott, "Ferdinand and Isabella" ..	20	4	2
Carlyle, "French Revolution" ..	18	10	8
McCarthy, "Our Own Times"	27	8	11
Biography.
Bourienne, "Memoirs of Napoleon" ...	19	18	9	7
Longfellow, "Life"	6	4	2
Carlyle, "Frederick the Great"	7	3	2	2	2
Fiction.
Dumas, "Vicomte de Bragelone"... ...	31	30	24	22	11	16
Dumas, "Monte Cristo"	27	17	18
Dickens, "Our Mutual Friend"	5	4	1	0
Stowe, "Uncle Tom's Cabin"	37	24

Of course, these could be multiplied indefinitely. They are sufficiently interesting apart from all comment. One would hardly believe without direct evidence that of thirty-one persons who began one of Dumas's romances scarcely half would read it to the end, or that not one of five persons who essayed Dickens's Mutual Friend would succeed in getting through it.

Those who think that there can be no pathos in statistics are invited to ponder this table deeply. Can anyone think unmoved of those two dozen readers who, feeling impelled by desire for an intellectual stimulant to take up Hume, found therein a soporific instead and fell by the wayside?

Correspondence.

Double Rhymes.

SIR,—In the ACADEMY of July 13 you quote, with approval, Mr. J. Williams's "Crushing Exposure." Mr. Williams's double rhymes are ingenious, but there are only five of them, and of the five one is the property of an earlier rhymer. When Mr. Williams tells us

> The shares rose first, and there was fun
> For us and Floater for a fortnight,
> Until they fell a point in one
> Short night,

he reminds us of the parodist whose wandering maiden's sceptical parents

> For the work of that cruel, though short, night,
> Sent her to bed without tea for a fortnight.

To use Calverley's words, double "rhymes are so scarce in this world of ours," are the outcome of so much ingenuity, that a good one is as much private property as a pun of Hood or of Charles Lamb. There is no copyright in such things, but that makes the point of honour the more kind-

Digitized by Google

ing. And we are not to suppose, of course, that a rhymer so accomplished as Mr. Williams has forgotten "The Willow Tree." You say, rightly, that Mr. Williams's verses are "lineal from Calverley." In your account of Calverley's verse, on p. 28 of the ACADEMY, you give a list of writers of light verse who owe their dexterity in the use of rhyme to their classical training. And you omit W. M. Thackeray! What, in English verse of this kind, is more rapid and skilfully easy than the double rhymes of "Peg of Limavaddy," or the "White Squall"? Thackeray's verse, not less than his Addisonian yet perfectly individual prose, shows in every word the tradition of classical training. I do not disparage Mr. Williams; but let us have no injustice to Thackeray.—I am, etc.,

GAHAGAN.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 95 (New Series).

THE terms of our competition last week were as follows:

> On page 25* will be found an extract from a paper contributed to the new Rambler by Mr. Richard Le Gallienne, entitled "The Desire of the Star for the Moth." Assuming that James Boswell reads this essay to Dr. Samuel Johnson in the Elysian Fields, it is probable that an interesting conversation between this Great Star (the Doctor) and this Great Moth (Bozzy) will ensue. For the best imaginative report of their remarks on Mr. Le Gallienne's substance and style we offer a prize of One Guinea. Contributions should be in the form of dramatic dialogue, and should not exceed 300 words.

* The passage quoted from Mr. Le Gallienne's paper was as follows:

> The Desire of the Moth for the Star has been made proverbial by a great Poet; but, so far as I am aware, no one has remarked that the Attraction is mutual, and that perhaps the Desire of the Star for the Moth in certain Cases is even more passionate than the Desire of the Moth for the Star.
>
> Of course, there are very big successful Stars who affect that the Hero-worshipper Moth is a Nuisance, and build themselves about with Bastions of Privacy, through which no Ray of their Shining can reach the most persevering Moth—but then, you see, they are so sure of their Moths. I wonder if the Time should come when the Flocks of little Pilgrims up to their dizzy Radiance begin to slacken, and the Roar of Moth-Wings outside their guarded Country-seats to grow fainter—and it has happened so with some very great Stars indeed!—if they would not become a little insecure in their Feeling of Starriness, and perhaps even at last unshutter a Window, and let slip a Beam of their celestial Selves; lest the Moths should grow discouraged, and perhaps cease coming at all.
>
> I have heard that some Stars of this Magnitude charge the Moth Half a Guinea for their Autographs—strictly, of course, for the Benefit of the Hospitals. Such Stars are, you can imagine, very sure of themselves. But there is another Kind of big Star that makes quite as fine a Blaze as those of which I have been speaking, yet it is by no means so unsocial: on the Contrary, is smilingly, even eagerly accessible to every Moth that is so kind and appreciative as to take the Trouble to call with its Homage. It often, indeed, asks the Moth to stay for Lunch, and makes it promise to be sure to come again.
>
> For this Kind of Star Press-cutting Agencies were invented, and my Belief is that the Secret of its Affability lies in a hidden Dread within its Heart that it is not really a fixed Star at all, but only a Comet. It dare not, however, admit this, even in the Silence of its own Soul, so it seeks to drown the hideous Whisper in the murmurous Cloud of the Moths.

We award the prize to the Rev. R. F. McCausland, Whitby, for the following:

BOSWELL: I remember, sir, a simile of yours in the Rambler in which you say: "An elevated genius employed in little things appears like the sun in his evening declination: he remits his splendour, but retains his magnitude, and pleases more, though he dazzles less." Pray what is your opinion of this author, who uses a somewhat similar metaphor in his musings on the Desire of the Star for the Moth?

[Boswell reads Le Gallienne's article.

JOHNSON: What hybrid concoction have we here? Prose or Poetry? "Si concionatur, cantat, si cantat male cantat." The approach of the Moth to the candle is an indubitable fact: the Desire of the Moth for the Star is a ridiculous impossibility.

BOSWELL: But is not the Desire of the Star for the Moth a sublime image?

JOHNSON: Sublime fiddlesticks! How can we predicate desire as an attribute of an inanimate constellation? When Mr. Addison exclaims of the planets:

> "What though in solemn silence all > Move round this dark terrestrial ball," there is sublimity in the expression. But this metaphor of the Star and Moth, with its parabolic application to great men and their parasites, is to me a ludicrous conceit. "Bastions of privacy"—a commendable phrase, but how could a Star construct anything? No, sir! the writer is more demented than Kit Smart. Christopher in his "Song to David" would not have collocated Stars and Moths:

> "O strength, O sweetness, lasting rise,
> God's harp thy symbol, and thy type
> The Lion and the Bee."

Lion and Bee, though distinct, are on the same plane of creation; but Star and Moth, preposterous absurdity! I would incarcerate in Bedlam such depravers of metaphor.

Other replies are as follows:

[Boswell has just finished reading the article.]

BOSWELL: Well, sir, and what is your opinion of this gentleman?

JOHNSON: Why, sir, that he is a monstrously impudent fellow, and much concerned to belittle his betters.

BOSWELL: Then you would hold him to be rather a Moth than a Star?

JOHNSON: Why, no, sir—neither the one nor the other; but rather one of those idle persons who neither give admiration nor command it.

BOSWELL: Then you would not consider it unworthy of a man of sense to wait on the opinions of great men?

JOHNSON: No, sir! So long as he act with wit and discrimination, such an attitude is both agreeable and decorous.

BOSWELL: So I have always found. And may not the Man of Talent also take pleasure in the respect of his friends?

JOHNSON: Why, of his friends, sir, yes: no man should be insensible to the opinion of his friends. But this person would accuse us of desiring the flattery of fools, and even of inviting it.

BOSWELL: I see no cause, sir, why he makes so great a pother over the adulation of the ignorant.

JOHNSON: Why, because he has never experienced it; and only persons of superior mind can be satisfied with their own esteem.

BOSWELL: It is said that he is a person of nice habits, and takes pride in the beauty of his hair.

JOHNSON: Well sir, I had rather he spent his time in adorning his own person than in defiling the English language.

BOSWELL: Indeed, his manner of writing does not please me.

JOHNSON: Nor me, sir. There is in it a particularity, a laborious search after the fantastick.

BOSWELL: The earlier Ramblers were not written thus.

JOHNSON: No, sir! they were excellently well written. Nor would I have permitted wings to roar, or beams to slip.

BOSWELL: What, sir, would you have said had a person sent half a guinea for your signature?

JOHNSON: Sir, I should have said he was a fool.

BOSWELL: And how would you have acted?

JOHNSON: Why sir, I should have taken the money. Intelligent persons should always be ready to profit by the excesses of the foolish.

[E. U., London.]

"The ghost of the Rambler——," I began; but my great and erudite friend would not suffer me to proceed.

"Enough, sir!" said Doctor Johnson. "This fellow, I perceive, is a coxcomb. Tell him to resume the darning of the Golden Slut's stockings!"

[J. T. P., Brighton.]

Only four other replies received.

Competition No. 96 (New Series).

WE offer a prize of One Guinea for the best four lines on a dead author. The following pretty verse, quoted in Mr. Frowde's publication, The Periodical, may serve to show the spirit of our suggestion, but we do not wish it to be taken as a model in style or spelling:

> "Done are Shakespeare's dayes:
> His dayes are done, that made the dainty Playes. . . .
> For, though his line of life went soone about,
> The life yet of his lines shall never out."—HUGH HOLLAND.

RULES.

Answers, addressed, "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, July 24. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the third page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon: otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

Digitized by Google

THE THRUSH:

A Periodical for the Publication of Original Poetry

Edited by MULLETT ELLIS.

PRICE FOURPENCE PER MONTH.

BY ORDER AT ALL BOOKSELLERS.

An Edition de Luxe, now limited to 50 copies, sumptuously printed, is also published at Half-a-crown per month. This Edition, being rare and of intrinsic merit, must eventually become valuable.

Since its origin, on the first day of the New Century, Poems have already appeared in "THE THRUSH" from the following well-known Authors:—

Dr. Richard Garnett; W. E. Henley; Emily Hickey; C. W. Wynne; Mackenzie Bell; F. Prevost Battersby; Keble Howard; Harold Begbie; A. P. Graves; Nora Hopper; L. Alma-Tadema; Norman Gale; Dr. Gilbert Murray; John Hutchinson; The Hon. Albinia Brodrick; Arthur Symons; N. Carruthers Gould; Clifton Brigham; E. Tindal Atkinson; Lady Margaret Sackville; Hamilton Aïdé; Sir Wyke Bayliss, P.R.I.; Victor Plarr; Edgar Fawcett; Lady Gilbert; the Rev. W. J. Dawson; and Mullett Ellis.

Other Poems by Eminent Writers are promised.

Amongst the Contents of the AUGUST NUMBER are Poems by Lady FLORENCE DOUGLAS, and a Sonnet by the great LORD LYTTON.

NOW READY.

Was Alfred King of England?

By A SAXON.

Demy 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

A brief review of one of our latest text-books, showing the true relations of Prince Alfred both to the Saxon people in England and to her Roman invaders.

HARRISON & SONS, Publishers, 59, Pall Mall, S.W.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED).

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per annum.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT

GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET;
241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C.. LONDON:
And at Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

NEW LIBERAL REVIEW.

No. 7.—AUGUST.—One Shilling.

NOTES of the MONTH.

E. T. COOK	Lord Rosebery and the Liberal Party.
R. C. LEHMANN	Henley—and After.
FREDERICK GREENWOOD	Party Dissension and Parliamentary Decay.
GEORGE W. E. RUSSELL	Lord Beaconsfield's Novels.
THE DUCHESS OF SUTHERLAND.	The Story of a Highland Industry.
J. KEIR HARDIE, M.P.....	Some Economic and Industrial Aspects of the War.
JOHN FOSTER FRASER	Some Impressions of a Traveller.
NORA CHESSON (Nora Hopper)	The Cornflower.
J. H. YOXALL, M.P.	The Anglo-Saxon in France.
F. C. SELOUS.....	Gemsbuck Hunting in the Northern Kalahari.
T. P. O'CONNOR, M.P.....	A Book of the Month: Henry George.
L. W. VERNON HARCOURT....	The Royal Arms.
HAROLD TREMAYNE	M.P.'s as Railway Directors.
CLEMENT SCOTT	Am I a Fraud?
CHARLES KENNETT BURROW..	The Quiet Spirit.
ALFRED KINNEAR	The Upas Tree Parliament.
SIDNEY GOWING	Hebba, the Sea-Gypsy.
FLORENCE ANNA FULCHER....	Killarney, the Church of the Wild Sloe.
FRANK LEIGH	Sir Wilfrid Laurier: a Character Sketch.

BOOKS WORTH BUYING.

Editorial Offices: 160, Temple Chambers, London, E.C.
Publishing Office: 33-34, Temple Chambers, London, E.C.

'Twixt Plate and Lip;

OR,

The Common Sense of Eating.

A HEALTH HAND-BOOK FOR EVERY DAY,
WITH SPECIAL ADVICE AS TO DIET AND REGIMEN IN HEALTH AND SICKNESS,
A POPULAR SUMMARY OF THE SYMPTOMS OF DYSPEPSIA AND INDIGESTION,
AND A NOTE ON THE SCIENTIFIC AND RATIONAL TREATMENT OF THOSE AILMENTS.

12th EDITION.

 This little book may be recommended to the general reader as a sound and safe guide to the common sense management of the stomach. The Publishers, at 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, will be pleased to send a free copy to any reader of the Academy. Early application necessary.

LONDON:
46, HOLBORN VIADUCT, E.C.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

6s., claret roan, gilt, Illustrated.

LONDON IN THE TIME OF THE DIAMOND JUBILEE.

London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING, A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.
THE NORFOLK BROADS.
BRECON and its BEACONS.
ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.
THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.
THE ISLE OF WIGHT.
THE WYE VALLEY.
THE SEVERN VALLEY.
BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.
BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.
LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR, LLANFAIRFECHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON.
ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.
CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, & FESTINIOG.
BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and PWLLHELI.
MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, & CHELTENHAM.
LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.
NORWICH, LOWESTOFT, YARMOUTH, and the NORFOLK BROADS.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.
"It very emphatically tops them all."—Daily Graphic.
"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 5s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT, & Co. Ltd., The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers.
Paris and New York: BRETANO'S.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

TO

"THE ACADEMY,"

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

Digitized by Google

JOHN LANE'S LIST.

LITERARY.

"A BRILLIANT ESSAYIST."

MEN and LETTERS. By Herbert Paul.
Crown 8vo, Second Edition, price 5s. net.
The Times.—"A book which is both learned and eminently readable, a rare combination."
The Spectator.—"These essays are all of them interesting—most of them are even brilliant....The book is full of good things....and has, in a marked degree, the qualities of 'acidity and light.'"

BY THE LADY MAYORESS.

TWELVE ALLEGORIES. By Kathleen HAYDN GREEN. With a Frontispiece, Title-Page, and Cover Designs by Percy Bulcock. Imperial 16mo, price 3s. 6d. net.
The Pilot.—"Each is good."
The Daily News.—"We have read each and all with a feeling of distinct pleasure."

ANNI FUGACES: a Book of Verse, with Cambridge Interludes. By R. C. LEHMANN. Crown 8vo, gilt top, price 3s. 6d. net.
Literature.—"One of the most interesting and pleasing volumes which the younger generation of literary men has published."

POEMS. By Lady Margaret Sackville.
Fcap. 8vo, price 3s. 6d. net.
Daily Chronicle.—"A natural magic that reminds us of the early works of William Morris."
Literature.—"Lady Margaret Sackville has clearly the spirit of true poetry in her."

YE PLEASAUNCE.

A GARDEN in the SUBURBS. By Mrs. LESLIE WILLIAMS. With 8 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.
The Literary World.—"Brightly and lightly written, the work is at once entertaining and practical—qualities all too rarely combined in books of this character."

STRAY LEAVES from a BORDER GARDEN. By Mrs. MILNE-HOME. With 8 Illustrations by F. L. B. Griggs. Crown 8vo, price 6s. net
St. James's Gazette.—"One of the freshest and most delightful of a considerable company."
Outlook.—"Will please many garden lovers."

FLOWERS and GARDENS. By Forbes WATSON. Edited, with an Introduction, by the Rev. Canon ELLACOMBE. With Photogravure Portrait. Crown 8vo 5s. net.
Daily News.—"The principles which the author fought for are accepted now on all hands."
Globe.—"The book should find many admirers even among those who know nothing about gardening."

HANDBOOKS of PRACTICAL GARDENING.
Edited by HARRY ROBERTS
Just published bound in cloth and profusely illustrated, crown 8vo, price 2s. 6d. net.

Vol. I.—THE BOOK of ASPARAGUS, with Sections also on Salsify, Celery, Scorzonera, and Seakale. By CHARLES ILOTT, F.R.H.S. Together with a Chapter on the History, Decorative Uses, and Cookery of these Vegetables, by the EDITOR.
The Pilot.—"Every point from the selection of soil to the treatment of parasites is carefully dealt with, and the book should prove extremely useful to scientific gardeners."

The following Volumes will appear in due course:—

Vol. II.—THE BOOK of the GREENHOUSE, with a Special Chapter on the little Town Greenhouse. By J. C. TALLACK, F.R.H.S., Head Gardener at Shipley Hall.

Vol. III.—THE BOOK of the GRAPE. By H. W. WARD, F.R.H.S., for twenty-five years Head Gardener at Longford Castle; Author of "My Gardener."

Vol. IV.—THE BOOK of OLD-FASHIONED FLOWERS. By HARRY ROBERTS, Author of "The Chronicle of a Cornish Garden."

Other Volumes in preparation.

ROMANCE.

SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

SECOND IMPRESSION, completing 8,000 Copies.

THE ARISTOCRATS: being the Impressions of the Lady Helen Pole during her Sojourn in the Great North Woods, as spontaneously recorded in her Letters to her Friend in North Britain, the Countess of Edge and Ross.
The Times.—"Clever and entertaining.....This gay volume is written by someone with a pretty wit, an eye for scenery, and a quick mind to grasp natural as well as individual characteristics. Her investigations into the American character are acute as well as amusing."
The St. James's Gazette.—"We feel constrained to warn our readers that by rigorously refusing to order 'The Aristocrats' from the library they will prevent entrance into their drawing-rooms of a book which is frank ALMOST TO offence, indecorous ALMOST TO naughtiness, and SO FUNNY THAT ON NO ACCOUNT WOULD WE HAVE MISSED ITS PERUSAL."

NEW EDITION, completing 18,000 Copies.

THE COLUMN. By Mr. Charles MARRIOTT, the New Writer.
The Daily Telegraph.—"Whoever Mr. Charles Marriott may be, he has written a very remarkable novel....a book very fresh, very original, very interesting, and suggestive. He has handled situations in the true spirit of an artist. His style is careful. Above all, he thinks for himself."

JUST PUBLISHED.—BY A NEW WRITER.

THEY THAT TOOK the SWORD: a Novel. By NATHANIEL STEPHENSON.
Academy.—"A well-written story."
Outlook.—"Good."

JUST PUBLISHED.—BY A FAVOURITE AUTHOR.

SEVERANCE. By Thomas Cobb, Author of "The Bishop's Gambit," "Mr. Passingham," "The Dissemblers," &c.

JOHN LANE, Publisher, London, and New York.

The Library of Useful Stories.

PRICE ONE SHILLING EACH.

Well Printed. Well Bound in Blue Cloth. Well Illustrated.

BOOKS FOR HOLIDAY TIME.

THE STORY of KING ALFRED. By WALTER BESANT.

THE STORY of WILD FLOWERS. By the Rev. Professor HENSLOW.

THE STORY of ART in the BRITISH ISLES. By J. E. PHYTHIAN.

THE STORY of BIRD LIFE. By W. P. PYCRAFT.

THE STORY of PHOTOGRAPHY. By A. T. STORY.

THE STORY of LIFE in the SEAS. By SIDNEY J. HICKSON, F.R.S.

THE STORY of the ATMOSPHERE. By DOUGLAS ARCHIBALD.

THE STORY of the WEATHER. By G. F. CHAMBERS, F.R.A.S.

THE STORY of FOREST and STREAM. By JAMES RODWAY, F.L.S.

THE STORY of a PIECE of COAL. By E. H. MARTIN, F.G.S.

THE STORY of the PLANTS. By GRANT ALLEN.

THE STORY of PRIMITIVE MAN. By EDWARD CLODD.

THE STORY of BOOKS. By G. B. RAWLINGS.

THE STORY of FISH LIFE. By W. P. PYCRAFT. [In the press.

Complete List of the Series on application to the Publishers.

GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED, Southampton Street, Strand.

F. V. WHITE & CO.'S LIST.

Now ready, price 5s.

GUY BOOTHBY'S NEW NOVEL.

A MILLIONAIRE'S LOVE-STORY.

With Illustrations by E. FAIRHURST.

NEW & POPULAR NOVELS.

Price 6s. each.

THE KING'S SECRET.
By RICHARD HENRY SAVAGE.

A HOUSE WITH A HISTORY.
By FLORENCE WARDEN.

MOSTLY FOOLS AND A DUCHESS.
By LUCAS CLEEVE.

A CRAFTY FOE:
A Romance of the Sea.
By HUME NISBET.

DOL. SHACKFIELD.
By HEBER K. DANIELS.

Several thousands of this Novel have already been sold in America, where it is most popular.

AN UNCONGENIAL MARRIAGE.
By COSMO CLARKE.

F. V. WHITE & CO., LTD., 14, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

A COMMENTARY ON

TENNYSON'S 'IN MEMORIAM.'

By A. C. BRADLEY, LL.D., Professor of Poetry in the University of Oxford.

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.
[Ready on Tuesday.

MACMILLAN'S LIBRARY OF ENGLISH CLASSICS.

NEW VOLUME.

SARTOR RESARTUS AND ON HEROES, HERO-WORSHIP, AND THE HEROIC IN HISTORY.

By THOMAS CARLYLE.

Demy 8vo, cloth elegant, 3s. 6d. net.

THREE NOTABLE NOVELS.
Crown 8vo. 6s each.

170,000 Copies sold
IN AMERICA AND ENGLAND.

WINSTON CHURCHILL. THE CRISIS.

JUST PUBLISHED.

ALBERT E. HANCOCK.

HENRY BOURLAND: The Passing of the Cavalier.

OWEN JOHNSON.

ARROWS of the ALMIGHTY.

THIRD EDITION NOW READY.

BY EGERTON CASTLE.

'LA BELLA' AND OTHERS being certain stories recollected by EGERTON CASTLE, Author of "Young April," &c. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE.

Price 1s.—Contents for AUGUST.

PRINCESS PUCK. By the Author of "The Enchanter" Chapters XI—XIV.
THE FLY-FISHER'S AFTERMATH. By H. T. SHERINGHAM.
THE LAND of the POPPY. By G. A. LEVETT-YEATS. I. Among the Opium Vats.
IN the EVENING of HER DAYS.
THE GREAT INVITATION. By A. MACDONELL.
SABRINÆ COROLLA.
THE LETTERS of ELIZABETH.
OUR LADY of LITTLE CAÑON. By JAMES AYSCOUGH.
INVASION or RAID? By DAVID HANNAY.

MIDSUMMER HOLIDAY NUMBER.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

Illustrated.—Price 1s. 4d.—Annual Subscription, post free, 16s.

The AUGUST NUMBER contains—

IN CITY PENT. By WILLIAM WATSON.
THE PARIS COMMUNE, THIRTY YEARS AFTER. By WILLIAM TRANT.
PERE RAPHAEL By GEORGE W. CABLE. Pictures by CHARLOTTE HARDING.
D'RI and I—VI. By IRVING BACHELLER.
THE MAKING of a MARCHIONESS.—III. By FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT.

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., London.

Digitized by Google

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1525. Established 1869. 27 July, 1901. Price Threepence.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

MR. THOMAS HARDY, we understand, has a new volume of Poems nearly ready for the press, which will include his poems inspired by the War. Unlike most of the War poetry, they certainly gained for themselves the epithet "unforgettable."

MR. RUDYARD KIPLING is with the Fleet. A former holiday of this nature, it will be remembered, produced A Fleet in Being, and the verses on the cruiser.

WE have received the following from a well-known novelist: "'People think that striking situations, or good dialogue, are got by studying life: they will not rise to understand that they are prepared by deliberate artifice, and set off by painful suppressions.' I agree with the latter half, not with the first, of this passage, which I have just read in R. L. Stevenson's Letters," adds our correspondent. "I think one should constantly study life, not slavishly, but imaginatively, as Turner studied landscape, the clouds, and the sea. Out of his great and precise knowledge he composed pictures. This, I take it, is the art of book and play writing. If you would invite correspondence on the subject, it might be an interesting, useful thing for the general reader." We do invite it.

MESSRS. METHUEN have in preparation a new series of books for children. This series will consist sometimes of new matter, sometimes of old; sometimes a book will contain one long story, sometimes several short stories: sometimes not a story at all, but something more instructive though not less interesting. The aim of the editor, Mr. E. V. Lucas, is to get entertaining or exciting stories about normal children, the moral of which is implied rather than expressed. The first three volumes arranged for are: The Castaways of Meadow Bank, by Thomas Cobb; The Beechnut Book, by Jacob Abbott, edited by E. V. Lucas; The Air Gun; or, How the Mastermans and Dobson Major nearly lost their Holidays, by T. Hilbert.

SIR EDWIN ARNOLD has completed a new epic poem of about 4,000 lines. Its subject is the circumnavigation of Africa by the Phœnicians six hundred years before the Christian Era. It is entitled "The Voyage of Ithobal." The hero is a sea-captain of Tyre, who takes service with Neko, king of Egypt, to explore the unknown waters beyond the Red Sea. After picturesque scenes at Tyre—where he buys in the Slave Market, with a priceless pearl, an African princess made captive in the Dark Continent, and alone knowing its secrets—he builds three ships at Suez and sets forth. All this is minutely described, together with full details of the voyage of fifteen thousand miles round Africa. Returning, with two out of the three ships, after numerous and exciting adventures, which bring out almost every feature of African life and scenery, Ithobal relates the story of his enterprise in a discourse of seven days before the throne of Pharaoh, who loads with honour the successful captain, the princess (his wife), and his crews.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "I noticed some correspondence in your paper with regard to odd rhymes. It is not generally known that extraordinary assonances are as easy to find as they are difficult to reject when once the Muse has played with them. I have done much in this line. The following verse abashes the 'short night' verse, though I say it who shouldn't:

'INTERRUPTION.

FICKLE SAMUEL loquitur:
As Baby, rubbing off his eye
The print of strawberry jam,
Will still for cake and toffee sigh
And sing his dithyramb,
So I within my office eye
With joy a new pet lamb,
Although I hear soft Sophy sigh
For her affianced Sam,
The which I grieve to prophesy
I shall not be who am
Wearing two hearts for trophies—I
Whose heart is but a sham.
But, hist! I know that cough is ei-Ther Kate's or—Amsterdam!
Ten pounds to one 'tis Sophy's! Ay!—
Good Hvar—— Good evening, ma'am.'"

THAT useful and interesting book, Annals of Politics and Culture, edited by Mr. G. P. Gooch, with an introduction by Lord Acton, which we noticed in our issue of March 9, has a particular interest for bookmen. From 1492 to 1899 the name of the important book, or books, of the year is given, or the literary event of the year, in such a way that it can be found at a glance. Turning the leaves the eye falls on such entries as these:

1851.—Kinglake's Eothen.
Stanley's Life of Arnold.
Disraeli's Coningsby.
1855.—Thackeray's Newcomes.
The Saturday Review founded.
1873.—Pater's Essays on the Renaissance.
1880.—Shorthouse's John Inglesant.
Thompson's City of Dreadful Night.
1891.—John Oliver Hobbes' Some Emotions and a Moral.
1895.—W. B. Yeats's Poems.

"I FOUND the following lines," writes M. G. C., "quoted in a book of essays last April. If any of your readers can tell me where they come from I shall be grateful:

'Look you be sure,
Take here the lure,
Ride you there, ride you for one, two, and three.
Down the King's fist
With the drag of the wrist
Dragged down the pomegranates pierced with the Bee.

On to your courser,
Spare not his horsehair,
Ride to the knight of the tower by the sea.
Long ago bade he
Carry my lady
Into his tower, carry her, carry me.'"

Digitized by Google

After more than forty years' service in the offices of the Board of Trade, Mr. Austin Dobson has just resigned his post of Principal of the Fisheries and Harbour Department; and it is his intention to devote his well-earned leisure to literature. Mr. Dobson has been doing that for many years, but we may now doubtless look for more sustained efforts from his pen. Indeed, it is understood that his first task will be to write a life of Samuel Richardson. A complete and scholarly life of this novelist is undoubtedly needed, for Miss Thompson's recent attempt, whatever its merits, could not be considered final.

A passage in an article on the late Bishop Stubbs in the Church Quarterly Review shows that the sternest and driest of historians revelled in historical romance. It also throws a little light on the effect which a bishopric may have on a man's reading: "His recreations, he wrote, were 'making out pedigrees and correcting proof-sheets.' But he was also a voracious novel-reader. It used to be said of him that he read Monte Cristo once a year before he was a bishop, and twice a year afterwards, and he half admitted the impeachment. As is the case with many students, omnivorous reading was his diversion, special reading his work. He seemed to read everything and to remember everything."

The late Bishop's love of local history was deep, and those who wish to lay their hands on a defence of this branch of knowledge will find it in the passage from a lecture delivered at Reading. After observing in his dry way, "We are not all philosophers, we are not all judges, or we are not all, thank goodness, members of local boards or county councils, but we do live in homes, county towns, villages, old houses or new neighbourhoods, we all have had parents, who had their homes and their family traditions," he went on:

> There is not an acre, I think I may say, in England—certainly there is not a parish or a manor—that has not its place in English history, either as the scene of some considerable act or as the home of some considerable man; and there is not, I think, an intelligent person in England who is not in one way or another a sharer in such interests of tradition, if he would or could realise it. By realising your own personal connection with these, you realise your historical relation to the progress of your country, and by working out the details of the local or personal history in which you are so interested, you may yourselves largely contribute to the ascertaining of historical truth in details. Every parish must have a history, every parish has a register, every person has a parish. Every manor has a lord, and every lord has had a share in the struggles by which our national life has become what it is; and every lord has had a following of his tenants, whose blood, shed for him, as it may have been, quite as certainly as for the cause in which he was enlisted, may constitute for us, who are not descended from lords of manors, our personal link with the past. Of course, some parts of England have been the scenes of more bloody battles and keener political conflicts than others, but it is very rare to find any district which has not its own special traditions and local affections.

Take up what paper we will, we find some reference to the novel that booms and its intrinsic merits. A writer in the "Contributors' Club" of the Atlantic Monthly falls to talking about it to his cousin Augustina, a young woman with opinions. Augustina blames the good-natured critic for the public inability to distinguish between big sales and real worth.

> "He should come out and say: 'My dear people, here is a new book, which in regard to style is without form and void. It contains no character that is vital enough to last. But it is a good book, a natural book, a perfectly harmless book. Read it, and you will still be able to sleep the sleep of the just.'"
>
> "And what good would that do?" I asked.
>
> "Well, the critic would tell the truth, and that is good for his soul. It might help to preserve the artistic balance. As it is, the crowd seems to be trying to perpetuate its amateur, lawless opinions. For the crowd," said Augustina, fixing a solemn eye upon me, "in spite of all the boards of education in this world or the next, will never know a piece of literature, even if it should live under the same roof with it."
>
> "Well?" I said helplessly.
>
> "This may be the land of the free," said Augustina, resuming the attack, "but it is not the home of the brave. Witness the general tone of criticism. What we need is some rude old Dr. Johnson to roar out to the good-natured critic, after some particularly genial effusion: 'Trash, sir, trash, and you know it! Is this your method of serving the ends of literature? Are you not aware, sir, that every author needs at first a good sound licking?'"
>
> "Go on, Augustina," I cried, from my corner.
>
> "I am thinking of organising a Society for the Preservation of the Adjective," said Augustina. "Between the publisher and the critic, and the critic and the crowd, it bids fair to decline into a state of chronic invalidism. I have a sentimental attachment for the adjective; a good, virile one has many a time prevented me from the shedding of blood."
>
> "Go on."
>
> "The publisher and the critic and the crowd together have so twisted and wrenched and hammered and beaten the adjective that it is fast going its way to the ambulance and the hospital. The national government should be called on to insist upon all writers abstaining from the use of this important little part of speech until it has recovered its old-time vitality and health."
>
> "Well?"
>
> "Now listen," and she rattled off a long list of words, and stopped for breath. "'Cohesive' is the last, a brand new one, but it is already showing signs of senile decay. Suppose Fielding or Thackeray were to come back from the tomb: with what word could we hail him? Or suppose someone should actually write the Great American Novel?"
>
> And this was the last word I could get out of her.

That Boston still keeps up its serious reading in spite of the literary high jinks of the hour, is brought home to us by the current number of Poet Lore, in which we find the following questions on Romola propounded:

> Does George Eliot mean Tito to represent, somewhat like Browning's Greek in "Pietro," a type of Greek influence and philosophy that is beautiful, but dangerous, needing to be checked by a sense of the equality of others and of obligation to them?
>
> Does George Eliot inculcate through Romola too grim an idea of justice, fealty, and duty?
>
> Is real love faithful in spite of any discovered unworthiness? Or is it weak to be constant under certain circumstances? Did Romola's submission accomplish anything?

A bibliography of recent "love letters" and "visits" might fill a momentary gap. The Unicorn Press sends us The Visits of Henry VIII., by the author of An Englishman's Love-Letters. It is a sufficiently rollicking work, in parchment and ribbons. A "Note" informs us: "These Letters have never before appeared in print. It seems a pity, but it is so." The first letter begins thus:

> The library here is large and old. The food, on the other hand, has points. They do you very well. They begin you early in your room, and they pursue from hour to hour wherever you may be. When you see a man coming towards you from the house, or from the conservatories, or from the home farm, or from the railway station, or from any other point of the compass, you may bet that his arms are creaking with viands, not to mention liquors. At lunch they make your eyes bulge. At dinner they gorge you to the sheer verge and steep of apoplexy.

Digitized by Google

Later we have amusing particulars concerning Mr. Nummit, a Gaelic poet, who has the misfortune to love the girl already appropriated by Tommy's correspondent:

> His love, of course, is of the hopeless brand, and he knows it. Also he grizzles about it, and is manfully doing his best to get a living out of it. Here is his latest effusion on the subject, which I commend to you for an exercise in scansion:
>
> Ul Moona.
>
> Ugh drafthen na gwht ha lashti
> Fashnatet drifnathot Moona ma busthel
> Flangstrif revocht ma clacher ner Uam
> Ner sneech ner terbacher ner tam ochle drochle
> Vertoch dhu der shee lochhabarten
> Moona, Moona, Moona, lum shughar.
>
> Now the untutored might not take that for poetry, Tommy, but I assure you Nummit knows how to scan it. And when he read it to us with the right stop on his voice, at least two of us broke down entirely and begged for a translation. Whereat Nummit, having smiled and looked meltingly heavenward, remarked: "Ah, you moderns! You have forgotten the beautiful sounds that the blue duck with the ivory bill made for King Boch in the Bitter Islands. You have no fairy green in your eye, and no hayseed in your pockets. In short, the fly from the golden spaces refuses to alight upon you. Come with me into the yeasty wildernesses of Find Horn, where the haddock is still smoked by the bare-legged maidens, and all the very brown sons of Half'un carry sporrans in their waistcoat pockets. Translation, forsooth! Why is not the Gaelic taught in our Heelan schules? Andrew me no Carnegies. I would not gie ye more'n a saxpence for a' the culture sooth o' the Coogit." And clutching his sandy beard convulsively, he ran off the lawn like a frightened deer, and was heard wailing in the shrubbery:
>
> Moon, Moona, Moona, lum shughar.

The task of writing the life of a reigning monarch is not an easy one, but in the case of Edward VII. it has been attempted by Mr. H. Whates in the "Bijou Biographies" (Drane). We have not examined Mr. Whates's pages, but his Preface begins thus: "This little sketch will excite the disdain of the courtier and the surprise of the sycophant. It is written for neither class, but for those to whom loyalty is not synonymous with servility, nor respect with fulsome adulation. An attempt has been made to give an estimate of His Majesty's capacities which shall be free from the nauseating flattery of conventional biography of modern Royalties, and to write an account of the facts of his life from which trivialities and mawkish sentimentalities are excluded."

The new (eleventh) volume of the Annual Index to Periodicals has just been issued from the Review of Reviews office. In the new volume, which covers the year 1900, the contents of over 190 British and American periodicals published during the year, as against 117 in Volume I. (1890), are classified and arranged on the same plan as that which has found favour in the previous volumes. The bibliographical plan on which the Index is compiled shows all the articles on each subject gathered together in one place in the alphabetical arrangement, instead of being scattered throughout the volume under various, and sometimes synonymous, headings. The numerous cross-references used indicate the headings chosen. This arrangement makes the work very useful, especially to authors and students, for it enables them to see at a glance how far the ground on any subject, or branch of a subject, has already been covered by other writers. This year the price has been raised from 10s. to 15s., because, as we are informed, the receipts from sales at the smaller price do not cover the mere outlay in printing and paper, without reckoning anything for the heavy and exacting labour of compilation.

The Rambler has distinguished itself at last. In sonorous periods it defends the sport of cock-fighting, and calls for its resuscitation. Fancy resuscitating Johnson's Rambler to resuscitate cock-fighting! We are glad to see that a more practical attempt to revive this cruel sport was defeated this week by the police. Says our mentor:

> As a Champion of Kindness to Animals, the Rambler cannot but favour the fine old Sport of Cock-fighting, which has been exposed to much adscititious Detraction at the Hands of the Ignorant. Pugnacity is as natural to a Cock as to a Bull-dog or a School-boy, and the Cruelty of impeding him from the Gratification of his hereditary Instinct is very great. That Instinct, like every other Inspiration of Providence, has a Purpose in the terrestrial System. Indeed, there is perhaps no more pertinent Lesson of Courage and Endurance to be learned than that provided by the Spectacle of contending Game-birds. Even a Round of Boxing under the Marquis of Queensberry's Rules is scarcely more salutary to Education, and the Usefulness of any scholastick Establishment would be enhanced enormously by the Addition of a Pit to the Accessories of the Curriculum.
>
> It has long been my Ambition to revive the Distraction of Cocking, and I shall welcome the Adherence of any Sports-men, who may be disposed to coalesce for the Formation of a Club. With the Aid of a circumspect Attorney, it should not be difficult to circumvent the anile Law, which seems to sustentate the Puritan's Abhorrence of Sport.

While Mr. H. C. Beeching believes that literature can be taught, he discriminates. In the August Longman's for example, he desires to bring to the notice of "parents and guardians" the sort of teaching which is given in order to prepare a youth to answer questions like the following in the matriculation examination of London University: "Give a very short account of the life and chief works of two of the following: Milton, Swift, Wordsworth, Byron, Tennyson." Filled with knowledge about, instead of knowledge of, these authors, the students acquit themselves in such manner as Mr. Beeching describes in the case of Wordsworth:

> Of Wordsworth's life such details as his birth at Cockermouth and his burial at Grasmere were generally known, as well as the fact that he lived in retirement; "took up," as one phrased it, "the position of retired poet." The papers then divided themselves into those which offered simply a more or less imaginative list of works, and those which gushed about the "poetry of Nature." "Wordsworth died a natural death. He was the author of the Excursionist." "Wordsworth was an early Victorian poet. He wrote the Excursion. He also wrote The Ring and the Book." "Wordsworth's Excursion is one of the finest poems of its sort ever written. Besides this, he wrote numerous preludes, which are very beautiful." "Wordsworth wrote The Fate of the Nortons and Intimations of Immortality." "Wordsworth regarded Nature as a sweetheart. His principal work is Tales of a Wayside Inn." "William Wordsworth is known as the poet of Nature. In his youth he received a university education, and that led him to say that the meanest flower that blew gave him thoughts too deep for tears. It seemed as if a blade of grass spoke to him. Probably the beauties of his home surroundings (Lake District) led him to love Nature. His longest poem was the Excursion; but many shorter ones are well known, as Lucy Gray, The Post-Boy, The Pet Lamb, while his Ode on Immortality is indeed grand." But for the unfortunate intrusion of the Post-Boy, one might perhaps have been almost persuaded that this young gentleman had read the poems of which he spoke so glibly.

Mr. Beeching's final recommendation is that boys should not be expected to cover the field of English literature in a scamper, but that, as in the cases of Latin and Greek, definite books should be set for their study.

From their American house, Messrs. Harper and Bros. send us a sheet on which is printed in colour a full-size reproduction of the cover of The Tribulations of a Princess, by the author of The Martyrdom of an Empress. Appended is an account of the book done in a characteristically American way:

Digitized by Google

> "The spirit of adventure was strong in me in those days," she confesses. And the recital bears out this candour. Fancy a woman, young, attractive, distinguished, visiting her childhood's friend, the Czar of all the Russias, for the purpose of asking him to pardon a Nihilist—a Siberian exile whom she believes unjustly convicted. At the station, she is met by an Imperial sleigh drawn by three magnificent black horses. At the palace, the gendarmes in blue uniforms and tall patent-leather boots, and the chevalier-guards, with their white uniforms and eagle-crested helmets, are stationed in picturesque groups. She is soon admitted alone to the presence of the Czar, who greets her kindly, but grows stern when she pleads the cause of the supposed Nihilist. "'But you must do something, Sire,' cried I, now quite beside myself. 'Must?' said the autocrat, drawing himself up and gazing at me with rising anger." However, by tact and persuasion, she wins her cause, and with the same dash and pluck starts out with the Czar's passports and a few men attendants over the frozen Siberian plains to rescue the "convict." Perhaps her bravery is partially the outcome of a strange fact in her history—that she was taught to regard herself as a boy until her ninth year.

Bibliographical.

Mr. Gosse's collection of Mr. Austin Dobson's fugitive pieces is now, I believe, in the hands of the fortunate subscribers; and something, therefore, may not improperly be said about it. It is called Carmina Votiva, and Other Occasional Verses, and on the title-page is the motto—"Enter a Song, singing—Old Play." The "Carmina" are sixty-three in number, and occupy ninety-nine pages. There is a dedication: "To Andrew Lang, master of many things (the lighter lyre included), by his old friend the Author"; and at the back thereof, by way of motto, is a reprint of the rondel—

> Too hard it is to sing
> In these untuneful times—which first appeared in Evening Hours in 1876. In the preface we are told that the "Carmina" "are alike in this, that none of them are now to be found in any of the author's published [and still obtainable] volumes. Some of them are printed from ephemeral sources, others have never appeared before, one or two have been restored from the earliest issues of his poems."

The volume, neatly printed on good paper, is one to be thankful for. We are grateful, to begin with, for the verses which we recognise as new to us. Not less grateful are we for the republication of lyrics which Mr. Dobson has dropped out of his later editions and his Collected Poems, but which many of us desired to preserve. Those of us who possess his early editions are all right on this point; but the younger generation is not so lucky. Take, for example, the following rondeau:

> Rose, in the hedge-row grown,
> Where the scent of the fresh sweet hay
> Comes up from the fields new-mown,
> You know it—you know it—alone,
> So I gather you here to-day.
>
> For here—was it not here, say?—
> That she came by the woodland way,
> And my heart with a hope unknown
> Rose?
>
> Ah yes!—with her bright hair blown,
> And her eyes like the skies of May,
> And her steps like the rose-leaves strown
> When the winds in the rose-trees play—
> It was here—O my love!—my own
> Rose!

Now, this charming little thing appeared originally in the Spectator in 1876, and the editor of Latter-Day Lyrics (1878) persuaded Mr. Dobson to let him reprint it in the notes to that collection. Latter-Day Lyrics, however, has long been out of print; it is, therefore, delightful to find that Mr. Dobson has permitted the republication of the rondeau in Carmina Votiva. It will be observed that in the use of the refrain there is a certain play upon the word "Rose" which makes the rondeau, strictly speaking, not according to rule. But that is no reason why the lover of verse should be deprived of so pretty a bit of work. In like manner, one is glad to meet again in this privately-printed volume with the rondels "Change" and "Fair," the lines to G. H. Boughton and R. W. Gilder, and "The Peacock on the Wall." Greatest of all must be our gratitude to Mr. Gosse for bringing together so many stray pieces by Mr. Dobson from books, magazines, weekly periodicals, and so forth. From Mr. Gosse's own Library Catalogue are extracted some half-dozen trifles by his friend, which will be highly appreciated by the possessors of Carmina Votiva.

Some of my readers may like to have a list of the art-books of the late Mr. Cosmo Monkhouse, who is dealt with elsewhere in this issue from the purely literary point of view. In addition to work done in connexion with publications of the Burlington Fine Arts Club, Mr. Monkhouse was the author of a book on The Masterpieces of English Art (1869); A Few Words about Hogarth (1872); critical comments on W. Etty (1874), Sir C. Eastlake (1875), J. H. Foley (1875), and Sir E. Landseer (1877); The Turner Gallery (1878), Turner (in the "Illustrated Biographies of Great Artists") (1879), The Italian Pre-Raphaelites (1887), Early-English Water-Colour Painters (1890 and 1897), In the National Gallery (1895), and British Contemporary Artists (1899). He also wrote a preface to The Life and Works of Joseph Wright, A.R.A. (1885), and edited, with revision, Mrs. Heaton's Concise History of Painting. To the series of "Great Writers" he contributed, in 1887, a biography of Leigh Hunt. The above mentioned, with his single novel and his three books of verse, constitute Mr. Monkhouse's literary output.

We shall be glad to have the biography of Samuel Richardson, in the compilation of which, they say, Mr. Austin Dobson hopes to expend his earliest leisure. That, however, is no reason why we should altogether ignore, as a publicist has recently ignored, the modest effort in the same direction made recently by Miss (or Mrs.) C. L. Thompson, whose monograph did her considerable credit. Meanwhile, good is the news of the library edition of Richardson, which a London firm is said to have in preparation for us. During the last twenty years our publishers have set forth Richardson, for the most part, in humble guise. Two have given us abridgments of Clarissa Harlowe (1890 and 1893) and cheap reproductions of Pamela (both in 1891). Of Sir Charles Grandison there was a cheap reprint in 1886, and a more sumptuous presentment (abridged, though in two volumes) in 1895. That, so far as I know, is all; and it is obvious that the sooner we have a uniform edition of the works of the worthy but rather tiresome Samuel the better.

Of the sons of the late Dr. Gordon Hake, poet and physician, two have devoted themselves in the main, or to a large extent, to literature. The name of Mr. Egmont Hake is attached to several volumes, miscellaneous in subject. That of his elder brother, Mr. Thomas St. E. Hake, is best known to the lovers of fiction, of which Mr. Thomas Hake has been a fertile producer. One remembers his novel, In Letters of Gold, published in the later eighties; and I see that the editor of the New Penny Magazine (Cassell) is about to run Mr. Hake's Within Sound of the Weir through his popular pages. Mr. Hake is one of the few who can claim a long and intimate acquaintance with that genuine Bohemian of letters—Borrow.

The Bookworm.

Digitized by Google

Reviews.

Moral Gower.

Works of John Gower. Edited by G. C. Macaulay, M.A. Vols. II. and III. (Clarendon Press. 32s.)

About a year ago we reviewed the first volume of Mr. Macaulay's learned and sumptuous edition of John Gower, containing the newly discovered text of the French Mirour de l'Omme or Speculum Medituntis. The present instalment consists of two volumes, devoted to the long English poem in virtue of which Gower's fame, such as it is, survives the Confessio Amantis. To this is appended the address to Henry the Fourth, "In Praise of Peace," and a fourth volume, with the Vox Clamantis and other Latin poems, will, we suppose, conclude Mr. Macaulay's laborious task.

The Confessio Amantis has not, in the past, missed its meed of praise. On the contrary, the critics of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries were distinctly inclined to over-rate it. James the First of Scotland and Dunbar, Hawes and Skelton, Puttenham and Sidney, barely differentiate between the merit of Gower and that of Chaucer. The heresiarch John Bale is perfervid enough to declare him "the lamp of his age" and "alter Dantes ac Petrarcha." The immediate popularity of the Confessio Amantis is shown by the long list of MSS. which Mr. Macaulay is called upon to catalogue. The poem had the honour of being printed by Caxton, and fifty years after Caxton, in two editions, by Berthelette. Upon Berthelette the current texts, that in Chalmers's English Poets, and those of Pauli and of the late Prof. Morley, are based. Not unnaturally, their critical value is small, and for philological purposes they cannot be depended upon. But Gower, in the last quarter of the fourteenth century, stands at the philological parting of the ways, and the importance of an accurate text is, therefore, even apart from its literary value, great. Such a text Mr. Macaulay has spared no pains to provide, and the abundance of excellent MSS. has made his path comparatively straight. The version principally relied upon—one of the Fairfax MSS. in the Bodleian—is contemporary with Gower, and may have been prepared under his superintendence. With it Mr. Macaulay has collated others, representing different recensions of the poem, due to alterations made from time to time, upon literary or political grounds, by the author. He has further supplied a careful linguistic and grammatical study of Gower's English, an analysis of the somewhat diffuse text, a full glossary, and a body of notes bearing upon the sources from which Gower derived his stories and other matters of interest. The whole work is a monument of remorseless and well-informed industry, and is thoroughly worthy to stand by Prof. Skeat's magnificent edition of Chaucer with which, in outward seeming, it is uniform.

And for the literary merit of the Confessio Amantis itself? One may demur to the hyperbole of Bale and others, and at the same time be willing to admit that John Gower's masterpiece is neither negligible nor unattractive. Something of the historic spirit, indeed, is required to appreciate it. It is essentially in the mode of its day. Gower himself describes its intention with perfect justice when he says:

> I wolde go the middel weie
> And wryte a bok betwen the tweie,
> Somwhat of lust, somewhat of love.

Gower is half minstrel, half schoolman. He will amuse, with a string of "smooth tales, chiefly of love," such as had certainly not yet lost their fascination for the expiring Middle Ages, even if they can be said to have done so yet: and he will edify, with his constant undertone of the pulpit, and his formal scheme of virtues and vices. The allegorical setting of the piece is ingeniously managed, and extremely characteristic of an age whose imagination had been profoundly impressed by the somewhat frigid personages and methods of the Roman de la Rose. It is as follows: The lover walks abroad "whan every brid hath chose his make" in the month of May. His heart is heavy with unrequited love.

> Unto the wode I gan to fare,
> Noght for to singe with the briddes,
> For whanne I was the wode amiddes,
> I found a swote grene pleine,
> And ther I gan my wo complaigne
> Wisshinge and wepinge at myn one,
> For other merthes made I none.

As he is in this somewhat conventional plight there pass by the King and Queen of Love. Venus takes pity upon her servant, and bids him arise and be shriven by Genius, her priest. The idea of this shrift is taken straight from the Roman de la Rose, but Gower twists it neatly enough into a sufficiently elastic framework for innumerable stories. The confession proceeds solemnly, book after book, through the Five Senses and the Seven Deadly Sins, and under each head Genius relates titles bearing, more or less remotely, either upon the general character of the vice under consideration or upon its particular manifestations in the affairs of love. These tales were taken from Ovid and the other repertories of such things so popular in the Middle Ages. They are a quaint assortment. Love-Gluttony, for instance, is variously illustrated by the episodes of the Marriage of Pirithous, Galba, and Vitellius Tristram and Iseult, Dives and Lazarus, Ulysses and Telezonus, and Nectanabus of Egypt. Nearly a whole book is filled with the rambling story of Apollonius of Tyre, which afforded the subject-matter of "Pericles," and induced Shakespeare, or Shakespeare's collaborator, to pay an homage to antiquity by introducing "ancient Gower" in person upon his stage as "presenter" of the play. Gower's narrative style has perhaps suffered unduly by comparison with the "Canterbury Tales." To rank with the varied excellence of Chaucer it can make no claim, but it moves easily, with a ready flow of light octosyllabic rhythm, and though occasionally long drawn out, is not wanting in grace and freshness. Mr. Macaulay rightly dwells upon the poetical touch of such as this, which, by the way, recalls a famous passage in "Aucassin and Nicolette," from the story of Medea:

> The worlde was stille on every side
> With open hed and fot al bare,
> Hir her to sprad she gan to fare,
> Upon hir clothes gert sche was,
> Al specheles and on the gras
> Sche glod forth as an Addre doth:
> Non otherwise sche ne goth,
> Til she cam to the freisshe flod,
> And there a while sche withstod.
> Thries sche torned hire aboute,
> And thries ek she gan doun loute
> And in the flod sche wette hir her,
> And thries on the water ther
> Sche gaspeth with a drecchinge onde,
> And tho sche tok hir speche on honde.

Nor is the framework mere framework. Even apart from the stories, the personages of the shriven lover and of the mistress of whom he speaks have their interest. The psychology—the somewhat conventional psychology—of "romantic" love is understood by Gower, and touched, as Mr. Macaulay says, "with delicacy and refinement." And there is something a little novel in the removal of this amorous idealism from the setting of romance proper to that of actual and contemporary life. The lady is human, and not a wraith of imagination, akin rather to Portia or to Clara Middleton than to Iseult or Guinevere. Pity she is nameless, this earliest of a long line of delicate portraiture!

Digitized by Google

A Bohemian Pessimist.

The Labyrinth of the World. Translated from the Bohemian of Komensky. By Count Lützow. (Swan Sonnenschein. 6s.)

In his introduction, Count Lützow says that "Komensky was overwhelmed with misery" when he sat down to write this remarkable book. And it is easy to see that the book must have been written by a man waking up from the first shock of the discovery of his illusions. Europe had already gone through five years of the Thirty Years' War, and Komensky's wordly property and his own nerves had suffered in the siege of Fulneck. His house "was pillaged and burnt down, and—to him almost a greater loss—his library and MSS. also perished in the flames." This was in 1621. Then followed two anxious years, during which Komensky, although under the protection of the Lord of Zerotin, must have become too well acquainted with all the sensations of an exile and a fugitive. And the wild Bohemian scenery of his hiding-place doubtless only quickened and troubled an imagination already troubled and quickened enough. In a hut within the borders of a great labyrinth of pine woods—probably far more labyrinthine than they are to-day—Komensky, in the bitterness of inactivity, began and finished this strange book which was destined to become a kind of second Bible for Bohemia, and is still read in the Bohemian schools. Doubtless it was the dark forest behind him which suggested the title of the book. I remember standing on the ruined citadel of Brandeis and looking across "the dolorous orlice," as Count Lützow happily describes the little river which breaks the wood, and trying to imagine the feelings of Komensky immersed in those "never-ending pine forests" to which he had fled from a wild scene of religious and political struggle. Given such conditions, it is little wonder, therefore, that the book is so full of earnestness and of passion. Moreover, Komensky was then thirty years old—that is to say, at the time of life when a man has seen enough of the world to be able to pass a judgment upon it, but has not seen enough, perhaps, to be able to make that judgment absolutely just and complete. Count Lützow, to whom English readers owe a great debt for this admirable translation, which is nothing less, although it is something more than a labour of love, tells us that Komensky described the book as a "drama," and certainly it is full enough of the drama of a confused world. But whereas it was an attempt to find "repose in the most tranquil harbour of his conscience" by one who lived through "the storms and sorrows of the sea of the world," it must be said that Komensky is much more interesting when he is describing the "sea" than when he is describing the "harbour." Count Lützow thinks that Komensky should be regarded as a "mystic," and no doubt there is a good deal of so-called "mysticism" in the closing chapters which are entitled "The Paradise of the Heart." But Komensky had too turbulent a brain to be a true mystic. The tranquillity of Eckhart, for instance, is foreign to Komensky's character. He keeps his eye too closely and too constantly on this present world, and, indeed, seems to know it through and through. But the true "mystics" hold aloof. The world's illusions, its noise, its disasters and its mockeries, these are the things which fill Komensky's mind. These feed his imagery, and sometimes his imagery is splendid. But when he moves off from the world of sight to the world of faith his imagination seems suddenly to fail him, and he becomes actually dull. At the very point where a writer like Eckhart or Madame Guyon begins to feel the stimulus of thought, Komensky draws back impoverished. Invariably he requires the excitement of sensible images and impressions, and certainly whenever he is conscious of these he expresses himself with wonderful vividness. He tells us, to be sure, that "the true Christian heedeth not the tumult of the world," but it was because he disobeyed his own precept that he was able to write The Labyrinth. For it is full of the world's heat and tribulation. His "realism" is very remarkable. There is a passage entitled "The Revellers," which reminds the reader of certain parts of Plato's symposium, but it is coarser and more vivid. And since The Labyrinth is frankly a kind of memoires in which Komensky confesses that he has "mainly depicted the adventures of his own life," we almost feel tempted to believe that he may have had as many "adventures" as Saint Augustine, but was only more cautious in his account of them. At any rate, there are passages which show traces of a man who, at least in imagination, has visited most of the waste places of human psychology. There is evidence of a most restless mind, and he speaks of his own "fickleness." Like Giordano Bruno, he travelled far and wide, ran up and down Europe, and visited even England, and has left us a curious description of his "disgust at sea." The two guides who lead him through the labyrinth of the world describe him truthfully enough where they say: "We see that this fellow is restless and wishes constantly to move like quicksilver." Count Lützow has succeeded in conveying the quaint but impressive style of the original, and since the translator is not an Englishman he deserves to be sincerely congratulated on a scholarly piece of work. It must have been no easy task.

Komensky has weighed everything, but has found everything wanting. His bitterness, however, is the bitterness of a sensuous and fiery character. He has been compared to Bunyan, but he has neither the simplicity nor the innocence of Bunyan. As Count Lützow points out, Komensky, or, to give him the Latin form of his name, Comenius, was familiar with worlds of thought and problems of life and of knowledge and a range of literature which Bunyan never realised. He knew gli errori chi serpono nella città. He has a brain far gloomier and essentially mocking and satiric. Nothing which his two guides, Falsehood and Curiosity, point out to him in the world seems to him to be of any fundamental importance. The whole range of human exertion is condemned as so much vanity and vexation of spirit. Everywhere he expresses his huge contempt. From top to bottom he finds, he says, "fearful disorder." And then in a humorous aside he adds: "But as all this had to be called order I dared not say anything." There is, however, one charming note of pathos and regret over lost childhood and youth: "Wait, I will also show him that spot to which we shall not come afterwards. Look, then, backwards towards sunrise!" But Komensky looks for ever towards sunset and the transmutations of things. He has an extraordinary passage on Death, who goes about with a crossbow, and leads mankind "out of the world in some strange fashion." Sic transit written everywhere! Nothing is good enough for Komensky. He gives an unconsciously humorous account of human marriage, which seems to have increased his own sufferings, for he describes it as a very "toilsome" affair. And no form of activity appears to him to be worth the bother. Philosophers, historians, jurists and priests all come under the lash of a judgment as insolent as Carlyle's. And when he mentions "those dear Christians" it is in infinite contempt of the sects which differed from his own. As an instance of the book's vivid manner, take this sentence: "Each one struggled for a place before the seat was cold." And he thus describes a political change which had important results for his own fortunes: "Now it befell that, in my presence, a royal throne suddenly shook, broke into bits and fell to the ground." Rumour, he says, "consists entirely of mouths." And as for fame, he can say nothing strong enough in ridicule: "Then looking around, I behold painters who are sitting and gazing at these men and portraying them; then I asked: 'Why do they this?' The interpreter answered: 'That their names may not pass away and vanish as a voice; the memory of these men will endure.' Then I gaze, and lo! each one of those who had been painted was then thrown into the abyss, just as the others; they left but the image, and that they placed on a pole, that it might be seen by all." It is all much ado about nothing, Komensky thinks. At last, weary of the whole show, he takes refuge in his own conception of the ultimate good which he discovers in the emotions of a Christian. The truth which he would appear to teach is that the search for reality must be not so much outwards as inwards. But who knows where "outward" ends and "inward" begins?

Digitized by Google

Evidently, if a mind like Komensky's keeps looking too long at the world it begins to suffer from a kind of intellectual lock-jaw. Indeed, Komensky seems to possess the secret of his spiritual troubles when he makes one of his guides say to him: "Everything is thine own fault, for thou demandest somewhat great and unusual that no man obtains." In other words, idealists have the worst time of it in this world. Komensky is ready enough with his answer to the gay guide: "Why dost thou not take into account," he asks, "the sweat, tears, groans, sickness, want, downfall and other misfortunes that I see in all the estates, countless, measureless, endless?" Even supposing, therefore, that a man's system of philosophy is only the outcome of his temperament, it is not necessarily illegitimate on that account, because the "temperament" is one of the things to be explained. It is precisely the want of correspondence between human emotion and the course of Nature that constitutes the problem of life. But Komensky has his own panacea. He proposes, as the cure of all his ills, the old-fashioned and orthodox method of "kissing" as, he says, "the rod and stick of God." This, as Count Lützow points out, is essentially Slavic. The advice is, flee from the world. It is to be a sauve qui peut, and the buffeted traveller in The Labyrinth, as in The Pilgrim's Progress, frankly announces his determination to take refuge in flight. This is no solution, however, for the modern mind. On the contrary, the modern mind, religious as well as rationalistic, considers such a doctrine irrational. If God is to be reached, He must be got at through the world. A great deal of the religious faith with which we are familiar is the result of intellectual poltroonery. But a man's brain is a weapon as well as his arm or his hand, and should be used as a weapon and never sheathed and never surrendered at all. Surely there is a noblesse oblige of the intellect. And although the intellect may fail in its long struggle to understand the meaning of existence, yet the struggle is not quite barren because it may, it does succeed in creating the positive quality of spiritual valour.

BENJAMIN SWIFT.

A Book of Bitters.

Dinners and Diners. By Lieut.-Col. Newnham-Davis. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.)

THERE are many possible means of stimulating the appetite for food. Some men take bitters of one kind or another, and pay penalty in the end with impaired digestion. The method is crude, expensive, and unwholesome. Others, more sensible, approach the physical appetite through the imagination, and thus attain fleshly longing by way of the intellect. Men who depend on bitters and such deleterious aids to the stimulus of the dinner gong should remember that to the healthy mind in the healthy body there is no such spur to eating as the reading about eating—if only the writer is really interested. Who, for example, could read the account of that wonderful breakfast of Amyas in Westward Ho! without being fired by the longing for pasties and ale after a morning plunge into the sea? But the book that stimulates to eating is—mark you—not the cookery book, which treats, as it were, de originibus. There is nothing of allurement to the appetite in the details of chopped raw meat, beaten eggs, and maltreated fowls. The reader of the cookery book gains knowledge, but with knowledge comes the disillusionment of the scene-shifter at the pantomime. And cooks, as everybody knows, find difficulty in eating at all, and are, unfortunately, inclined to take it out in drink. A book about brickmaking or stone-cutting stirs in you no enthusiasm for cathedrals, and a work that enters too minutely into the prosaic origin of the daintiest of plats only helps to jeopardise your dinner. The present writer has been hitherto in the habit of using Mrs. Pennell's Feasts of Autolycus as a sort of book of bitters when appetite needs encouragement. For Mrs Pennell deals rather with the dish made perfect, and dwells with no nauseating insistence on the steps by which perfection is reached. But her enthusiasm for the æsthetic side of a cutlet or a salad is infectious, and as you read your mouth waters. Placed in a prison library, the book would add another turn to the torturing screw of deprivation. And as you mount from dish to dish until contentment comes with coffee—in imagination, of course—you feel the exaltation which comes from the reading of stanza after stanza of some loved poet. The appetite and the intellect commingle, and eating becomes one of the fine arts.

With Lieut.-Colonel Newnham-Davis's Dinners and Diners comes an alternative bitters, and in quite the most accessible shelf of at least one dressing-room it will find a place among the books which are good to read in the spare quarter of an hour which should be sacred to the cultivation of appetite. Colonel Newnham-Davis deals, as he should, with the choice and the consumption of food in its finished state rather than with the preparation of raw meats. There are one or two recettes given, autographed by famous chefs, but they may be skipped. Colonel Newnham-Davis takes London in the largest sense of the word for his topic, London as a place to dine in. Where shall I dine, and what shall I have for dinner? Now that so many people dine at large, the question must have occurred to everyone who is in the habit of dining at all. Our author has dined steadily through London, from Richmond to Greenwich. He has dined "on guard" at St. James's Palace, and he has eaten at a "Kosher" restaurant in the City, where you will find a little copy of the Ten Commandments let into the doorpost, and always he takes at least one of us with him. The host is always the same, but we vary. Now we are a young failure who wants to get into the Yeomanry, and we are dined at the St. James's for thirteen-and-six. Now we are an Eton boy, and eat bravely through a Trocadero dinner (twelve lines of print), and drink champagne, costing our host £1 18s. At other times we are Miss Dainty, or Mrs. Tota, or a maiden aunt. Once we are a Princess, whom Colonel Newnham-Davis takes appropriately to dine at Claridge's; and the bill comes to £3 12s. Were Princesses more frequent as guests than they are, one would thank the gods if, like Xerxes, they required but one meal a day.

But what of our host? What manner of man is he? Well, a good man to dine with, the reader will say. From his book it is possible to reconstruct him, or at least to gain some idea of the generous entertainer who scatters so many sovereigns that our mouths may water. He is a "man about town," with a wide nodding acquaintance; for as we wait for the soup he points out Cabinet Ministers, leaders of society, actresses, artists, and men of letters, and once we were within twenty-four hours of dining under the same roof with the then Prince of Wales. Nor is it only the great and good that we encounter, for in the American bar at the Criterion we make ocular acquaintance with bookmakers and "sports." He is also—those fifty or sixty diners excuse it—a trifle corpulent, for we are told incidentally that attendance at a levée is out of the question until the tunic of his early manhood is replaced by something more ample. And—this is most important—he has the right way with waiters and those who direct them. If you want to dine well ask at once for the head waiter or the manager. "If you or I, in the absence of the mâitre d'hôtel and the head waiter, fall into the hands of an underling, heaven help us . . . The manager is the man to look for, if possible, when composing a menu. The higher you reach up that glorious scale of responsibility which runs from manager to marmiton, the more intelligent help you will get in ordering your dinner, the more certain you are to have an artistic meal, and not to be spending money unworthily." Now our host has the soldier's way with the waiter, the diplomatist's way with the manager, and the combined ways will usually ensure a good dinner. He knows who is the chef here, whence he came, and whither he will probably go. He is on distantly genial terms with head waiters—who are, after all, men, and not only automatic money machines, and when he dines the Eton boy at the Trocadero, he introduces him to Mr. Lyons. The Eton boy said the dinner was jolly good. He applied the same epithets to the Empire. And finally our host takes a boyish delight in the appurtenances of feeding. His wave of the hand towards the Cupids on the ceiling, the candelabra, the flowers on the table, the dark-green panelling—that alone makes one hungry.

Digitized by Google

But London is not built for the three-guinea diner alone. And for the man who cannot afford to spend fifteen hundred a year on taking Princesses out to dinner, Colonel Newnham-Davis provides consolation. In Soho our host finds restaurants where one may eat, without sacrificing self-respect, for half-a-crown (without wine) or even eighteen-pence. Of these, too, he writes with unabated enthusiasm, taking the good where he finds it. To the man who has an appetite and a few shillings in his pocket wherewith to satisfy it, Colonel Newnham-Davis supplies a valuable guide. The man who has the shillings but no appetite, ought to get an appetite by reading of dinners enjoyed.

Fine Pickings.

"The Prose Works of Jonathan Swift, D.D." Vol. II.: The Journal to Stella. Edited by Frederick Ryland. (Bell & Sons.)

The Journal of Stella. Edited by G. A. Aitken. (Methuen. 6s.)

"The relations between Mrs. Johnson and Dr. Swift have been the despair of judicious biographers," says Mr. Ryland. They are also the despair of judicious reviewers, and we shall say nothing about them. Fascinating as literary biography is, and always will be, it is apt to be valued too much for its own sake. "Chatter about Harriet" long ago fell like a drop-scene between the public and Shelley's writings. The Brontës have to some extent superseded their books, and stories of Rossetti have become more popular than his poetry. Much the same thing has happened with the Brownings; it is in some quarters considered more disgraceful to be ignorant of a fact in their lives than to be unread in their works. The criticism of investigation is become more common than the criticism of appreciation. That is why Mr. Herbert Paul's recent book, Essays in Criticism, was so welcome, and yet so staggering, to his readers. It was based on reading, not on rooting.

Swift's Journal to Stella is, of course, not to be read without due knowledge of Swift and of Stella. But the book is the thing, and the book is full of the finest pickings. It is an ideal diary, being written by a great man in an interesting age, for the eyes of a woman with whom he was in close intellectual sympathy. It gives us the small change of Swift's mind, with gold pieces slipping in by accident. The very buzz of court and street and coffee-house survives in these delightful pages, written every night with infinite wit and tenderness before the writer blew out his candle. It is easier to say what the Journal does not contain than to say what it does contain. All "Queen Anne" is here. And what tantalisations mingle with what satisfactions! "Mr. Addison and I dined together at his lodgings, and I sat with him part of this evening; and I am now come home to write an hour." Not a word of what Addison said. Again and again he dines with Addison, at a City merchant's, at a great lord's, or in a hedge tavern, and somehow neglects to give us a flash of Addison's wit. But, indeed, Swift rarely reports conversations. He showers suggestions. "I dined to-day [October 25, 1710] with Mr. Addison, Steele, and a sister of Mr. Addison, who is married to one Mons. Sartre, a Frenchman, prebendary of Westminster, who has a delicious house and garden; yet I thought it was a sort of monastic life in those cloisters, and I liked Laracor [his Irish living] better. Addison's sister is a sort of wit, very like him. I am not fond of her." Swift's impatience with the declining Tatler extended to Steele, of whom he remarks petulantly in one place: "He is the worst company in the world till he has a bottle of wine in his head."

Petulance lends a rare sauce to the whole of the Journal, for it is the petulance of the moment, and proves the sincerity and naturalness of every word. No good critic has ever hinted that the Journal to Stella was written for publication. "These letters of mine," he says, "are a sort of journal where matters open by degrees; and, as I tell true or false, you will find by the event whether my intelligence be good; but I don't care two-pence whether it be or no." A few hours later he writes: "To-day I was all about St. Paul's, up at the top, like a fool, with Sir Andrew Fountaine and two more, and spent seven shillings for my dinner like a puppy; this is the second time he has served me so; but I will never do it again, though all mankind should persuade me; unconsidering puppies." Swift is referring, of course, to his poverty. He rattles on:

> There's a young fellow here in town we are all fond of, and about a year or two come from the university, one Harrison, a little pretty fellow, with a great deal of wit, good sense, and good nature; has written some mighty pretty things—that in your 6th "Miscellanea," about the Sprig of Orange, is his; he has nothing to live on but being governor to one of the Duke of Queensberry's sons for forty pounds a year. The fine fellows are always inviting him to the tavern, and make him pay his chit. Henley is a great crony of his; they are often at the tavern at six or seven shillings reckoning, and always makes the poor lad pay his full share. A colonel and a lord were at him and me the same way to-night: I absolutely refused, and made Harrison lag behind, and persuaded him not to go to them. I tell you this because I find all rich fellows have that humour of using all people without any consideration of their fortunes; but I will see them rot before they shall serve me so. Lord Halifax is always teasing me to go down to his country house, which will cost me a guinea to his servants, and twelve shillings coach-hire, and he shall be hanged first.

Thus, hundreds of times, is a picture of the age flashed on us; and always the style is inimitably naïve, jerky, rapid, and prehensile. In all the hurly-burly there are threads which we keep. The history of Swift's excellent poem, "The Shower," may be gathered as we go along. Thus:

> Oct. 10, 1710.—I am now writing my poetical Description of a Shower in London, and will send it to the Tatler.
>
> 12.—I have finished my poem on the Shower all but the beginning.

Digitized by Google

13.—Lookee, gentlewomen, if I write long letters I must write you news and stuff, unless I send you my verses; and some I dare not; and those on the Shower in London I have sent to the Tatler, and you may see them in Ireland.

17.—This day came out the Tatler, made up wholly of my Shower, and a preface to it. They say 'tis the best thing I ever writ, and I think so too. I suppose the Bishop of Clogher will show it you. Pray tell me how you like it.

20.—Tell me how my Shower is liked in Ireland: I never knew anything pass better here.

27.—Mr. Rowe, the poet, desired me to dine with him to-day. I went to his office (he is Under-Secretary in Mr. Addison's place that he had in England), and there was Mr. Prior; and they both fell commending my Shower beyond anything that has been written of the kind; there never was such a Shower since Danae's, etc.

Nov. 2.—Mr. Dopping (an Irish friend of Stettin's) I have seen, and he tells me coldly, my Shower is liked well enough; that is your Irish judgment.

8.—The Tatler upon Ithuriel's spear is not mine, madam. What a puzzle there is between you and your judgment? In general, you may be sometimes sure of things as that about Style [a Tatler paper written by Swift], because it is what I have frequently spoken of; but. . . . I defy mankind if I please. Why, I writ a pamphlet when I was last in London, that you and a thousand have seen, and never guessed it to be mine! Could you have guessed the Shower in Town to have been mine?

10.—I dined to-day at Lady Lucy's, where they ran down my Shower.

28.—I had a letter to-day from the Bishop of Clogher. . . . He says I bid him read the London Shaver, and that you both [Stella and her companion, Mrs. Dingley] swore it was Shaver, and not Shower. You all lie, and you are puppies, and can't read Presto's [his own] hand. The Bishop is out entirely in his conjectures of my share in the Tatler.

30.—The Bishop of Clogher says he has seen something of mine of the same sort, better than the Shower. I suppose he means the Morning; but it is not half so good. I want your judgment of things, and not your country's.

Dec. 14.—I suppose you think it a piece of affectation in me to wish your Irish folks would not like my Shower; but you are mistaken. I should be glad to have the general applause there as I have here (though I say it), but I have only that of one or two, and therefore I would have none at all, but let you all be in the wrong. I don't know, this is not what I would say; but I am so tosticated with supper and stuff that I can't express myself.

What have we here but the very impact of an eighteenth century composition on the eighteenth century world? All through the Journal literature, politics, and society scintillate in little actualities which time has made precious. Consider this: "I was this morning at ten at the rehearsal of Mr. Addison's play, called 'Cato,' which is to be acted on Friday. There were not above half-a-score of us to see it. We stood on the stage, and it was foolish enough to see the actors prompted at every moment, and the poet directing them: and the drab that acts Cato's daughter [Mrs. Oldfield] out in the midst of a passionate part, and then calling out, 'What's next?'" And this picture (May 19, 1711) of a rural Chelsea in the spoiling: "Do you know that about our town we are mowing already and making hay, and it smells so sweet as we walk through the flowery meads; but the haymaking nymphs are perfect drabs, nothing so clean and pretty as further in the country There is a mighty increase of dirty wenches in straw hats since I knew London."

It would be invidious to compare the two editions of the Journal before us. Messrs. Bell's takes its place in a complete edition of Swift's works, which is itself conditioned by the Bohn Library, to which it belongs. Mr. Lecky's general introduction to the set, printed in the first volume, is of great value. Messrs. Methuen's edition is a separate publication, and it has the advantage of annotation by a critic, who, already in his edition of Defoe's works, and in his life of Steele, has proved himself one of the keenest and most accurate explorers of the eighteenth century.

Poems of a Novelist

Selections from the Poems of S. Weir Mitchell, M.D., LL.D., Edinburgh. (Macmillan. 5s. net.)

THESE poems, selected (we are told) from eight thin volumes published between 1886 and 1889, represent the excursions into verse of an American novelist, whose reputation has been deservedly won by much ability. The volume has considerable merit and attraction: yet it must be said that Dr. Weir Mitchell shows conclusively that he is no poet. He lacks quintessential emotion, he has not the lyric touch, even his thought (and the verse is thoughtful) is not beyond the compass of the average cultured and reflective mind, and there is a conspicuous lack of metrical ease and felicity. He does not take naturally to metre, but moves (so to speak) like a conscientiously trained swimmer; his work is wrought into verse instead of creating verse by its own impulse. The chief exception to these strictures is the opening "Ode on a Lycian Tomb," and even that transcends his wonted level only in the first three stanzas. It is too long; he has outlasted the inspiration which bore him safely over the commencement. There he had the advantage of Keats's example, and this derivative impulse gives an alien nobility to the stanzas, which ceases when the external guidance fails. It is the idea of the "Ode to a Grecian Urn" reapplied to a new yet kindred theme, which carries off those first three stanzas; and the diction, the style, derive from the same source. But the idea is well reapplied, the style well copied. The "tomb" in question bears (as a foot-note tells us) one female figure in eighteen attitudes of grief, separated by Doric columns. Thus the poem opens:

> What gracious nunnery of grief is here!
> One woman garbed in sorrow's every mood;
> Each sad presentment celled apart, in fear
> Lest that herself upon herself intrude
> And break some tender dream of sorrow's day,
> Here cloistered lonely, set in marble gray.
>
> O, pale procession of immortal love,
> For ever married to immortal grief!
> All life's high-passioned sorrow far above,
> Past help of time's compassionate relief:
> These changeless stones are treasuries of regret
> And mock the term by time for sorrow set.
>
> Ah me! what tired hearts have hither come
> To weep with thee, and give thy grief a voice;
> And such as have not added to life's sum
> The count of loss, they who do still rejoice
> In love which time yet leaveth unassailed,
> Here tremble, by prophetic sadness paled.

That is very felicitous. The fourth line of the first stanza, the first two, the fourth, and the last of the second stanza, are quite memorable, and of high poetic quality. Were they unimitative, without a model, they would suggest great ideas of Dr. Mitchell's power: even as it is, were such a note, or anything approaching it, sustained through any considerable portion of the volume, we could never have made the pronouncement with which we started this review. But they disappear with the turning of the page, to reappear no more throughout the book. Nor is anything to be found there at all on a level with them, though (it might be) in another kind. The rest is hard, and not anywise "high-passioned"—in Dr. Mitchell's Keatsian phrase.

Yet we have said the book shows ability, and has interest. Its ability is precisely in the kind where the author can get near the art of the novelist; and in proportion as he recedes from that art he fails. It is in the dramatic monologues or narratives, and above all in the actual dramatic pieces, short though they be. They have nothing of poetical quality, neither imagination nor imagery, so far as diction is concerned; their imagination lies purely in construction and characterisation.

Digitized by Google

"François Villon" is notable for its resemblance in plot to a celebrated play of the present day (Dr. Mitchell being prior, we conclude, in publication), "Cyrano de Bergerac." It is not a play, but a narrative, in form of a dramatic duologue. The plot, as in M. Rostand's well-known drama, turns on a man wooing his mistress through the medium of another. But in Dr. Mitchell's poem it is done through the medium of verses supplied by the other man—no less a person than the poet Villon. The lady, after marriage, discovers the cheat, and declares her love due to the poet, not his employer; with the ultimate result of a duel, when Villon is found serenading under her window. She kisses his dead face, after her husband has run him through the body. It is well told, though essentially after the fashion of the novelist rather than of the poet. One of the few poetic touches is when the noble husband, finding his wife has become alienated from him, yet not guessing the reason, applies to the peasant rhymer to furnish him verses which shall renew her love, as verses won it; and is mockingly refused. The thing is impossible, says Villon, and chalks up drunkenly on the tavern wall:

> If God love to a sexton gave,
> Surely he would dig it a grave;
> If God fitted an ass with wings,
> What would he do with the pretty things?

It is a pretty epigram on the uselessness of verse to the illiterate noble, or of gained love to the man incapable of retaining it.

But the best thing in the book is the short dramatic piece, "Francis Drake." The author has wisely thrown aside all endeavour to make it an acting drama, a play: it is a less possible stage-piece than "Pippa Passes." No stage—hardly the Elizabethan, with its splendid independence of scenery—could represent its shifting and difficult scenes, passing from ship to boat and ship's side; nay, involving the transit of a boat from one ship's side to another. But it is truly dramatic in the reading, and deals with a remarkably interesting story. It is the narrative of how, in the expedition against Panama, Drake's trusted friend, Thomas Doughty, played traitor to him, being won over by Burleigh, before the voyage started, to thwart the scheme, lest it should provoke Spain to open declaration of war. Consequently, when the fleet is delayed for a time by contrary weather in the Straits of Magellan, he incites the seamen and the gentlemen adventurers to mutiny, and compel the return of the fleet to England. Doughty is the real hero of the drama. He is represented (in accordance with history) as a singularly fascinating personage—scholar, soldier, fearless, and with a genius for making friends, which he uses in pursuit of his design. Discovered by Drake, Drake for a time is lenient with him, but at last is compelled to arrest him, and, after due trial, sentence him to death. Under the sentence of death, the singular qualities of the man come out. In sight of the block, he takes the Sacrament with Drake, and banquets gaily with him and his former friends, taking final leave as though he were but going on a journey. All this is historical: but Dr. Mitchell's art appears by the manner in which he makes credible and visible the man's fascination and courage, despite the treachery of his design. Our sole objection to an otherwise most interesting little dramatic piece is that Dr. Mitchell is no humorist. Vicary, the Mercutio of the piece, "jokes wi' deeficulty." An interesting book: though scarce the work of a poet.

Other New Books.

'Twixt Sirdar and Menelik. By Capt. M. S. Wellby.

Gradually we are getting light thrown on the mysterious country whch lies on the borders of Abyssinia and the Soudan. It is one of the few districts which has not been run over by tourists and sportsmen, and the men who penetrate into it can still claim to be looked upon as pioneers. Captain Wellby, the author of the latest book on the country, was a young officer of the 18th Hussars, who, in August 1898, joined Lieutenant-Colonel Harrington at Harrar, and journeyed with the British Agent to Menelik's Court at Addis Adeba. He was fortunate enough to ingratiate himself with the Abyssinian Sovereign, and obtained leave to travel through every part of the country. So, in December, 1898, he started, without any white companion, through the unknown parts of Abyssinia, and through the "devil-infested country of Walamo," as far as Lake Rudolf. He passed round south of the great lake, and then turning north, followed the river Ruzi from its source to where it runs into the Sobat at Nasser, and so on to Khartoum, and down the Nile to Cairo. A glance at the map will show the extent and value of the journey, and the easy and unaffected style in which Captain Wellby tells of his wanderings with a caravan of natives makes the book a fascinating one, even for the general and ungeographical reader. On its value to the student of the interior of Africa there is no need to insist; it is a work which will well repay careful study.

Of Harrar, that important town which should now be under the Union Jack were it not for the limpness which characterises all our dealings abroad, Captain Wellby says: "Anybody who pays Harrar a visit will wonder why the place was ever allowed to slip from our hands, for it is an important district, both commercially and strategically; and as soon as the Abyssinians come to a reasonable understanding, and have more direct dealings with Europeans, its value is bound to increase tenfold." We have allowed this valuable centre of the trade of North-east Africa to pass into the hands of Menelik, and we must now do the best we can to see that the trade does not pass into other hands. The people eagerly inquired why the English did nothing to help the inhabitants of Hargeisa by constructing a line from Berbera to Harrar. King Menelik, it appears, has strict ideas of Court dress where Europeans are concerned, and Captain Wellby tells a pleasant little story of Prince Henry of Orleans, who went into the presence of the King attired in shooting costume. It appears that dress-clothes are what the Abyssinian monarch considers fitting for his dignity, and so he remarked, sternly, when he saw the descendant of the kings of France: "Who is this person who does not know how to appear before a king?" Captain Wellby arrived at Omdurman, after his adventurous journey, in the July following the great battle which broke the power of the Dervishes, and soon afterwards rejoined his regiment in South Africa. He arrived at Ladysmith just before the investment, and went all through the siege. Just a year ago, he was seriously wounded in a skirmish with the Boers, and died at Paardekop, on August 5, 1900. Those who read his book will feel the loss as that of a personal friend, so charming is the character which is expressed in every page of the work. Dog lovers, too, will note, with regret, that the author's little fox-terrier, "Lady," which went through all the journey, was lost in the Soudan between Atbara and Khartoum. (Harper's. 16s.)

The Life and Times of Sydney Smith. By S. J. Reid.

We cordially welcome this cheap edition of a biography, the four editions of which bear testimony to its interest and value. Intended not to rival, but to supplement the biography of Sydney Smith by his daughter, Lady

Digitized by Google

Holland, in effect it furnishes a mass of new information, anecdotes, letters, etc., which greatly extends our knowledge of the famous and witty parson, whose reputation in London society and personal intercourse exceeds the actual value of his necessarily ephemeral literary remains, though we are far from underrating the value which his genius has stamped even on these. They are ephemeral only as regards subject and object. Mr. Reid has enjoyed special advantages in the help of Sydney Smith's decendants and all who could furnish fresh light, details, and letters; and he has set the man in his milieu, sketching in the brilliant group, or rather groups, of contemporaries who act as reflecting mirrors to set off his own fascinating personality. The result is a book interesting to the last page. For wit and humour are not merely among the most immortal of things; they are of universal appeal, which cannot be said of poetry; philosophy, eloquence, or even novel-writing, apart from the ingredient of humour. (Sampson Low.)

SPRINGTIME IN THE BASQUE MOUNTAINS. BY ARTHUR LASENBY LIBERTY.

As a drill-ground for students of the gentle art of skipping this book is a success. On the second page of the narrative we have a foot-note authorising the reader to jump forward to page 49, "for even the author realises that Part I. is uninteresting." We gladly accepted the privilege, but it was only to find ourselves immersed deeper in the small beer of travel. Of our own motion we leaped to page 149, and then to 249, but although here and there the narrative is crisper, we found it insufferably tedious in the mass. Letters written home by an ordinary pen, and then printed end on end in a book, even when "prepared for the press," do not make literature. This book contains scores and scores of passages like the following:

> We agreed that the path must lead ultimately into the worn track we had followed for so long last evening, which surmise proved correct. Then once again we stood at the self-same meeting of the ways where we had lingered in the twilight to admire the scenery around the Pas de Rolande. But we found three ways met here instead of two, and, further, that we had failed last evening to notice the one by which we had mounted up so easily to-day. In the broad daylight we felt quite clever and superior people, and benignly pitied the follies of the "Pilgrims of the Night."

Mr. Liberty spares us no detail or cliché.

To do him justice, he offers his text as an environment to the photographs taken by Mrs. Liberty. Many of these are charming, and they are admirably printed. (Grant Richards. 12s.)

In Twenty Thousand Miles of Road Travel in Central and Western Europe, Mr. W. J. A. Stamer essays to write not a simple book of travels, but "a treatise on men and manners, on foreigners and foreign things," and, among other things, to tell us why we English are so hated on the Continent. Mr. Stamer expresses his opinions freely and naturally, and that is the chief merit of his book. His opinions are rather breezy than subtle, and he has much scorn for English husbands and wives, and the London Sunday. The book is certainly not a treatise, but a medley—the medley, however, of one who has travelled far and observed with some care. It will interest those who have travelled in Italy, France, and Germany, as a budget of impressions by a talkative and resourceful traveller over the same ground. (Chapman and Hall. 12s.)

Messrs. Cassell have now issued their serial History of the Boer War in a stout volume. It has the characteristic merits of "Belle Sauvage" publications, and at seven-and-sixpence is generous value for money.

Fiction.

The Serious Wooing: a Heart's History. By John Oliver Hobbes. (Methuen. 6s.)

THE morals and customs of certain smart sets of modern society are not edifying, but they are part of the social fabric of our time, and in this, her new novel of manners, Mrs. Craigie has caught them on the wing. She uses the novelist's right to choose the material that suits the planned purpose: hence this clever picture of the unmoral, selfish, indulgent days of such a family as the Ragots. The mother, Lady Ragot, "who looked like a very pretty doll who had, by some accident, got wrinkled," was daughter of the twelfth Baron Dundrum, and widow of the late Sir Algernon Ragot, Baronet, formerly of Holt Park, Suffolk. To her were born three daughters and a son, and the second daughter was Rosabel, who had been married at sixteen—"it was all mamma's doing"—to an imbecile peer. "Shortclough was a crétin from the beginning," says Archie Wardle. "I can see him now as he looked on their wedding-day—his swivel eye rolling horribly, and that wobbly under-lip turned down as far as the chin-line." It is to narrate the great episode in the life of the pretty, attractive Countess of Shortclough that Mrs. Craigie has evolved this sparkling background of smart folk. Rosabel is of them, but in her emotional, undisciplined way, she has the desire to escape, to live the life that her inarticulate soul dimly cries for. She is a rebel against her set, fancying that she wants, under her lover's influence, "to work among the poor, and give up the old, frivolous business" She is, at any rate, capable of one thing—a great passion; and to that, so far as this book goes, she is faithful—splendidly faithful. For Jocelyn Luttrel (a Socialist, with three hundred thousand pounds, who gives it all away to his Cause with a stroke of the pen) she defies her world, going away with him, while her husband is still living, but returning, the next morning, when she learns, through her brother, that her flight will jeopardise her young sister's marriage to the Duke of Beauleigh. Through the lies and deceptions of her relatives she is led to believe that Luttrel has forsaken her, and they force her into a marriage with Lord Wroxall, an elderly, faithful admirer. Finally discovering the conspiracy against Luttrel, who has been true to her all through, she leaves her second husband to follow Luttrel, "poverty stricken, through Europe."

Students of fiction in years to come will have no difficulty in placing the period of this book. There are allusions to the opening of Parliament, to "San Toy," to Bennett the murderer, to Anatole France's M. Bergeret à Paris, to Mrs. Botha, and to pictures by Lenbach, Sargent, and Constant. Here is the Constant picture of Rosabel:

> She sits, queenly, on a Byzantine throne: there is a sort of heavenly rhetoric about the whole composition: the famous chestnut hair is more sunny than her blazing diadem: her cheeks declare with brilliance, that errors of the blood, not of the mind, might drive the most rare creature to heroism: the proud nostrils all but quiver with the fervour of a pink, celestial thought or two: it is not lifelike, but it is marvellously suggestive of womanhood dressed for conquest, for tragedy, or for a family gallery of painted ancestors—some by right of adventure.

The subsidiary characters are convincingly sketched in. Susie, "who was watching them both with a young girl's half-devising blindness—a thing truer in its judgments than the long experience of human folly can warrant." Miss Luttrel, "spare, with a fine gaunt chest, plunging black eyes, and no nonsense discernible about the knees." Huxter, who "made splendid salmon-flies, wrote for the Field, and was a country squire of perfect breeding, small means, and scholarly tastes." Mr. Odo Ceppel, who remarked, "Do not use expressions whch you cannot understand. Do I have temptations? Certainly not. People who conduct themselves properly do not know what the word means." It was this gentleman, her brother-in-law, of whom Rosabel said: "If they would only make mutton and mashed potatoes expensive, dear Odo would get perfectly well." Father Stonyhurst, the Jesuit priest, is quite a refreshment in this company of worldlings, who never "mis-read a letter, undervalued a favour, overdid a kindness, nelected a rising power, or dropped too hurriedly a falling one."

Digitized by Google

> As he [the Jesuit Priest] had spent his own life learning how to die, it always seemed a little astonishing to him, in spite of his great experience as a Director of consciences, that men should be so eager to extract every possibility, as quickly as possible, from existence, and cling to it, and pray to have it prolonged, and love it—even in circumstances when it seemed to offer nothing except pain and disappointments.

The story is told with all the wit and the power of characterisation that Mrs. Craigie has at command. Satire is abundant, and the falseness, the meanness, the pettiness of the men and women who compose the Ragot smart set, are revealed with an infinity of small touches, and a ripple of good-humoured contempt, that produces all the effect the author intended. Her world took Rosabel's flight with pleasant cynicism. It was all part of the game, and her nearest and dearest condemned chiefly Rosabel's imprudence. It would have been so easy, one whispered, to arrange matters with this importunate lover, even after her second marriage. The Dowager Duchess of Beauleigh declared that there was something to be said for her. "She herself never said that something, but one of her glances went a long way." Rosabel suffered from her bringing up. In her heart this pretty sport of Passion despised her set. Life with her lover, so she thought, had an intention and some meaning; "without him it looked forlorn, contemptible enough, and base." It is significant of the times, this picture of a society without religion, obeying no law except prudence, regarding, with amused tolerance and contempt for its very frankness, the action of one of their number who thought their world well lost for love. Rosabel enlists our sympathy. She at least had the courage to be loyal to a great passion.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

LA BELLA, AND OTHERS. BY EGERTON CASTLE.

Eight spirited short stories, "originally published elsewhere," by the author of Young April. They are divided into four sections: "Clank of Steel," "Silhouettes," "Temptations," and "Rococo." The third paragraph of the dedication, which is to Walter Herries Pollock, runs: "In my younger days of literary bashfulness, you were the first expert to give me that word of quiet approval which was 'sufficient and necessary' to keep me going on a new and pleasing pursuit." (Macmillan. 3s. 6d.)

LOVE AND THE MASK. BY MENÉ MURIEL DOWIE.

This well-written and entertaining novel, by the author of Gallia and The Crook of the Bough, has for background the heavy clouds of the Boer War in its early stages. Not so much the actual fighting, as its effect upon those who stayed at home, and waited. It is mainly an analysis of the emotional life of Leslie Rose, the heroine. "Life baffled her, as it does most women; the closer they get to grips with it, the more unmanageable does it become. . . A mad mistake to be awake, to be twenty-seven, to be beautiful, to have thought things out, and to want—well, for lack of a word, Leslie called it 'everything.'" (Heinemann. 6s.)

MARY HAMILTON. BY LORD ERNEST HAMILTON

A romance of the days of Mary, Queen of Scots. "Being the chronicles of Anne Cunninghame, sometime waiting woman and humble friend to that most sweet and lovely lady." "Mary Hamilton was twelve years old when I was first sent for to Andrew's Knowes, I being at that time sixteen. . . . She was tall for a woman, though not within an inch of my own great height, and as straight and upright as a ship's mast." (Methuen. 6s.)

MISTRESS NELL. BY G. C. HAZELTON, JUN.

"It is the vogue," says Mr. Hazelton in a foreword, "to dramatise successful novels." The author of the present Nell Gwyn story has pursued the contrary course. His "merry" play of the same name was written and produced before he undertook to compose this tale, suggested by the same historic sources. (Murray. 3s. 6d.)

BOTH SIDES OF THE VEIL. BY RICHARD MARSH.

Eleven stories dealing, in Mr. Marsh's "well-known manner," with matters "human and superhuman." They are all readable. Mr. Marsh's superhumanity is genial rather than creepy, and when he has a story to tell he begins right away, as: "It was beastly weather," or "Directly I entered Walter's room I perceived that there was something the matter." (Methuen. 6s.)

HENRY BOURLAND. BY A. E. HANCOCK.

From America. It begins: "Before daybreak, on the 12th of April, 1861, the hush of Nature's peace brooded over the fair lands of Virginia." In a foreword the author says: "This book is an endeavour by one bred in the North to write sympathetically the annals of a Virginia family. . . . In one sense the narrative is fiction; but in another and truer sense, for most of the incidents have warrant in fact, it is a history of general conditions turned into the concrete." (Macmillan. 6s.)

THE LITTLE TIN GODS. BY JESSIE E. LIVESAY.

A cleverly entitled story, into which we dip and read: "'Sometimes I am sorely tempted to throw up the sponge, and sink to the level of the shopkeepers; for the hall-mark seems to stick to me, I can't get rid of it. Why, oh why, were our pickles so largely advertised?' cried Lady Perry, throwing up her hands in despair." (Hurst and Blackett. 6s.)

DOL SHACKLEFIELD. BY HEBER K. DANIELS.

A melo-dramatic police story, in which the heroine performs much racing and chasing, and private detecting, and hiding and standing at bay. All written rather breathlessly, with great use of the dash. (F. V. White. 6s.)

THE SEVEN HOUSES. BY HAMILTON DRUMMOND.

A French historical romance by the author of For the Religion. "In his padded settle by the gaping western hearth of the great hall sat Guy de Lheeac, Seigneur of that name, and seventh Suzerain in direct succession. . . . 'What news, brother?' cried the Seigneur, rising to meet his fellow-shadow half way? 'Is the pother ended? By the saints! but this coming into the world is a plaguey slow business.'" (Ward, Lock. 6s.)

THE THIRTEEN EVENINGS. BY GEORGE BARTRAM.

The evenings were spent in the smoking-room of the Boomerang Club, where the members took it in turns to narrate strange experiences. They were a travelled lot, learned in strange by-ways of life, and they talked of hypnotism, the mysteries of Obi, "the freaks of modern Corinthianism," Vampires, and so on. (Methuen. 6s.)

Digitized by Google

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage, One Halfpenny, Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscription, prepaid (including postage) 17/6
" Quarterly 5/0
" Price for one issue /5

Art and Life.

ART, though in its cruder forms it seems to pervade life, is artificial and negligible. It is the embroidery on the coverlet that keeps us warm at night We are happier with it, but we could be happy without it. A man may say that an appreciation of the classics alone makes life tolerable to him, but put him in an ice-house with Homer, and tell him that he may emerge only on condition of leaving Homer for ever behind, and he will leave Homer for ever behind. Life is, indeed, constantly and rudely reminding us that art is a mere game of make-believe, a diversion and a solace to be employed in the moments when life is a little less business-like than usual. We don't turn to Adonais while our friend is dying, but only when he is dead and there is nothing else to do. When life chooses to become intense, art is nowhere, neglected like a mistress in the wars, forgotten like a fable. The toothache will annihilate Beethoven's C minor symphony. Art is a very little thing, and only by borrowing some of the greatness of life can it become great. All the great works of art have simple, primitive, elemental themes, and achieve their greatness as much by their themes as by their execution. What shall be said, then, of the art which, avoiding the grand and permanent simplicities of life, turns for its theme to art itself, seeking to artificialise the artificial, to build a convention on a convention, to embroider the embroidery?

We have been led to this consideration, and to the somewhat facile pomposity of our title, by the perusal of a little book of admirable tales called Crucial Instances (Murray) by a novelist who truly deserves that often misapplied epithet, "distinguished"—Edith Wharton. Mrs. Wharton persistently does her best work in writing about art, artists, and the other people who make of art their chief pre-occupation. And, though she not improbably is unaware of her limitation—since she gives prominence in this book to the conspicuous failures of it, her fine and rare talent is quite confined to that narrow circle of artificiality which is called art. Of the seven stories, two are about authors, two are about pictures, one is about a painter, and the remaining two alone—the first and the last—deal with sheer stark life. These latter are both concerned with adultery. One is a flat, painstaking recital of a nineteenth century Italian melodrama. The other is a mediæval legend closely resembling the most famous of all Balzac's short stories, told in a manner which would fain be Balzacian, but is not. Here we are sorrowfully compelled to listen to the strident shouting, over the bleak ways of life, of a voice which, in the close air of the studio, can be full of subtle significance and quiet impressiveness. We guess that the author means to strike us down by imaginative force, but all we are conscious of is a futile beating of the air with violent similes.

> Cypresses that cut the shunshine like basalt shafts,
> Maimed statues stretched their arms like rows of whining beggars,
> A heavy door behind which the cold lurked like a knife,
> A quibbling mouth that would have snapped at verbal errors like a lizard catching flies,
> Lizards shot out of the cracked soil like flames,
> White domes and roofs flashed like a smile.

Not thus, by the reiteration of likes, by the machinery of bizzare comparisons, is the tragic atmosphere to be created, but rather by simple and direct fervency of statement.

> This done, he went on shipboard, and is now
> A Seaman, a gray-headed Mariner.

There is tragedy, haunting and profound, got by the simple directness of Wordsworth's art, which suited the simple directness of his theme. But it is a proviso of Mrs. Wharton's gift that she cannot be direct. Her force curiously depends on its obliquity. She can only arrive at her destination by going somewhere else. She can only describe one thing by describing another. She is bound to talk the delicate and dulcet language of hints which Mr. Henry James and herself have perfected. And so she fails whenever her theme demands singleness, simplicity, naïveté. But when she leaves the few simple passions and desires of which real essential life is made, and comes to the unreal bewildering overlay of conventions which the leisured classes have constructed for themselves, and whose "complexity" they bewail, then she is at home; then she can be herself; then she can point at a truth with her elbow while looking the other way, convey a statement of fact while uttering the exact opposite, and generally achieve the highest virtuosity of fencing. One tale in this book, "The Recovery," is a little masterpiece; we say a little one. It is about an American citizen, who, by means of an instrument made for that purpose, daubed coloured pigments on oblong pieces of canvas in a particular way. He thought that no one had ever daubed with such skill as himself. But he had not been to Europe, where this craft of daubing had been carried on for hundreds of years A female admirer arranged for a number of his oblong pieces of daubed canvas to be hung on the walls of a room in Paris, where people could see them. The American citizen also came to Paris. The exhibition of his canvasses was not a failure, but he discovered, to his horror, that the European daubers had daubed in a different style from himself, and a better. For hours he was in despair, and then suddenly he resolved to learn the European method of daubing. And that is all. No question of love, hunger, pain, death; but merely this question of how to daub, which all the characters take seriously, as if it really mattered. And yet a masterpiece, though a little one. The extraordinary jargon of the inhabitants of that world where daubing is done, and when done is discussed, is rendered with a fidelity that will charm the initiate.

> "He's too impossible!" cried Mrs. Davant, sweeping her at once into the central current of her grievance.
> Claudia looked from one to the other.
> "For not going to see you?"
> "For not going to see his pictures!" cried the other nobly.
> "I can't make her understand," he said, turning to his wife.
> "I don't care about myself!" Mrs. Davant interjected.

What would the man who sowed the wheat that made the bread that these people ate make out of this intercommunication of souls? Might he not excusably remark, as the navvy remarked to the Oxford House young man, "H—ll and thunder——"? And yet we understand it, appreciate it; and we who can breathe the atmosphere of studios without inconvenience are apt to say that it is none the less clever, exact, truthful, subtle, because only a few persons can make head or tail of it. We can perceive, too, the fine satire of such a stroke as this in the delineation of the hero (What a hero!): "Keniston to his other claims to distinction added that of being hard to know. His friends always hastened to announce the fact to strangers—adding, after a pause of suspense, that they 'would see what they could do.' Visitors in whose favour he was induced to make an exception were further warned that he never spoke unless he was interested, so that they mustn't mind if he remained silent." We can perceive the wonderfulness of the faculty disclosed in this truly brilliant aperçu of Paris:

Digitized by Google

> Claudia . . . turned aimlessly into the wide whirling brightness of the streets. Never had she felt more isolated amid that ordered beauty which gives a social quality to the very stones and mortar of Paris. All about her were evidences of an artistic sensibility, pervading every form of life like the nervous structure of the huge frame—a sensibility so delicate, alert, and universal that it seemed to leave no room for obtuseness or error. In such a medium the faculty of plastic expression must develop as unconsciously as any organ in its normal surroundings; to be "artistic" must cease to be an attitude and become a natural function. To Claudia the significance of the whole vast revelation was centred in the light it shed on one tiny spot of consciousness—the value of her husband's work.

Take the story as a whole, take all the five stories, was the achievement worth achieving? We think so. There must be little art, as well as great art. But—and this is the moral we wish to inculcate—the little art is very little, very limited in its scope, its power, its appeal. The besetting danger of the time is, in art, to confuse the fine and subtle, the highly conventionalised, with the supreme elemental. No good quality can atone for the absence of the elemental. Art is not elemental—never will be nor can be. The moment it ceases to be an "attitude" towards life, it will cease to be art. And the artists of to-day are more and more prone to discuss themselves, to find their themes in their own artificial problems. The artists of the golden ages never did so. It is a sign of decadence, this pre-occupation with the inessential. But we are as we are, planted here by a power beyond the ken or art. If the age be decadent, we can help it no more than an old man can help being old. To the decadent age, a decadent literature. Let us make it as excellent as we can, and enjoy it as bravely as we can. But let us not lose our perspective, nor lower our ideals. Let us especially not miss the distinction between fine and great. We who write have a sincere admiration for Mrs. Wharton's original and delicate talent; we have felt the tempation to give it all sorts of beautiful names; it suits us and our time; it is of the hour. But when we turn, for instance, to the poem whose last lines we have quoted above, we grow absurdly conscious of the instability of the whole Wharton fabric.

Things Seen.

The Cornfield.

It stretched down the broad hill-slope, reaching almost to the station-yard, and as I waited on the little platform I thanked the good fortune that set its swaying yellow expanse before my town-tired eyes. A fussy engine tugged away at some trucks back in the siding, between whose metals ox-eyed daisies and meadow grasses grew. Geraniums blazed about a railway carriage that had evidently retired from active service to do duty as a lamp-shed. London was a hundred or more miles distant. I awaited my train contentedly! The cornfield dominated the landscape; every way I looked my eyes came back inevitably to that ripening stretch of wheat, deep amber in the very heart of the land. A small party of prospective travellers joined me on the platform. They were a friendly trio. The matron was young and comely, with small, kindly eyes and ruddy cheeks, the little girls owned shining ringlets with tips still damp from the brush, and their clean starched frocks stuck out stiffly at an acute angle, and crackled with every movement like a brown-paper parcel. Excitement plainly simmered very near the surface. "Tü Lunnon? Ess, zur, me cousin hev alwez a-promised us. Doin' mortal well hisself, conductor o' a tram out Camberwell way, went from these parts fifteen years agone wi'out ten shillin' tü 'ees name. The maidens be jest crazy tü zee all ez they hev heerd on, the waxworks an' the Crystal Palace, brave fine chance fer us, I reckon!" The owners of the crisp skirts executed a war-dance of expectancy at the conjured delights, while the mother mopped her perspiring brow. "You will find London a little warm, just now?" I hazarded. "Bless'ee, country-volk dawnt take no 'eed o' the weather, when they goes 'olidayin', no vay!" I assisted in the conveying of the bundles and the little people into the train, and as they departed I reflected that the ideal holiday for some is Camberwell, for others cornfields; personally, I am for cornfields.

The Unities.

Patiently I waited on the outer step of a bonnet shop in Bond-street. As the roadway traffic broke for a moment there crossed by the refuge over against me a vision in chiffon, fluff, feathers—all the luxuries of the season. Stepping off the refuge she stopped, and with the interrogation point of an expensive toe, turned over something which lay in the road. It was a silver-mounted driving whip. I saw her difficulty, which cost her but a moment's hesitation. She did the only possible thing and passed on, with the slightest shadow of regret on her well-bred face. It looked a very nice whip. But while I hesitated, even before the roadway traffic had resumed its attack, a young man, immaculate, shiny, correct, stepped from the refuge. He, too, hesitated as he saw the whip; turned it over with his umbrella, stooped, picked it up, and deposited it by the kerb. As he lifted his head our eyes met, and it flashed across me that the lady's difficulty and his difficulty would be mine. How could I combine a frock-coat, a silk hat, an umbrella and a driving-whip in a walk down Bond-street? And as I considered, with the whip lying at my feet, a boy with a slab of fish on his shoulder came along. He did not hesitate, or even abate his leisurely pace. In a moment the silver-mounted whip was swinging in his hand and he went on whistling gaily at the unities.

All Jewry.

To the Gentile first and afterward to the Jew, this has been the sequence in the matter of Encyclopedias. But now The Jewish Encyclopedia (Funk and Wagnalls Co., New York) has begun to be born. When we look at its first volume, the first of twelve (how could they be other than twelve?) and see its bulk, its beauty of typography and illustrations, its immense list of contributors, in all countries, its incalculable erudition; and when we contemplate the cost of the whole work, which must exceed half-a-million dollars; we are moved to compare Dr. Isidore Singer, its editor, with Nehemiah. Five years ago Dr. Singer, a graduate of the University of Vienna, could speak hardly a dozen words of English. Yet the idea of a great Jewish Encyclopedia, printed in the most widely spoken language on earth, had taken possession of this obscure student. Assuredly he must have known something of the emotions that filled Nehemiah when he had conceived the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem:

> Then went I up in the night by the brook, and viewed the wall, and turned back, and entered by the gate of the valley, and so returned.
>
> And the rulers knew not whither I went, or what I did; neither had I as yet told it to the Jews, nor to the priests, nor to the nobles, nor to the rulers, nor to the rest that did the work.

Even when Dr. Singer had told his plans to the priests,

Digitized by Google

the nobles, and the rulers, he had still to tell it to the publishers, and here, again, his case resembled Nehemiah's. The publishers of Germany and France were cold to him; not one could see his way to an enterprise of this magnitude:

> When Sanballat the Horonite, and Tobiah the servant, the Ammonite, and Geshem the Arabian, heard it, they laughed us to scorn, and despised us, and said, What is this thing that ye do?

True, the German publisher, Brockhaus, did not laugh, but he asked for guarantees which could not be given. In France the Anti-Semitic wave and the Dreyfus case rendered the search for a publisher hopeless. Then the venerable Zadoc Kahn, chief rabbi of France, advised the young man to go west. He crossed the Atlantic, and, paying no duty on his idea, melted—a solitary figure in a black coat—into the crowds of Broadway. Publishers received a card, saw a man, and heard a great idea expounded in broken English with an Austrian Jewish accent. It was impossible that the young Encyclopedist should have made an impressive figure, and after some flurry and hustle he invariably found himself in the street. It was in the street that his eye fell on a street-car advertisement of the Standard Dictionary. Arguing that the publishers of such a work must be of the right stamp, our young Nehemiah went to see Funk and Wagnalls. There appear to be five members of this firm; their portraits are arranged pattern-wise on page 7 of the illustrated prospectus of the Encyclopedia. A set of stern, smart faces. These men needed to be convinced, and they were convinced:

> Then Eliashib the high priest rose up with his brethren the priests, and they builded the sheep-gate; they sanctified it, and set up the doors of it; even unto the tower of Meah they sanctified it, unto the tower of Hananeel.

And, as usual, the sheep were easily led through the sheep-gate. The vast scheme took shape and parts. Very soon a huge organisation was in working order. No fewer than four hundred scholars, all versed in Jewish lore, have agreed to write for the Encyclopedia. In Vienna, in Paris, in St. Petersburg, in London, they are even now corrugating their brows over MSS. and papyri, and writing their articles to be ready by given dates. In New York there is a Board of Consulting Editors. Abroad, there is a Foreign Board of Consulting Editors. Their cultured Hebrew faces, as portrayed by photo-process, are a study. And the portraits of the eager men and women who form the sub-editorial, art, proof-reading, and stenographic staffs convey, as nothing else could, an idea of the magnitude of the machine which Dr. Singer has set in motion. The facsimiles of MSS., galley proofs, and what not, repeat the tale. It is the Jewish genius for co-operation over again. The Funk and Wagnalls sheep-gate was but the beginning:

> Next unto them builded the men of Jericho. And next to them builded Zaccur the son of Imri.
>
> But the fish-gate did the sons of Hassenaah build, who also laid the beams thereof, and set up the doors thereof, the locks thereof, and the bars thereof.
>
> And next unto them repaired Meremoth the son of Urijah, the son of Koz. And next unto them repaired Meshullam the son of Berechiah the son of Meshezabeel. And next unto them repaired Zadok the son of Baana. And next unto them the Tekoites repaired, etc.

And so, working next and with each other, Dr. Singer's cohort of scholars may be trusted to bring their magnum opus to a symmetrical conclusion.

In the presence even of the first volume one's feeling with regard to this work is one of awe. What a gathering together of the attributes of this marvellous race, in whose eight million living souls are represented nearly all man's experience and skill and learning and memory and wisdom and suffering. One feels all this in the trifles, the chance entries, on which a roving and bewildered eye pauses. The obscure biographies of rabbis, amoraim, copyists, Talmudists, bookmen, and merchants, in lands and cities remote, produce a powerful effect. Dip where you will and learn what was done or said by Cohen Abigdor, the learned and wealthy rabbi of Ferrara, in the middle of the fifteenth century, or by Joseph Ben Isaac Ben Stans Ibn Abitur, who, "according to one of Abitur's own acrostic poems," was born in Merida, about the beginning of the century, when England was ripening for the Norman invasion. Have you yet sufficiently acquainted yourself with the works of that eminent Barcelona scholar of the fourteenth century, Abraham Ben Hayyim Ben Remok? They can show you a MS. of his in the Bodleian. And Russiaen, Lithuanian, Arab, and Greek doctors, mathematicians, poets, chess-players, and men of prayer—"the chosen men of Israel, thirty thousand"—here they are! Perhaps you never heard of the Baron Ephraim Lopez Pereira d'Aguilar, whose farm, in Colebroke-row, Islington, was known a hundred years ago as Starvation Farm, for that he starved his sheep and oxen, his he-goats and she-goats most abominably, but left £200,000 to his daughters. Here are his biography and his portrait.

But why do we potter round in a volume which contains articles on Aaron, Ablutions, Abraham, Anglo-Israelism, Angelology, Apocalypse, and Alpha and Omega? Or why do we seek to compass the magnitude of a work which gives a drawing of Abraham's Oak at Mamre? The oak still puts forth leaves as it did when Josephus referred to it, and the Crusaders rested in its shade, and told each other that here Abraham bargained with Ephron, the Hittite, for the cave of Machpelah. Let the scope and magnificence of this work, now in its first stage, struggle through our sentences. Already we seem to hear the exultant words: "So the wall was finished in the twenty-and-fifth day of the month Elul, in fifty and two days. And it came to pass, that when all our enemies heard thereof, and all the heathen that were about us saw these things, they were much cast down in their own eyes; for they perceived that the work was wrought of our God."

W. Cosmo Monkhouse.

An Appreciation.

It is to be feared that the great British public has not been particularly perturbed by the announcement of the decease of William Cosmo Monkhouse. It takes a great deal to catch and hold the attention of "the average man" in this more-or-less United Kingdom; and Monkhouse had succeeded in impressing his individuality upon two classes only—those who are interested in the pictorial arts, and those who are specially interested in the art of poetry. With his work and influence as an art critic I have nothing to do for the moment; it is as a writer of verse that he attracts me mainly. And as such, one is obliged to admit, his vogue was, and remains, limited. How could it be otherwise? To begin with, he was not an advertising man; and, secondly, there were few to advertise him. He had his influential admirers, who worked loyally for him, so far as it was possible. But not much was possible. It was Monkhouse's misfortune (or advantage—who shall say which?) that the greater part of his time and energy was given, not to verse-work, but to prose-work about pictorial art. He wrote some dozen books on the latter subject; his verse-books are only three in number—A Dream of Idleness, published in 1865, when he was only twenty-five years of age; Corn and Poppies, printed twenty-five years later—i.e., in 1890; and The Christ on the Hill, a single ballad brought out in folio and with sumptuous illustrations, in 1895.

Digitized by Google

Now, this record shows quite sufficiently that Monkhouse was not primarily a poet. No convinced and consecrated bard could be satisfied with such an output. Monkhouse could have had no overwhelming leaning towards the poetic life and fame, or he would not have occupied so much of his leisure from official work in the criticism of painters and of painting. He began, to be sure, as a poet, but within three years he sought fame as a fictionist, though he never repeated the experiment. His poetry, we may take it, was the flower, it was not the business, of his life. Something of the man is revealed in the preface to the Dream of Idleness—a preface singularly dignified and self-respecting. It was a sign of the old head on the young shoulders. Though he was only sixty-one when he died, he was, in a sense, old from his youth up. He always had, if one may say so, a sort of aged air. And that, perhaps, accounts for the singular maturity of his first verse-volume. A Dream of Idleness was more than promising; it was, in its way, a definite, though small, achievement. Its chief weakness was an obvious and admitted indebtedness to Tennyson. The young writer had been markedly impressed by In Memoriam, and wrote several pieces on the same metrical model. There was an echo, too, of Maud in such lines as these:

I am fallen in love with pain,
 Such treachery lurks in delight,
Then leave me alone to the wind and the rain
 Alone to the starless night:
Alone to the starless night,
 Where the willow is tearing her hair,
Where the aspen is white with a shivering fright,
 And the poplar-tree writhes in despair.

Still more marked was the influence of the Tennysonian blank verse in the "idyl" called "Restored to Sight," and beginning:

O blessed Eve! O blessed Christmas Eve!
When our good Vicar's well-beloved wife
Beheld her home and husband once again.

That Tennyson had always had a magnetic charm for Monkhouse was shown again in Corn and Poppies, with its imitation of the elder writer's "Recollections of the Arabian Nights," called "Recollections of Alfred Tennyson," and its open confession—

My soul was steeped in the golden rhyme
 Of Tennyson, the Laureate.

In A Dream of Idleness, a notable feature was the writer's frequent use of the sonnet form. In Corn and Poppies one sees signs of the interest he had come to take, in the long interval, in the old French forms which Mr. Gosse and Mr. Dobson did so much to popularise in English. The dedication took the shape of a rondel, and in the body of the book there were four rondeaux, to say nothing of a "Virelai Ancien." Of the rondeaux Mr. Le Gallienne gave specimens in the "Morris" volume of The Poets and the Poetry of the Century. I prefer to reproduce here the rondeau rédoublé which appeared for the first time in the collection called Latter-Day Lyrics (1878), and which was never reprinted by its author. I give it because it is characteristic of the man as well as a piece of poetic ingenuity:

My soul is sick of nightingale and rose,
 The perfume and the darkness of the grove;
I weary of the fevers and the throes,
 And all the enervating dreams of love.

At morn I love to hear the lark, and rove
 The meadows, where the simple daisy shows
Her guiltless bosom to the skies above—
 My soul is sick of nightingale and rose.

The afternoon is sweet, and sweet repose,
 But let me lie where breeze-blown branches move.
I hate the stillness where the sunbeams doze,
 The perfume and the darkness of the grove.

I love to hear at eve the gentle dove
 Contented coo the day's delightful close.
She sings of joy and all the calm thereof—
 I weary of the fevers and the throes.

I love the night who like a mother throws
 Her arms round hearts that throbbed and limbs that strove,
As kind as Death, that puts an end to woes
 And all the enervating dreams of Love.

Because my soul is sick of fancies wove
 Of fervid ecstasies and crimson glows,
Because the taste of cinnamon and clove
 Palls on my palate—let no man suppose
 My soul is sick.

Perhaps one reason why Monkhouse, as a poet, never seized and retained the ear of the public may be found in his very versatility. Though his verse-production was small, it was wide in range. He could descend with ease and effect from the heights of "A Dead March" (his chef d'œuvre, as I think most judges allow) to the comparative depths of the "familiar"—such as his lines, in his first volume, on "My Friend," and his stanzas in his second volume, called "De Libris." Concerning his books he wrote:

And some are dear as friends, and some
 We keep because we need them;
And some we ward from worm and thumb,
 And love too well to read them.
My own are poor, and worthy new,
But I've an Elzevir or two.

For the writing of familiar verse Monkhouse had undoubtedly a gift.

Possibly some one—Mr. Gosse or Mr. Dobson—may now give us a selection from the verse of Monkhouse. It would be a small volume if it contained only what posterity is likely to care for and accept. Monkhouse wrote little that had absolute finish and felicity He was more interesting, more valuable, as a man than as a verse-writer or a prose-writer. But are not all men greater than their works? Monkhouse was content to make no loud or violent appeal to the outer world. He lived his own life in his own way. And who can blame him? No one is called upon to live for the benefit of the outsider. Monkhouse gave the public three slender books of verse; he was probably under no delusion as to the amount of permanent matter which they contained.

W. D. A.

Correspondence.

Mr. Hall Caine.

SIR,—I cannot refrain from writing to you with regard to the criticism of The Christian which you quote from the new Quarterly. It seems to me most unfair, if not altogether unjust, to classify Mr. Caine with Miss Corelli. When Mr. Caine wrote The Deemster and The Bondman there was hardly a paper of any standing in London and the provinces that did not hail him as a genius. Praise was literally heaped upon him. We were told that a new great writer was among us, that he had developed the English novel on new lines, and that he had a wonderful future before him. Among others who acknowledged his genius I call to mind John Ruskin, Wilkie Collins, Thomas Edward Brown, A. T. Quiller-Couch, R. D. Blackmore, W. E. Gladstone, etc., who were unanimous in asserting that he was in the very front rank of living English novelists. But, according to the Quarterly critic, all these men of intellect and literary feeling were wrong, and he only is right; for surely it is not possible that he wishes us to believe that Hall Caine once possessed genius, but that of late years it has entirely evaporated? I challenge anyone to read The Scapegoat, or either of the above-named novels, and then peruse such a palpably absurd article as that quoted in your paper without a feeling of impatience and annoyance. To put the case in a very mild form, Mr. Caine has a sense of style, excellent spelling, and correct grammar. Can anyone say the same of Miss Corelli?

Digitized by Google

It may be very true that many inferior writers attain an immense popularity, but it does not necessarily follow that all popular writers are inferior, even in these days. Besides, was there ever a time when the critics accepted large circulations without demur? We all know what they had to say about Dickens. It seems to me that the present position of Mr. Hall Caine with regard to his critics has been brought about by the indiscreet things he has from time to time spoken to interviewers, but more especially by the untrue stories which his so-called friends have persistently circulated about him. I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that I believe his name will go down to posterity when the name of Miss Corelli is entirely forgotten. If being an admirer of Mr. Caine's necessitates being a unit of the "vast and half-educated public" sneered at by the Quarterly critic, then I am proud of being half-educated, and happy to belong to such a public.—I am, etc.,

C. Fred Kenyon.

Ellesmere Park, Eccles.

Sir,—In your current issue you cite, with seeming approval, some remarks suggested to a Quarterly reviewer by the contemplation of the many editions of the works of Miss Corelli and Mr. Caine, which, if we may credit their publishers' announcements, are called for by the reading public. We learn that the reading public of England has been converted "from an aristocracy into a huge heterogeneous democracy," and that "whereas formerly the novels which had most readers were those which, in the opinion of all competent judges, were the best," the very reverse is the case now. Unfortunately for the Quarterly reviewer, the facts which move him to such melancholy reflections have existed as long as there has been an organised literature; at all times there have been works of inferior literary merit, but enjoying a very large circulation. The Quarterly reviewer instances Dickens, Thackeray and George Eliot; it is doubtful if even Dickens had such a large average circulation as Reynolds, G. P. R. James, or Harrison Ainsworth; it is almost certain that Lady Blessington and Mrs. Gore commanded a larger sale in their day than did George Eliot. The result is the same if we look abroad. Eugène Sue sold better than Balzac; Paul de Kock sold better than even Dumas, whilst some thirty years earlier Ducray-Dumesnil and Pigault-Lebrun, names practically forgotten now, were far and away the most popular French novelists, far more popular than Madame de Stael, Chateaubriand, or the youthful Hugo. But the most striking example comes from Germany; during the period when Goethe, Schiller, Jean Paul, Tieck, Novalis and Fouqué were writing the masterpieces of modern German literature, the really popular writers, the men who made money out of literature, were K. G. Cramer and Vulpius. Rinaldo Rinaldini der Räuberhauptmann could have given Wilhelm Meister or the Wahlverwandtschaften an easy beating in the matter of circulation. Personally, I am convinced that if a Dickens or a Thackeray were to appear now they would command that wider sale that is denied, for perfectly intelligible reasons, to Mr. Meredith, Mr. Hardy or Mr. James.

In reviewing Brandes' Main Currents in Nineteenth Century Literature, would it not have been advisable to state that the Danish original is some thirty years old, and that for the last twenty-five years the work has been a classic in Germany, the four volumes having been published in a most excellent German translation by A. Strodtmann from 1872 to 1876? Vol. IV., Der Naturalismus in England, etc., is, save for its insufficient appreciation

FROM MR. GRANT RICHARDS'S SPRING LIST.

THE WORLD'S CLASSICS.

I. JANE EYRE. By Charlotte Brontë.

II. THE ESSAYS of ELIA. By Charles Lamb.

III. THE POEMS of TENNYSON, 1830-58.

Pott 8vo, cloth, gilt back, 1s. net; leather, gilt back, top, and side, with silk marker, 2s. net.

"The cheapest series that has yet been put upon the English book market." Mr. C. K. Shorter, in the Sphere.

The following additional Volumes will be issued in SEPTEMBER.

IV. THE VICAR of WAKEFIELD. By Oliver Goldsmith.

V. THE ESSAYS of RALPH WALDO EMERSON.

VI. THE POETICAL WORKS of JOHN KEATS.

VII. OLIVER TWIST. By Charles Dickens.

VIII. TABLE TALK: Essays on Men and Manners. By WILLIAM HAZLITT.

IX. THE INGOLDSBY LEGENDS. By Thomas Ingoldsby.

X. WUTHERING HEIGHTS. By Emily Brontë.

BY GREY OLD GARDENS: Verses. By Nellie B. BADCOCK. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 5s. net.

Some of these poems have already appeared in the Spectator.

THE MAID'S PROGRESS. By Mr. and Mrs. Ernest AMES, Authors of "The Tremendous Twins." Illustrated in Colours. Demy 4to, picture boards, 3s. 6d.

"Conceived in a spirit of the most refreshing mirth, and the book, with its clever pictures in colours and its humorous, smoothly flowing stanzas, will wreathe the countenance even of a funeral mute in smiles."—Scotsman.

THE CURSE OF EDUCATION. By Harold Gorst. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

"I wish that, before giving that two millions to the Scotch universities, Mr. Carnegie had read a little book just published by Grant Richards, under the title of 'The Curse of Education,' by Mr. Harold Gorst. The book is the most valuable contribution to the greatest problem of our time which I have come across. It goes right to the root of the whole question. I would like every reader of my column to read this book."—Sun.

HIS MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY KING EDWARD VII. By Mrs. BELLOC-LOWNDES. 86 Illustrations. Royal 8vo, cloth, gilt extra, 7s. 6d.

"The whole tone of the book is excellent, being characterised by good taste. Mere gossip is scrupulously excluded, and the work has all the dignity of a carefully written biography."—Globe.

"The biography covers all aspects of the King's career."—Scotsman.

"By far the best of the popular lives of the King that have yet been published." Daily News.

SEA AND COAST FISHING: with Special Reference to Angling in Estuaries and Land-locked Waters. By F. G. AFLALO, Author of "Sea Fishing on the English Coast," &c. 50 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"The whole mystery is expounded, a result all the more effectively achieved by means of the excellent illustrations."—Country Life.

"Obviously the work of a man who knows what he writing about. The book will have a fascination even for those who know very little of the gentle craft beloved of Izaak Walton."—Bristol Mercury.

THE STORY OF THE STOCK EXCHANGE: its History and Position. By CHARLES DUGUID. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"Mr. Duguid, having set forth to expound the 'history and position' of the Stock Exchange, has also done ample justice to its romance, its humour, and its strong elements of personal interest; and his book, beautifully illustrated by Mr. Joseph Pennell and Mr. Dudley Hardy, is assured of an eager welcome and a widespread popularity."—World.

GREAT MEN. By Harold Begbie and F. CARRUTHERS GOULD, Authors of "The Political Struwwelpeter." Illustrations in Colours. Demy 4to, picture boards, 3s. 6d.

"We have none of us forgotten 'The Political Struwwelpeter'....a combination of happy caricature and honest humour that set all people laughing.....And now the authors have in their 'Great Men' given us another little book which is equally delightful."—Daily Express.

"'Great Men' is capital fun."—Punch.

SPRINGTIME IN THE BASQUE MOUNTAINS. By ARTHUR LASENBY LIBERTY. Illustrated. Fcap. 4to, cloth gilt, 12s.

HOW TO INVEST AND HOW TO SPECULATE. By C. H. THORPE. ("How To" Series VI.) Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s.

"His book covers the field completely. In its first part the author lays down the principles of investment and speculation; and then, descending from the general to the particular, he leads us, in the second part of his book, through the various markets of the Stock Exchange, setting forth their characteristics and summarising the position of their leading loans and companies with a cogency that is striking."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE CASE FOR THE FACTORY ACTS. By VARIOUS WRITERS. Edited by Mrs. SIDNEY WEBB. With a Preface by Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

London: GRANT RICHARDS, 9, Henrietta Street, W.C.

Digitized by Google

tion of Coleridge, the sanest and most brilliant account extant of the great group of poets writing in England from 1790 to 1825.—I am, etc.,

ALFRED NUTT.

Rivals in Age.

SIR,—You say in your issue of July 20 that the "Notes and Queries" column of the Nottinghamshire Guardian has run longer than any other such feature in a provincial newspaper. Allow me to explain that a similar column, called "Bye-Gones," in the Border Counties Advertizer (Oswestry), has been running since 1871, and I am inclined to think that if it was not the first provincial column of the kind to be published, it was the first to be reprinted in periodical parts. The volumes of Bye-Gones from 1871 to 1900 lie before me.—I am, etc.,

E. WOODALL (Ed. Bye-Gones).

Oswestry.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 96 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best four-line stanza on a dead author. We award the prize to Miss Mary A. Woods, Clifton-gardens, W., for the following:

ROBERT BROWNING.

The paths of night and death unscathed he trod,
His eye still fixed where, pale in whitening skies,
Love's herald-star assured a sun's uprise,
And darkness slain, and earth "afire with God."

Other verses follow:

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

The mountain tops of letters were his aim;
A mountain top received his weary frame:
With hardihood the highest peaks he scaled:
Flushed with success, how was it that he failed?

[P. A., Ramsgate.]

R. L. S.

Far Samoa marks his tomb:
Britain gives his spirit room.
Dead the breather, yet the breath
Comes and comes, defeating death.

[H. J., Hadley Wood.]

POPE.

His special points were elegance and wit,
Neat phrasing formed his intellectual scope,
A rare causticity that ever bit—
These were the Cardinals that made this Pope!

[F. H. D., Torquay.]

HEINE.

Heinrich Heine! bitter-sweet!
Sweet as opening rose's breath:
Bitter as house where mourners meet:
Sweet as Life and bitter as Death.

[A. G. M., Glasgow.]

SAPPHO.

Quenched are the fires long since: long stilled the heart—
Thy stormy heart: sweet Sappho. But, for me,
Thou Sleepest—and from thy lips, in dreaming, start
Sweet broken fragments of thy Reverie.

[H. C. P.]

SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE.

Dear Coleridge, thy flame of life burnt fast:
Weak-willed and tempest-tost from first to last—
Yet Wisdom writ in blood, and Song divine
But prove the strength of weakness such as thine.

[H. G. T., London.]

JOHN KEATS.

The love of beauty "held him, like a star"
That shone unmated o'er this world's endeavour;
And by its splendour, drawn from earth afar,
He built on dreams, which live, with him, for ever.

[A. E. W., Greenock.]

GOLDSMITH.

In winsome words, simple with gold inwrought.
Goldsmith! Well-named thou gavest us thy thought;
But since, alas! thou laid'st thy cunning tools away
Perforce with weary words of gilt we rest content to-day.

[W. F., Duncon.]

TENNYSON.

Freedom he sang: our hearts would brim
Beneath that strong, heroic strain.
He sleeps: our hardlings pipe in vain;
The voice of England sleeps with him.

[C. C. P., Epworth.]

CHAUCER.

Chaucer is dead that made the welk'n ring
With songs that told the world made holiday;
For then all months were May, all seasons Spring;
And are they not to-day?

[TWENTIMAN, Birmingham.]

BROWNING.

Tho' oft thy voice be harsh as raven's croak,
Thy gait more shambling than the camel's roll,
Yet lovable in its strength, like some gnarled oak,
Browning, is thy gaunt gladiator soul.

[S. Y., Eastbourne.]

EMILY BRONTË.

Your body died, and few men shed their tears;
But that bright, quenchless fire that lit your eyes—
That stern white spirit of passionate Love shall rise,
And purify mankind through countless years.

[C. F. K., Eccles.]

RUSKIN.

What need is there of verse to sing thy praise?
Ruskin, historian of the visionary;
Since, from her sunlit stones and moonlit ways,
Venice sings thee one grand apostrophe!

[F. C. H., Cardiff.]

DICKENS.

Ah! Dickens, king of laughter and of tears,
Thy charm outruns the cavalcade of years:
Still are we cheered or softened by thy spell,
And laugh at Pickwick, sigh for Little Nell.

[J. K. W., Cornwall.]

Competition No. 97 (New Series).

IN the "Literary Lounger" column of this week's Sketch appears the following paragraph:—

> With regard to the fashion of re-christening and re-issuing old books, which has grown considerably of late on both sides of the Atlantic, an American literary journal suggests that a big success is in store for the publisher who will bring out a new edition of Robinson Crusoe as On a Desert Island, and Æsop's Fables under the title of Animals Who have Talked with Me.

We offer a prize of One Guinea for the best re-christenings of six well-known books. The actual and proposed titles should be written down in parallel columns, each opposite each.

RULES.

Answers, addressed, "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, July 31. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

Digitized by Google

'Twixt Plate and Lip;

OR,

The Common Sense of Eating.

A HEALTH HAND-BOOK FOR EVERY DAY,
WITH SPECIAL ADVICE AS TO DIET AND REGIMEN IN HEALTH AND SICKNESS,
A POPULAR SUMMARY OF THE SYMPTOMS OF DYSPEPSIA AND INDIGESTION,
AND A NOTE ON THE SCIENTIFIC AND RATIONAL TREATMENT OF THOSE AILMENTS.

12th EDITION.

 This little book may be recommended to the general reader as a sound and safe guide to the common sense management of the stomach. The Publishers, at 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, will be pleased to send a free copy to any reader of the Academy. Early application necessary.

LONDON:
46, HOLBORN VIADUCT, E.C.

MR. MURRAY has just published a New Novel by

ANTHONY HOPE,

entitled

TRISTRAM OF BLENT,

To be obtained from all Booksellers, Bookstalls, and Libraries. Price 6s.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY AND AFTER.

No. 294.—AUGUST, 1901.

HOW AMERICA REALLY FEELS TOWARDS ENGLAND. By SAMUEL E. MOFFETT (of the "New York Journal")
FEDERAL GOVERNMENT for the UNITED KINGDOM and the EMPIRE. By the Hon. T. A. BRASSEY.
THE CONGO STATE and the BAHR-EL-GHAZAL. By EDMUND D. MOREL.
THE EMIGRATION of GENTLEWOMEN: a Woman's Word from Natal. By S. STAPLES.
DOWN-TRODDEN IRISH PROTESTANTS. By JOHN F. TAYLOR, K.C.
THE DANGER of the WAR OFFICE REPORT. By SIDNEY LOW.
A REMNANT of BUDDHA'S BODY. By PERCEVAL LANDON.
ASSUMING the FOUNDATIONS. By the Hon. AUBERON HERBERT.
THE PRESENT RAGE for MEZZOTINTS. By W. ROBERTS.
BEAU NASH. By CHARLES WILKINS.
THE CIDER INDUSTRY in FRANCE and ENGLAND. By C. W. RADCLIFFE COOKE.
WOMEN as HOME WORKERS. By LADY KNIGHTLEY, of Fawsley.
THE MEDITERRANEAN SCARE—
1. By ARCHIBALD S. HURD.
2. By EDMUND ROBERTSON, K.C., M.P.
POSTAL PETTIFOGGING. By J. HENNIKER HEATON, M.P.
THE SUPREME COURT of the UNITED STATES. By JOHN MACDONELL, C.B., LL.D.
LAST MONTH: the Liberal Imbroglio. By Sir WEMYSS REID.

London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., LTD.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

6s., claret roan, gilt, Illustrated.

LONDON IN THE TIME OF THE DIAMOND JUBILEE.

London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING, A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.
THE NORFOLK BROADS.
BRECON and its BEACONS.
ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.
THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.
THE ISLE OF WIGHT.
THE WYE VALLEY.
THE SEVERN VALLEY.
BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.
BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.
LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR, LLANFAIRFECHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON.
ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.
CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, & FESTINIOG.
BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and PWLLHELI.
MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, & CHELTENHAM.
LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.
NORWICH, LOWESTOFT, YARMOUTH, and the NORFOLK BROADS.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.
"It very emphatically tops them all."—Daily Graphic.
"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 5s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.
London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT, & Co. Ltd., The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers.
Paris and New York: BRENTANO'S.

SELECTIONS FROM
ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD'S PUBLICATIONS.

WORKS BY DR. MACLAREN.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 5s. each, post free.

THE GOD of the AMEN, and other Sermons.

THE WEARIED CHRIST, and other Sermons.

THE BEATITUDES, and other Sermons.

THE UNCHANGING CHRIST, and other Sermons.

THE HOLY of HOLIES. A Series of Sermons on the 14th, 15th, and 16th Chapters of the Gospel by John.

PAUL'S PRAYERS, and other Sermons.

CHRIST'S "MUSTS," and other Sermons.

London: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, Limited, 21 and 22, Furnival Street, Holborn, W.C.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS
TO
"THE ACADEMY,"

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

Digitized by Google

OUR HIGHLAND DAYS.

THE REMINISCENCES OF DR. JOHN KENNEDY.

With a Sketch of his Later Life by his Son,

HOWARD ANGUS KENNEDY.

Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top, 6s.

"Dr. Kennedy was a fine specimen of honesty and independence, and left behind him a great record of good work."—Spectator.

"Will be read with interest by all who knew or were influenced by this eminent Congregationalist writer and Divine. In the early part of the book will be found some interesting reminiscences of religious life in the Highlands in the first half of the last century."—Literature.

"Many picturesque reminiscences of life in Scotland during the early part of last century are given."
Morning Leader.

THE AUTHOR OF THE "PEEP OF DAY."

BEING THE LIFE STORY OF MRS. MORTIMER.

By her Niece, Mrs. MEYER.

With an Introduction by the REV. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

With a Photogravure Portrait and Illustrations

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

"It describes how the 'Peep of Day' came to be written, and tells many new anecdotes of Miss Bevan, who in her early womanhood was a great friend of Mr. H. E. Manning, who became the famous Cardinal. A number of letters from him, and details connected with his youth, will be found in the volume."
Daily Chronicle.

A DAINTY GIFT-BOOK.

Dedicated by gracious permission to Her Majesty Queen Alexandra.

OUR GRACIOUS QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

By the Rev. Canon FLEMING, B.D.,

Of St. Michael's, Chester Square.

With a Photogravure Portrait of the Queen, from a Painting by Edward Hughes, and 3 Illustrations of Sandringham.

Crown 8vo, white cloth gilt, and gilt top, 2s. 6d.

"One cannot predict the limits of the sale of such a book. There is perhaps no preacher of the day who appeals so much to the great men of the country, the able men of the country, and the young men of the country as Canon Fleming."—Queen.

"Canon Fleming has never found a more inspiring subject for his Courtier-like pen than the gracious lady who shares the throne of our Sovereign."
St. James's Gazette.

"A brief and eminently readable sketch of the Queen."—Scotsman.

"A charming booklet."—Daily Mail.

Published by
THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, INCORPORATED,
56, Paternoster Row, London.

THE THRUSH:

A Periodical for the Publication of Original Poetry

Edited by MULLETT ELLIS.

PRICE FOURPENCE PER MONTH.

BY ORDER AT ALL BOOKSELLERS.

An Edition de Luxe, now limited to 50 copies, sumptuously printed, is also published at Half-a-crown per month. This Edition, being rare and of intrinsic merit, must eventually become valuable.

Since its origin, on the first day of the New Century, Poems have already appeared in "THE THRUSH" from the following well-known Authors:—

Dr. Richard Garnett; W. E. Henley; Emily Hickey; C. W. Wynne; Mackenzie Bell; F. Prevost Battersby; Keble Howard; Harold Begbie; A. P. Graves; Nora Hopper; L. Alma-Tadema; Norman Gale; Dr. Gilbert Murray; John Hutchinson; The Hon. Albinia Brodrick; Arthur Symons; N. Carruthers Gould; Clifton Bingham; E. Tindal Atkinson; Lady Margaret Sackville; Hamilton Aïdé; Sir Wyke Bayliss, P.R.I.; Victor Plarr; Edgar Fawcett; Lady Gilbert; the Rev. W. J. Dawson; and Mullett Ellis.

Other Poems by Eminent Writers are promised.

Amongst the Contents of the AUGUST NUMBER are Poems by Lady FLORENCE DOUGLAS, and a Sonnet by the great LORD LYTTON.

The Sonnets in the Newnham College Prize Competition are also published in the AUGUST NUMBER, and the Rules relating to "THE THRUSH" Prize Poem Competition (Six Prizes). First Prize, Ten Pounds sterling.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

No. 1030.—AUGUST, 1901.—2s. 6d.

A BORDER BURN. By ALFRED AUSTIN.—THREE YEARS WITH THE METROPOLITAN FIRE BRIGADE.—THE CONQUEST OF CHARLOTTE. Part I.—ACROSS THE HIMALAYAS IN MID-WINTER. By THE EARL OF RONALDSHAY.—FOUNTAINBLUE. By JOHN BUCHAN.—PORTLAND. By MAY BYRON.—SPECULATING ON A DOUBLE EVENT.—MUSINGS WITHOUT METHOD:—THE WORSHIP OF SPEED—THE UNIVERSAL PASSION OF RACING—THE CONSEQUENT DECAY OF SPORT—THE DEVELOPMENT OF CRICKET—THE HUSTLER IN LITERATURE—THE VANDAL AT WORK—MARBLE HILL AND HOGARTH HOUSE—"BUSH-WHACKING." THREE NOVELS. By G. S. STREET.—A SIDE-SHOW. By "LINESMAN."—A LANGUID SESSION AND A LIBERAL FARCE.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

NOW READY.

Was Alfred King of England?

By A SAXON.

Demy 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

A brief review of one of our latest text-books, showing the true relations of Prince Alfred both to the Saxon people in England and to her Roman invaders.

HARRISON & SONS, Publishers, 59, Pall Mall, S.W.

MR. EPICTETUS, JUN., HIS BOOK.

Wherein is set forth a Common-Sense Philosophy for the Conduct of Life.
Specially Written for Unsophisticated and Simple-minded Folk, and for those who ignore every form of Conventional Religion.
A Theme for the Twentieth Century and until the Millennium shall Dawn.

By BENJAMIN WALKER.

Now ready, cloth, price 3s. 6d., post free.
JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate and Ridgefield, Manchester.
London: 29 and 30, Shoe Lane, E.C.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

"THINGS THAT ARE MADE." Devotional Meditations in the Haunts of Nature. By Rev. A. J. BAMFORD, B.A., of Royton.

Now Ready, Second Edition, crown 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d., post free.

THE CHARTER of the CHURCH. Lectures on the Principle of Nonconformity. By P. T. FORSYTH, M.A., D.D.

"Explains the position of religious dissent with great force and eloquence."—Manchester Guardian.

London: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, LTD., 21 and 22, Furnival, Street, E.C.

CASSELL & COMPANY'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

A REMARKABLE NEW NOVEL.
JUST PUBLISHED.—Price 6s.

ALICE OF OLD VINCENNES.
ALICE OF OLD VINCENNES.

By MAURICE THOMPSON.

175,000 COPIES SOLD IN AMERICA.

A MAGNIFICENT NEW WORK ON BUTTERFLIES AND MOTHS.

JUST PUBLISHED.—Price 6s.

FAMILIAR BUTTERFLIES AND MOTHS.

By W. F. KIRBY, F.L.S., F.E.S.,
Assistant in the Zoological Department, British Museum (Natural History).

Illustrated with 18 beautiful Coloured Plates.

THE BEST POPULAR ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF THE WAR.

NOW READY.—In 1 Complete Volume, price 7s. 6d.

CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF THE BOER WAR.

Profusely Illustrated with Coloured Plates, &c.

JUST PUBLISHED.—Price 5s.

THE FIRST HALF-YEARLY VOLUME OF

CASSELL'S MAGAZINE.

Profusely Illustrated.

Containing the first portion of RUDYARD KIPLING'S Great Story, "KIM"; Complete Stories, &c.

JUST PUBLISHED.—Boards, price 3s. 6d.; cloth, 5s.

LITTLE FOLKS' MIDSUMMER VOLUME.

With Pictures on nearly every page, together with 6 Full-Page Coloured Plates, and numerous Illustrations printed in Colour.

A SUPERB PANORAMA of the SIGHTS and SCENERY of the British Isles can be viewed in the great Art Work which Messrs. Cassell & Company are about to publish in FORTNIGHTLY PARTS, price 6d. net.

UNDER THE TITLE OF

PICTORIAL BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

Each Part will contain 32 pages of beautiful Fine-Art Pictures exquisitely reproduced from Copyright Photographs.

PART I., with which will be given a large Rembrandt Photogravure of the magnificent picture EDINBURGH FROM ARTHUR'S SEAT, by J. MACWHIRTER, R.A., will be ready on AUGUST 14.

THE WORK WILL BE COMPLETED IN 21 PARTS.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED, London and all Booksellers'.

Digitized by Google

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1526. Established 1869. 3 August, 1901. Price Threepence.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

TWELVE French novels, each representing a phase of the fiction of the period, have been newly translated, and will be published by Mr. Heinemann, with coloured plates by French artists. Each book will contain a short biographical note by the editor (Mr. Edmund Gosse), and an introduction by a well-known writer. The sequence of the series will be as follows: Stendhal's La Chartreuse de Parme, with an introduction by Maurice Hewlett; Balzac's Les Deux Jeunes Mariées, with an introduction by George Moore; Dumas père's La Tulipe Noire, with an introduction by Dr. Richard Garnett; George Sand's Mauprat, with an introduction by "John Oliver Hobbes"; Mérimée's Carmen and Colomba, with an introduction by Arthur Symons; Victor Hugo's Notre Dame de Paris, with an introduction by Andrew Lang; Octave Feuillet's Le Roman d'un Jeune Homme Pauvre, with an introduction by Henry Harland; Dumas fils' La Dame aux Camélias, with an introduction by Edmund Gosse; Flaubert's Madame Bovary, with an introduction by Henry James; Alphonse Daudet's Le Nabab, with an introduction by Prof. W. P. Trent; Jules et Edmond de Goncourt's Renée Mauperin, with an introduction by James Fitzmaurice-Kelly; and Guy de Maupassant's Pierre et Jean, with an introduction by the Earl of Crewe.

MORE than once R. L. Stevenson acknowledged that he owed much to Patrick Walker. To the new edition of Walker's Bibliographica Presbyteriana, which Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton will publish in the autumn, Mr. Crockett has contributed a Preface, from which we take the following:

> And then how triumphantly graphic he is! Consider the account of the killing of John Brown, the carrier of Priesthill, and the appalling spectacle of Peden the Prophet, on that grey dawn when he took his farewell, coming out of the door of the doomed house, saying to himself, "Poor woman, a fearful morning!" and then, twice over, "A dark, misty morning!" It makes one shiver as one reads.
>
> I have always thought that a great deal of the incision and directness of the late Mr. Stevenson's style in narration could be traced to his familiarity with Patrick Walker's account of the death of John Brown. Those curious in the matter, and familiar with the wonderful histories of Alan Breck and David Balfour, will be able to parallel many phrases in a somewhat remarkable manner—that is, not at all literally, but in the spirit of them. Mr. Stevenson himself, when taxed with the fact, only responded unblushingly with, "Well, you're another!"

THE Daily News published on Thursday a long and informing article on "The Book Sales of the Season," with a list of fifty-four works that realised £100 or more. Six books brought £400 and more. They were:

Shakespeare. First Folio	£1,720
Caxton. The Ryall Book	1,550
Bunyan. Pilgrim's Progress. First Part. First Edition. Orig. calf	1,475
Shakespeare. Titus Andronicus. 4to	620
Gray. Designs by R. Bentley for Six Poems. "Ode to Poesy" and extra stanza of "Elegy" in Gray's auto.	400
Rappresentatione S. M. Maddalena	400

The first four items are record prices.

"IN a remote country inn," writes a travelling correspondent, "where I was weather-bound for an afternoon last week, I found, somewhat to my astonishment, a sixpenny edition of John Inglesant. I read that remarkable book through again from cover to cover, and I now look back upon that wet afternoon and evening as containing the most interesting, and, may I say, the most fruitful hours I have spent for a long time. A few days later I learned from a letter by Mr. Charles Linnell in the Athenæum, that since its first issue, in 1881, 81,250 copies of John Inglesant have been circulated. Good! That is still some 94,000 copies behind the advertised (American) circulation of Alice of Old Vincennes, but 81,250 copies in twenty years of such a book is very gratifying in the interests of sincerity and fundamental brainwork. You may care to paste in your common-place book this, "The True Story" of John Inglesant, from Mr. Linnell's letter:

> With the exception of the author himself, the MS. of John Inglesant was seen by no one but Mrs. Shorthouse and the lady who copied it for the press. The copy was finished in 1877, but it was put by and was seen by no one till 1880. In January of that year the author took it to Mr. Rickman King, to whom he had been recommended by his brother, Mr. Edmund Shorthouse, and requested him to print it. The first proof was sent on February 20 and the last on June 11; the first bound copy on July 1 (100 copies were printed). Some seventy were presented to the author's personal friends; the rest were sold by Messrs. Cornish Brothers, at one guinea each. One copy was sent to each of the Birmingham morning papers, one to the Athenæum, one, at the suggestion of Mr. Linnell (Cornish Brothers), to Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co., and one to the Guardian. On August 18 appeared a very gratifying and talented review of the book in the Birmingham Daily Gazette, written by Mr. Walter Sylvester, brother to the then proprietor, Mr. A. A. Sylvester, to both of whom Mr. Shorthouse was a perfect stranger. The Athenæum reviewed the book very favourably on October 30, 1880, and the Guardian also favourably on January 19, 1881. The Birmingham Daily Post also noticed it on January 14, 1881. The MS. was never sent to any publisher, and these were the only copies presented to the trade. The Rev. Arthur Jamson Smith, one of Mr. Shorthouse's most intimate friends, sent the copy he had received to Mr. Arthur Johnson, of All Souls', Oxon, who, after he had read it, sent it to Mrs. Humphry Ward, who took it with her on a visit to Knapdale, the residence of the late Mr. Alexander Macmillan at Tooting, and read some passages to him. Mrs. Ward told Mr. Johnson that Mr. Macmillan would like to have a copy, and one was immediately sent to him. Mr. Macmillan wrote to the author that he would be pleased to publish it. 750 copies were published in two volumes at 25s. They were ready by June 16, 1881. They sold readily. On an afternoon of the following month, July 16, Mr. Gladstone called on Mr. Macmillan, in Bedford-street, "specially to thank him for the copy which had been sent him" in the regular course, "and to ask him to tell the author that he thought it a work of real genius, and of a class that interested him greatly." He added that there were a good many mis-spellings in the Italian proper names. Mr. Gladstone never wrote publicly about the book, but it is understood that he talked about it a great deal to his personal friends. The second edition, in two smaller volumes, was ready in December, 1881, at 12s. It sold enormously. This is the true story of the publication of John Inglesant.

Digitized by Google

One of our readers seems to have stumbled, at this late day, on an interesting confession by Sir Walter Scott in his own handwriting. While looking over the second-hand books on a stall in the Market-place, in Coventry, he found a copy of the fifth edition of Scott's Lay of the Last Minstrel, dated 1806. On the inside of the fly-leaf is a short note in pencil, which runs as follows:

> Whilst I read this, I feel ashamed that I have written it because I see many things, which even in my Judgement as the Author appear only worthy to be erased.

Comparison of the handwriting with Scott's, says our correspondent, indicates the genuineness of the note. He adds that he is in a difficulty about the edition. "In the bibliography of the Lay in Lockhart (Macmillan, 'English Classics') only four editions are given for years 1805 and 1806, but this, called the fifth edition, 1806. I shall be greatly obliged if you can explain this anomaly. I do not suppose the copy has any great value, unless the note is genuine; in which case I imagine the value would be enhanced." We cannot explain it without further reference; and meanwhile, perhaps a reader can oblige.

Mr. Kipling's spirited remarks, "The Lesson," printed in the Times of July 29, scarcely fall within the scope of a literary paper. But for the sake of auld lang syne we quote the following:

> We have spent some hundred million pounds to prove the fact once more,
> That horses are quicker than men afoot, since two and two make four:
> And horses have four legs and men have two legs, and two into four goes twice
> And nothing over except our lesson—and very cheap at the price.
>
> For remember (this our children shall know: we are too near for that knowledge)
> Not our mere astonied camps but Council and Creed and College—
> All the obese, unchallenged old things that stifle and overlie us—
> Have felt the effects of the lesson we got—an advantage no money could buy us!

Is the successful conduct of a first-class magazine an editorial feat or an operation of nature? The Editor of Harper's Magazine self-sacrificially inclines to the theory that a magazine "simulates the operations of Nature." The following does not seem too long to quote:

> It is not made out of hand; it is born and it grows. There is a certain inevitability about it from the outset. It is not a matter of so much capital or even of so much brains. The richest man living, assisted by the most brilliant talent that wealth can command, might publish a magazine, as he might own and run a yacht for pleasure, or a factory for profit, and he might make a successful venture. His magazine might win general popularity if wisely conducted with that end in view, or, if so designed, might adequately occupy some special field. Magazines have been started in that way—i.e., from outright intention and with a definite scheme and backed by abundant material and intellectual resources—and have succeeded. But for a magazine to be not merely successful, but institutionally important, entering so intimately into the life and thought of a people that its inevitableness is conceded, something more is necessary. There must be an imperative call for it in the conditions attending its birth, so that its emergence seems spontaneous. It must in itself have the power of creative life, making large demands upon its environment. Even its sponsors in baptism may not comprehend its genius, and must needs wait upon it with patience and docility, such plans as they make for it being modestly tentative. If they unwittingly put upon it an unnatural burden, it will assert itself with that miraculous strength that in the germinant seed lifts a paving-stone. As money cannot make nor mind invent this living thing, so they are not adequate to its continuance. The pattern of what, according to its own genius, it is naturally meant to be dominates its development. It refuses to be the toy of the artificer or of the doctrinaire. Else it could have no life, but only such motion as may be imparted to a machine. There have been a few such magazines in this country and in England, having a "touch of nature" in them from the first, by which they are distinguished from all others. When any new species of organic life appears upon the earth, it is because it is allowed by the existing conditions. Thus it is with human institutions. The class of magazines of which we are writing come in like manner, by permission, and the circumstances permitting them enter into their texture and complexion. In the case of Blackwood and in that of the Atlantic Monthly, it would seem that a group of writers called each of these periodicals into being to serve as their organ of expression. How many of our readers know who were the first publishers of the Atlantic Monthly? Then, again, as in the case of Harper's, and afterwards of Scribner's, the character of a publishing house and relations already established with its constituency through its publications, become the fostering elements of a magazine's growth.

One of the English magazines that may claim to have affinity with a natural growth is the Cornhill. Thackeray preferred to compare it to a great ship, and himself to its captain. But, ship or tree, the Cornhill has reached this month its 500th number, and Mr. Austin Dobson writes with sparkling drops from the Castalian spring. Preserving Thackeray's simile, he says (in the current number):

> For two-score years the tumbling spray
> Has fallen from our bows away;—
> What change of skipper and of crew,
> Since first the Cornhill sailed the blue,
> Grain-laden, Master, Thackeray!
>
> Trollope, George Eliot, Gaskell—nay,
> Our own dear "Blackstick" of to-day,—
> What wealth of genius old and new
> For two-score years!
>
> Once more we steer across the bay,
> With no vain thought our hearts are gay:—
> Our log is clean, our course is true;
> What we have done we mean to do—
> We hope, once more, to lead the way
> For two-score years!

Hurrah!

The Cornhill, by the way, contains a very readable anonymous article on "The French Press." The writer points out how the instinct for news is growing in the French papers at the expense of those traditions which still make them the most literary newspapers in the world:

> The desire first and foremost to get at the fact, rather than to produce brilliant "copy," has during the last decade been creating a veritable revolution in French journalism. We had the most signal proof of this when the Matin, at a considerable pecuniary sacrifice, for the first time in the whole history of French newspaper organisation, made special arrangements with the Times, sending to London M. Stéphane Lauzanne to provide its readers with such of the latest information concentrated at Printing-House Square as could interest Paris. By this initiative it shattered the protective monopoly of the Havas Agency and spurred its contemporaries to imitate it. Two great daily newspapers, the Echo de Paris and the Journal, sent correspondents to London, and English facts and English opinion are now constantly reported in their columns as elaborately, and on the whole as accurately, as is Parisian life in the English newspapers.

Several correspondents point out that the "Notes and Queries" column of the Manchester City News has been running for a considerably longer period than "twenty-one years and a half." The time claimed by Mr. Potter Briscoe (in regard to the Nottingham Guardian) has a "run longer than for any other such feature in a provincial paper." The Manchester paper's notes were begun, it seems, in the issue of January 5, 1878, and have been continued without interruption ever since, a period of twenty-two years and a half. During the whole of that time they have been edited by Mr. John Nodal. For the first eleven years of the publication of these Manchester Notes and Queries in the columns of the paper they were reproduced in volume form, and these reprints fetch a high price on the rare occasions when they are offered for sale. Other contributions have also been published separately by their writers, including Reminiscences of Manchester Fifty Years Ago (1880), by Josiah T. Slugg; Outlines of the History of Saddleworth (1888), by Morgan Brierley, and numerous smaller books and pamphlets.

Digitized by Google

Our recent Johnsonian competition has found an imitator in the place of its kindly engendure—namely, the Rambler. "The hebdomadal Academy," says the Editor (What have we done to be called hebdomadal?), "playing Moth to the Rambler's Star, has instituted a Contention among the Wits [good], who are invited to imagine a Conversation between Dr. Johnson and Mr. Boswell on their Perusal of Mr. Le Gallienne's Paper in Number 210." More than this, he has commissioned Mr. Helm to essay the same feat. For reasons which will be obvious, our heart inclines us willing to see verisimilitude in the following speech by dear old Bozzy:

> Mr. Boswell: Just now, at the Ferry-stairs, I encountered the last Victim of those horseless Vehicles, the oily Stench of which is wafted across the Styx when the Earth-wind sets this Way. He informed me that the Academy, a critical Journal of much Influence in London, has offered a Prize for the best imaginative Report of a Conversation between you and me, Sir, on the Substance and Style of an Essay which, as he happily had the Rambler's No 210 in his Pocket when he was run over, he permitted me to read.

The conversation ends as follows:

> Mr. Boswell: Sir, you are harsh. But you, Sir, were the special Star of all Moths of fine Taste.
>
> Dr. Johnson: Very likely, Sir. Look at poor Noll Goldsmith, who demands of every new Comer from London if his Comedies are yet played and his Poems recited in Schools and Colleges. Pooh! Sir, Mankind has always been the same. Do you think, Sir, that Tully did not want to be praised in the Forum, or that Plato did not derive Satisfaction from the Applause of his Disciples? Why, Sir, I do not deny that the Literary Club was more agreeable to me because Burke and Reynolds and Langton professed to delight in my Conversation.

The Bookman for August contains an illustrated article on Mr. Hall Caine and his work, which will be read with interest at the present juncture. The writer, Mr. J. E. Hodder Williams, is enabled to give the first full and authentic biography of Mr. Hall Caine published; and at the same time his article contains interesting particulars of Mr. Hall Caine's new novel, The Eternal City, with a description of the author's plan and purpose in writing it. On the same authority it is stated that Mr. Hall Caine contemplates laying his next novel in the Isle of Man; and it may derive something of its character from the recent failure of Dumbell's Bank. In short, it is likely to be concerned with Capital and Labour. But Mr. Caine will rest first; and then there is that lawsuit in which literary folks take so much interest.

Audrey, by Miss Mary Johnston, the author of The Old Dominion and By Order of the Company, is announced for publication early next year by Miss Johnston's publishers, Messrs. Archibald Constable and Co. Miss Johnston's two previous books have already reached a sale of over 426,000 copies in England and America. As we have already pointed out, Miss Johnston is very young to have achieved so remarkable a success. In this connection it is interesting to note what Mr. Joel Chandler Harris says of these two novels. He recently wrote: "I think Miss Johnston's two books represent, with respect to their art, their style and their noble ideals, the high-water mark of American fiction that has appeared since Hawthorne died. I have read pretty nearly every American story of the better class, especially the so-called historical novel: none compare with Miss Johnston's books." Such is Uncle Remus's opinion.

As Lord Beaconsfield's novels are little read nowadays, and less talked about, it is rather refreshing to find an article on them in the New Liberal Review, by Mr. George W. E. Russell. Mr. Russell entered Parliament in 1880 for the express purpose, as he tells us, of dethroning Disraeli. But he always enjoyed his books, and in his present eulogy he reads bits aloud to us in the manner of a choice reader. There is no better way to create an appetite for an author. Take this "dig at philosophy" in Vivian Grey:

> Watch that lively looking gentleman who is stuffing Kalte Schale so voraciously. The leader of the idealists, a pupil of the celebrated Fichte. . . . The first principle of the school is to reject all expressions which incline in the slightest degree to substantiality. Existence is in his opinion a word too absolute. Being, principle, and essence are terms scarcely sufficiently ethereal even to indicate the subtle shadowings of his opinions. Matter is his great enemy. My dear sir, observe how exquisitely Nature revenges herself on these capricious and fantastic children. . . . Methinks that the best answer to the idealism of M. Fichte is to see his pupil devouring Kalte Schale.

"An excellent piece of chaff at the expense of a grave young lady," is Mr. Russell's remark on the following:

> "What a pity, Miss Manvers, that the fashion has gone out of selling oneself to the devil."
>
> "Good gracious, Mr. Grey!"
>
> "On my honour, I am quite serious. It does appear to me to be a very great pity. What a capital plan for younger brothers!"

After Vivian Grey came The Young Duke, and Mr. Russell recalls the words of the elder Disraeli when he heard of it: "My son write a book about a duke? Why, he has never seen one." In this book Mr. Russell finds much that is tawdry, vulgar, and grotesque, but he amuses us with the following passage, descriptive of a debate in the House of Lords:

> Lord Exchamberlain thought the nation going on wrong, and he made a speech full of currency and constitution. Lord Deprivyseal seconded him with great effect, brief but bitter, satirical and sore. The Earl of Quarterday answered these, full of confidence in the country and himself. When the debate was getting heavy, Lord Snap jumped up to give them something light. The Lords do not encourage wit, and so are obliged to put up with pertness. But Viscount Memoir was very statesmanlike, and spouted a sort of Universal History. Then there was Lord Ego, who vindicated his character when nobody knew he had one, and explained his motives because his auditors could not understand his acts.

Venetia is read still by students of the lines of Byron and Shelley, on which it is founded. Mr. Russell quotes the description of the death of Marmion Herbert (Shelley):

> The sea had washed on the beach another corpse—the form of Marmion Herbert. It would appear that he had made no struggle to save himself, for his hand was locked in his waistcoat, where at the moment he had thrust the Phædo. He had been reading to the last, and was meditating on Immortality when he died.

Digitized by Google

After his first brief Premiership, that is to say, after the General Election of 1868, Disraeli went into his study and wrote Lothair, perhaps his greatest novel. Mr. Russell's account of it is interesting, if not new:

> Lord Houghton, who reviewed it in the Edinburgh, wrote thus to a friend: "There is immense and most malevolent curiosity about Disraeli's novel. His wisest friends think that it must be a mistake, and his enemies hope it will be his ruin. He told Longman he believed he was the first ex-Premier who had ventured on a work of fiction. If he had said this to me, I should have suggested M. Guizot's Méditations Religieuses."
>
> The popularity and, in a pecuniary sense, the success of Lothair were instantaneous and immense. But the judicious grieved, and the solemn shook their heads, and the critics (possibly because they found themselves defined as the men who had failed in literature and art) were unmerciful. And, indeed, it was easy to make fun of Lothair. The hero was a namby-pamby creature, and, though his career in some points resembled that of Lord Bute, whose submission to Rome had been the social wonder of the moment, he had little enough in common with that interesting and virile character. Then the unbridled and unblushing adulation of rank and wealth, so happily caricatured in Lothair, set the ordinary Englishman against the book; and the descriptions, exact though they were, of such homes as Knole and Trentham, and Stafford House and Norfolk House, seemed, to the unitiated, apocryphal and absurd.
>
> The portraits of eminent persons were recognised as life-like. Probably the late Duke of Abercorn and the late Duke of Sutherland were pleased; but Cardinal Manning regarded the portrait of himself as an act of political revenge; and Bishop Wilberforce wrote: "Lothair is all you say. But my wrath against D. has burnt before this so fiercely that it seems to have burnt up all the materials for burning."

It is some years since any new work by A. Mary F. Robinson (now the wife of M. Duclaux, Director of the Pasteur Institute) has appeared in English; and many readers will, no doubt, be pleased to hear that a collected edition of her poems is in preparation. This volume will be published by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin, and will contain some new poems, together with selections from the five books of verse issued by the same publisher. Mme. Duclaux's first husband was the late Prof. James Darmesteter, founder of the "Revue de Paris," of which Mr. Fisher Unwin is the English publisher, and she is a frequent contributor to the review.

Bibliographical.

Rumour has it that Mr. Leslie Stephen is engaged on a Life of George Eliot, and somehow or other I do not take kindly to the suggestion. It is not that Mr. Stephen is not to be trusted to produce a readable and even valuable volume; it is that one feels as if one had read about George Eliot almost all that one cares to read. It may be remembered that Mr. Stephen is the author of the memoir of Mrs. Cross which figures in the Dictionary of National Biography. That he knows his subject we may be sure. But is there any real necessity for telling the old story all over again? Quite a literature has grown up round George Eliot. There is the biographical and critical study by Mr. George Willis Cooke (1883); there is the monograph by Miss Mathilde Blind in the "Eminent Women" series (1883); there is the official Life and Letters, by Mr. J. W. Cross (1885); there is the little work by Mr. Oscar Browning in the "Great Writers" series (1890); there is a book on the Early Home of George Eliot (1891); there is the miniature Life in the "Westminster Biographies" (1901); and there is the biographical sketch by Mr. Kegan Paul. A book discussing George Eliot as Moralist and Thinker appeared in 1884; and, as for the critical essays on her work, why, they are legion. We have yet to see what Mr. Stephen will do for us, but the prospect is not altogether cheerful.

We shall all, I am sure, be very pleased to have a collected edition of the poems of Miss A. M. F. Robinson (Mme. Duclaux). It is true that she has not resisted the temptation to belong to another nation—that we have to regard her now almost as a Frenchwoman who once condescended to write in English. And her talent as a poet, too, was slender. Her work was pretty, but little more. Still, pretty it was, and, as far as bulk went, there was a fair amount of it. We had The Crowned Hippolitus (from Euripides) in 1881; The New Arcadia, and Other Poems, in 1884; The Italian Garden: a Book of Songs, in 1886; Songs, Ballads, and a Garden Play, in 1888; and A Retrospect, and Other Poems, in 1893. That is a very tolerable show. We must not forget, either, that we had, in 1890, a volume of Lyrics from the Works of Miss A. M. F. Robinson, who, by the way, brought out eighteen years ago a novel called Arden, but has not repeated the experiment.

The editor of the Thrush, I observe, promises us a sonnet by "the great Lord Lytton." The phrase is ambiguous, for it is conceivable that Mr. Mullett Ellis may mean Robert Lytton, while, more probably, he may mean Bulwer Lytton. I fear he stands alone in regarding either of the Lyttons as "great." And, as regards Bulwer, we all know that he was not a poet at all, though he wrote, I take leave to think, a good deal of really vigorous verse. He was also truly remarkable for his versatility—for his unquestionable successes in so many fields. It is not, I submit, permissible to despise the man who produced My Novel, A Strange Story, The Coming Race, Harold, The Last of the Barons, The Last Days of Pompeii, Richelieu, Money, Caxtoniana, and The Student. Yet no one has dreamt of including him among "English Men of Letters," "Great Writers," or any similar series. He seems to have had little or no attraction for the critics. I can recall no estimate of him more recent than those of George Brimley, Nassau W. Senior, and W. Caldwell Roscoe. Perhaps he will find a sympathetic "appreciator" some day—a little less enthusiastic, no doubt, than the editor of the Thrush.

The late Mr. R. H. Newell was, if I remember rightly, one of the American humorists whom Mr. John Camden Hotten introduced originally to the English public. One recollects that, for a few years or so, the Orpheus C. Kerr Papers had a considerable vogue. Personally, I found that a very little of them went a long way. One of the most notable of Mr. Newell's books was that entitled Avery Glibun; or, Between Two Fires. The preface to this was one of the shortest on record: "Avery Glibun being my first essay in sustained fiction, it seems remarkably prudent to say no more about it." I find that Mr. Newell published in England about fifteen years ago a story called There Once Was a Man. His name, probably, is known to very few English people of this generation.

I note the announcement of a new farcical piece, which the authors have entitled, comprehensively, "Smith, Brown, Jones, and Robinson." I wonder if they have ever read, or even heard of, a book by Anthony Trollope, called The Struggles of Brown, Jones, and Robinson, which I recollect perusing some thirty years ago. Modern playwrights are fond of putting the words "Smith," "Brown," and "Jones," into their titles, but of "Robinson" they have hitherto made but little use.

"I see," says a correspondent, "that Mr. William Watson has been singing the praises of Simon de Montfort—perhaps on the principle that led C. S. Calverley to 'enthuse' over an organ-grinder 'for a change.' I have an idea that Mr. Watson is not the first bard to celebrate De Montfort's character and achievement, but I cannot recall the name of his predecessor in eulogy. Can any of your readers help me? Of course, I am well aware that Joanna Baillie's De Montfort was not the historical Simon."

The Bookworm.

Digitized by Google

Reviews.

The Prince of Pessimists.

Schopenhauer: a Lecture. By Thomas Bailey Saunders. (Black. 1s. 6d. net.)

In 1858 appeared in this country a Cyclopædia of Biography, in four volumes, which dealt with the living and dead celebrities of several nations. It is remarkable that this work skipped from Francis Schooten to John Schorel, as though the philosopher did not exist who, in 1818, brought out Die Welt als Wille und Vorstellung. Schooten, and not Schopenhauer! it seems incredible, but the fact remains. At this date Schopenhauer furnishes the bible of all who preach the incurable badness of human nature, and the advantage of annihilating desire. And—fitting revenge!—the Encyclopædia Britannica devotes nearly ten pages to Schopenhauer and none to Schooten and Schorel. Mr. Bailey Saunders has accomplished a useful task in giving us a concise account of the leading ideas of Schopenhauer's philosophy, for the benefit (perhaps) of those persons who fight shy of the colossal World as Will and Idea, because its author advises that it be read twice, "and the first time with great patience."

Says Mr. Saunders: "That the world is the manifestation of Will everywhere one and the same is the truth which he declares his system to embody and all his writings to expound and illustrate." Will is "all and every kind of energy . . . an effort towards being." Says Amiel, who felt flattered by Schopenhauerism, "he refuses to believe in the new man, in any real progress towards perfection"; and with this statement we may well associate the philosopher's own words in Haldane and Kemp's translation of Die Welt (book iv., ch. xli.):

> Death reaps unwearyedly. Yet . . . everything is always there and in its place. . . . The plant always thrives and blooms, the insect hums. . . . The cherries that have already been enjoyed a thousand times we have again before us every summer. The nations also exist as immortal individuals, although sometimes their names change; even their action, what they do and suffer, is always the same, although history always pretends to relate something different, for it is like the kaleidoscope, which at every turn shows a new figure, while we really always have the same thing before our eyes.

This passage brings us face to face with the doctrine of predestination. Schopenhauer's man is born with certain ancestral qualities; they are himself; his actions are merely the result of their movement. Hence the theological drama of temptation is lodged in the exercise of those qualities, and its dénouement is predetermined by what they are and the way in which they are related with one another. Man is merely the phenomenon of a will, and, since he is not the arch-willer at whose behest he crept into being, he is not free. He is naturally, and even in his altruistic struggles and tears, inexorably selfish. Duty is a meaningless expression. As for love, "All love, however ethereally it may bear itself, is rooted in the sexual impulse alone." And sexual impulse in general is "simply the will to live," the will, of which all persons and things are the expression, seeking to express itself once more, and as harmoniously as circumstances allow, in the offspring of two lovers:

> The delusive ecstasy which seizes a man at the sight of a woman whose beauty is suited to him, and pictures to him a union with her as the highest good, is just the sense of the species, which, recognising the distinctly expressed stamp of the same, desires to perpetuate it with this individual.

The lover is the dupe of the species, of the world-will.

These ideas involve a great contradiction of Christianity; they are not, however, so morally debilitating as they appear at a first hearing. For an intellectual man who wakes up to the thought that the universe is, as it were, playing at life and playing with him as the result of an immense desire to feel its own life, must necessarily acknowledge in himself a hostility to the Power that speculates in his ignorance for its own amusement. The clank of his shackles arouses his combativeness; he breaks them. This act does not imply freedom—there are many slaveries; but the slavery of Kentucky in bad old days was not the slavery of Georgia. Bondage to the world-will may, however, be temporarily escaped by means of the intellect when it declines to be enfeebled by sensual indulgence and to fetter itself by the concept "duty." The result is clairvoyance in the limited, yet mystic, sense of seeing things as they are. No one for long sees things as they are. Their colour is in the eye, their sound in the ear; but the one is misread, the other misheard, even if we allow that ear and eye receive authentic impressions. But, says Mr. Saunders in eloquent paraphrase:

> To the man whose intellect is most fully detached from his will [the things of the world] reveal themselves in their true nature. He sees them not as they are in relation to other objects, . . . but in their real significance. He sees in each of them the manifestation of the Will at a particular stage, the outline of the ultimate form or archetype which it embodies. . . . Every object thus contemplated for its own sake alone and in its eternal meaning is, according to Schopenhauer, beautiful.

The clutch of the world-will is, one apprehends, least disastrous on the artist—especially the musician who, in his medium, represents "not this or that particular joy or sorrow, pleasure or pain, but joy and sorrow, as it were in the abstract, and pleasure and pain as they are in their very essence."

And this brings us back to Schopenhauer's disdain of history, that ocean of particularities—history, which Bolingbroke followed an ancient author in calling "philosophy teaching by examples." He sees in history no motion towards the Tennysonian "far off divine event." He sees simply the maëlstrom of man's badness, and that badness is, in his estimation, very bad indeed. It is hardly profitable to quote him in the full tide of his misanthropy, but a few lines may be devoted to explain it. It is not considered unlucky to rail at life from an armchair. There seems a fortification in distrust and abuse. It is sometimes good policy to affect to despise a treasure. The egoist who between 1788 and 1860 revelled in knowledge and the comforts of the body stuck to his own life with the pertinacity of any optimist for all his despising of life and men. He lived on the ground floor to be safe against fire; he carried his own razor about with him to avoid infection. He was, we may conjecture, a man who would not have willed self-annihilation. But he saw, as one born on the eve of Europe's blood-drunkenness, man's rage for havoc and revenge, and in the spectacle of negro slavery in the United States man's appetite for cruelty and the fruits of grinding wrong. He read his London Times, too, and was aware of crimes committed for insurance money in moral England. Our pet hypocrisies were glass to him. It is to be feared much goodness was brick to him. Yet he acknowledged a kind of altruism, which we may call the transference of self. His dull life was not always dignified; the throwing of a middle-aged seamstress downstairs brought him into irksome contact with the law. But what of his life? It is not his philosophy, though his consciousness of personal imperfection may have enhanced his sense of the imperfection of mankind. No one has denounced more logically, more eloquently, than he the miseries and vices of mankind. To read him when in pain is to hear a man swearing for us. That is his smallest service, but it is a noticeable one.

Nietzsche falls foul of his impulse to be the unriddler of the world. We demur. The hymn tells us to "dare to be a Daniel," and Daniel was a prophet. Prophecy may not be meat, but it is wine. Tempted by a splendid mirage, man explores the desert. He who has read The Critique of Pure Reason, as Schopenhauer would have men read it before they proceed to his own masterpiece, is in need of refreshment. Schopenhauer provides it not only in the speculation, which we suspect is the staple of prophecy, he provides it in his brilliant wit, his aphoristic wisdom, his English reasonableness, which atone for his envious diatribes at the expense of Hegel, the colleague who emptied his lecture-room. It is true that, as Amiel says, he "simplifies" too much, and that his concept "Will" becomes paradoxical in excessive application. But he is—how un-Kantian this seems!—continually referring to and criticising life. He is, when all is said, the most practical of German philosophers.

Digitized by Google

Hebrew History and Letters.

The Social Life of the Hebrews. By the Rev. Edward Day. (Nimmo.)

That the glory which the piety of eighteen centuries has woven around her history has at length departed from Israel requires no better proof than this well-written little book. As one of the "Semitic" series, edited by Prof. Craig, of Michigan, it aims at being, in the words of its prospectus, "popularly scientific," while its author, as a clergyman of we know not what denomination, cannot be supposed to write without, at any rate, an ulterior view to edification. Yet, instead of the magnificent race of conquerors towering above the neighbouring peoples as much by their inherent superiority as by the visible protection of Heaven, he shows us the Hebrews as a few savage clans, of mixed origin, learning the arts of life, religion, and everything we call civilisation, with some difficulty, from the more cultured peoples among whom they had thrust themselves. He does not even disguise their inferiority in warfare, of which he says they made "sorry work," and somewhat sarcastically adds that it was lucky for them that they "were seldom opposed by forces more disciplined than their own before the Assyrian armies, in the ninth century, began to devote attention to them." We are inclined to believe, even without the proofs that he offers, that Mr. Day's picture of Israel is truer to nature than that instilled into us in our youth, but it certainly is not so picturesque.

To come to particulars, Mr. Day divides his social history into two periods, which he calls "The Time of the Judges" and "The Time of the Monarchy." In the first of these, the clan was, as he says, the form of social organisation, and it was not until the last-named period that the Hebrews showed any sense of nationality. Under the Judges, we see them passing from a nomadic people into an agricultural one, and in so doing acquiring some of their later characteristics. We may cast aside, says Mr. Day in effect, any attempt to extenuate the cruelties committed by them in their conquest of Canaan, because it never really took place; and the wars of Joshua, as recorded in the Bible, are irreconcilable with the fact that the Canaanites remained superior in numbers to the Hebrews. He thinks it was from these Canaanites, situated as they were in the midst of the great empires of Egypt and Assyria, and the, perhaps at one time, equally great power of the Hittites, that the Hebrews first got the passion for trade that has since distinguished them. This was probably an unmixed blessing, but the same cannot be said for the religious notions that they borrowed from the same source. For the Canaanites had everywhere set up a quantity of local gods, passing under the generic name of Baal—Mr. Day, indeed, does not hide his belief that Yahweh was at one time recognised as a Baal Himself—and the worship of these Baals was attended with licentious orgies, which were never really abandoned by the Hebrews till the Captivity. Yet it is difficult to see that the Hebrew religion can have suffered much by this adulteration, for we are told later that "at its best, in the eighth century, Yahwism did not have a very salutary influence upon the social life of the people as a whole," and it was only the Great Prophets who had a conception of the national deity higher than that of the nations around them. We even read that "much of the moral obliquity which we discover among the Hebrews of the Monarchy must be charged to Yahwism, though for the character of Yahwism they were themselves at least partially responsible." After this, it is perhaps needless to say that Mr. Day writes avowedly from the standpoint of the Higher Criticism. Yet his book is modest in tone, and will well repay perusal.

History, Prophecy, and the Monuments. By James Frederick McCurdy. Vol. III. (Macmillan.)

This volume is in effect an independent book, dealing with the period of Hebrew history from the reign of Josiah to the Return of the Captivity, the aim of the author being to spin, from both sacred and profane sources, such a consecutive and consistent narrative as cannot be drawn from the Bible alone. He has by his other works shown himself well fitted for the task, and writes easily and well. As might be expected, too, from the Professor of a University so imbued with Scottish feeling as that of Toronto, he does not scruple to look at Hebrew history through what may be called Sunday-school spectacles, with the result that he attempts to explain away "the propensity to cheat and deceive" that he finds among the earliest Hebrew traditions, and gets out of the difficulty by the extraordinary dictum that "no community becomes honest and veracious unless, by business training, it is made to realise, as a people, the advantages of honesty and veracity, and the evils of cheating and crookedness in matters of bargain and sale." Yet he does not permit himself to conceal the fact that the Return from the Captivity fell very far short of the expectations formed of it by the Jews: or that, as he puts it:

> No contrast could be greater than that between the prophetic picture of Israel's restoration and its actual process. . . . Instead of a host of eager patriots triumphantly reclaiming Jehovah's land, and thronging thither from the ends of the earth, a feeble band of settlers were huddled between the mounds of Jerusalem, which long remained without the bare essentials of walls and temple.

Nor does he think Cyrus' measure more successful from the spiritual point of view:

> The new Jerusalem [he says], which was to be a light to the Gentiles and the hospitable shrine of votaries from the north and west . . . became the seat of formal and exclusive worship, with a minute and rigorous ritual as the handbook of the most spiritual of religions.

Yet it was only by some such means that the mass of the people could at once preserve their nationality and at the same time turn from the polytheism of the Monarchy to that monotheistic faith which he thinks was always present to their prophets: and in this he sees a sufficient reward for all their sufferings.

Turning to more mundane matters, Prof. McCurdy gives an explanation of the perpetual tergiversations and rebellions of the Hebrews against their suzerain for the time being which seems to us both new and plausible. From the time of "poor old Solomon," as Prof. McCurdy disrespectfully calls the king who was himself probably a vassal of the Pharaoh Sheshonq I., down to that of the miserable Jehoiachin, Hebrew history is but a long series of attempts to throw off the yoke of Assyria, Egypt, or Chaldæa, as each power in turn came to exercise supreme control over Palestine. This has been often put down to fanaticism, but it is evident from Prof. McCurdy's history that this cannot have been the real motive, for while none of the predominant powers attempted to interfere with the national religions of their vassals, the Hebrews always showed themselves more than willing to run after "strange gods," and to worship them either concurrently with or to the exclusion of their own. Nor was there among the pre-Exilic Jews that overmastering sense of patriotism which has sometimes induced a small people like the Swiss to rebel at all risks against what seem to be overwhelming odds. For with the Hebrews, as the separation of the Ten Tribes showed plainly enough, clan-feeling was almost always stronger than nationality, and the independence which both Israel and Judah enjoyed under the great powers of Asia was preferable to the enslaved condition in which the united tribes existed in the time of the Philistines and the Canaanites. But Prof. McCurdy lets us see in more than one passage his conviction that it was the objection of the freeholders and merchants to the taxation necessary for raising the tribute due to the suzerain, which time after time forced the hands of the Hebrew kings, and thus drove them into rebellions that their better judgment must have condemned. This seems likely enough, for the reluctance of the Hebrew to sacrifice either person or purse for the good of the community has always made a Hebrew state most difficult to govern, and even in the time of David it was found impossible to raise an army without the aid of foreign mercenaries. But the conclusion might possibly lead Prof. McCurdy into admissions he might not care to make. For we gather from certain obiter dicta of his in the work before us that he is one of the people called "Pro-Boers," and if ever there was a lesson against shirking national responsibilities it is to be found in the history of the Hebrews before the Captivity.

Digitized by Google

A Handbook to Old Testament Hebrew. Edited by Samuel G. Green, D.D. (Religious Tract Society.)

This book is intended, as we learn from the preface, not as an exhaustive study of the language, but merely to ground the reader in "the Hebrew of the Old Testament." As such it seems well adapted for its purpose, being both clearly written and well printed. Besides the usual exercises and chrestomathy, it contains two vocabularies—of Hebrew-English and English-Hebrew respectively—and after a short study of it the intelligent learner ought to find no difficulty in reading the Hebrew Bible in the original.

A Three Months' War Diary.

On the Warpath. By Mrs. J. D. Leathes-Culley. (Long. 3s. 6d.)

This slender volume comprises the diary written for the entertainment of a friend by a lady who spent something short of three months in Cape Colony and the Orange River Colony, about the time when Buller joined hands with Roberts at Pretoria. She came out with a general notion of being useful, and thirty-six boxes of assorted usefulness for distribution. Being a woman for whom the word impossible had no meaning, she found the men who could help her each more delightful than the other. Thus, "Sir Alfred Milner is simply charming":

> I determined to make Ficksburg my objective, and his Excellency says I need not fret any more as to my permits, which is as good as saying he will get them. What a strong, able face he has—this "whitest man in South Africa!"

She excepts always the Dutch element from eulogy:

> You have no idea at home, and the average officer has none, because his presence imposes silence and deceit, of how really this [Cape] colony is an enemy's country. Even men in Imperial pay do their best to hamper our transport, and yet our officers believe every word these creatures say.

Even Kitchener she thinks too easy; but though > a good many people have downs on Lord Kitchener, my own opinion is that he is the only man with backbone and disregard enough for breaking eggs to deal with this South African pudding.

Mrs. Leathes-Culley is one of the people who have the knack of making things hum, and in spite of what she wonderfully calls the "stick-in-the-muddiness" of the Afrikander officials, she hustled her way up to the north with admirable celerity. The journal of her progress is of the most flowing and unstudied kind; she is quite happy in setting down the name of a place as "something like Tea-pot," and so leaving it for investigation by those that come after. Another thing, on the way up, aroused her sporting Englishwoman's indignation:

> The road is strewn with dead horses, dead creatures whose attitudes suggest too much suffering to set down for you, and, above all, needless suffering, and as such a most grievous and a great blot.

But the gallant lady is not especially prone to criticism or lament. She is full of fun. Half out of and half through a window in the dead of night, overwhelmed by sudden misgiving as to whether it were her own, she "had a vision of the Commissioner sitting up in bed with his hair on end, startled by the sight of the 'confoundedly aristocratic lady' being precipitated violently into his room on her head in the small hours of the morning"; whereby she was "more amused than she had been for many a long day."

The great event of her expedition was the defence of Ladybrand by 150 men, mostly Yeomanry, against 2,500 Boers, with seven guns. Mrs. Leathes-Culley remained in charge of the hospital, and fetched water in pails, under a cross-fire; in which act her invaluable Eliza Mills, or some other well-inspired person, snapshotted her with good results. As to her emotion, she writes:

> When a woman tells me she likes hearing bullets whistling round her head, as one did to-day, I know she must be either an imbecile or a liar; but it is quite possible to put up with it when an object is to be gained by doing so.

Two particular impressions the diarist brought away with her from Africa:

> The first, that Mr. Atkins in hospital is the bravest, patientest, most thorough gentleman God ever made; the second, that lying is in the very atmosphere of South Africa, and the statement of an Afrikander about as real as the mirage on his native veldt.

In simple, artless, straightforward way, this narrative of what a brave gentlewoman saw of a corner of the campaign is quite readable.

Where Caxton Lived.

The Story of Bruges. By Ernest Gilliat-Smith. Illustrated by Edith Colomb and Herbert Railton. (Dent. 4s. 6d. net.)

It would seem that no year passes without its new book on Bruges, in Flemish, French, or English. It is little more than twelve months since we reviewed Mr. Wilfrid Robinson's handy "Historical Sketch," and now Mr. Gilliat-Smith, who, like Mr. Robinson, is an enthusiastic Brugeois by residence, has, as it was inevitable somebody should, added an account of the "Ville Musée" to Messrs. Dent's "Mediæval Towns" series. The book, of course, does not pretend to be a history of the Flemish city, now so calm and pensive after the centuries of strife and uproar which have surged around its tall belfry and its almost matchless Hôtel de Ville. That has still to be written, and it is only some Kervyn de Lettenhove, steeped in the Flemish spirit, and with all the archives under his hand, who can ever hope to perform so monumental a task. Meanwhile, Mr. Gilliat-Smith's volume is, in many respects, a really excellent handbook, alike to the visitor in Bruges and to the fireside tourist. He is inclined sometimes to be a little "precious," a trifle vague and mysterious in the language of his enthusiasm. To him, however, the City of Charles the Bold and Mary of Burgundy is "the flower of cities all," and those who have fallen under its spell shall say whether there is much—or any—exaggeration in his appreciation.

Digitized by Google

The main outlines of the story of Bruges are already so familiar that the writer has been wise to make his book anecdotal rather than formally historical. He thus obtains scope for much matter of great interest which might otherwise have had to be sacrificed to the mere marshalling of facts and dates. Those same hard facts are very well narrated, and, in most cases, they are told with admirable accuracy. But we are somewhat puzzled by Mr. Gilliat-Smith's attitude about the relic of the Holy Blood, which, as he justly says, "has had no little influence on the architectural, and artistic, and religious development of the city." The tradition is that the crystal cylinder that is kept in the gorgeous "Chasse du Saint Sang" contains either a quantity of the blood of Christ or of the blood-stained water in which Joseph of Arimathea washed the Divine body. Mr. Gilliat-Smith appears to accept the tradition, despite its grotesque impossibility, and we are well aware how difficult it is for any resident in Bruges to do otherwise. But is he not somewhat out in his facts when he says that the relic, which is kissed by thousands of lips every year, and carried in procession through the town once every twelve months, "is still preserved in the same crystal vial in which Dierick of Alsace received it"? Gailliard, whose Recherches Historiques sur la Chapelle du Saint Sang à Bruges shares authority with Canon Van Haecke's more recent monograph, Le Précieux Sang à Bruges, states categorically that the cylinder has been "changé ou renouvelé" five times, and he gives dates and the most minute details of the alterations. The matter is not of much importance, though it would obviously add greatly to the curious interest of the relic were it still in its orignal covering. Mr. Gilliat-Smith develops an ingenious theory that, when the day of its decadence came, Bruges was saved from utter extinction by the Church. The city was made a bishopric in 1560, and soon afterwards it became the home of many religious communities, who erected buildings and caused money to circulate, while their presence attracted many rich and gentle families. We are disposed to think that there was once a good deal of truth in this; but it is true no longer, and the Bruges of to-day is painfully pauperised. What may happen when the ship-canal that is to connect it with the sea is finished it is hard to say. Should the place again become a busy seaport, there is only too much reason to fear that it may be modernised out of all knowledge, as Antwerp has been.

It is a pity that Mr. Gilliat-Smith has not told us a little more about the place of Bruges in literature. He devotes a great deal of space to its architects and painters—space which, for the matter of that, it is impossible to grudge. The two Van Eycks, Gerard David, Roger van der Weyden, Memling—whose finest work hangs in St. John's Hospital—are enough to confer imperishable lustre upon any town; but we find next to nothing in these pages about Caxton and Colard Mansion, for example, despite that their presence in Bruges had the most vital influence upon English letters. The father of English printing lived there for more than thirty years; there he learned printing from Mansion; there he produced the first book ever printed in our tongue, The Recuyell of the Historyes of Troye. It was not surprising that, at such a time, the thoughts even of a merchant like Caxton should turn towards literature. He abode in Bruges during the reign of the greatest bibliophile of the fifteenth century, when the city, as Mr. Blades has told us, "teemed with authors, translators, scribes, and illuminators," as well as with great libraries. Caxton produced his first five books there—a circumstance which, had it no other claim upon us, would invest Bruges with profound interest for every lover of letters. Great, too, may well be the pride of any city which knew Dante, and the references to Bruges in both the "Inferno" and the "Purgatorio," certainly suggest that Dante had visited Flanders, which, indeed, was probable enough. The father of Flemish poetry himself, that Jacob van Maerlant whom enthusiastic native critics would place second only to the immortal Florentine, although nobody in the wide world but themselves ever reads him, was Recorder of Damme, and consequently a Brugeois. Sir Thomas More is supposed to have partially composed his "Utopia" beneath the towers which arise, brown and grey and weather-beaten, from the Flemish plain. In the sixteenth century—or, as Mr. Gilliat-Smith would say, in "the fifteen hundreds"—Bruges was as literary as in the days of Philip the Good; indeed, Justus Lipsius found it the Athens of the Netherlands. In later generations it has done little direct work in literature, but has been the cause of much bookmaking in many tongues. Mr. Smith's effort is the newest, and by no means the worst, of the long series. We could wish, however, that it suffered less from a drawback which afflicts all the volumes in the "Mediæval Towns" series—most of the illustrations are ruined by excessive reduction; while the index is a farce. All things considered, however, it is the best guide we know to the wonderful old city, which was great alike in commerce and in war, in art and in architecture, and remains to-day stately yet gracious and tender in its decay.

Empire Makers.

Letters Received by the East India Company. Edited by William Foster. Vol. V. (Sampson Low.)

This collection of letters and reports from the factors of the East India Company to the Governors at home is prepared by Mr. Foster, with great knowledge and pains, "under the patronage"—whatever that may mean—of the Secretary of State for India. The enterprise is sufficiently bulky to daunt a less persevering editor. The ninety-three letters of the present volume occupy three hundred and fifty-two pages, and only cover the events of the first six months of the year 1617. But as apparently someone can afford to print them, they are welcome, for the artless narratives of these half-educated merchants possess a distinct interest, not only for the historian of commerce, but also, in the light that they throw upon a little-known side of early seventeenth century life, for the humanist. The year 1616 had been noteworthy for the arrival in India of Sir Thomas Roe, sent as a formal Ambassador from James the First to the Great Mogul, in the hopes of negotiating a treaty which would give the factors a more definite and unassailable position in the Peninsula. There is not a great deal about Roe's affairs in this instalment of the correspondence, but already it was becoming obvious that he was not likely to attain his main object. Jahángir received the Ambassador in friendly fashion enough, and led him a pretty dance in following the wanderings of the Court through the thick jungles and rough hills that lay between Ajmere and the Vindhya Mountains. The presents that accompanied him were seized upon with truly Oriental eagerness. A pair of mastiffs especially pleased the king, and were provided with palanquins and special attendants to keep off the flies, while Jahángír fed them himself with a pair of silver tongs made for the purpose. One of the gifts, indeed, was misunderstood. This was a picture of Venus and a Satyr, which suggested "a scorn of Asiatics, whom the naked satyr represented, and was of the same complexion, and not unlike: who, being held by Venus (a white woman) by the nose, it seemed that she led him captive." Roe shared in the "hunting or hawking on tanks by boats, in which the king takes wonderful delight," and when Jahángír was not "prevented by a drowsiness which possesseth his Majesty from the fumes of Bacchus," was admitted to familiar chats in the palace during the cool of the evening. But no treaty was signed, and before long it became apparent that none would be signed, Jahángír preferring to treat the regulation of the English trade as a local matter, to be settled by his favourite son, Khurram, the governor of the province within which the factory at Surat lay.

Digitized by Google

Most of the letters before us deal with the extension of the East India trade by settlements at Bantam, in Japan and elsewhere; and particularly with the mission of Edward Connock, Thomas Barker, and others, "to attempt the establishing of a trade in Persia." They made good their footing, and, in spite of the intrigues of the friars, began to sap the Portuguese commerce—already declined—with Ormuz. But, as so often in the history of these ventures, success was jeopardised by the jealousies of the factors themselves, Barker, in special, who seems to have been an ill-conditioned fellow, intrigued against Connock, and calumniated him to Sir Thomas Roe. Roe was deceived, but we agree with Mr. Foster that the documents make plain the baselessness of the charges. He says truly of Connock:

> Ambitious, fussy, strangely wanting at times in tact and judgment, he made many enemies and left few friends; yet the honesty and unsparing energy with which he carried out the duty entrusted to him command our respect, and, on the whole, his is a welcome addition to our gallery of portraits of the men who founded English trade in the East.

Of the factors as a whole, it must be admitted that their loyalty to the Company left something to be desired, and that the unrestrained liberty of their position was too often abused. They brought the English name into contempt by the facility with which they gave way to the temptations of the luxurious East. Their personal bickerings fill an astonishing space in the letters, and the quick interchange of complaint and counter-complaint must have sorely harassed the Directors at home. William Leske, a clergyman who went out as minister to the factory at Surat, had to be sent home, as "a most licentious, ungodly liver, and one that prefers his epicurism, drunkenness, and intolerable, insolent pride before the divine worship of God." Upon his way home he took occasion to compose a specious letter, wherein he endeavoured, quite falsely, as it appears, to turn the tables upon his accusers. George Cokayne writes to the chief factor at Bantam to complain of the discontent he has with Hugh Gritt, to whom on one occasion he "could frame no better answer than with half-a-dozen good cuffs." George Play is put upon by Barker, a dishonest scheme of whose he will not further, and is "branded with the name of knave, Puritan knave, prying knave, and threadbare knave." In the last epithet, he insinuates, there is some justice, since "to brave it in cloth of gold I cannot, as he doth, unless I should wrong the Company." It is evident that many of the factors carried on a private trade of their own, to the loss of the Company, and although efforts were made to put down this practice, the Directors at home were really helpless. Nor were they wholly free of blame themselves. They should have paid better salaries. But there is much to show that in many respects they did not know their own business. They sent out unsuitable and badly packed goods. Their ships were ill-equipped and ill-found. Pepwell, the captain of the Charles, writes:

> Manifold are the abuses of them your Worships put in trust about the arming and victualling your ships. The muskets are generally naught, being not well metalled, ready upon three or four shots to do more harm to their fellows than to the enemy; the powder, a great deal of it, little better than coal dust clammed together; the cordage full of tar, which causeth it to be of an extraordinary weight and seemingly great, which being stretched proveth of too small a size for your ships (besides the tar in hot countries burneth and spoileth the hemp); some of our boltropes rotten; our bread full of worms and mouldy, much old bread being shuffled in amongst the [new] to the spoil of the rest, nor can the pursers give a just account of it, being delivered by the baker (I guess) at adventure; the wax candles more than half tallow; the cider weak and naught.

A few miscellaneous points of interest in the volume may be noted. Here is an early observation of the characteristic taste of Japan in matters of art:

> The pictures of the planets and others of high price which came in these ships, and cost £3 sterling per piece, were wrapped together face to face, and as it seemeth were not dry; so that in opening of them one spoiled another, and are not all of them together worth a penny, being utterly defaced, and had they come in their full beauty could never have sold here for a quarter part of the money they cost in England. So it is no use sending such matters into these parts, for they esteem a printed sheet of paper with a horse, a ship, or a bird, more than they do such a rich picture. Neither will anyone give 6d. for that fair picture of the Conversion of St. Paul.

Among the Englishmen who came out to India in Pepwell's fleet was one Thomas Herbert, who was a younger brother of Lord Herbert of Cherbury, and of George Herbert the poet. He seems to have been rather a ne'er-do-weel. Sir Thomas Roe sent for him, and the factors were glad to be quit of his company. On the way the "hasty and cholerick young man"—it is really very English—endangered the safety of his party by beating and firing at a native. There was no preferment for him with the Ambassador, and before long he drifted back to England. Finally, it is to be observed that the letters of the traders and ship-captains which make up this correspondence, though often pretentious and stilted enough, are sometimes racy examples of the vernacular, and must afford a happy hunting-ground for the editors of the New English Dictionary. "Brabbles," for idle, cavilling talk, is a pleasing term. A factor writes "that the Dutch are almost off the hinges at Japara for nimming the junks," and the painful commentator of "Henry the Fifth" may garner the phrase.

Other New Books.

A Historical Geography of the British Colonies. Vol. V. By C. P. Lucas.

The fifth volume of Mr. C. P. Lucas's Historical Geography of the British Colonies contains the history of Canada up to the "happy calamity" which made that country a British possession. The scope of the work has necessitated a certain compression which has prevented Mr. Lucas from doing full justice to the romantic detail in which the history of New France abounds. But the book is thorough, sober, and full of interest. It is the special object of this series to exhibit the influence which natural conformation and climate have exercised upon the course of events, and in this volume the crowning importance of the great waterways in both the military and the social history of Canada is well set forth. But of more interest to the general reader is the comparison between the aims and methods of French and English colonisation. In neither case did the home country follow any consistent or definite policy. But whereas the leaders of French Canada were men of long vision and large ideas, enterprising, resourceful, versatile, their English rivals were slow and matter-of-fact, often short-sighted, seldom united in any common policy. Cartier, Champlain, La Salle, Frontenac, and Montcalm are names which it is not easy to match from the annals of the English colonies. Against them stands out the heroic figure of Wolfe, but Kirke and Johnson and Shirley are men of lesser mould, and Washington is as yet in the making. "The path of English colonisation has been strewn with lost opportunities"; yet the progress made has no parallel in history. Success has not been won—in the field of colonisation it never can be—by the genius of a few, but by the stubborn perseverance and practical instinct of thousands. The very limitations of the Anglo-Saxon race have conduced to its success. The idealist may found an empire, but not a nation. Here and there it is hinted that the lessons of Canadian history are not inapplicable to South Africa, and the volume closes with something like a profession of faith in the future of a South Africa which will be, as Canada is to-day, the home of a nation deriving strength and unity from the very differences within it, and from the hard-fought battles of its past. (Clarendon Press.)

Digitized by Google

THE WORK OF THE NINTH DIVISION. BY SIR H. E. COLVILE.

This book, by Major-General Sir H. E. Colvile, cannot be approached as if it were an ordinary book on the war. It must naturally be controversial, considering the amount of argument of a heated sort which has been expended round its author's name and actions. We may say at once that there is nothing of the furious partisan about Sir Henry's work; he tells in spirited, but temperate, fashion—from his own point of view, of course—what he saw and did when he was in command of the Ninth Division. The only way to review the book adequately would be to pick out the parallel passages from it, and from the official despatches and books by newspaper correspondents, especially on Paardeberg and Sannah's Post. That is not possible here, and so it will be sufficient to point out that if the reader keeps the despatches, and some one of the histories of the war already published, at hand while he is studying Sir H. E. Colvile's book, he will be able to understand a good many things that hitherto seemed obscure. The points dealt with by Sir Henry are Paardeberg, Poplar Grove, Sannah's Post, Winberg, Lindley, Roodeport, and Heilbron. Into matters which are still subjects of controversy we will not enter, but we may observe that Sir Henry is a practised writer, who carries his reader pleasantly along, and avoids as much as possible hearsay, giving only his own impressions of what he has seen and done. The maps and plans are excellent. It is a book to be read, but not to be read alone. (Edward Arnold.)

SURREY. BY WALTER JERROLD.

Mr. Jerrold, like the other writers of volumes in this series, has a proper enthusiasm for his county. He does not merely state facts, but endeavours to make them live, to give them an appropriate setting. The ordinary guide-book is a thing which one endures just as one supports many other necessary discomforts of life; but there is no question of enduring Mr. Jerrold's book—one can enjoy it as the personal expression of the point of view of a man who appreciates his subject.

Surrey is emphatically a royal and lavish county; yet it gives liberally and of its best only to those who approach it with a lover's intimacy. Its great highways are admirable in their kind, but its byways, its woods, its shy valleys, are incomparable. So also are its downs and heaths. The enthusiasm of John Evelyn and John Aubrey does not, to-day, seem in the least overstated, though Aubrey had no birth-tie with the county; to Evelyn it was "the country of my birth and my delight." And, indeed, the lover of pure English scenery need not travel more than thirty miles from London to come upon ripe perfection, and the antiquarian may set out from Bermondsey and steer south or south-east and find everywhere material for his contemplation. So far as we have been able to discover, Mr. Jerrold has omitted nothing of importance which could practically assist the tourist of the right sort; his itineraries are complete and well-arranged, and his narrative is marked by a pleasant allusiveness. The additional articles, by competent authorities, upon the birds, flowers, geology, and entomology of the county, are concise and full, and many of Mr. Symington's line-drawings are accurate and suggestive. (Dent. 4s. 6d. net.)

THE STORY OF NEWFOUNDLAND. BY F. E. SMITH.

Our first colony, and the little spot from which has grown the British Empire as we know it now, is the island of Newfoundland, of which Sir Walter Raleigh wrote: "If this should be lost it would be the greatest blow that was ever given to England." When he wrote it was the one visible sign of that greater England in which he was so passionate a believer, and stood for the Empire that was to be. There is no doubt that the island was discovered by John Cabot (setting aside the wanderings of the Vikings), and the date was early in 1497, for on August 10 of that year King Henry VII. entered in the Privy Purse expenses: "To hym that found the New Isle, £10." The early history of Newfoundland is of some interest, and is well summarised by Mr. Smith. It suffered even more than most colonies from Little Englanders on the one hand, and from injudicious friends on the other, but the real interest of the island lies in the history of to-day. There are three burning questions in Newfoundland: the French shore, the Federal Union with Canada, and the Reid Contract. In a volume of the size to which the "Story of the Empire" series is limited it is, of course, impossible to deal at all fully with such vexed questions as these, each one of which has used a vast quantity of printer's ink on its own account, but Mr. Smith seems, within the limits at his command, to have put the case as lucidly and impartially as possible. His chapter on the French Shore is specially to be commended as containing the gist of the matter in remarkably few words. This question is one on which Englishmen will do well to inform themselves, as it has been chronic for many years, and may become acute at any moment should a change of government occur in France. (Horace Marshall.)

THE ENGLISH CHURCH, FROM THE NORMAN CONQUEST TO THE ACCESSION OF EDWARD I. BY W. R. W. STEPHENS.

This is the third volume issued, and the second in chronological order, of an elaborate history of the Church of England, written on the co-operative principle. It extends from the middle of the eleventh century to the middle of the thirteenth, and its principal subjects are—first, the struggle between the ecclesiastical and civil powers in the state of which Lanfranc, Anselm, and Becket are the leading figures; and, secondly, the renewal of activity in the Church brought about by the reforming spirit of Edmund Rich and Robert Grosseteste, and by the coming to England of the Dominican and Franciscan orders. It appears to be the object of the Dean of Winchester and his fellow-writers, while making "a careful study of original authorities and the best ancient and modern writers," to put their results into a form convenient for the general reader. They give no detailed references to the texts, contenting themselves with a brief bibliographical note of each chapter. And certainly the three volumes before us provide excellent summaries, alike learned, clear, and judicial, of the periods with which they respectively deal. The general reader will probably find this in every way the best book of the kind to put on his shelves. (Macmillan.)

Digitized by Google

STUDIA SINAITICA, No. VIII. EDITED AND TRANSLATED BY M. D. GIBSON.

THIS instalment of the treasure discovered in the Convent of St. Catherine, on Mount Sinai, comprises three MSS. The first item is an interesting Arabic fragment, evidently from the pen of a Christian in defence of the mother of Jesus against Jewish obloquy. Its object is to prove her descent from David. Incidentally you may learn several unfamiliar details of the early world and them who peopled it, notably the perpetual service before the body of Adam, and the idea that it must be carried to Jerusalem, there to rest at the centre of the world.

The second item is the story of Aphikia—a sort of corrective of the scandal of Bathsheba. It is followed by the Acts of the martyrs Cyprian and Justina, in Arabic and Greek. (Clay. 10s.)

Fiction.

The Inheritors By Joseph Conrad and F. M. Hueffer. (Heinemann. 6s.)

THIS book is an allegory, a satire à clef if you prefer it. The Inheritors are a new social and political development, an unmoral, grasping people, bred of these days, a menace to England, who will inherit the earth by force of possessing every needful quality except meekness. The story depicts their corruption of Parliament and the Press in the interests of a great chartered company; the disclosure of the whole gigantic fraud by an emotional novelist, sent out to bless, but returning with a curse in his mouth; the consequent downfall of the promoters. In Churchill, the old-fashioned literary statesman, you may recognize ———; in the Duc de Mersch you may see another ———; Polehampton, the publisher, might be ———; Gurnard, the statesman of a newer, less principled school, is certainly intended for ———; even Lea, the publisher's reader, who has nothing to do with the story, is probably identifiable. In so far as certain "inheriting" tendencies are about just now, influencing the originals of these characters, their identity is valuable; yet the first interest should be the story, and that the authors have failed to make either persuasive or vital. To set down the history of a big political swindle is one thing: to prove it, to make it live, is another. This book never lives. We are told this and that, we are called upon to witness the various stages by which a rogue like de Mersch acquires power and prestige; and we comply with never more than languor. We knew it all before. The novelist who would lay bare a venerable truth must dress up his find with more spirit and skill than this, and with more flavour. Political comedy, above all varieties of comedy, must be carried off with a high hand, with gusto. There is none here.

And a satire must be more normal. Indeed, a political satire cannot be too normal, too close to ordinary human nature. And yet to these national castigators it has seemed good to introduce into their history of twentieth century fact, as the leader of the Inheritors (surely a natural enough product), a supernatural visitor, fresh from the imagination of Mr. H. G. Wells, who calls herself a "Fourth Dimensionist," and to whose influence is attributed the downfall of de Mersch, his associates, and his chartered company in Greenland. As if everyday reasons were not—as in life—enough.

Apparently, without the fascinations exerted upon Granger of Etchingham, the journalist and rising author and narrator of the story, by the Fourth Dimensionist, beginning with a conjuring trick played upon a Sussex labourer, and continuing with the impersonation of Granger's dead sister in his aunt's house in Paris—without this, he would never have been so weak as to write against his conscience, and play into the hands of the de Mersch party. Hence her inestimable value. And, of course, one can call her by any other name—such as "The Imperialistic Spirit." To our mind, however, she remains a blot on a book which without her would be more reasonable and many times more effective.

The Inheritors has many deft passages, some of the character-drawing is brilliant, and the writing is never slovenly, rarely anything but above the ordinary level. The author of Lord Jim and Mr. Hueffer, however, should beware of ultra-delicacy of expression. We remember no book in which so many sentences collapse upon dots.

Bush-Whacking, and Other Sketches. By Hugh Clifford. (Blackwood. 6s.)

MR. CLIFFORD is not only one of the most capable and successful of our younger Eastern administrators, but he is also fast proving himself one of our best tellers of contemporary Eastern tales. The fascinating Malay Peninsula is his habitat, both as Resident and as writer, and his first-hand knowledge, his simple human feeling, and his genuine literary gift (witness the phrase—a seaman's "knotty snore") combine to make its strange people and primal natural conditions very real to those who walk in frock-coats and fichus. Moreover, his tales are true—not in the sense that the events portrayed happened, though he says they did, but in the sense that they might have happened yesterday, or may to-morrow, exactly as he tells us. The present writer knows Malaya pretty well, and loves it as Mr. Clifford does, and has even been in parts of it that Mr. Clifford does not know, and his verdict is that here is the real East. Through the stories, too, there runs a delightful series of pictures of the Englishman of the uncovenanted Civil Service out there—who he is, why he is there, what he thinks and feels and does. A better book for a lad who has his way to make in the world, and is thinking of putting his slim shoulder to one of the great wheels of the Empire, we cannot imagine. It will help to make a white man of him.

Mostly Fools, and a Duchess. By Lucas Cleeve. (White. 6s.)

WHEN the reviewer had read this story for an hour, he began to look for some safe place to deposit it out of sight, where it would never be found, but as there was no hollow tree or dry well near his own particular bit of green earth, he proceeded, and was by and by glad that he had. It is a story—of a character partly to be guessed from the reviewer's first impulse—of contemporary Society, dealing with a beautiful, philanthropic, and frail duchess, a corn-factor who finances her philanthropy, a young lord who is presented as the type of the man of to-day, and a German prince. It is written breathlessly, and with the peculiarly frank frankness that is supposed to mark the conversational young married ladies before a dressing-room fire after a ball. At least we have understood—from Mr. Jerome, was it, or Mr. Percy White?—that these ladies talk so; we have never heard them. It is very amusing, and to our surprise, after the nature of the beginning, vice really has its natural results in the end—or some of them, which is, in a modern novel, a praiseworthy concession to virtue. It is astonishingly illiterate—quite entertainingly so. For instance, the prince had an "infatuation for the wife of the Herr Königlicher Polizei-Presidentin"; when he fears the duchess is unreachable he is made to say she is "unereichar"; the corn-factor "had a terrible way of dotting his eyes"; the Italian criminologist is "Lamprosi"; and so on. But it is also full of things like the duke's butler's remark when he perceived that Lord Verity had "chucked" the duchess. "A chuck is painful to all classes alike, but naturally the bigger the parties the bigger the chuck." And this reflection of the duke about the duchess: "She grew so nice to him that he was afraid she was going to be ill, or have a baby, or die, or something." And this:

Digitized by Google

> The corn factor remembered the day when he sold mouldy flour and made his tarts with condemned fruit, and raised her hand to his lips.
>
> After that, the duchess felt that she could descend no further; she must go up again, like an india-rubber ball that has touched the ground.

The story is not precisely a roman à clef, but no doubt many readers will think they find portraits in it.

The Domine's Garden. By Imogen Clark. (Murray. 6s.)

A first book always excites a dutiful critic's curiosity, and when the book calls itself The Domine's Garden the temptation is naturally to lift the latch and walk straight in. Frankly, the book is worth perusal. In the garden is the daintiest of Dutch maidens, extremely fond of a pretty flower. Says the gardener:

> "You taught me to say 'Noan zo praetty——'"
>
> "Oh! t'at vas yestertay, foolish man. To-tay t'ey are laties' telights ant to-morrow vill t'ey pe 'Yump up ant kiss me,' and t'e next tay 'Tree faces unter a hoot,' and after t'at 'Herp Trinity' or 'Cuttle unto you.' . . . 'Tis like a little child's face, ever laughing. None of its names, many as they are, will do for me."

There is a passage which fairly touches what is at once typical and fragrant in the book. It is the realisation of the Dutch atmosphere of old New York, a realisation in which even so able a writer as Mrs. Barr compares ill with her new sister of the pen. It must be admitted that in this passage the finished English of the last sentences is incongruous, for Miss (or Mrs.) Clark has yet to learn that authenticity in fiction is the beneficent result of surgical pruning. She has yet to achieve that perfect fitting together of events which creates an illusion of reality.

The story is primarily tragic, and relies for its cup of trembling on the diabolical hands of a humiliated suitor, the narrow-mindedness of a Dutch congregation, and the indiscretion of a girl who jockeys her brother's horse. It relies on too much; for so much more will the provinces praise it. But here, it suffices to say that the root idea of the book—that a man should not lie even for love's sake, illustrated by the Domine's concealment of a domestic wrong—might have flowered more noticeably if it had been given room to expand.

The author has humour; we shall not forget the Dutchman who thanked God that "hey nonny-nonny" was untranslatable. Style she has, too. She will, no doubt, be heard of again.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final Reviews of a selection will follow.]

The Wooing of Sheila. By Grace Rhys.

A very pretty Irish love-story, introducing a barefooted heroine of seventeen. "Michael came down slowly, his heart beating fast, and stopped by the water's edge.

"'God and Mary to you,' he said in greeting.

"'God and Mary to you, and St. Patrick,' answered Sheila courteously.

"'A fine voice you have,' went on Michael in English.

"'It is as God gave it,' answered Sheila." (Methuen. 6s.)

The Skirts of Happy Chance. By H. B. M. Watson.

"Lord Francis Charmian, debonair and indifferent, drove his four bays round the turn and fetched them gently through the archway of Hyde Park Corner." Adventures come to this adventurous nobleman "of fascinating but irresponsible character." They are told by Mr. Marriot Watson in nine chapters, and they make very spirited and attractive reading. At the end of Lord Charmian's adventures comes "Lady Silvia," a short story of philandering, followed by an unexpected marriage. (Methuen. 6s)

Alice of Old Vincennes. By Maurice Thompson.

An American historical novel that has had "a phenomenal sale" in the United States. It begins: "Up to the days of Indiana's early statehood, probably as late as 1825, there stood, in what is now the beautiful city of Vincennes, on the Wabash, the decaying remnant of an old and curiously gnarled ———." The story deals with the capture and recapture of Old Vincennes, and describes the incident of Colonel Clark's march to the relief of the town. The author, Mr. Maurice Thompson, died last February. (Cassell. 6s.)

Love the Atonement. By Frances Campbell

A story in which much is made of Celtic glamour, Vice-regal society, and the "moon-white" ocean. "I know what the sea says. Listen—'Shule, shule, shule agra. Shule go succer agree agra. Aroon, arga, aroon, arga. Shule go succer, slawn, slawn.'" We feel we have underrated Mr. George Moore's martyrdom. (Digby, Long. 6s.)

The Story of Eva. By Will Payne.

A strong, pathetic piece of work. The scene is Chicago, and the title well describes the story, which treats of the problem of a "weak-willed, selfish nature, connected by a genuine love." Philip and Eva are the chief characters, and towards the end this is said of Philip: "He had no plan, no idea, no thought. He burst through the bounds of selfishness, his inertia, his moral laziness, in a storm. It was only an impassioned overwhelming necessity to rush to her, to throw his life before her." (Constable. 6s.)

A Black Vintage. By Morice Gerard.

"Yes, Agnes Bieta! the fisherman's daughter: he could see now those dark eyes which had a trick of deepening after a while when he spoke to her; that mane of unruly hair which was for ever straying in forbidden places; that splendid throat, exposed enough to indicate the shapely contour of the bust under the wide red kerchief. Agnes Bieta!" In looks and deeds Agnes is quite Byronic. (Digby, Long. 6s.)

Digitized by Google

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage, One Halfpenny, Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscription, prepaid (including postage) 17/6
" Quarterly 5/0
" Price for one issue /5

The Business Side.

IN his sketch, entitled "A Conversation," in the August number of the Monthly Review, Mr. G. S. Street has treated an important subject in a deft and humorous way. Meeting a young fellow in the empty smoking-room of a country inn, he is at once attracted and irritated by the stranger, whom he fancies he has seen before. They take stock of each other, and the elder soon divines that the younger is by way of being a writer. Himself a weary writer, he is curious about his companion's notions on the literary career, and the result is a brisk argument. The thing is very well done, and we shall damage no one's enjoyment by revealing that, before they part, the elder man discovers in the younger his self of ten years ago, even to a pair of knickerbockers. The identity lends much point to the earnest dissuasions of the older man, at first tactfully disguised, and then delivered in scolding terms. "You will advise me against it, like everybody else," begins young Hopeful—as we will call him. "Why, no," answers Experience. "Can you live on a hundred and fifty pounds a year?" That income, he proceeds to lay down, will be, with luck, the commercial reward of a young man who writes in the way of art, on themes which interest him, observing fresh things, or freshly observing old things. True there is the thousand-to-one chance that his writings, written to please himself, will please a large public too; and even in that happy event there are additional chances against finding "an honest and competent publisher." "Can you live on a hundred and fifty a year?" Hopeful thinks it an impossible figure.

"By no means," replies Experience, resolved to talk. "In London, I grant you, the tastes you probably have, the example of your companions, the mode of life of people who amuse you, will make it very difficult. But you may take a labourer's cottage in the country, have sufficient beef and mutton, and shoe-leather for your long walks, and subscribe to the London Library—all for a hundred and fifty pounds a year." The argument, begun on each side with caution, soon waxes strong and familiar. Hopeful, far from being depressed, reiterates his determination for the literary life. Warned that he will one day regret the absence of things he now despises—money, power, established position, the opportunity to influence others—he defends his resolves. When the two disputants discover that they are merely each other, differently dated, the younger, blind to the implicit warning, flies out in scorn of his counsellor: "You complacent beast! You to lecture me on not going to the Bar and standing aside from my fellow men and all that! As though I had no ambitions! Have you forgotten them? What have you done with them? Why, man, it is ten years—ten years!—and you have had time to create a new English drama and purify the public taste and reconstruct a Tory party and write a modern epic—you have had time for a whole Renaissance by Jove! And what have you to show? You have acquired a capacity to live in a labourer's cottage and watch with pleasure a confounded child walking down the village street. That is all, positively all."

Thus in semi-allegory and unmistakable earnestness, Mr. Street raises the question of the worldly status and prospects of writers. We say of "writers," because the word covers both literature and literary journalism, and we think that Mr. Street has both in mind. To his rebellious fellow traveller he says: "Don't suppose you can keep up your idea of writing as an art. You will have to do something which will degrade it—you will write leading articles or dramatic criticism. And even then—but go your ways, and God be with you." It is evident that Mr. Street grieves for us all. But we need not be careful to follow his line of thought, or to adopt his terms. The subject he touches is full of sap; it starts into gesticulatory life at a nod. Nor have other writers been slow, of late, to ascend the watch-tower and shower uncomfortable, half-finished remarks on the little mob of penmen below. The Watcher's muttered words are disconcerting first to one and then another; but most often they affect all. Now, he reports that the novelists who are earning a real living can be numbered on his fingers; now, he announces that the market for refined and scholarly work is being killed by the common and clamorous demands of the suburbs; now, with alarmed and reluctant breath, he speaks of vast horizonal changes in journalism—amalgamations, absorptions, the extension of Tudor-street from London to Edinburgh, and what not; now, he counts the papers that are known to yield no profit, and hints what will happen when yonder cloud of Bad Trade, no bigger than a man's hand, shall hide the sun. Then, hearing laughter below, he comes down to join in it.

Laugh though we may and must, these forebodings do not represent nothing; and one need be in no croaking mood to see that the general position of writers is confused, and by no means roseate among roses. At any rate, we honestly doubt whether there are many writers of less than extraordinary attainments who do not have hours of regret and anxiety born of the present obscure conditions and movements of the writing craft. That craft has reached dimensions which are altogether new, not to say terrifying. The multiplication of readers is past statement, and should be a blessing. But these readers do not provide the literary man with a proportionately greater number of opportunities. They live and move and have their intellectual being in currents of great breadth and irresistible sweep, of which small barques, bound for small ports, can take little advantage. All the world reads, yet the "literary world" is as narrow as ever. Much compromise is necessary, and much is practised. A noticeable thing is the adoption by a single writer of many literary crafts. Such Jack-handiness is not new, but we think it is more common, and more necessary, than ever before. Fishing, as he knows, in troubled waters, your writer-by-trade fishes with many lines. The novelist receives his weekly parcel of other men's novels to review, and would be seriously disturbed if the supply fell off. Your critic hungers to write a novel, and considers it necessary to his career. Your weekly reviewer and journalist, weary of detail and anonymity, is glad to edit a standard work. Novelists and critics write verse if they can, or take a turn at literary topography. When a publisher wants a reader, all Grub-street springs to judge all Grub-street. These are not generalities. We all know men who are thus laudably prehensile? They have to be prehensile because the prizes, though many, are small and elusive. As for the great prizes, they are usually political, and always scarce; and they have been shown by recent events to be subject to seismic disturbances. Speaking broadly, the literary worker of to-day does not know from year to year where his work will lie, what publisher will issue his book, what editor will print his articles, or what new vogues and rivalries will eat into his connections with the public. No doubt it is difficult to state these things with out overstating them. An intellect is not brought low in a day. The flux of things works well and ill. A man may turn pale at his breakfast table to learn that his paper has "gone smash," and at luncheon he may meet a literary friend who offers him a smoke and £300 a year, in the act of sitting down. But you can't call the craft which is subject to such fevers, some of which are lingering, a profession. Mr. Street is quite right to insist that writing is not a profession, and it is too much of a dance to be called a trade. It lacks security, or at least does not give the sense of it. It is good for bachelorhood and for the thirties; it is not so good for marriage and the forties. And as, sooner or later, most of us marry and reach forty, there is food for reflection alike for those who, being up, may drop a few pegs, and those who, being lower, hope to rise as many.

Digitized by Google

The idea of living in the country—we mean thirty or forty miles out—on a low scale of expense is a fascinating one to many writers, who see in this expedient a means of equalising the chances of their lot. They smile in a far-away manner, and talk about a stronghold; almost on their lips you see Pope's "Dear, damned, distracting town, farewell!"

> Luxurious lobster nights, farewell,
> For sober, studious days!
> And Burlington's delicious meal
> For salads, tarts, and pease!

Practically, the subject is impossible of discussion, except in reference to individual cases. We have seen the thing done with nonchalance and evident success by busy men. A man must consider what opportunities he will miss and what disabilities he will incur. We heard recently of a literary position lost by the too infrequent attendance of a country-dweller in town. Great delusions are possible on the subject of rural quiet and inspirations. There are few things so disturbingly quiet or frankly uninspiring as a potato-field under a noonday sun. A very clever, very industrious novelist told the present writer that the fadge of getting to work in the morning after breakfast in the country is nameless and awful. We forget how many saunters round the garden, how many pipes, and how many perusals of the newspaper, "even to the advertisements" (for he bared his soul), were included in those approaches to the Muse. Not all writers could afford it. Certainly a writer spends less in the country, and by going thither he escapes the flat which has cramped his body and the suburb which would certainly destroy his soul. The health of others comes in too, comes in first. There are some allurements which are more suspect. The desire for a quieter, wider life, "moderate tasks and moderate leisure," comes very strongly to a man after ten years of wild writing. He wants to write better and read more. To write as he would like to write after reading these words of Walter Pater's:

> Material for the artist, motives of inspiration, are not yet exhausted; our curious, complex, aspiring age still abounds in subjects for æsthetic manipulation by the literary as well as by other forms of art. For the literary art, at all events, the problem just now is, to induce order upon the contorted proportionless accumulation of our knowledge and experience, our science and history, our hopes and disillusion, and, in effecting this, to do consciously what has been done for the most part too unconsciously, to write our English language as the Latins wrote theirs, as the French write, as scholars should write.

And to know books as he would like to know them after reading these words of Hazlitt's:

> I once sat on a sunny bank in a field in which the green blades of corn waved in the fitful northern breeze, and read the letter in the New Eloise in which St. Preux describes the Pays de Vaud. I never felt what Shakespeare calls my "glassy essence" so much as then. My thoughts were pure and free. They took a tone from the objects before me, and from the simple manners of the inhabitants of mountain scenery so well described in the letter. The style gave me the same sensation as the drops of morning dew before they were scorched by the sun; and I thought Julia did well to praise it. I wished I could have written such a letter. That wish, enhanced by my admiration of genius and the feeling of the objects around me, was accompanied with more pleasure than if I had written fifty such letters, or had gained all the reputation of its immortal author.

Alas! desires like these are will o' the wisps, to be seen, not followed. One writes for a living. That is always the first consideration, and it follows from the multiplicity of literary employments which a man must combine in his hand, and their shifting character, that he cannot lightly diminish his chances. All these problems, in all their varieties and overlappings, come home to writers to be solved or shelved. When one comes to think about rules, or guidance, the writer's lot melts very quickly into the common lot, and one is left alone with a few platitudes. If we were asked to name the three things most helpful to a writer in these days, we could but answer: good health, a small private income, and a prudent wife. To prescribe a private income may seem mockery, but we mock no man. A writer differs from a tradesman, a farmer, or a doctor in that, if his work fails, all fails. The tradesman can sell his goodwill, the farmer his cattle, the doctor his practice. In the case of temporary failure the shop, the farm, and the practice can be carried on by deputy. It is not so with a writer. His last writing is his last asset. We said a "small" private income. A hundred a year is an incalculable blessing; a hop-pillow to Care. As for thrift, it simply must be practised if there is to be safety. One might as well go up the Matterhorn without a rope as climb the modern Parnassus without a bank-book or an endowment policy. Unless, of course, one is a philosopher like Leigh Hunt.

Things Seen.

The Evangelist.

A STONE, neatly aimed by some unseen marksman, struck from his hand the little Bible he carried; and the group, mostly children, which had been listening in uncertainty whether to be amused or impressed, broke up with a titter, leaving him to smooth and dust the battered volume, replace it in his pocket, and turn off by the stile from which I had been an onlooker. He gave me a civil "good morning," and then, with a shy smile, began a sort of apology for his unknown assailant, as if it were I, not he, that might be offended. It was a village lad, he surmised; they were so ignorant, these country folk, and so hostile to anyone attempting to help them. It seemed sad in times of so-called education. I assented, and turned to accompany him a little way. The quivering July noon held the meadows silent, and muffled the distant woodland and horizon of down, blue under mist. I don't think, however, that the beauty of the hour or scene appealed to him, for he plodded on, looking neither to right nor left, and talking in a high-pitched voice, with a marked cockney accent. He was assistant in a London shop, he told me, and this was his holiday. Yes, he always spent it thus; ever since, at least, he had been called to righteousness. It was hard work sometimes, as he could not afford both train and lodging, and weak lungs compelled him to sleep under shelter. Some thought he should give up his holiday to his family, but he felt called "to preach deliverance to the captives," and his wife liked him to "go down to the harvest." His tags of Scripture came out quite naturally, without unction, as just the words that expressed his meaning. At the end of a mile I paused to say good-bye. "You do, doubtless, see some results of your labour?" I said,

Digitized by Google

striving to speak sympathetically. He shook his head. "Not much yet," he answered. "Men's hearts are 'ard, but 'when men shall revile you and persecute you ——'" He left the text unfinished, and stood looking dreamily at me, a rapt expression on his narrow, unintellectual face, with receding brow and thin beard hardly concealing the insufficient chin.

Riches.

ADJOINING the principal Wein-Stube of a certain small German town there is a little hanging-garden, to reach which one must pass through a sort of kitchen-yard, and go up a narrow flight of steps. There is a small window looking out on the steps, and during the hour or so that I spent in the garden I listened to some music, which came from that half-shuttered window. It continued without intermission, that simple music, and it had a peculiarly soothing effect. Later, when I came down the steps, I peeped into the window. The room was rather bare. There were two beds in it, a few chairs, and to the right a round table, on which a candle flickered. Seated there, with her back to me, was a young woman, playing without much skill on a half-dumb dulcimer, her head bent forward over her instrument on account of the poor light. And in the middle of the room, with the candle shining full on his face, her younger brother (as I take it), a lad, was fiddling to her accompaniment. Neither played well, but in their shadowy room they were quite quiet, except when now and then they moved to choose another piece of music. They were very self-contained, and very rich, I think.

A Minor Poet of the Seventeenth Century.

THE twin brother to the famous Henry Vaughan of that part of Wales inhabited of old by the Silures is known to the curious and the amateur as Eugenius Philalethes. It was, perhaps, this fantastical pseudonym, reviving memories of something I had once dimly known, that set me searching once more for the few facts of his life—little foundations on which has risen, at least in France, it seems, so wild a story—so impossible and ridiculous a legend. It was the title of a book in a second-hand book catalogue that set me thinking: "The Fame and Confession of the Fraternity of R. C., commonly, of the Rosie Cross, with a preface annexed thereto, and a short declaration of their Physicall work by Eugenius Philalethes. 12mo, calf gilt. The author's own copy." On the margin of the page "To the wise and understanding Reader" Vaughan has written: "This is the Epistle of the Fraternitie itself, and should have been placed after the Preface"; and on page 56: "Heere ends the Fame and Confession of the Fraternitie: that which follows is my owne. Th. Vaughan." The signature is plainly visible. The price was beyond me; but the name of the book brought again to my mind the curious and never settled questions, whether the brother of Henry Vaughan was really a Rosicrucian, and, again, whether the Rosicrucians were really a sect abandoned to Satanism?

Thomas Vaughan was born at Newton St. Bridget, in the County of Brecon, in 1621-2. He was the twin and younger brother of Henry Vaughan, Silurist. Educated at Jesus College, Oxford, whither he went in 1638, he took Holy Orders, and in 1640 became rector of Newton St. Bridget, his birthplace. The Rebels, however, deprived him of his living on charges of bearing arms in the King's Cause, and of drunkenness and immorality, and so he returned to Oxford. It is interesting to remember that about this time Richard Crashaw was turned out of Cambridge for a like devotion to the King's Cause, whence he proceeded to Italy, dying at Loretto a few weeks after his arrival at that strange, and, to him at least, sacred place. But Thomas Vaughan seems to have been of a tougher fibre than poor Crashaw. He soon left Oxford for London, and began to study Alchemy. After making considerable advance in this study, which was, perhaps, half scientific, half magical, he married, in 1651, a lady named Rebecca, who died on April 17, 1658. After this, a kind of despair seems to have grown upon him. We find him leaving London, in haste, to avoid the Great Plague, going with Sir Robert Murray, his patron, to Oxford again, and from there to Albury, where, on February, 27, 1665, he dies, it is supposed, from the effects of chemical fumes. That is almost all we know of a curious personality—a man whom it would probably have been delightful to have known, beyond his more famous brother. And he, too, was a Poet, it would seem; so that one is inclined to think that the mysticism occasionally to be found in Henry Vaughan's work must have been much more evident in his brother, though less capable of expression or at least less capably expressed. The following lines lack something of the facility that one finds almost always in Henry Vaughan; there is a touch of Crashaw, a very humble Crashaw; something of that perfect sincerity with which Crashaw even in his most fantastic moods never fails to impress us:

To God.

My God, my Life! Whose essence, man
Is no way fit to know or scan;
But should approach Thy Court a guest
In thoughts more low than his request.
When I consider how I stray,
Methinks 'tis pride in me to pray;
How dare I speak to heaven, nor fear
In all my sins to court Thy ear.
But as I look on moles that lurk
In blind entrenchments, and there work
Their own dark prisons to repair,
Heaving the earth to take in air:
So view my fettered soul that must Struggle with this her load of dust,
Meet her address and add one ray
To this mew'd parcel of Thy day;
She would, though here imprisoned see
Through all her dirt Thy Throne and Thee.
Lord, guide her out of this said night,
And say once more "Let there be light."

Anthony à Wood says of him:

> He was a great chemyst, a noted son of the fire, an experimental philosopher, a zealous brother of the Rosicrucian Fraternity. An understander of some of the Oriental languages, and a tolerable good English and Latin Poet. He was neither Papist nor Sectary, but a true resolute Protestant in the best sense of the Church of England.

Was he a Rosicrucian? Was anybody ever a Rosicrucian, and, if so, were the Rosicrucians Satanists? We shall never know. At least he appears to have been devoted to his wife, for every "chemycal" receipt is signed with his own and his wife's initials, as "T.R.V." or "T.V.R.," and followed either by an expression of love for her or of pious devotion; and "the greatest joy I can ever have in the world after her death" was the discovery of an Extract of Oil he had found while she was alive and had lost since. Could so devoted a lover have murmured horrid and hurried prayers to the Devil? One cannot think it. Sathanas, surely, would have been jealous of "the greatest joy I can ever have in the world." Of all his books, and they are numerous, one seems to get a clearer sight of Thomas Vaughan in the bare title of one than in the unreadable, and not to be understood, pages of the majority. "Lumen de Lumine," the title runs in the words of the old Latin hymn of the Church, "a new Magicall Light discovered and communicated to the world." His life was, as it were, ever on the eve of some splendid surprise, some altogether gracious and perfect awakening; and, after all, as he bent over the tripod and crucible, and inhaled the fumes that killed him, perhaps it was not altogether unexpectedly, but with thankfulness that at last he had come upon what he had so long looked for in vain, that he found eternity opening before him, and he himself a wanderer in fields of light in the sound of many waters.

Digitized by Google

E. H.

"Browning's Profoundest Attempt."

In the current Poet Lore (Boston, U.S.A.), Mr. Thomas Wentworth Higginson describes Browning's poem, "Childe Harold to the Dark Tower Came," as "Browning's profoundest attempt to touch the mystery of life." His account of this poem is interesting as a typical specimen of highly wrought interpretation, such as finds favour in Boston:

"Childe Roland" ranks with the great imaginative works, with "Christabel" and "The Ancient Mariner," and so unspeakably above Poe's "Raven" that one is surprised to have heard it mentioned in the comparison; but the poet himself has left us no key to it outside of his own lines. And the criticism of others stops before it, mainly because of its supreme excellence. We see on reflection that there is really a Dark Tower in every thoughtful person's life, and that consequently the tower differs for each person. The power symbolises the supreme aim of one's life at any moment—something which may be a secret to one's next-door neighbour, to one's husband, wife, or children, and, very likely, to oneself, since we are as often guided by unconscious temperament as by deliberate purpose. At least, the tower stands for some controlling action to which all events and purposes have led up—some experience never, perhaps, to be estimated at its full value until the leisure of the future life—if that be leisure, which I doubt, at least for New England souls. Nor are we ever sure that heaven will afford us on a larger scale the delights of mutual investigation, although I once heard my eloquent cousin, William Henry Channing, predict that we should spend much of eternity in unravelling the strange secrets of one another's lives. Alas! it is doubtful whether we shall ever unravel even those of our own.

The poet Keats, in classifying nature, places at the head "things real, as sun, moon, and passages of Shakespeare," thus placing all else in a secondary and subordinate position. For Browning the tower of "Childe Roland" was a thing as real, as clearly to be dealt with, as little to be evaded, as a moonrise or an earthquake. It was a fact in the universe. You observe that he takes Edgar's first line by itself, and attributes the "Fie, foh, and fum" to the wandering mind. This gives a key to the whole situation. Childe Roland's quest symbolises the whole struggle and achievement of man. As to the details, every man interprets the tower for himself, every man has his own definition: no two persons can have the same tower. The visible materials of the picture are, after all, not so very remarkable. As our associate, Mr. Latimer, has said: "There is nothing in it that does not belong to our New England scenery"—not an item except the tower itself; and that is the most real thing about it, precisely because we cannot see it, except in imagination.. As another of our associate members, Mrs. Marean, has said: "This is a poem in which every reader may legitimately find his own meaning, just as he may in any other tale of a quest; but its descriptive power is of an order not dependent on the significance of the Round Tower at which it leaves us."

The "Childe Roland" poem is simply Browning's profoundest attempt to touch the mystery of life. The Dark Tower stands for the supreme secret of each man's existence: we follow up streams, tread mountains, and reach only this at last. Friends and foes help to guide us to it; but we must go alone. The last finger extended may even be that of a malicious enemy. We may so shrink from it that the sky looks dark, the whole surroundings repulsive. All our early memories come back upon us, veiled in a shadowy mist; yet we go forward. This is the poem. The critics exhaust their variety of conjecture to show what it all means. Dr. Furnivall states that he asked Browning three times whether the poem was an allegory, and that Browning had said each time that it was simply dramatic—as if any human being could tell where "dramatic" ends and "allegory" begins! Given what is dramatic enough, and every human being may draw its own allegory from it. Mr. Kirkman and Mr. Sears Cook think the tower means death; Mrs. R. Gratz Allen interprets the moral as lying in sin and punishment; Mrs. Orr and Mrs. Drewry find that it stands for life and truth; Prof. Arlo Bates "can think of nothing more heroic, more noble, more inspiring," than the whole poem. As I said, every man finds in it his own tower; and, the more towers suggested, the greater tribute to the spell, as woven by Browning. Life's supreme mystery—that is the Dark Tower. It is the scene of each man's problem, the point to which all the paths of his life for the time converge, the concentration of the soul upon its own crisis, its own conflict. It is rarely that anyone else knows precisely what his neighbour's Dark Tower is. Even the time of his approach to it is very likely unknown to his dearest friend. In a long life, or one long in emotion, if not in years, he may even pass through several such towers in succession: he never forgets how he felt when he approached them; but, strange to say, he forgets his exit from them. When he passed through one and has turned round, the Dark Tower has disappeared: even Browning provides no outlet from it; but, fortunately, life does very often, and we emerge. Browning's hero naturally sees for the moment in imagination all previous adventurers as lost. Yet each may, without his knowing it, have lived through the day, and conquered his tower by facing it; and each commonplace friend by his side, did he but know it, may have survived a greater peril than his own.

I know of nothing in literature outside of Browning which is pitched upon the same key with his poem or carries us a step into the same world.

Correspondence.

Life and Literature.

Sir,—The study of life as a means to producing literature is a subject to which, it is obvious, only the person who is intimately interested in literature can profitably contribute. The general writer's view of matters like the one named varies according to the writer's literary inclinations and calibre. To some a study of life must seem the one essential thing, to others quite a secondary one. The writer who gets his material from actual occurrences, from records of crime and such-like sources, may be said to be a student of life, and his whole business is to reproduce the everyday occurrences of life melodramatized to satisfy his own particular imagination and suit a certain public. Can this, however, be called a study of life in any serious meaning of the term? It seems to me that, by a conscious study, the tendency of a writer toward the production of genuine literature is thwarted, and that he is impelled, instead, to bring forth work in which the superficial movement of life is there without its meaning, or at least that the meaning is too greatly subordinated to, almost obscured by, a merely interesting narrative of events. Turner's pictures are, in my opinion, no parallel to a question like this; their scope of suggestion is limited. They appeal to the eye—a book appeals rather to the mind; the truth of the one is external, of the other not always so. Even to study life "not slavishly, but imaginatively" (as your well-known novelist puts it), is not directly essential to the production of literary work. To put it briefly and bluntly, the literary man rarely makes it his business to study life at all.

Digitized by Google

I agree entirely with R. L. Stevenson, who wrote as a literary man. There must be many who see, as he did, that the phenomena of life is absorbed almost unconsciously by the imagination, and that it is the imagination pure and simple which re-acts upon this in a world of its own. The literary man's imagination is informed mysteriously, it seems, and always confidently as if inspired, through the unconscious process of absorption. He is essentially a dreamer, not a student; his imagination sees things; the truths of life are there for him when he chooses to light the lamp. How does he know? is a question he may sometimes ask himself. But it is part of his natural equipment to know, to have absorbed it, to have inherited, perhaps, an embryo stock of wisdom, which his mere outlook on life, curious or dreamy as the case might be, has quietly developed in the dark. Imagination is at once his lamp and his store.

Writers of this calibre are artists in the highest sense. The "deliberate artifice" of Stevenson is in fine an imaginative arrangement governed by principles of art. It is no less true because of that; the question is merely one of method, of imaginative calibre. Stevenson was fully aware of this when he said that people "will not rise" to understand it. He might have said they cannot rise to understand it; it is apparently a matter which even well-known novelists do not fully comprehend, or we should have books more intrinsically thoughtful, less characterised by valueless top show.

I believe it to be characteristic of all great writers that they have never consciously or imaginatively studied life. I think they have absorbed it, and, when their time came, written with full, kaleidoscopic knowledge—with a growing and endless insight for art, and truth, and life, because the imagination was there, mysteriously, at once "the lamp and the store." I believe this to be true even of Dickens, who, more than any other novelist, may be accused of having studied life for the purposes of his work. Dickens may have taken an active and curious interest in life; but above all he was a story-teller, and what he produced was a world peculiarly his own. It was no reflex of life as we see it every day; it was something recast from the store of his imagination, fantastically, truthfully, most powerfully, and with no sense of his having studied life for material or for truth. Sometimes a secondary purpose cropped up, but the broad fact remains. It is, in my view, a standard consideration: the genuine novelist has no need to study life. Life enters into him; life and his imagination are one.—I am, etc.,

C. T. Podmore.

Mr Cosmo Monkhouse's Poetry

Sir,—"W. D. A's" notice in your issue of July 27 makes me a little impatient. Had Mr. Monkhouse lived in an age when poetry was a passion and not an amusement, before "Mr. Gosse and Mr. Dobson did so much to popularise in English the old French forms," and when substance still counted—a time when poets enjoyed a real access to the public, and were bought rather than "appreciated"—his picture-sense and his gift of expression would probably have combined with his graver thought to yield us more work like the following:

Life and Death.

From morn to eve they struggled—Life and Death.
At first it seemed to me that they in mirth
Contended, and as foes of equal worth,
So firm their feet, so undisturbed their breath.
But when the sharp red sun cut through its sheath
Of western clouds, I saw the brown arms' girth
Tighten and bear that radiant form to earth,
And suddenly both fell upon the heath.

And then the wonder came—for when I fled
To where those great antagonists down fell,
I could not find the body that I sought,
And when and where it went I could not tell;
One only form was left of those who fought,
The long dark form of Death—and it was dead.

I never met him.—I am, etc., R. Warwick Bond.

10, Lunham Road, Upper Norwood, S.E.

Mr. Hall Caine.

Sir,—Apt alliteration undoubtedly aids the absurd classification of Mr. Hall Caine with Miss Corelli, of which Mr. Kenyon rightly complains. Caine, Corelli, Christian, Master Christian—the association of the names is irresistible. I would go a little farther than Mr. Kenyon ventures, and would maintain that the popularity of The Christian is a sign of health, not of decadence. The Christian was the protest of a manly soul against religious humbug, against the fashionable compromise which pretends to be Christianity, but which is little better than civilised heathenism, as it was once called; and it is a good sign that such a protest should be well received and widely read. Of course, religious humbugs felt the scourge and howled—this only proves the artistic power and truth of the book—and the mob of gentlemen who write with ease about everything, but believe in nothing, scoffed at a book which was interpenetrated by virile faith. Some criticisms also were made from confusion and mistake. As some reviewers identified Tennyson with the lover of Maud and with other of his characters, so some would ascribe all John Storm's opinions to his creator; but John Storm is merely an intensely passionate and sincere man, driven to madness by the hypocrisy and falseness of all around him, much in the same way as Robertson of Brighton was nearly driven from his faith by his experiences of fashionable religion at Cheltenham. If others of us looked upon life after the same manner, it might make us mad also. The most maddening thing in my own experience was what I saw one Good Friday in a very fashionable church. In the pew before that in which I was sitting was a lady, an invalid and a cripple, attended by a friend. Just before the service commenced, another lady, attired in the height of fashion, came to the pew, and beckoned the others out, as it was her seat. The poor cripple tottered out with the utmost difficulty, and her pious evictor entered the pew and knelt down to join in the contemplation of the Three Hours' Agony.—I am, etc.,

E. J. Newell.

Neen Sollars, Salop.

The Aims of Art.

Sir,—The reviewer of Mrs. Wharton's book, in last week's Academy, compares art to the embroidery upon a coverlet—therefore, not essential to warmth. I think he misunderstands the aims of art almost as much as does Mrs. Wharton herself.

Perhaps it is the fault of modern art in that it is too trivial, but surely there is a necessity of refinement just as much as a necessity to eat, drink, or keep warm! Does the animal part only of man require sustenance? Is it not in the degree that he rises above the animal that he becomes man?

Digitized by Google

As long as artists are willing to be beguiled into the idea that their activities are not required, or into the dominance of what is called "public taste," their art will remain "oblong pieces of daubed canvas." It will be a sad day for us when the sister arts of Beauty, Word and Sound become less necessary than our daily bread.—I am, etc.,

JAMES J. GUTHRIE.

White Cottage, Shorne, Kent.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 97 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best suggested new titles for six well-known works. We award the prize to Mr. Walker Stanford, Spencer House, St. George-street, Norwich, for the following:

The Book of Job...	Hard Lines.
The Arabian Nights	Some Early Inventors.
The Pilgrim's Progress	All the Way.
Hamlet	The Indecision of the Prince.
Confessions of an English Opium Eater	Such Stuff as Dreams are Made of.
Vanity Fair	The Resources of Rebecca.

Other replies are as follows:

A Yankee at the Court of King Arthur	The Man that Corrupted Camelot.
Oliver Twist	The Visits of Bill Sikes.
Pickwick Papers	No. — Goswell Street.
Paradise Lost	Eve and her Eden Orchard.
Tom Jones	Unsentimental Tommy.
Pillars of the Family	The Columns.

[W. P., London.]

Waverley	In the Days of Prince Charlie.
Ivanhoe	The Knight and the Jewess.
Dombey and Son	The Conversion of a Prig.
Vanity Fair	In Mixed Society.
The Ordeal of Richard Feverel...	A Baronet's Blunders.
Dorothy Forster	A Romance of Rebellion.

[J. F. M., Edinburgh.]

Sartor Resartus	Fig Leaves and Destiny.
Adam Bede	The Methodist.
Diana of the Crossways... ...	The Marriage of the Sphinx.
Jane Eyre...	Mr. Rochester.
Westward Ho!	When Bess Was Queen.
The Talisman	The Saracen.

[F. G. C., Hull.]

Waverley	Charlie is my Darling.
The Essays of Elia	A Slice of Lamb.
Vanity Fair	How to be Wretched though Married.
David Copperfield	Charles Dickens as He Knew Himself.
Robert Elsmere	A Curate in Difficulties.
Tess of the D'Urbervilles ...	Sauce for the Goose is not Sauce for the Gander.

[P. A., Ramsgate.]

The Cloister and the Hearth ...	The Parents of Erasmus.
Friends in Council	Vexed Questions.
Sartor Resartus	The Divine Ideal.
Dead Men's Shoes	Fairy Gold.
The Comedy of Errors	Doubles.
Puck	Venus Pandemos.

[A. G., Cheltenham.]

Bacon's Essays	A Porker's Prosings.
Mill on the Floss	The Fight on the Floss.
Pilgrim's Progress	The Path to Paradise.
Heroes and Hero Worship ...	Lions and Lionisers.
The Sorrows of Satan	The Devil in the Dumps.
The Wealth of Nations	What the World is Worth.

[F. B. D., Torquay.]

Alice in Wonderland	Such Sudden Surprises.
Jane Eyre	Una and Her Lion.
The Gods, Some Mortals, and Lord Wyckenham.	A Great World, a Little Flesh, and One Devil.
Vanity Fair	Some Moths and a Candle.
Ships that Pass in the Night ...	Grey Love in a Fog.
What Maisie Knew	That Acute Child.

[R. H. R. C., Wilts.]

The following suggestions, more or less wise or witty, are gleaned from other papers:

An Englishwoman's Love Letters	The Parting Was Well Made.
The Silence of Dean Maitland ...	A Clerical Error.
Bleak House	The Jarndyce Case.
The Ordeal of Richard Feverel...	The Baronet's System.
Sartor Resartus	Clothes and the Man.
Uncle Tom's Cabin	The Apotheosis of a Negro.
Paradise Lost	How the Liberals Went Under.
Diana of the Crossways... ...	Memoirs of a Woman of Genius.
Fox's Book of Martyrs	For Conscience Sake.
The Scarlet Letter	A Criminous Clerk.
Westward Ho!	A Sailor's Life for Me.
Vicar of Wakefield	A Bunch of Primroses.
Oliver Twist	The Burglar and the Boy.
Alice in Wonderland	Two Thousand Miles Down a Rabbit Hole.
The Heir of Redclyffe	Noblesse Oblige.

Competition No. 98 (New Series).

IN Ulula, the Manchester Grammar School Magazine, there is a clever Posthumous Apology supposed to be written by Charles Dickens in answer to his latter-day critics. Our readers will readily seize the idea. We offer a prize of One Guinea for the best Posthumous Apology supposed to be written by a dead author. Under the circumstances we exclude Dickens. The length must be limited to 300 words.

RULES.

Answers, addressed, "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, August 7. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

An American Transport in the Crimean War.

By Capt. CODMAN.

In this work Capt. Codman relates his experiences of an American Chartered Transport in the Crimean War..... The Crimean War is the connecting link between old and modern methods of warfare.

Frontispiece. 198 pp. Price 3s. 6d.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON & CO.

Digitized by Google

EXPERIENCED LITERARY MAN desires ENGAGEMENT. Capable original writer, investigator, compiler; thoroughly versed in French (some years in France), also German, Latin; shorthand writer, typist; practical knowledge of printing; high credentials. — Address "INDAGATOR," office of THE ACADEMY.

WANTED at ONCE.—SHORT STORIES, ARTICLES, VERSE, and all kinds of BLACK and WHITE WORK.—Send stamp for particulars, SECRETARY, London Literary and Artistic Agency, 11 and 12, New Stone Buildings, W.C.

WILFRID M. VOYNICH.

THIRD LIST OF BOOKS.
Royal 8vo, pp. 279-438, and Plates XVII. to XXXVIII.
PRINCIPAL CONTENTS: MUSIC, EARLY PRINTED BOOKS, BINDINGS, BOOKS on AGRICULTURE, AMERICANA, &c.—Price 2s. 6d. post free.
CATALOGUE No. I. out of print. CATALOGUE No. II., 2s. 6d., may be had, post free, on application at 1, SOHO SQUARE, W.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
Importers of Foreign Books,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden; and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.
CATALOGUES post free on application.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.
DULAU & Co., 37, Soho Square.

BOOKS WANTED.—25s. each given. "Bells and Pomegranates," 1841; Jackson's "Old Paris," 1878; Jorrock's "Jaunts," 1843; "Alice in Wonderland," 1866; Moore's "Alps in 1864"; Cook's "Foxhunting," 1826; George Meredith's Poems, 1851; Scrope, "Salmon Fishing," 1843. 2,000 other Books wanted. List post free.—BAKER'S Great Bookshop, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

TYPE-WRITING.—10d. per 1,000 words. Sermons, Authors' MSS., &c.—Miss LOXLEY, Jarrow Rectory, co. Durham.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and COLLEGE.
OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS.
Four Scholarships and One Exhibition, worth £150, £75, £75, £50, and £20 each, tenable for one year, will be competed for on September 23rd, 1901—viz., Two Senior Open Scholarships, value of £75 each, will be awarded to the best candidates (if of sufficient merit) in not more than three nor fewer than two of the following:—Chemistry, Physics, Zoology, Botany, Physiology, Anatomy.
Candidates for these Scholarships must be under twenty-five years of age, and must not have entered to the Medical and Surgical Practice of any London medical school.
One Junior Open Scholarship in Science, value £150, and One Preliminary Scientific Exhibition, value £50, will be awarded to the best candidates under twenty-one years of age (if of sufficient merit) in not fewer than three of the following:—Botany, Zoology, Physiology, Physics, and Chemistry.
The Jeaffreson Exhibition (value £20) will be competed for at the same time. The subjects of examination are Latin, Mathematics, and any one of the three following languages:—Greek, French, and German. The Classical subjects are those of the London University Matriculation Examination of June, 1901.
The successful candidates in all these Scholarships will be required to enter to the full course at St. Bartholomew's Hospital in the October succeeding the Examination.
For particulars, application may be made, personally or by letter, to the WARDEN of the COLLEGE, St. Bartholomew's Hospital, E.C.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references. Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss MESSER, 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

TYPE-WRITING.—Authors' MSS., neat, prompt, accurate, 10d. per 1,000 words. Duplicates, Translations, French Correspondence, and Literary or Technical Work.—Mrs. MICHEL, 31, Craven Street, Charing Cross

THE DOWNS SCHOOL, SEAFORD, SUSSEX.
Head Mistress—Miss LUCY ROBINSON, M.A. (Late Second Mistress St. Felix School, Southwold).
References: The Principal of Bedford College, London; the Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge University.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE of WALES, ABERYSTWYTH.
CLASSICAL LECTURESHIP.
The Council invite APPLICATIONS for the post of ASSISTANT LECTURER in GREEK and LATIN at the above College. Stipend, £120 per annum.
Applications, together with Testimonials, must be in the hands of the undersigned (from whom further particulars may be obtained) not later than Saturday, September 7th, 1901.
T. MORTIMER GREEN, Registrar.
July, 1901.

SUNDERLAND SCHOOL of SCIENCE and ART.
APPOINTMENT OF MASTERS.
The Committee of this School is prepared to receive APPLICATIONS for the positions of HEAD MASTER and SECOND MASTER.
The Head Master's salary will be £250 per annum, rising £15 annually for three years.
The Second Master's salary will be £130 per annum, rising £10 annually for three years.
The gentlemen selected must devote the whole of their time to the service of the School.
Applications, stating qualifications, age, &c., and accompanied with three recent testimonials, must be addressed to the undersigned, from whom full particulars may be obtained, on or before August 15th, 1901.
JAMES PATTERSON, Hon. Sec.
School of Art,
Town Hall, Sunderland.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY
(LIMITED).

ENLARGED AND CLASSIFIED CATALOGUE
(Over 500 pages, 8vo, bound in green cloth).
All the Principal Works in Circulation at the Library
ARRANGED under SUBJECTS.
Forming a Comprehensive Guide to Notable Publications in most Branches of Literature.
Books of Permanent Interest on POLITICAL and SOCIAL TOPICS, the ARMY, NAVY, ARTS, SCIENCE, PHILOSOPHY, SPORT, THEOLOGY, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, and FICTION.
Price 1s. 6d.

Also a FOREIGN CATALOGUE, containing BOOKS in FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, RUSSIAN, and SPANISH.
Price 1s. 6d.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY,
30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET;
241, Brompton Road; and
48, Queen Victoria Street, London.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS TO "THE ACADEMY,"
Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 8s 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!
6s., claret roan, gilt, Illustrated.
LONDON IN THE TIME OF THE DIAMOND JUBILEE
London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.
Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.
Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.
THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING, A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.
BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST. THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.
THE NORFOLK BROADS. THE ISLE OF WIGHT.
BRECON and its BEACONS. THE WYE VALLEY.
ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW. THE SEVERN VALLEY.
BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.
BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.
LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR, LLANFAIRFECHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON.
ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.
CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, & FESTINIOG.
BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and PWLLHELI.
MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, & CHELTENHAM.
LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.
NORWICH, LOWESTOFT, YARMOUTH, and the NORFOLK BROADS.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.
"It very emphatically tops them all"—Daily Graphic.
"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.
THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 5s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.
LONDON AND ENVIRONS
By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.
With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.
Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.
London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT, & Co. Ltd., The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers.
Paris and New York: BRENTANO'S.

Digitized by Google

NEW BOOKS AND NEW EDITIONS.

AMELIA E. BARR'S NEW NOVEL.

SOULS of PASSAGE. By the Author of "The Maid of Maiden Lane," &c. (Unwin's Green Cloth Library.) 6s.

A NEW BOOK BY LOUIS BECKE.

BY ROCK and POOL; or, An Austral Shore. By the Author of "By Reef and Palm," &c. (Unwin's Green Cloth Library.) 6s.

BARRY PAIN'S NEW BOOK.

DE OMNIBUS. By the Conductor (Barry Pain). Cloth 2s.; paper, 1s.

OTHER VOLUMES IN THIS SERIES.

ANOTHER ENGLISHWOMAN'S LOVE LETTERS. By BARRY PAIN. THE GODS, SOME MORTALS, and LORD WICKENHAM. By JOHN OLIVER HOBBES. THE LETTERS of HER MOTHER to ELIZABETH. By —. Sixth Edition.

Cloth, 2s. each; paper, 1s. each.

GEORGE MOORE'S GREAT NOVEL of a NUN, SISTER TERESA, is ready. Cloth, price 6s. A Sixpenny Edition of EVELYN INNES by the same Author, is on sale at the Booksellers'.

FROM SQUIRE to PRINCE. Being the History of the House of Cirksena. By WALTER PHELPS DODGE, Author of "Piers Gaveston," &c. Illustrated. Cloth, 10s. 6d.

FIFTH EDITION READY TO-DAY.

THE IRISH SONG BOOK. With Original Irish Airs Edited by A. P. GRAVES. Cloth, 2s.; paper, 1s.

CHEAP EDITION JUST READY.

THE FIRST TWO CENTURIES of FLORENTINE HISTORY. By Prof. PASQUALE VILLARI. Fully Illustrated. Cloth, 7s. 6d.

SECOND EDITION READY TO-DAY.

OLIVER CROMWELL and his TIMES. By G. Holden PIKE. (Lives Worth Living Series.) Cloth, 3s. 6d.

London: T. FISHER UNWIN, Paternoster Square, E.C.

THE THRUSH:

A Periodical for the Publication of Original Poetry

Edited by MULLETT ELLIS.

PRICE FOURPENCE PER MONTH.

BY ORDER AT ALL BOOKSELLERS.

An Edition de Luxe, now limited to 50 copies, sumptuously printed, is also published at Half-a-crown per month. This Edition, being rare and of intrinsic merit, must eventually become valuable.

Since its origin, on the first day of the New Century, Poems have already appeared in "THE THRUSH" from the following well-known Authors:—

Dr. Richard Garnett; W. E. Henley; Emily Hickey; C. W. Wynne; Mackenzie Bell; F. Prevost Battersby; Keble Howard; Harold Begbie; A. P. Graves; Nora Hopper; L. Alma-Tadema; Norman Gale; Dr. Gilbert Murray; John Hutchinson; The Hon. Albinia Brodrick; Arthur Symons; N. Carruthers Gould; Clifton Bingham; E. Tindal Atkinson; Lady Margaret Sackville; Hamilton Aidé; Sir Wyke Bayliss, P.R.I.; Victor Plarr; Edgar Fawcett; Lady Gilbert; the Rev. W. J. Dawson; and Mullett Ellis.

Other Poems by Eminent Writers are promised.

Amongst the Contents of the AUGUST NUMBER are Poems by Lady FLORENCE DOUGLAS, and a Sonnet by the great LORD LYTTON.

The Sonnets in the Newnham College Prize Competition are also published in the AUGUST NUMBER, and the Rules relating to "THE THRUSH" Prize Poem Competition (Six Prizes). First Prize, Ten Pounds sterling.

NOW READY.

WAS ALFRED KING OF ENGLAND?

By A SAXON.

Demy 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

A brief review of one of our latest text-books, showing the true relations of Prince Alfred both to the Saxon people in England and to her Roman invaders.

HARRISON & SONS, Publishers, 59, Pall Mall, S.W.

'Twixt Plate and Lip;

OR,

The Common Sense of Eating.

A HEALTH HAND-BOOK FOR EVERY DAY,

WITH SPECIAL ADVICE AS TO DIET AND REGIMEN IN HEALTH AND SICKNESS,

A POPULAR SUMMARY OF THE SYMPTOMS OF DYSPEPSIA AND INDIGESTION,

AND A NOTE ON THE SCIENTIFIC AND RATIONAL TREATMENT OF THOSE AILMENTS.

12th EDITION.

 This little book may be recommended to the general reader as a sound and safe guide to the common sense management of the stomach. The Publishers, at 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, will be pleased to send a free copy to any reader of the Academy. Early application necessary.

LONDON: 46, HOLBORN VIADUCT, E.C.

NOVELS BY THE BEST WRITERS

Crown 8vo, 6s. each.

By MRS. HUMPHRY WARD.

ELEANOR. Fifth Impression. With Illustrations by ALBERT STERNER.

OVER 110,000 COPIES SOLD IN ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

London Quarterly Review.—"A real love story, steeped in Italian sunshine and rich in glimpses of Italian life and character..... Mrs. Ward has never given us a book that finds its way to one's heart so completely and gives such unmixed pleasure as this."

HELBECK of BANNISDALE. Sixth Edition.

Times.—"A book which will take rank with Mrs. Humphry Ward's best work.... The story is a story of a great passion worthily told."

SIR GEORGE TRESSADY. Fourth Edition.

Standard.—"An exceedingly able book. We doubt if any other living woman could have written it.....It is a work which does her heart and imagination infinite credit."

By STANLEY J. WEYMAN.

THE CASTLE INN. With a Frontispiece. Fifth EDITION.

Times.—"A story which the reader follows with excited curiosity The opening scene is of the essence of romance, and worthy of Dumas.....In brief, author and readers are to be congratulated, and, as the Toad in the Hole says, 'This is what you can recommend to a friend.'"

By HENRY SETON MERRIMAN.

THE ISLE of UNREST. With Illustrations. FIFTH IMPRESSION.

Morning Post.—"A really admirable novel.....The sort of tale for which the reader neglects everything until he has finished it."

RODEN'S CORNER. Third Edition.

Punch.—"For dramatic situation, intensity, and simplicity of narrative it is marvellous.....The plot is ingenious and new."

IN KEDAR'S TENTS. Eighth Edition.

Guardian.—"Mr. Merriman is at his best. It is full of adventure, of humour, and of vigour."

THE GREY LADY. New Edition. With 12 Full-Page Illustrations.

Globe.—"A story of striking merit throughout."

THE SOWERS. Twenty-first Edition.

Graphic.—"Will be found very difficult indeed to lay down until its last page has been turned."

By A. CONAN DOYLE.

THE TRAGEDY of the KOROSKO. With 40 Full-page Illustrations.

Speaker.—"It is dangerous to describe any work of fiction in these days of a prolific press as a masterpiece, yet there cannot be any doubt that the word is strictly applicable to Mr. Conan Doyle's 'Tragedy of the Korosko.'"

UNCLE BERNAC. With 12 Full-page Illustrations. SECOND EDITION.

Daily Chronicle.—"'Uncle Bernac' is for a truth Dr. Doyle's Napoleon. Viewed as a picture of the little man in the grey coat, it must take rank before anything he has written. The fascination of it is extraordinary. It reaches everywhere a high literary level."

THE GREEN FLAG, and other Tales of War and Sport. With a Frontispiece.

Times.—"These stories stir the blood and make the heart beat faster, and any Englishman who does not enjoy them must have something wrong with his nature."

By F. ANSTEY.

THE BRASS BOTTLE. Third Impression.

Manchester Guardian.—"A pure farce from beginning to end, and, we think, the best thing he has done since he cracked our sides with 'Vice Versâ.'"

By S. R. CROCKETT.

THE SILVER SKULL. With 12 Full-page Illus-trations. SECOND IMPRESSION.

British Weekly.—"A work of real genius, full of glorious adventures, stirring with the romance of hot and passionate hearts."

LITTLE ANNA MARK. With a Frontispiece. SECOND IMPRESSION.

Daily Telegraph.—"A rattling, rousing story of adventure and mis-adventure."

THE BLACK DOUGLAS. With 8 Full-page Illus-trations. THIRD IMPRESSION.

Speaker.—"A book which grips the imagination in a thoroughly satisfactory fashion."

THE RED AXE. With 8 Full-page Illustrations. THIRD IMPRESSION.

Weekly Sun.—"A powerful story, which he tells in his own masterful style."

CLEG KELLY, ARAB of the CITY. Third Impression

Spectator.—"The story teems with incidents of all sorts, and it carries the reader along, keenly interested and full of sympathy, from the first page to the last."

 Messrs. SMITH, ELDER & CO. will be happy to forward a copy of their CATALOGUE post free on application.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

Digitized by Google

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1527. Established 1869. 10 August, 1901. Price Threepence.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

The death of the Empress Frederick has aroused in England much genuine sympathy, and many interesting reminiscences. Her mental activities were many and various; even as a girl she appears to have had wide interests, and, before her early marriage, she is said to have painted an ambitious picture, with the Relief of Lucknow for subject. Her taste in music was, perhaps, rather narrow, though it admitted of strong enthusiasms, and as a collector of antiquities she had taste and the true virtuoso's industry in discovery. She modelled in clay, made designs for glass and porcelain, and was always approachable by artists of any kind. But perhaps her literary tendencies were the strongest and most interesting; for a woman, she had remarkable grasp. Putlitz said of the Crown Princess: "She has read everything, and knows almost everything off by heart. She was as well up in German as in English literature; knew Hebbel's pieces as well as those of her favourite English poets. She almost knew Shakespeare by heart." To Tennyson she wrote: "I almost know the 'Idylls of the King' by heart now; they are really sublime." She had also considerable acquaintance with science; the geologist Lyell wrote to Darwin, after an interview with her: "She was very much au fait with 'the Origin' and Huxley's book, with the Antiquity, and with the Lacustrine Museums, which she lately saw in Switzerland. She said that, after twice reading you, she could not see her way as to the origin of four things, namely, the world, species, man, or the black and white races. Did one of the latter come from the other, or both from some common stock? And she asked what I was doing, and I explained that in recasting the 'Principles' I had to give up the independent creation of each species. She said she fully understood my difficulty, because after your book the old opinions had received a blow from which they would never recover."

Mr. Arnold White has a long article in the Sunday Sun concerning the King's title. He contends that the word "Dominions" should not be employed, because it suggests possession: "In no sense are the Britains beyond the seas the possessions of England. . . . In no sense can one English-speaking population be spoken of as a 'possession' by another population of the same race." The subject is a difficult one, no doubt, and we are inclined to agree with Mr. White that Lord Rosebery's suggestion "of all the Britains within and beyond the seas" is best. Mr. White, in referring to our competition of last year, in which the word "Englander" took the prize, says that the word is unsuitable because it confirms the predominance of England. The prize was given for the best suggestion, and did not necessarily carry our approval with it.

It will be news to many that Max Adeler (Mr. Heber Clark), the author of that most amusing book, Out of the Hurly-Burly, has for many years been a writer on economic subjects, and an editor of trade journals. Mr. Clark is now in London, and is about to publish a new humorous book to be called Captain Bluitt.

We referred last week to Mr. Leslie Stephen's praise of walking in the Monthly Review. The Russian writer Gor'ki is apparently of the same mind. In spite of the fame and money that have come to him, he prefers the old tramp life which he has led for thirty years, doing odd jobs here and there, and continually on the move. Gor'ki is a man after George Borrow's own heart.

We have said from the beginning that the "booms" of American novels are of little account, and we are aware that Americans of insight know this. It is interesting, however, to see the gradual awakening of a wider public. A writer in the Chicago Post says: "American publishers proceed upon the principle that a book is like a cake of soap or a uneeda biscuit." On this method they proceed to furnish ready-made reviews, and the opinions of bishops and millionaires, which opinions the critics do not care to contradict. The article concludes: "English publishers need not hasten to copy these new century methods. Let them continue to distinguish between books and patent medicines, soap, and biscuits. There will soon be a reaction among our own best, sanest, and most useful American publishers. The dignity of literature will reassert iself."

Apropos of Mr. Dobson's promised Life of Samuel Richardson," "C.K.S." has some interesting remarks in the Sphere. He contends that there is no public nowadays for Richardson, and that only publishers who can afford to treat literature in a princely fashion would think of re-issuing his works. This, no doubt, is very true, but Clarissa is an extraordinarily fine novel, and should be read with interest even by moderns. There seems to be room for a separate good edition.

The "Man of Kent," who loves admonition tempered with mystery, gives us the following: "It is interesting to see how badly some authors suffer from swelled head on attaining a moderate success. I know of one novelist whose condition is at present very critical. He has written his publishers, one of the first firms in the trade, informing them that 'I have had offers for my next book from twenty firms of equal standing with your own, and at least twenty other firms of secondary standing.' The writer is a wonderful youth, no doubt, but by far the most wonderful thing about him at present is his conceit."

There are some interesting notes in the current Scribner on the old subject of scholarship and poetry. Is a poet likely to do better work for having had a scholastic training? The writer concludes that for the lighter forms of verse an intimate acquaintance with Greek and Latin literature is a distinct advantage, and we agree with him. Certainly in England the best vers de société has been produced by men full of classical allusiveness, and the happy faculty of re-pointing old shafts, and in America it appears that success follows in the same road. But where serious verse is concerned, a conclusion is not so readily arrived at. "As for the general effect of scholarship upon poetry in general," says the writer, "a safe conclusion would be, as the diplomatic student said when asked what was the Anglican doctrine of good works, 'a few of them won't do any harm!'" The cases of Tennyson, Browning, and Matthew Arnold are cited as those of men classically fully equipped. Tennyson and Browning gained by their knowledge, but Arnold "has the air of a poet oppressed by too much learning." We dissent from this: it was not his learning that stayed Arnold's achievement. Apropos of this, it is interesting to quote the following passage from a letter of Arnold to his sister:

Digitized by Google

> The fault I find with Tennyson in his "Idylls of the King" is that the peculiar charm and aroma of the Middle Age he does not give in them. There is something magical about it, and I will do something with it before I have done. The real truth is that Tennyson, with all his temperament and artistic skill, is deficient in intellectual power; and no modern poet can make very much of his business unless he is pre-eminently strong in this. Goethe owes his grandeur to his strength in this, although it even hurt his poetical operations by its immense predominance.

August sits heavily on the American Bookman, and in sheer lassitude (as we may suppose) it has allowed the following "Queries About Authors" to invade its pages:

> What does Anthony Hope?
> To Marietta Holley.
>
> What happens when John Kendrick Bangs?
> Samuel Smiles.
>
> When is Marian Evans Cross?
> When William Dean Howells.
>
> When did Thomas Buchanan Read?
> Just after Winthrop Mackworth Praed.
>
> Why was Rider Haggard?
> Because he let Rose Terry Cooke.
>
> Why is Sarah Grand?
> To make Andrew Marvel.
>
> Why did Lewis Carroll?
> To put a stop to Francis Quarles.

The Thrush is above lassitude, and sings its various lay as heartily as ever. Those poets who wish to compete for a prize of ten pounds sterling should secure the current number and note the particulars of the competition, which will close "before the 31st day of November." We can well believe that before such a date arrives the floods of verse will have ceased from off the face of the earth. Meanwhile the editor is making considerable efforts to prepare a wider audience for his competing bards. He makes the following appeals:

> Will any lover of pure Literature give a standing order for the regular supply of our Periodical to twenty ships of our Navy, at a price of only fourpence per copy per month? We have received a beautiful poem from a sailor on board one of H.M.S., which we intend to publish.
>
> Will any benevolent Lady give our publishers a standing order for the regular supply of our Periodical, The Thrush with the healthy poetry it contains, to twenty Hospitals in London or the Provinces? The Thrush is much liked in the Hospitals, though it is rarely seen there.
>
> Will any patriot order our publishers to send a hundred copies per month of our Periodical to our soldiers in South Africa? The soldiers like The Thrush; it brings to them visions of home, arouses their kindliest emotions, and awakes in their hearts delightful memories of dear old England.

The writer of several sketches in the Pilot, who calls himself Epsilon, has a considerable fund of observation and humour. Writing on "Fish out of Water" in last week's issue, he describes a literary At Home as follows:

> I have seen Facetius Brown, as honest a fellow as ever stepped and a soldier of some repute, reduced to misery in a room full of wits and poetasters. He came in as jolly as usual from his afternoon tramp, with a bundle of illustrated papers and Christmas numbers in his arms. Mr. Lionel Trighte, the Essayist in Verse, was talking about himself to the Honourable Egeria in one corner of the room; Mr. Vein-Vrenze, the Danish bard, was also talking about himself (though he thought he was talking about his wife) in another corner; Miss de Smatterall was telling the rising novelist that she had not the creative gift, but that alone of all women she could understand his meaning—and both were so deeply moved by her humility that the tears were in their eyes, while their tea-cups were at their lips. The Lady Maud Monsoon, who had only lately been confirmed, but was really "Flip-flop" of the Metropolis (that famous fashionable newspaper), was confiding the plot of her new "Improper Playlet," "The Double-entendres of Jane," to the sympathetic ear of an elderly art critic. Even her mamma, a stout old dowager, who wrote for a children's magazine under the pseudonym of "Snowdrop," was buzzing about literary achievements. Of course it was unfortunate that Facetious (he was the husband of the Honourable Egeria) should mark his entrance by saying in his loud, cheery tones: "Well, I must say you do all look glum; I confess I like a little fun at Christmas"; and should then proceed to read them the story of a practical joke from the Graphic. But tact was never Facetious's strong point. A frosty silence fell on the company, and the Honourable Egeria glared at him as her poet moved off. In that glare his whole life, as I afterwards saw it, was revealed to me. He knew and was known to but few of the guests at his own house—Egeria's "rag, tag, and bobtail," as he called them. Most of them did not recognise who he was till he took his seat at the bottom of the dining-table; and, in spite of his V.C. and his valuable volume on Scouting, he was generally only regarded as a kind of spiritual mésalliance for his wife.

"O. O.," of the Sketch, says: "Quite a series of legends has grown up as to the relations between Zola and his publishers. Here are, I believe, the actual facts. In 1862 Zola entered the publishing house of Hachette, where he was head of the publishing department. He received a hundred francs a month there, and, later, this was raised to two hundred. He left in 1866 to take up the literary columns in the Figaro. Several years later he made a curious bargain with Lacroix—not Charpentier, as has been usually stated. He was to write a novel every six months, which Lacroix was to publish, and to advance to the author three thousand francs, making six thousand francs a year. But, as the publisher could hardly hope to make such a profit on these two books, Zola was to make it up by giving him a lien on the profits of his other works written for newspapers. He was to make arrangements for the serial publication of his works, and in this manner pay back Lacroix. When Lacroix failed, Zola owed him several thousand francs. Charpentier offered to take Lacroix's bargain off his hands, and Lacroix sold his connection with Zola to the new publisher, who soon began to have the best of the bargain. Zola always speaks in the highest terms of Charpentier's generous treatment, for, as soon as his books began to sell largely, the old agreement was cancelled and a royalty paid on all copies sold from the date when Charpentier first began to publish Zola's works."

In acknowledging the receipt of a copy of Mr. Maude's book, Tolstoy and His Problems, recently issued by Grant Richards, the great Russian writer, while speaking highly of the book, wishes to correct one mistake which occurs in the "excellent" short biography with which the work commences. It is there stated that "Tolstoy did not wait for the decree of emancipation, but voluntarily freed his serfs." This is incorrect. Tolstoy explains that he transferred his serfs from "barstchina" to "obrok"—i.e., he let them pay a yearly sum instead of doing compulsory labour; but it was not, at that time, possible to emancipate them.

Digitized by Google

ANOTHER interesting point in the same communication relates to the inquiry (referred to in Chapter III. of the book) why no mention of John Ruskin was made in What is Art? On this Tolstoy now says: "First, because Ruskin attributes a special moral importance to beauty in art"—which is the very point Tolstoy was calling in question. "Secondly, because all Ruskin's works, rich as they are in depth of thought, are yet not united by any one ruling idea," and therefore could not well be summarised either for approbation or refutation. Of Tolstoy's high appreciation of Ruskin's work in general, one is sufficiently reminded in Tolstoy and His Problems, where this remark is recorded: "I don't know why you English make such a fuss about Gladstone—you have a much greater man in Ruskin."

MR. EGERTON CASTLE provides his critics with a good deal of ready-made material for their remarks in his long preface to his new romance, called The Light of Scarthey, just issued by Messrs. Macmillan. The prototype of Scarthey is the Peel of Foudrey, on the North Lancashire coast, near the edge of Morecambe Bay. A floating light in the estuary of the river Wyre has now replaced the beacon in the story. Mr. Castle has critics behind as well as before him, as the following remarks show. We quote them for their general interest to writers and students of fiction. The story we shall review in regular course:

> It was originally urged by my publishers that, in The Light of Scarthey, I relate two distinct love-stories and two distinct phases of one man's life; and that it were wiser (by which word I presume was meant more profitable) to distribute the tale between two books, one to be a sequel to the other. Happily I would not be persuaded to cut a fully composed canvas in two for the sake of the frames. "It is the fate of sequels," as Stevenson said in his dedication of Catriona, "to disappoint those who have waited for them." Besides, life is essentially continuous. It may not be inept to state a truism of this kind in a world of novels where the climax of life, if not indeed its very conclusion, is held to be reached on the day of marriage. There is often, of course, more than one true passion of love in a man's life; and even if the second does not really kill the memory of the first, their course (should they be worth the telling) may well be told separately. But if, in the story of a man's love for two women, the past and the present are so closely interwoven as were the reality and the "might-have-been" in the mind of Adrian Landale, any separation of the two phases, youth and maturity, would surely have stultified the whole scheme of the story.
>
> I have also been taken to task by some critics for having, the tale once opened at a given time and place, harked back to other days and other scenes: an inartistic and confusing method, I was told. I am still of contrary opinion. There are certain stories which belong, by their very essence, to certain places. All ancient buildings have, if we only knew them, their human dramas: this is the very soul of the hidden but irresistible attraction they retain for us even when deserted and dismantled as now the Peel of Foudrey. For the sake of harmonious proportions, and in order to give it its proper atmosphere, it was imperative that in this drama—wherever the intermediate scenes might be placed, whether on the banks of the Vilaine, on the open sea, or in Lancaster Castle—the prologue should be witnessed on the green islet in the wilderness of sands, even as the crisis and the closing scene of rest and tenderness.

THE author of a new volume of verse which has just reached us, containing a drama of 109 pages, "and other dramatic and lyric poems," sends us the following "mem.":

> Though not intending to offer this volume of Poems to the public till September, I am sending out copies for review thus early in the hope that the reviewers will deem the evidence of the prospectus (and the fact that a staid Litt.D., of middle age, who has gone through the proofs for me, writes that he "thoroughly enjoyed" the reading) sufficient inducement to take my volume with them on their ensuing vacation, and peruse it at their leisure by the rippling stream or surging shore, in the sunlit woods or on the breezy moors, when they are likely to be in the mood to appreciate to the utmost any merits my verses may possess. This is "a consummation" the more "devoutly to be wished" because I am no longer "a young aspirant," full of hope and courage and opportunity, but feel keenly that if, at fifty years of age, I am still to "do the State some service," I shall need all the encouragement I can get.

IN his remarkable series of articles entitled "Anticipations," in the Fortnightly Review, Mr. H. G. Wells has begun to handle literature. After contending that variation and experiment are to be the notes of the future—that "there will be the literature thought and effort of this sort of people, and the literature thought and effort of that"—Mr. Wells encourages us to believe that under such conditions the literary "boom" will become an impossible method of creating literary reputations over-night. Already, says Mr. Wells, > this is becoming apparent enough. The literary "Boom," for example, affected the entire reading public of the early nineteenth century; it was a figure of speech that "every one" was reading Byron, or puzzling about the Waverley mystery, that first and most successful use of the unknown author dodge. The booming of Dickens, too, forced him even into the reluctant hands of Omar's FitzGerald. But the factory-syren voice of the modern "boomster" touches whole sections of the reading public no more than foghorns going down the Channel. One would as soon think of Skinner's Soap for one's library, as So and So's Hundred-Thousand-Copy Success. Instead of "every one" talking of the Great New Book, quite considerable numbers are shamelessly admitting they don't read that sort of thing. One gets used to literary booms, just as one gets used to motor cars; they are no longer marvellous, universally significant things, but merely something that goes by with much unnecessary noise and leaves a faint offence in the air. Distinctly, we segregate. And while no one dominates, while, for all this bawling, there are really no great authors of imperial dimensions—indeed, no great successes to compare with the Waverley boom or the boom of Macaulay's History—many men, too fine, too subtle, too aberrant, too unusually fresh for any but exceptional readers, men who would probably have failed to get a hearing at all in the past, can now subsist quite happily with the little sect they have found, or that has found them. They live safely in their islands; a little while ago they could not have lived at all, and yet it is most often these very men who are most covetously bitter against the order of the present day.

THE City Press gives interesting facts about Mr. Commissioner Kerr, whose retirement from the judgeship of the City of London Court is about to take place. The Commissioner's Court has been for forty years an imperium in imperio, a place where human nature could be studied under a great dissector. How few of us knew it! But the retirement of Commissioner Kerr means mountains in the City. Of his many sharp utterances the City Press has made a little anthology, and these are so full of that charm of the irrelevant, of which we say something in another column, that we will quote a selection:

> If you owed £49 19s. 11d. I could wipe off your debts by your paying, perhaps, 1d. in the pound. As you owe over £50 your debts must go on, hanging round your neck like a millstone all your life.
>
> It is a great pity that unlimited companies—men who trade in the name of a company—are not registered in this country. You don't know who a man is if he trades as a company. In about another half-a-century that will be done.
>
> Never give credit. Always deal for cash; I do.
>
> Talking is the curse of the country.
>
> The system of payment by commission is one of the worst I know. It opens a wide gate to fraud.
>
> The jurymen are paid 1s. for trying a case. They have to listen to three speeches. That is 4d. a speech. That is very hard upon them, so I always make jury cases as short as possible.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Nisbet Bain contributes to the August Monthly Review a most interesting article on Maurus Jókai. Not despising personal detail, he draws the following picture of this remarkable writer:

> For the last forty years Jókai has been the best known personage in the Hungarian capital. His slim, erect, elastic figure; his carefully-kept beard and truculently pointed moustache; even his long, spruce, black Francis-Joseph kabat or surtout, with the invariable dark brown trousers, and the Cornelian dog-headed pin stuck jauntily into the bright neckerchief, form an essential part and parcel of the social atmosphere of Budapest. In the days when he meddled with politics and condescended to employ his leisure hours in averting ministerial crises, he would frequently be observed pacing the corridors of the Parliament House with head erect and hands crossed behind his back, and then everyone knew that the Member for Kassa was about to deliver one of his persuasive speeches in a crowded house. But all that is over now. He has ceased to serve "that old hag, Dame Politica," and only quits his writing-table for a couple of hours every evening to fight his old political leader, Coloman Tisza, for a few florins at the tarok table of their club. But his appetite for work is as voracious as ever. He is up every day at dawn, summer and winter, and has generally written his 30,000 words before lunch. His life is absolutely harmonious: to every hour of the day is allotted its proper labour or pleasure, and he always has "a pocketful of witticisms and comic apercus" for the delectation of his innumerable friends. But his greatest happiness is to know that he has only one unforgivable enemy in the world, and that is the phylloxera, with which he wages remorseless warfare in his vineyard-garden at Svábhegy, the place which he loves the most.

We have always entertained a high idea of Jókai's industry, but 30,000 words every day before lunch take our breath away. Of course, one should read 3,000.

Bibliographical.

Messrs. Dent are credited with the intention of adding to their "Temple" Library a number of literary classics. It is not quite clear why they should bother about a new translation of Plato's Republic, seeing that that by Davies and Vaughan is still accessible, I believe, in the "Golden Treasury" series, to say nothing of the version by T. Taylor which figures in the Scott Library (1894). The version of Apuleius' story of Cupid and Psyche which they promise to give us is, I suppose, that of Messrs. Adlington and Lang, originally published in 1887. A version of the same story appeared so lately as last year. Of Pascal's Pensées a new translation seems scarcely necessary. Selections from the Thoughts were issued by Messrs. Walter Scott last year. The Thoughts on Religion figured in 1893 in the "Lubbock" series of Messrs. Routledge. Going further back, we think of the Selections made by Mr. Sidney Lear in 1888, and the translation of the Thoughts made and published by Mr. Kegan Paul in 1884.

Of Bunyan's Holy War, which Messrs. Dent likewise propose to reprint, we have had several editions lately—two or three cheap ones in 1899, and others by Messrs. Oliphant, Mr. Frowde, and the Religious Tract Society in 1893, 1892, and 1891 respectively. In this respect, it may be said, the public is well supplied. Not so in reference to Lady Mary Wortley Montagu's Letters, assuming that Messrs. Dent are going to reproduce them in full. A Selection from the Letters came out just a decade ago; otherwise there is nothing available but the edition of the Letters and Works printed under the editorship of Lord Wharncliffe in 1887, and reprinted in 1893. Especially welcome will be the reproduction of Coleridge's Biographia Literaria, which has not been accessible in separate form for a very long time. This is a very judicious selection. Of George Eliot's Scenes from Clerical Life there were sixpenny editions in 1897 and 1899, there was also a cheap edition in 1898, and an illustrated edition in 1899. These hardly need adding to yet awhile.

Because this happens to be the millenary of King Alfred the Great, are we to have a surfeit of plays on the subject? It is understood that Mr. Wilson Barrett has penned one, and called it "The Christian King." Now we are promised one from the pen of Mr. Edmund Hill, son of Dr. Birkbeck Hill. It is not so very long since Mr. Alfred Austin presented us with his dramatic poem, "England's Darling." Not so very long ago, too, the Academy contained an account of the verse-play on the subject of Alfred which came from the workshop of Mr. Martin Tupper. The dramatic poets have not given very much attention to the king of the West Saxons. One can hardly rank among such poets Lord Stratford de Redcliffe (1876) or Sheridan Knowles (1831), or John Home, of "Douglas" celebrity (1778); so there are none left to us but Thomson and Mallet, with their masque of "Alfred" and its "Rule Britannia." Alfred has figured, of course, in melodramas and musical dramas and extravaganzas galore.

As Mr. Andrew Lang has been writing about Tennyson for Messrs. Blackwood, it is rather a relief to find that he is not to do the Tennyson for Messrs. Macmillan's "English Men of Letters." That book, one is pleased to see, is to be the work of Sir Alfred Lyall, who has penned a Life of Warren Hastings, though he has not yet given us, so far as I know, any literary criticism. Most people know him as the erudite and experienced author of such volumes as Asiatic Studies (which dates originally from 1882) and The British Dominion in India (1893). To students of literature he is also known as the author of Verses Written in India, first brought out in 1889, and issued in a fourth edition in 1896. Sir Alfred is rarely mentioned in connection with the minor poetry of our day, though his Verses have distinct individuality.

For the rest of the announced volumes in the "English Men of Letters," one does not quite see what points of sympathy there can be between Hazlitt and Mr. Augustine Birrell. On the other hand, the Crabbe of Canon Ainger, the Miss Austen of the Rev. H. C. Beeching, and the Matthew Arnold of Mr. Herbert Paul, should be altogether welcome, Mr. Herbert Paul having already shown, in an essay included in his recent Men and Letters, that he has an intelligent as well as a kindly feeling for the author of Culture and Anarchy.

It cannot be truly said that Mr. Hilaire Belloc's monograph on Robespierre will be de trop. There is room for it, despite Prof. Ten Brinck's book of two years ago, which can scarcely be said to have had much vogue in this country. Of George Henry Lewes's work, first published in 1849, there was a reissue in 1899. It still remains readable by virtue of the writer's pleasant style; but since 1849 much fresh light has been cast upon the character, temperament, and achievements of Robespierre, and of that light Mr. Belloc may be trusted to have availed himself. I take for granted that the memoir by J. B. O'Brien (1837) is out of print. J. W. Croker's article in the Quarterly Review for 1835 is, of course, always accessible.

Mr. Herbert's Vivian's Rambler is not by any means the first since Johnson's. There was a Rambler, describing itself as "a Journal of Home and Foreign Literature, Politics, Science, Music, and the Fine Arts," which came out monthly, I think, between 1848 and 1862, dropping its title in the latter year, and figuring for the next two years as The Home and Foreign Review.

The Bookworm.

Digitized by Google

Reviews.

Real Love Letters.

The Love-Letters of Abelard and Heloïse. (Dent.)

The letters of Abelard and Heloïse! What a vista of traditional romance, what oceanic sentimentality, easy and acquiescent, does not the name call up! The tomb in Parisian Père Lachaise, tears and immortelles, due and facile year after year from the greatly-enjoying sentimentalist of every European race under heaven; literary immortelles flung by writers of every age, Pope with the old Heloïse, Rousseau with the New Heloïse! Rousseau, it is true, scarcely counts in this connection: his heroine is a mere literary parallelism, like the New Atlantis or any other device for procuring a venerable ancient book to chaperon a young and giddy modern book. But Pope's poem, artificial and stilted though the bulk of it be to our modern reconsideration, has itself a classic prestige, and has been all-influential in forming the English tradition on the Abelard-Heloïse legend. For a legend it is, no less than the Niebelungen legend, or any other theme which it is everyone's business to imagine he knows something about. Of the many English pilgrims to the tomb in Père Lachaise, it is safe to say scarce one in ten thousand knows anything beyond Pope's poem and some smattering account (itself far from first-hand knowledge) in a guide-book or other slovenly source of information. It is a boon, therefore, to have, in the handy format of the "Temple Classics," a translation of the famous letters. No doubt it was not unprompted by the present midsummer-madness for Englishwomen's, and every kind of woman's, love-letters. Also, one thinks it was nowise impossible, nor even difficult, if the thing were worth doing at all, to have obtained a new translation of the letters, which should be at once scholarly and sympathetic, instead of this eighteenth-century version, admittedly scarce more than a paraphrase. It is too evidently a paraphrase—we are warned of it by such eighteenth-century clichés as, "To be always so near the dear object of desire"; and it manifestly takes unconsidered liberties of omission with the original. This, apart from the omission of a very considerable passage, presumably on the ground of delicacy; though there is no need for such omission with a reader of the smallest sense, and we did not suppose a nice delicacy to be a distinguishing feature of the eighteenth century.

These letters, however, may hold surprises in store for the inheritors of smooth tradition. They may, and again they may not; for such a tradition blinds the eye of him who holds it, and to read character or story aright from letters needs some insight, however plain be the speech. Against the traditional waxen view of the relations between the famous pair we remember but one protest—a very vigorous, uncultured, somewhat excessive, and characteristic protest—in Mark Twain's Innocents Abroad. He roundly pronounced the whole popular legend to be humbug, and his visit to Père Lachaise a waste of tears and immortelles. That this view should be held by any who have read these letters is blindness, or insincerity, or both. And it is so on the evidence of Abelard himself. The story, as we have most of us gathered it, is that of a brilliant and grave philosophic genius, Peter Abelard, destitute of any fault but that, at the height of his success, he loved too well. He becomes tutor to the beautiful niece of old Canon Fulbert, Heloïse—herself almost as great a prodigy in her own sex as Abelard in his. The grave and high-minded teacher insensibly falls in love with her, finds his passion returned, and they become the victims of their unforeseen ardour. Fulbert discovers them, takes a barbarous revenge on Abelard, and the philosopher is compelled to enter a monastery, while the girl has to seek shelter under the veil.

Where the tale breaks to pieces is in regard to the character of Abelard. He gives you the whole story in the first letter to his friend Philintus; a very remarkable human document, if you take it whole, without sugar—that is, without sentiment. But when can you get the average reader to do this? Abelard is almost as frank as Rousseau, both in what he says and what he does not know he is saying. He, at least, burkes nothing. "I was born with those complexional faults which strangers charge upon our nation," he says: "an extreme lightness of temper and great inconstancy." He might have added to those Gallic qualities vanity and arrogance; as, in fact, five pages later, he does. "I was always vain and presumptive." He shows it. He has nothing but supercilious disparagement for his early master, the great Anselm, whose works still attest his solid powers and originality. Mounted on the shoulders of Anselm's labours, the brilliant young pupil saw only his own superiority. He deals out sneers at every teacher he mentions. His father "offered up to Heaven the languid remains of a life he could make no further use of." His mother does not escape. Though she turned a Religious, she "did not entirely abandon the satisfactions of life; her friends were continually at the grate, and the monastery, when one has an inclination to make it so, is exceedingly charming and pleasant." These "charming and pleasant" little notices are all he gives us upon his parents. But he displays with the frankest ostentation his own conviction that the one man worth talking about in that age was Peter Abelard. You begin to understand why he was never without an enemy, why, with all his greatness, he failed.

He did not waste himself on women; but this, he lets you know, was because only a very exceptional woman was worth the sacrifice of an Abelard. He found her in Heloïse. He immediately resolved to win her, and sought a position in Fulbert's house for that very purpose—though his tutorship of her was an unforeseen advantage, which he gladly seized. No staid doctor this—and he tells you so:

> My person was advantageous enough, and by my dress no one would have suspected me for a doctor; and dress, you know, is not a little engaging with women. Besides, I had wit enough to write a billet-doux.

He had, and much else besides. The seduction was deliberately accomplished, and betrayal was brought about by his own imprudence. Such a man could not keep silent; his love-poems to Heloïse were quoted by everyone, he spoke of her in all companies. Fulbert was content to banish him the house. An attempt to see Heloïse through her maid failed, because he refused to give that young lady a junior partnership with her mistress in his affections. She became his enemy, and he warns others to be more complaisant. Finally, he did see Heloïse, only to learn that she was with child. He carried her off, and put her under his sister's care. Fulbert he endeavoured to appease by offering to marry the girl, to which the Canon consented. The obstacle came from Heloïse herself, who urged both his advantage and her own wishes against the marriage, before he won her reluctant consent.

Then came the end. If Fulbert had let things rest, one doubts whether a man like Abelard would long have been ardent in a peaceable domestic love. But having saved the girl's reputation by marriage, Fulbert destroyed his own by a dastardly revenge, in these days scarce nameable. Ashamed to face his students or the world, Abelard fled to a monastery, where he hoped absence might enable him to forget her, as he says himself. But he prefaced his retreat by a crowning wrong. Unwilling that any should enjoy what he had lost, he insisted that Heloïse should enter a nunnery before he retired from the world. To condemn the unfortunate girl to a life for which she had not the smallest vocation, where she must needs therefore be unhappy, was surely a final touch of supreme egotism.

Digitized by Google

That things proved as any sane person could have foreseen these letters are witness. Yet it is in these that the pair capture the sympathies which we, at least, could not previously feel for so common an intrigue. The perfectly sincere record of two souls that—even through their own fault—suffer and love is ever irresistible. Here there is added the conflict between heaven and earth, religion and affection. And one's sympathy for the woman is heightened by exasperation at the senseless wrong of the man who put her in that position, and the senseless laxity of those who so easily received her. Nay, Abelard bribed them to receive her, and to make no remonstrance with her. He confesses it—with shame, when it is too late. Her letters are the most eloquent in the volume. The letter to his friend in which Abelard told his story, and admitted he had found no peace in religion, fell into her hands, and awakened all the love she was trying to crush. She writes to demand the help and comfort of his letters in pursuing a life to which he had condemned her, and pours forth the long agonies and revulsions of her lonely struggle. He answers by an endeavour to reconcile her to her fate, exposing his own like sufferings. The only result is that, womanlike, she goes a step further, and tries to secure a sight of him, or at least more news of him. He does not answer. Then, with most feminine wile, she professes that she is reconciled to her fate; his letter has done its work; but she must have spiritual counsel, and rules for her convent. Alas! he takes her at her word, and closes the correspondence except for strictly religious advice about her community. And so the passionate flutter of renewed hope goes out. But to what revelations of a woman's tortured heart it had first given birth! Clearly this was a woman of something very like genius.

> After having passed the day in thinking of you, full of the repressed idea, I give myself up at night to sleep. Then it is that Heloïse, who dares not think of you by day, resigns herself with pleasure to see and hear you. How my eyes gloat over you! Sometimes you tell me stories of your secret troubles, and create in me a felt sorrow; sometimes the rage of our enemies is forgotten, and you press me to you and I yield to you, and our souls, animated with the same passion, are sensible of the same pleasures. But O! delightful dreams and tender illusions, how soon do you vanish away! I awake and open my eyes to find no Abelard: I stretch out my arms to embrace him and he is not there; I cry, and he hears me not.

As the editor, Miss Honnor Morten, remarks, it is difficult to read this beautiful passage without being reminded of Mrs. Meynell's "Renouncement":

> I must not think of thee, and tired yet strong, &c.

Alas! it is just after this that Heloïse hears the "Write no more to me, Heloïse, write no more to me," of her husband. She had already said: "I see your heart has forsaken me, and you have made greater advances in the way of devotion than I could wish." It is these charming naïvetés, these revelations of the woman's way in her, which are more attractive than set outbursts of passion; her evident, sweet cajoleries and wiles, her weaknesses and tendernesses and self-betrayals, chasing one another across these pages, engage us more than the passages which stand out as "literature." Those are there, none the less.

> Among those who are wedded to God I am wedded to a man; among the heroic supporters of the Cross I am the slave of a human desire; at the head of a religious community I am devoted to Abelard alone. What a monster am I! Enlighten me, O Lord, for I know not if my despair or Thy grace draws these words from me

And again:

> Oh, for pity's sake help a wretch to renounce her desires—her self—and if possible even to renounce you! If you are a lover—a father, help a mistress, comfort a child! These tender names must surely move you; yield either to pity or to love.

But it is not the externals of literature which make the letters for ever valuable. It is their value as the documents of two souls, whom we learn to understand and feel with across the centuries. Abelard, the embittered, all too-Gallic egotist, here in his letters compels our sympathy and even our admiration. They have nobility: they are only less attractive than hers. We see a man doing a terrible task which must have been torture to such a nature: yet in the end and in the sum, not flinching. Many things become thinkable when we live a few hours in a man's heart. We close the book, feeling that when all tinsel has been stripped from the tale and the man, they were, after all, a remarkable and tragic pair—in some sense, perhaps, great. To go to Pope after them is impossible, though Pope has passages not less than beautiful. For we have felt the reality.

The Soul of Essex.

Romantic Essex: Pedestrian Impressions. By Reginald A. Beckett. (Dent.)

"How unjust the world is to Essex!" These words were written by Matthew Arnold to his wife all but fifty years ago. He had gone down into Essex to inspect schools, and had left London by the old cramped terminus of the Great Eastern Railway at Shoreditch. "What a filthy line is the Eastern Counties', and what bad carriages!" he exclaims; "but how unjust the world is to Essex!" Shoreditch has been superseded by Liverpool-street, and the bad carriages by good ones. The Great Eastern trains are, moreover, the most punctual running in and out of London—by far the most punctual. Yet the world is still unjust to Essex, and beauties which forced themselves on Matthew Arnold's attention thus long ago have not yet drawn many literary men or artists to enjoy and celebrate them. Essex is still stigmatised as a county of inferior charms and superior fogs. Moreover, of late years the county has come to be regarded as a sort of grey hinterland to the East End, across which the jerry-builder, with a hod of bricks on his shoulder, is marching from Ilford even unto Pitsea, as thou goest to Southend. Unfortunately for the picturesqueness of the county, this is partly true. All down the two river-side railways land is being sold at low prices. Clerks, shopkeepers, and spinster ladies of small means eat free lunches in marquees, and buy land at £5 an acre, with free transfers. If our observation has been at all accurate, the thing is being rather overdone. Building estates in name are being created by the score; but when you have seen, for a year or two together, the names of unbuilt streets nailed to trees in quiet lanes where the rabbit crosses your path, and the lark sings unrestrainedly above, the imminence of a townified Essex does not oppress you greatly. Yet London is undoubtedly streaming into Essex along the Thames Valley, thereby remaining true to its ancient development as a river-side town.

Elsewhere, as Mr. Beckett's book abundantly shows, Essex is still a county of unspoiled agricultural charm. Other home counties offer hills, pinewoods, and lordly pleasure houses; but if you love the country for the country's sake, if you care for the smell of crops and the homeliness of dialect, if you can delight in wide lone marshes on which cattle look like insects, and across which the winds of the North Sea rush impetuously; if the hieroglyphic of mast and sprit rising from the unseen hull of a hay barge can give you joy; and if you are refreshed by neighbourly kindness and the communism of village life and the talk of village inns, why, then, Essex calls to you, and will yet prevail. In no direction can you pass so quickly from London to regions where the old English country life remains in such quiet amplitude and restfulness. Where, within forty miles from London, can you find such a welcome from sky and water and waving corn as on Foulness Island at the mouth of the Crouch? Over those wide, pale solitudes the wild geese take their punctual flights, on the mud and saltings at low tide the heron transacts his business, and every farmhouse stands up in the vast shining levels with welcome flashing from the glow of its tiles and the glint of its haystacks. In such places you may still talk to old people who have never seen a railway train. And what is this vision of brown sail and golden lading that seems, in its majestic advance, to overtop all, and threaten your little boat with destruction? It is a hay barge in its glory.

Digitized by Google

But Essex is not all creeks and waterways. Its quiet inland villages, green lanes, low chalk hills, cottage life, windmills and churches give it rare homeliness and an inexhaustible amenity. Mr. Beckett knows it all. You are really prepared for his final exclamation: "With me Essex is a passion—almost a religion." We care less for this expression than for what follows:

> Sometimes in the London streets, especially during long sunny days, the thought comes over me of churches, inns, or clustered villages that I know, how they stand quietly through the hours, the sunlight travels round them and fades, and all the time perhaps there is no one there who appreciates their beauty as I do—at least, I am not there.

There speaks a real lover of the country. Perhaps the feeling which Essex gives in richest measure to her lovers is one of content. Even her finest views do not disturb that sentiment. From the village of Althorne, near Burnham-on-Crouch, you may see three rivers, each of great width—the Blackwater, the Crouch, and the Thames. Yet this vast outspread country is all quiet, all reassuring, and tenderly voiceful of man's labour. It is the same along the inland roads that thread village to village, inn to inn. Mr. Beckett takes us up along the tow-path of the Stour into Constable's country, over the chalk downs of North Essex, through the wheat fields around Witham and Fairstead (the home of old Tusser), and delights our eye with the windmills of the "Rodings" cluster of villages. Take one of his pictures:

> Across a restless expanse of corn you may see and keep in sight for a mile or more—gazing at you with an almost human look—the casements and gables of some great white solitary farmhouse, which, when at length you reach it, you find surrounded by a moat. The labouring arms of a windmill on the horizon show where a village is to be found; for in the Rodings every village has its windmill, always in close proximity to the church. Indeed, the villages usually consist of nothing but church and windmill, with perhaps two or three cottages and a farm. . . . Looking one day into a barn in one of the Roding parishes, I noticed the operation of thrashing with a flail.

That is Essex. Some may see tameness in these suggestions, and, for our part, we have always felt a certain hesitation in recommending a friend to go into Essex. Essex is something of a test. Mr. Beckett, by a happy inspiration, quotes these words of Walt Whitman's: "The trick is, I find, to tone your wants and tastes low down enough, and to make much of negatives, and of mere daylight and the skies." Essex, indeed, offers more than these, far more, and this book is the discreet inventory of her charms. Even Mr. Beckett loves discreetly. "The friendly simplicity of its landscape, of the homes of the people, and of the people themselves—this is the soul of Essex." Mr. Beckett has done the county admirable and intimate justice.

Clio in Mufti.

A History of the Four Georges and of William IV. By Justin McCarthy and Justin Huntly McCarthy. Vols. III. and IV. (Chatto. 12s. each.)

The history of our Georges, of which we saw the first instalment in 1884, is now, thanks to filial collaboration, prettily completed. The volumes before us take us from 1760 to 1837, a circumstance which inevitably points to disproportion, seeing that the first two volumes only extend from 1714 to 1760, and that the concluding period includes the secession of the American colonies, the Napoleonic wars, and "the triumph of reform."

The graces of the leader-writer do not atone for the uncommunicativeness of the historian. The omission of such names as Sir John Moore, Sir David Baird, and Sir Ralph Abercromby is hardly explicable in a history which announces no exclusive intention. But the total lack of information is not, perhaps, so irritating as the incompleteness of it. The business of the instructor assumes the ignorance of the instructed. The latter may feel annoyed when several pages written round about Grenville's Stamp Act fail to explain the nature of that measure, and when "the unfortunate Walcheren expedition" is alluded to merely to observe that it was the cause of a duel between Lord Castlereagh and Canning. It is puzzling to read under the date of 1830 the remark: "There was some doubt as to the position which might be taken up by Canning." The Canning died, of course, in 1827, and his son, Viscount Canning, does not enter into this history. We believe that the common statement, repeated by our historians, that Canning inspired the Munroe doctrine, is challenged by Secretary of State John Foster in his Century of American Diplomacy.

It must be admitted that father and son have worked very harmoniously together. The younger writer is fonder, as his early work showed, of the felicitas curiosa than the parent, who once pounced even on such poeticisms as "the eyes of him." Here the two styles are one style, a style of charming brightness, as of the natural conversation of one who is pleased with his company and undisposed to strain its enjoyment by any specialised excellence. Impossible as it is to praise these volumes from the point of view of the student, it is easy to praise them as romance. Flagrant lopsidedness does not impair their interest. Wilkes, the idol of journalism and democracy, fascinates as if he again bullied and robbed his wife and, in the very teeth of his sovereign, became Lord Mayor of London and member for Middlesex—a Caliban of genius with the morals of an ape and the magnanimity of a saint. Junius—if we accept the current belief which identifies him with Philip Francis—again insults and undermines Warren Hastings. Sheridan once more commits the bêtise of serving up rechauffé his Linley love-letters to Miss Ogle. Wherever the personal element is strongest our historians are most admirable. And it must be conceded that they have touched in the sovereigns of England and Hanover very cleverly. In Kew Palace we remember to have seen a framed specimen of the handwriting of George the Fourth, written when that gentlemanly monarch was five—that is, in 1767. The words were "Conscious innocence," and their vacuous benignity, coupled with the natural childishness of the hand, seemed to rebuke Thackeray for writing of him with a stick of lunar caustic instead of a pen. George the Fourth is now depicted to us as the flabby artistic temperament. He said he was at Waterloo because he could imagine he was. When, on August 17, 1821, "he made his grand State entrance into Dublin in an open carriage drawn by eight horses," he "wore in his hat an enormous bunch of shamrocks, to which, by repeated gestures, he kept incessantly calling the attention of the crowd. More than once, as he gazed upon his admiring followers, he was observed to shed tears." Yet "he could not reconcile himself to the idea of allowing any Irishman to occupy the position of Primate of All Ireland." He was born to kingship, but not to kingliness; of that he had barely enough to rule over Hanover. He was always the animal when the question was one of tickling a favourite nerve. But he overflowed with sentimentalities, of which, perhaps, the most striking was his request to be buried in his night-shirt, beneath which was a locketed portrait of Mrs. Fitzherbert, the woman whom he loved and slandered.

Digitized by Google

William the Fourth is held up to us as the bucolic boor rather than the sailor king. He is all for the ancient order, but reform surges about him, and demands the warrant of his hand. The "man in the street" (prey of the brutal pressgang), the populations of towns unvoiced in Parliament, the youths and children of factories, had their several grievances ameliorated if not removed, in spite of the Toryism of "the poor eccentric, restless, illiterate personage" for whose sake Hanover still condescended to be one with England.

There is something terrible in the lateness of the reforms, without which life must have been well nigh horrible for countless Englishmen, but it is not strange. Men like Lord Holland and Rigby, Dashwood and Grafton, "whose example might be avoided by Pompey Bum," were "ceaselessly prominent" in the early part of the reign of George the Third. Government meant, as it always tends to mean, the fostering of "diplomatic relations" or the prosecution of hostilities against foreign powers, rather than the attempt to make the ostensibly governed patriotic and contented.

The Lady Julian.

Revelations of Divine Love. Recorded by Julian, Anchoress at Norwich, 1373. Edited by Grace Warrack. (Methuen.)

VERY little is known about her. The nineteen lines and one word that The Dictionary of National Biography gives to the Lady Julian—or Mother Juliana, as she is also called—tell all. What she was like we know not. In her book she does not even give her name. She calls herself just "a simple creature, unlettered," the "poor" or "simple" soul to whom these Revelations of Divine Love were shown. We know not why she left the world and lived her long hundred years of life as a recluse, with two women to attend her in her very old age. We know only that she was a woman—history is eloquent with them—who found peace in living the interior life, in prayer and meditation, and inexpressible joy in the mystical visions that she believed were revealed to her. Her home, the scene of her visions, was the Anchorage in the east part of the churchyard of St. Julian, in the parish of Conisford, outlying Norwich. In 1373 the Lady Julian was Anchoress there. In the years that followed, till the Dissolution broke up the Anchorage, Dame Agnes, Dame Elizabeth Scott, Lady Elizabeth, and Dame Agnes Edrygge were also Anchoresses there. They are names only. But the Lady Julian was articulate, and so it happens that the book she wrote in an ecstasy of joy five hundred years ago, is to-day, in green cloth binding, with a decorated frontispiece, being handed over Mudie's counter to the curious.

The busy world has not been very eager for the Lady Julian's book. The original MS.—be sure it was in fair, good writing—"has been sought for in vain." The last known handler of the "old vellum manuscript, 36 pages," was probably one T. Payne, bookseller in the Strand, about 1758, and Payne is now beyond the reach of questions. The earliest printed edition was prepared by Father Serenus Cressy in 1670, more than two hundred years after the Lady Julian's death. The entry stands thus in the British Museum Catalogue:

> Juliana, an Anchorite of Norwich. XVI Revelations of Divine Love made to a devout servant of our Lord, called Mother Juliana. Pub. by R. F. S. Cressy.

It was re-issued in 1843 and 1872, and so we come to the present edition, which has been prepared by Miss Grace Warrack, from an MS. version, in a seventeenth century handwriting, in the British Museum.

It is not difficult to picture the externals of the life that the Lady Julian lived for a hundred years. At that period Anchorites and Anchoresses were as common in rural England as village greens. There was often a tiny dwelling attached to the village church, containing two or three rooms, and there the holy man or woman dwelt, never crossing the threshold. One of the windows looked into the church, enabling the recluse to participate in the services; another opened on the world, "to which all might come that desired to speak." This audience window was covered with a curtain of double cloth, black, with a cross of white, through which the sunshine could penetrate—"sign of the Dayspring from on high." In such a little dwelling the Lady Julian lived after she had yielded herself "to the Divine Goodness for service in the order of Anchorites." There, "in the anchorage, in the east part of the churchyard of St. Julian, outlying Norwich," on the 13th day of May, 1373, the Revelation of Love was showed to her, "'a simple creature, unlettered,' who had before this time made certain special prayers" from out of her longing after more love to God and her trouble over the sight of man's sin and sorrow. She relates that the "Shewings" lasted from about four o'clock till after nine of that same morning, that they were followed by only one other Shewing, on the night of the next day. She gives a minute description of her state before the first revelation, which begins thus:

> In this [moment] suddenly I saw the red blood trickle down from under the Garland hot and freshly and right plenteously, as it were in the time of His Passion, when the Garland of thorns was pressed on His Blessed head who was both God and Man, the same that suffered thus for me. I conceived truly and mightily that it was Himself shewed it me, without any mean. . . . In this [shewing] He brought our blessed Lady to my understanding. I saw her ghostly, in bodily likeness: a simple maid and a meek, young of age and little waxen above a child, in the stature that she was when she conceived.

Well, in these days, medical science has its appointed name for such visions, and its various cures (if their relations desire it) for those who see them. Had her book contained nothing but the ecstatic record of such visions, the memory of the Lady Julian might never have blossomed from the dust of her anchorage. Soul outpourings which merely retell, with the addition of an undisciplined, irritating egotism, what has already been told, for all time, in the Bible, have small power to edify or to interest. Man is interested not by the mystical experiences of other people, but by their experiences of practical life, its conduct and control. The Lady Julian averted her face from the school of the world, in which the striving after a pass degree is to many the chief excuse for remaining in it. She cultivated the part as if it were the whole, and so she fails to help by just that more important part that she neglected. And the same criticism applies to Miss Warrack's Introduction. It is all too transcendental, too emotional, too nebulous. Iridescent arrows are shot into the air. They make beautiful curves, and lose themselves in the blue distance far from the target. In all the Lady Julian's book, in all the great library of this kind of devotional literature, there is little of the nourishment that such a passage as this from Tocqueville offers: "La vie n'est pas un plaisir ni une douleur, mais une affaire grave dont nous sommes chargés, et qu'il faut conduire et terminer à notre honneur."

Digitized by Google

But these Revelations of Divine Love, these outpourings of a cloistral, "God-intoxicated" soul have their message, and their message is this: that that correspondence which, in moments of spiritual uplifting, man has with that Eternal something which is not himself, is a personal communication between himself and his God. The subtleties of creeds, the "this is so" of authority, the example of the wise and good, may help him, but the few things which become to him Eternal Verities are revealed only to himself according to the depth of his spiritual genius, and the clearness with which he has clung to what Swedenborg calls the "umbilicus of the Unseen." What philosopher, after years of labour trying to explain the unexplainable in miles of small print and furlongs of footnotes, has not thrown down his pen and, leaning back, with closed eyes, in his chair, acknowledged that he has travelled no further than the intuitive wisdom that was his before the doors of the prison-house had begun to close on his growing mind? Did not Martineau mean something of this kind when, after spending the best part of his life on a monumental metaphysical work, he wrote in the preface: "I am now aware of the tediousness of these metaphysical tribunals, especially when the whole process wins at last, through all its dizzying circuits, only the very position which common sense had assumed at first."

Neither printed books nor the Book of Life made any call to the Lady Julian. To her there were but two "luminous and self-evident" things—herself and her "courteous," "dearworthy Lord," and she knew without, we are sure, aid from others, the few simple truths attainable by the pure in heart who have the will to retire into themselves, and the courage to be true to themselves. Such truths shine out from the tiring record of the miracles that she believed were shown to her, and the wild visions that accompanied her vigils. "Prayer oneth the soul to God," says the Lady Julian:

> His working is privy.
> Nothing is done by hap nor by adventure, but all things by the foreseeing wisdom of God.
> I saw full surely that He changeth never His purpose.
> Sin is behovable [playeth a needful part] but all shall be well, and all shall be well, and all manner of thing shall be well.
> This is the cause why we be not all in ease of heart and soul; that we seek here rest in those things that are so little.
> We can never come to full knowing of God till we know first clearly our own soul.
> Faith is naught else but a right understanding, with true belief and sure trust, of our Being: that we are in God, and God in us: Whom we see not.

Thus did this cloistral lady five hundred years ago give her quiet answers to the riddle of existence. And the conclusion she reaches and puts on the last page of her book is the conclusion you may hear preached in any pulpit to-day, and in most sincere books. "I desired oftentimes to learn," says the Lady Julian, "what was our Lord's meaning."

> And fifteen years later, and more, I was answered in ghostly understanding, saying thus: Wouldst thou learn thy Lord's meaning in this thing? Learn it well: Love was His meaning. Who shewed it to thee? Love. What shewed He thee? Love. Wherefore shewed it He thee? For Love. Hold thee therein and thou shalt learn and know more in the same. But thou shalt never know nor learn therein other thing without end. Thus was I learned that Love was our Lord's meaning.

What private griefs the Lady Julian had we know not. She is always reticent, with a simplicity of exposition that is very winning; see chapter v., where "our Lord showed me a spiritual sight of His homely loving—the hazel-nut that He held in the palm of His hand, with its three properties: the first, that God made it; the second, that God loveth it; the third, that God keepeth it." The Lady Julian was an optimist. Again and again she raises her confident cry of "al shal be wel and al shal be wel and al manner of thyng shal be wele." So it seemed to her with the world, and all the problems of its difficult days shut out. Not for her was the bitter knowledge that awakens to the wisdom of "the rewards of life are contingent upon obedience to the whole law—physical as well as moral." She gave of her best. That best was only one point of the circle of life; and just so much of it lives as pierced through the unreality of her visions to the truth. And we may well conclude by echoing the words that she tells us "our good Lord" said to her in the sixth revelation: "I thank thee for thy travail, and especially for thy youth."

An Historical Painter.

English Seamen in the Sixteenth Century. Lectures Delivered at Oxford Easter Terms 1893-94. By James Anthony Froude. (Longmans.)

This new and illustrated edition of Mr. Froude's Oxford lectures, on the Seamen of the Sixteenth Century, is welcome. The illustrations are excellent, and form a little gallery of some of the most eminent seamen, statesmen, etc., in that age. Drake, Hawkins, Effingham, Essex, Burghley, Raleigh, are some of them; and on the other side the famous Jesuit, Father Parsons. The book has run rapidly through its editions, as one might expect from the popularity of its subject in these Imperialist days; but it is not, perhaps, so highly finished in style as some of the work which made Mr. Froude famous. It has, in other respects, all the old characteristics; the unfailing energy and sense of narrative effects, the power of grouping things into a living whole, and the uncompromising way of discarding even the air of impartiality. Since Mitford, there surely has not been an historian of eminence so openly and cheerfully one-sided as Mr. Froude. Without personally following him to his sources, original or otherwise, it is not possible to seize on any definite utterance as misleading. Yet his whole tone and manner irresistibly enters a caveat against any too docile acquiescence in his facts and statements. Providence, one feels, cannot have been so completely on the side of the English as this book shows forth. Englishmen, he somewhere remarks, have a way of always thinking their own countrymen in the right. It is a way which has considerably altered among a section of them nowadays; but Mr. Froude has the infection in a most glorious degree. Some points he certainly seems to make. Father Parsons's document, for instance, does seem to show that the Jesuit named, and probably many of his colleagues, were political emissaries as well as missionaries: that the Government had some reason for their treatment of these men and their distrust of the Roman Catholic population. The account of Drake's voyages is as fascinating as any boy's romance in Mr. Froude's hands. In pure narrative he is irresistible.

But you have Mr. Froude at his best in the story of the Armada. It gives him his chance, so to speak, the chance for those qualities of pictorial style and verve which are eminently his; while his defects are kept, for the moment, out of sight. There are here no controversies to display his violent partizanship, no matters needing judicial sifting to bring out his vehement injudiciality. It is a great scenic, nay, a great epic, passage in history; it comes home to that national pride in which he is steeped; it is full of material for effective colour. And here is a master of colour, a master of narration, ready to combine all his materials into an artistic whole, rejoicing to run his course. The result is masterly. You forget, for the time, that he is an unreliable historian, and remember only that he is a great historical painter. It is interesting to note in how many points we are reminded of present conditions. Then, as now, the English Government was unready. Alas! there is not, perhaps there could not be under modern requisitions of warfare, the like compensation. One point strongly brought out is that England was saved despite, not because, of Elizabeth. The Queen, indeed, never lacked courage. But she nowise showed herself the resolute, unfaltering, energetic woman of our school-day teaching. On the contrary, she was all fluctuations and unreason, variable as—woman. Her preparations—or want of preparations—could not be surpassed in fatuity by a modern English ministry. While the Armada was getting ready to be launched against these shores, she prepared, and cancelled her preparations, and changed her mind continually. She paid off her fleet. The danger of leaving the coast open being pressed upon, she put part of it in commission again. Then, on a report that the Armada was not coming, she ordered half the crews to be dismissed—to save their pay, quite in our Treasury fashion. And the reason of her indecision and holding-back action—she was negotiating through commissioners, and feared if anything were done that Kruger (we beg pardon, Philip) might take it ill. It is hard, you see, to remember that one is not writing about the initiation of the Boer War. She cut down Drake's expenses. He wasted ammunition in target-practice, she complained. Ammunition must not be wasted in target-practice, so she measured it out to him at the rate of what would suffice for a day and a half's service. (No, it is not a page out of the modern Admiralty records.) She kept her four best ships out of commission to the last moment: they would not be wanted, and it were waste of money to refit them. She kept down the fleet's supplies. Food was issued to the middle of June, and an extra month's supply was hardly squeezed out of her, with positive orders that it was to be the last. When the Armada hove in sight, our fleet had but powder for two days' fighting, and half-rations for scarce a week. It was the same with the land militia. "There were no reserves," says Mr. Froude, "no magazines of arms, no stores or tents." If Parma had landed, it would have been nearly as perilous as if now the French landed.

Digitized by Google

When it came to the actual fighting in the Channel, again one is struck by parallels with modern times. The English prevailed against the immense numbers of Spain, not only from the superior mobility of their ships, but also because their guns outranged those of the Spanish ships. They sailed round the Spaniards, pouring in broadsides at a distance from which the enemy could not reply, since all their shots fell short. Superior mobility, superior weight of guns—it is the same tale nowadays, only the advantage has shifted from us to our enemies on land. The Spaniards also had been sent out without sufficient supplies of powder; and their admiral—luckily for us—was a hopelessly incapable landsman. But outsailed, out-manœuvred, out-classed in guns, they fought in that day as Cervera fought at Santiago. They were "helpless butts to the English guns," as afterwards to the American guns, yet "not a single galleon struck her colours."

> One of them, after a long duel with an Englishman, was on the point of sinking. An English officer, admiring the courage which the Spaniards had shown, ran out upon his bowsprit, told them that they had done all which became men, and urged them to surrender. . . . For answer they cursed the English as cowards and chickens because they refused to close. The officer was shot. His fall brought a last broadside on them, which finished the work. They went down, and the water closed over them.

Truly, as Shelley's Maddalo says: "'Tis strange men change not." As a finishing touch of irony, the powder of the two fleets, in the crowning battle off Calais, to which our extract refers, gave out shortly after each other (thanks to the joint folly of Philip and Elizabeth), whereby the Spanish fleet was saved from being captured entire or driven on shore—as happened at Santiago.

In conclusion, if not the best work Mr. Froude has done, this volume is yet unmistakable Froude; which is to say that it is always quick, alert, and vital; wherefore its defects will exasperate some no less heartily than its merits will attract others. That is the way of work which is alive.

Other New Books.

PRIMITIVE MAN. BY DR. MORITZ HOERNES.

This volume of Messrs. Dent's excellent little "Temple Primers" deals with a most fascinating subject for all who possess any trace of the archæological mind; nay, for all who are not infected by the shallow and hurried modern impatience of "ancient history"—that term of opprobrium with which the modern flings aside everything without the petty circle of his present life and interests, aping the woman's frivolous disrelish for all outside her yet pettier circle of domestic and personal interests. What can be more fascinating than to penetrate the nebulæ which conceal the far-back cradle of man, to learn the ways of those long-undreamed-of beings who lived, battled, and loved in this Europe of ours long before the Roman girdle was drawn about it, before the Celt and Teuton rolled on Italy, before Greek broke Persian at Marathon? With those prehistoric men this admirable manual (translated from the German by James H. Loewe) in miniature is concerned. Of course, the reader must understand that in so small a volume the dogmatic treatment is necessary for the most disputable and dim of subjects. It starts with the downright assertion of a cosmogony little more authoritative than that of Lucretius. "Our own planet originally detached itself from the sun in the form of a loose gas-ball," and so forth: which simply means that such is the common scientific theory on a subject open to endless revision. So, again, it is asserted that the "dolmens" and such-like huge stone edifices (our Stonehenge, for example) were graves or burying-places, as though no other view were dreamed of or possible, although some of us would contend for a different conception. Quite properly; since only the prevalent theory can be stated in a small primer, and it would be irretrievably confusing to tag every statement with notes of interrogation, so to speak. As for the interest of the subject-matter, one may refer to the section on the pile-dwellers, who have left the broken foundations of their houses in many a lake about the Alps, and the débris of their fallen or cast-away properties thick amidst the ooze of its bottom. Bronze axes, needles, bracelets, chisels, swords, daggers, knives, and spear-points, drawn from the floors of the lakes, tell of these strange people, who built their settlements of straw and wooden huts on great platforms supported by piles driven into the bed of the lake above which they stood. It is of such a people and such a settlement that Sir Arthur Helps wrote his romance, Realmah. But the whole of this tiny primer is a romance, or rather the material for a hundred romances. It is clear, scientific, and as authoritative as the latest knowledge can make it. (Dent.)

ANCIENT INDIA AS DESCRIBED IN CLASSICAL LITERATURE. BY J. W. MCCRINDLE.

In five previous volumes Dr. McCrindle has translated and annotated the larger classical works on India, the fragments of Megasthenes and of Ktesias, the Indika of Arrian, the Geography of Ptolemy, and the various accounts of the invasion of Alexander. The series is now completed, with a number of lesser excerpts from other writers bearing on the subject. Strabo and Heredotus, Pliny and Ælian, are all represented, and among the miscellaneous sources drawn upon some early Christian accounts of Brahmanism are, perhaps, of the highest interest. Dr. McCrindle's copious notes and thorough knowledge of his subject make his work of high value both to historians and anthropologists; and we congratulate him upon the successful conclusion of an enterprise which has now been in progress for nearly a quarter of a century. Dr. McCrindle's first volume was published in 1877. There is, of course, a large element of myth and a still larger element of vagueness in the classical descriptions of India, especially in those which precede the famous expedition of Alexander; but it is noteworthy that many statements which provoked the incredulity of earlier scholarship have been confirmed, or at least explained, by modern research. Dr. McCrindle, for instance, is prepared, within limits, to defend Megasthenes against Strabo.

Digitized by Google

> Strabo says: "No faith whatever can be placed in Dêimachos and Megasthenes. They coined the fables concerning men with ears large enough to sleep in, men without any mouths, without noses, with only one eye, with spider legs, and with fingers bent backwards. They renewed Homer's fables concerning the battles of the Cranes and Pygmies, and asserted the latter to be three spans high. They told of ants digging for gold, of Pans with wedge-shaped heads, of serpents swallowing down oxen and stags, heads and all." Now it is certain that neither Megasthenes nor Dêimachos, who was ambassador after him at the Palibothian court, coined these fables. That they were but fictions of the Indian imagination is clearly proved by the fact that the names by which Megasthenes designated the races in question are but translations or transliterations of their names as found in Sanskrit literature.

But what was the original intention of these fictions, some of which, it will be remembered, survived into such mediæval compilations as that of the pseudo-Mandeville? They had been thought to be the ingenious devices of traders and gold diggers, designed to frighten away rivals from their profitable haunts. Dr. McCrindle gives another explanation of one of the most famous of these stories, that of the terrible gold-digging ants, "somewhat less than dogs, but larger than foxes," which has helped to saddle Herodotus with the discreditable and undeserved appellation of "father of lies." This yarn, too, appears to be of Indian, rather than Greek, origin, for Sanskrit writers give to small fragments of alluvial gold-dust the name of "paippilika," or "ant-gold." Dr. McCrindle quotes the late Prof. Ball:

> "Sir H. Rawlinson, and, independently, Dr. Schiern, of Copenhagen, were enabled to come forward and state beyond a question of doubt that the myrmeces of Herodotus and Megasthenes were Thibetan miners, and, it may be added, their dogs. . . . I pass from this discovery now, save that I mention a contribution which I have made to it, namely, that the horn of the gold-digging ant, which we are told by Pliny was preserved in the temple of Hercules at Erythræ, and which for centuries has been the subject of much speculation, was probably merely one of the gold-miners' pickaxes. I have been informed by an eye-witness, Mr. R. Lydekker, that the picks in use by agriculturists and miners in Ladak consist of horns of wild sheep mounted on handles."

The phase of scholarship which assumed that every statement of Herodotus not immediately intelligible was a deliberate fabrication is now becoming extinct. (Constable.)

Fiction.

Fiction in Tabloids.

The Skirts of Happy Chance. By H. B. Marriott Watson. (Methuen. 6s.)

A Woman Alone: Three Stories. By Mrs. W. K. Clifford. (Methuen. 6s.)

"La Bella," and Others. By Egerton Castle. (Macmillan. 3s. 6d.)

The Thirteen Evenings. By George Bartram. (Methuen. 6s.)

"Meagre and hollow, but crisp," was the "taste" of the snark; the same may be said of the typical English short story. It is either an anecdote of five or ten thousand words or it is a long story abridged. The characters are accidents in the incidents.

All the writers before us are too clever to betray absolute snarkishness—if the word be permitted us; but Mr. Marriott Watson comes dangerously nigh such a disclosure. The greater part of his book, nicely illustrated by Mr. Frank Craig, is concerned with the antics of an unmarried nobleman who has a passion for impersonation. At one time we see him posing as a private detective, at another as a husband. Once he is commissioned to make love to a young lady who is suspected of having bestowed her affection in an even less desirable quarter. Hence this passage:

> "Tell me," he asked abruptly, seizing her hand, "how would you like a home?"
>
> "I have one, thank you," she said demurely.
>
> "Ah, but a home of your own, to be happy in," he said anxiously; "and a—a husband and—a—a—children?"
>
> "Lord Francis!" said Miss Langley, colouring very swiftly, and rising again.
>
> "I don't mean your children, but my children," he hastened to explain in some confusion.
>
> "I think, if you won't mind, I will go back to the drawing-room," said she freezingly, for all her warm face.

An arch-philanderer is Lord Francis, with a temperament leading so naturally up to situations that, even if "happy chance"—outside the precincts of Tennyson's verse—had worn "bloomers," he would not have failed to take advantage of her. Such a man is dear to the short story, which necessarily avoids negotiations. Mr. Watson makes him distinctly amusing, as we have shown.

The assumption of another's identity is also the theme of one of Mr. Castle's strongest tales. It is in a German setting, and one is reminded of Gottfried Keller's charming "Clothes Makyth Man." But the pure comedy of the Swiss master is here the grimmest tragedy. The point to note, however, is the tenacity with which Romance clings to the idea of privacies laid bare by trick or accident, of intimacies arrived at without tediums and ceremonies. When Mr. Castle's German student is, owing to a misapprehension, commanded to "kiss Elsa"—Elsa whom he has never seen, Elsa whom he knows not from Eve—the sense is tickled below the intellect. Rich in scenic accessories is Mr. Castle, but, cultured as this writer undeniably is, he smacks a little of the "property" shop. The marvellously beautiful Duchessa, who momentarily diverts the artist from his red-haired Maimie with the thin red hands, is, with her ultimate humiliation and his resilient virtue, of transpontine manufacture; so, too, are the patrician fencers, the brothers Lugani, who fight to the death for an empty woman who cannot choose between two such twins of perfection. Consummate technique as an emotional expression is dear to the short story. Fictional violinists we all know, it is anti-climax to listen to Ysaye after reading about them; and so Agnes Castle, in a story at the end of her relative's book, gives us a hero, Darwinianly evolved from the performer on Christy's old organ, who falls in love with the pretty

Digitized by Google

German princess whom he instructs in clavier-playing. "What the master played" when he heard that she was engaged "was never written, but as it burst from the seething anguish of his beautiful artist's spirit, so it escaped from his fingers."

Our old friend "the Thing" appears both in Mr. Castle's pages and in Mr. Bartram's. There is something rather ludicrous and ineffectual in that capital T, even when applied to the production of a Frankinstein less crude in his procedure and less imitative in his results than Mrs. Shelley's remorseful creator. But Mr. Castle certainly achieves an effect in the weird not unworthy of Mr. Wells. All through his book the hand is clearly that of an artist. His work always attracts by its vitality and the polish on its style.

Mrs. Clifford is, for the nonce, less vital, but on a higher plane. A Woman Alone is a solemn and touching story of a passionate love thwarted by its recipient's selfishness. The woman was ambitious for her husband, and the husband was ungrateful because he was not ambitious either for her sake or his own. His "soul lived in a prison of which his manner was the gaoler":

> "I like the quiet [he said], there are no neighbours to worry one, and there are plenty of books; it is possible to think and study."
>
> "Ah, yes," she answered, "perhaps it is good for study—but also . . . we must live."
>
> "We shall do that together," he said; and she felt his words to be a cul-de-sac.

In the story of a man's falling in love with an uxoricide Mrs. Clifford reaches the top of her sensationalism. She is content, however, to go sketching her way through her book, and work more coarsely imagined but more vividly presented scores against her, though it does not persuade one of its inherent equality.

Beyond question, the most remarkable of the four volumes before us is The Thirteen Evenings. It bears marks of considerable culture, being characterised by much nicety of phrase, though a book of vigorous brawn and large heart. We have the device of a club, whereof the members tell stories to one another. The soldier who, with a chum of splendid forbearance in friendship, served in the West Indies in the sixties tells of visions seen under the spell of "White Obi," when his past existences flashed before him as they did in the case of Mr. Kipling's Charlie Mears. The autocrat of the club tells how he was locked up in the stocks of a Midland town by a malicious sexton. Others tell of gipsy love and fighting, of Gargantuan drinking, of fabulous snoring. Such a riot of the weird, the pawky, the bucolic, is not often listened to in modern fiction. Here is a characteristic passage:

> We entered the Barley Mow, ordered lunch, and inquired for the bath-room.
>
> "'Nowt o' the sort here, gentlemen," said the landlady.
>
> "Now," said I to the American, "the thing works perfectly. Thorough old English style; wash the face only, once a day, and the feet and back of the neck, with due precaution against cold, every Saturday night."
>
> "I am indeed a degenerate," said he, "for I must bathe or die. . . ."
>
> We . . . found the helper, engaged an empty stable, stripped, and bade him douse us with half a dozen buckets of water each. . . . While we were drying ourselves we heard him talking to someone at the other end of the yard.
>
> Said someone, "What ha' ye been a-doin' wi' 'em, Bill?"
>
> "Slushin' on 'em down wi' watter," answered Bill.
>
> "What's wrong wi' 'em to need that?"
>
> "The Lord only knows. They look middlin' respectable, but ye never know what's what or who's who these times."

A fine intolerance of literary dilettanti, and all the mouthings of their urbanity, is breathed through this work, which is incidentally a fiery dragon against newspaper critics. Its virile pages make even friends Watson and Castle look rather deficient in red corpuscles under their trappings of romance. But one is inclined to overrate the man who has the key of the fields and the village taproom, just because few of us would use it if we could. It is clear that Mr. Bartram draws from a life rich in full-flavoured fact. In the briefer short story he is able to preserve his integrity of vision. Here there are no flats to be joined with pinchbeck artifice. His artistry bungles in repairing the ruins of a wronged maiden. Here he works in three chapters instead of one, and with scant regard for the probabilities which, in matters optimistic, should be held sacred in this dismal world.

Howbeit he proves, as indeed do the writers we have associated with him, that the short story still flourishes with us. It has occasional comeliness of shape: it is not uninspired by originality. Let it try to be truthful.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

TRISTRAM OF BLENT. BY ANTHONY HOPE.

After running its conspicuous course in the Monthly Review, this novel appears in an admirably tasteful volume. The story looks to be rather long and complex, and it is, in fact, concerned and written in the author's more serious vein. Its principal characters, Tristram of Blent, and his cousin, Cecily Gainsborough, are placed in very delicate relations to each other as claimants to a large property. Tristram's is the bad claim, and he resigns it, but does not lay aside his pride. The whole story is thoroughly modern. (Macmillan. 6s.)

THE LIGHT OF SCARTHEY. BY EGERTON CASTLE.

"This book is my dream-child," says Mr. Egerton Castle in a sixteen-page preface to this "Romance." The idea of the story is romantic and not a little fantastic; and it provides a theatre for "elementary passions, for fighting and loving in despite of everyday conventions; for enterprise, risks, temptations unknown in the atmosphere of humdrum peace and order." The scene is Morecambe Bay, the time early in the nineteenth century. The "romance" is of generous length—more than five hundred closely-printed pages. (Macmillan. 6s.)

FOR ALL TIME. BY CLIVE R. FENN.

A love-story in a modern aristocratic setting, with a lord and a journalist as lovers of one woman. (Digby, Long. 6s.)

AN UNCONGENIAL MARRIAGE. BY COSMO CLARKE.

He painted, she prayed. He wanted to dine out, she feared to be drawn into worldliness. Moreover, in Ruth's ministrations amongst the poor she had met a young minister named Silas Warne, "whose austere piety filled her with admiring awe," and who, when she asked him to share a cab, replied: "Thank you, I never pamper this poor body." Ruth felt "rebuked," and with more zeal than ever invited the great unwashed into her husband's dining-room. The ensuing complications make the story. (F. V. White. 6s.)

SISTER CARRIE. BY THEODORE DREISER.

A clever if depressing story, in which is traced the sordid-successful career of Caroline Meeber, from her arrival in Chicago with a small trunk to her success on the New York stage. The hero, if he can be called such, marries her after committing a robbery, and his downhill course synchronises largely with is wife's ascent of the hill of fame. A good deal of penetration and imaginative sympathy go to the development of the story, which is rather a transcript than a dramatisation. (Heinemann. 4s.)

Digitized by Google

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage, One Halfpenny, Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscription, prepaid (including postage) 17/6
„ Quarterly 5/0
„ Price for one issue /5

The Charm of the Irrelevant.

There are times when we do not find it an easy task to treat the Editor of our contemporary as a serious influence at work in the petroleum world.

We were wondering whether the ravens would feed us in a bookless week, when by the accident of an accident our eye fell on the above sentence. After all, why ransack the literary world for a theme? Why not accept as facts the emptiness of August, the holidays of publishers, and the indolence of bookbinders? There is time to look over the wall. Doubtless we make too much of the book world. It is a world to which the man in the street is bound by only a few intermittent ties. Walk through the vast suburbs of South London—you can never know how vast they are until you have done this—and ask how many publishers, booksellers, authors, critics, or pressmen inhabit the houses. Very few. Hardly any. These trim and beautiful streets, with their gardens, their leaf-strewn pavements, and all their suggestions of solvency and comfort, cannot easily be associated with the literary parliament. These people are concerned with the finished and appropriate book, and so sure are they of getting it that it does not pay to establish large bookshops in their midst. By easy and inevitable channels the book they want passes into their hands. Their conversation is ordinarily of the church or chapel (with swallow flights into scepticism), of politics, of business, and of sport; and the books that please them best are those which touch on life in their own manner, and with a little more than their own courage. In a word, it is precisely because they are not primarily, or sincerely, interested in books that they are so powerful to make the fortunes of the writers who hit their taste. Ah, but they are happy—these wise, quiet, half million people who read little, and read for enjoyment; and you do not see a tall girl of the suburbs walking down Streatham Hill with a library book in one hand and a tennis racquet in the other without learning something of the real relations of literature to the public.

Neither is a sentence like the one which heads this article without its useful and even tonic suggestions. There is a petroleum world. Moreover, there are emotions, anxieties, and hostilities peculiar to the petroleum world. It is just as well to remember such facts. Nay, one of these days the petroleum world may suddenly find itself filled with cheap trippers from the literary world. For, in turning the pages of Petroleum (fortnightly, of all booksellers) we found the question asked, "Is Texas Safe?" In the petroleum world they think that there is an appreciable danger that the petroleum fields will one day take fire. If it does we know several publishers who will fiddle while Texas burns. Let them note the possibilities:

> It is the occasional visitor who might in a moment of thoughtlessness drop a match or commit some careless act that would put an end to the value of the field. A fire once started would in all probability wipe out every tank and pipe-line, and spread to every well. It would be practically beyond all human possibility to extinguish the flames, which would burn as long as the wells would flow.

That is fairly interesting, is it not? But then trade and class papers are interesting. They are loopholes through which you may look at any moment into worlds larger, busier, and perhaps more important than your own, worlds of which it is useful to keep yourself mildly aware. Every word they contain is more or less irrelevant to your own occupation or interests; and yet, such are their relevancy to other men's interests, and such the intimacy of that connection, that they become curiously documental and fascinating. As a recreative means of enlarging the mind, and sensing the business and desires of your fellow men, there is hardly a better device than that of taking in a paper which deals authoritatively with affairs wholly foreign to your own. There is a cogency in these expert opinions that takes a grip on the mind, and you are interested before you know where you are. Statements which in some moods you might dismiss as altogether remote and rather sordid, assume a good deal of human interest when they are read with imaginative sympathy. One realises how many storms in how many tea-pots rage unknown. For example, we read in the current number of the Draper's Record:

> Drastic action has been taken of late by the head of a local shipping house, who has, owing to death, been placed in a position of control. Salaries have been cut down by 50 per cent. in some instances, while in cases where men were alleged to be underpaid advances have been made. The result in several instances has been a rather curious turning of the tables.

We should think so! Under the head of "Legal News," we find a trade comedy of errors which was placed in the City of London Court. The plaintiffs were a City firm of woollen merchants, and they sued a firm of carriers under circumstances which their counsel explained quite lucidly as follows. His clients, he said, > carried on a very extensive business in various parts of the world, and they sent woollen goods by the defendant company's line in considerable quantities until the circumstances which had given rise to that action. In January last the plaintiffs had orders from two customers in Glasgow. One was Mr. Charles Jacobs, who carried on business as the Star Clothing Company, and he ordered five bales of special woollen goods. The other was Mr. B. Jacobs, who carried on business as the Scottish Woollen Company in Trongate-street. These customers had been in the habit of ordering large quantities of woollen goods from the plaintiffs, and the custom was to ship them by the defendants' service. There was an unusual amount of jealously amongst trade competitors in the woollen trade, and there was much anxiety that other persons in the trade should not know what had been ordered by their rivals for their season's goods. That was the cause of the whole of the trouble which had given rise to these proceedings. When bales of woollen goods were sent by the plaintiffs to customers they bore a private mark which was only known to the carrier and customer concerned. The full name of the customer was, of course, known to the carrier, and that appeared on the shipment note. The defendants were very well acquainted with the two respective marks of the plaintiffs, two Glasgow customers in question, as they had delivered tons of goods on many previous occasions. In January last two separate orders were given by Mr. C. Jacobs and Mr. B. Jacobs. They had both selected special lines, but neither knew what the other was having. The goods were despatched on February 1, but owing to a mistake of the defendants one of the parcels intended for Mr. B. Jacobs was delivered to Mr. C. Jacobs, and one parcel intended for Mr. C. Jacobs was delivered to Mr. B. Jacobs. The plaintiffs were communicated with by Mr. C. Jacobs. The mistake was fully explained, but the mischief had arisen from the fact that one of the parcels which had been opened by mistake by one of the Jacobs was refused by the othe Jacobs. The whole of the bale of goods, valued at £41, ha[d] been cast upon the plaintiffs' hands, for, by the defendan[t] conduct, they were absolutely worthless, except as remnants' the plaintiffs having lost the sale of them in the ordinat[e] course. The plaintiffs would now only be able to sell thery as remnants for £15, and the balance, £20 8s., was nom claimed by the plaintiffs. The Jacobs, for whom the goods were originally intended, would not now take them at any price or under any circumstances.

Digitized by Google

you go about to say that this is not interesting we can only beg to differ. From the Grocers' Gazette we learn that notice of appeal at Quarter Sessions has been given in the Royton Pepper Case by a grocer who was fined for selling black pepper as genuine white pepper. Think of the little drama behind this simple statement; the gossip, the indignation, the suspense, the impounded pepper. We will not presume on our readers; we pass over the "better consumptive enquiry" for lard, and the deadly monotony of the market in raw beetroot. There is a note of tragedy, however, in the following bald statement under "Bacon": "The killings in Ireland last week amounted to only 4,854 hogs, being 327 less than the previous week. The killings in Denmark were estimated to have been about 22,000 hogs. The improvement which was noticeable last week has been fairly well maintained." It is the glimpse of the world that struggles through such information that is interesting. These particulars, and a thousand others, are collected and commented on with punctual assiduity week by week.

From another source we learn that > much difference of opinion prevails as to what is the best form of blades for fans or air-propellers. . . . It is quite certain that no advantage results from unduly adding to the number of blades, probably because each blade becomes sufficiently close to the next to hinder the free access of the air to it, and so throttles the supply, and causes waste through eddying or churning.

We might have known that the air-propeller which cools us in our favourite restaurant was an object of criticism as legitimate as the book we insist on talking of beneath it.

We need scarcely say that a county newspaper is excellent reading. Here it is well if the irrelevancy is qualified by some acquaintance with the district. The conscientiousness with which a really good county paper collects the smallest news from the remotest villages is itself inspiring. The result is a veritable document, a window by which over your Sunday breakfast you may look into the simple heart of old England. There are scores of such papers. One, the Essex Weekly News, has given us many an interesting half-hour. There is music and suggestion in the very village names that head the paragraphs: Tolleshunt D'Arcy, Asheldam, Beauchamp Roothing, Southminster, Bulphan, Stisted, and Layer Marney. The humours are many, and racy of the soil. Hardly a crop is raised, hardly a mare bruises her knees, not a well is sunk, not a labourer is fined for going in search of conies but you know of it. The reports of marriages are wonderful, with their array of family names, and the police cases are done with a solicitous geniality and wealth of detail that make them irresistible. Comment and news run hand in hand:

> LATEST FROM COGGESHALL.
>
> I am informed that on Tuesday afternoon, as Mr. Percy ——, son of Mr. W. ——, cabinetmaker, Coggeshall, and one of Mr. ——'s men, were driving home from Feering, they were stopped near the Red House, and had their attention directed to the fact that they and also some things in the cart were on fire. They had been complaining to each other of the excessive warmth for some time, thinking it was due to the heat wave; but when they got out of the trap they found that the backs of their coats, and also their tool basket, were alight. The fire was promptly extinguished. How it originated they are at a loss to explain, neither of them having struck a match. The incident, therefore, must be added to the already long list of "Coggeshall jobs."

Now, what is a Coggeshall job? "Igsplain, men and hangels." Every week the scent of produce and the hum of village councils are borne to you like vegetables fresh from the garden. The charm of the irrelevant is over all

If a man needs to realise that the world is bigger than he computes it to be, he has only to ask himself whether he is a Freemason or not. If he is not a Freemason, then a whole world or flavour of the world is barred off from him under portentous locks and unobtainable keys. The Freemasonry papers are not very fascinating; they are too cryptic, too obviously private and forbidding. Yet they show week by week how intensely this Craft and Mystery is loved by its adherents. You may go from year's end to year's end with hardly a thought of Freemasonry, and wholly unconscious that Freemasons are your companions in train and omnibus; still less that their bosoms are filled with sentiments not unlike the following, which we quote from an address delivered in one of the suburban lodges. After referring to various orders of nobility, and the ignorance of them everywhere met with, the speaker said:

> How different it is with our cherished Order; in the American swamps and the burning sands of Arabia, the Australian bush and the Indian jungle, the Mexican ranches and the icefields of Iceland and Labrador; in the joss-house of China, as well as in the civilised cathedrals and other fanes; in the deserts of the Sahara, up to the very apex of the Pyramid of Cheop; is there a part of the globe where our Order is unknown or where it is not recognised? It is a jewel which dazzles the eyes of the profane!

The cult which has filled the joss-house and been honoured on the very apex of the Pyramid of Cheop is probably known to you, in practice, only by the sight of certain shop windows in Great Queen-street. Yet in England alone there are 2,800 Freemasons' lodges, and one of the Order has recently declared: "It is food for reflection, and I give it to you as an established fact, that wherever you find Freemasonry in the ascendancy, there you find benevolence and charity in their wisest and highest forms." On this we make no comment. We merely point out that it is interesting to know that the men to whom such words appeal are counted in England alone by hundreds of thousands. Truly the world is full of a number of things, and Stevenson knew that we are apt to forget it.

Things Seen.

The Ruling Passion.

IT has been remarked that although life is short, the afternoon can be very long. Very long it seemed to the four men who sat on the sea-wall peering at the receding tide. They seemed to have no other occupation but to watch the beach gleam out from the rippling water, and plainly they grew gladder and gladder as yard after yard of flat, glimmering sand was disclosed. To watch, to nod to each other, to grow hourly a little more eager—that was their afternoon's occupation. There were many delightful things to do on that coast, with boats, with bicycles, with horses, with the legs, but not for those four men. They desired no pursuit but to watch the tide go down, and to see the moist sand lie outstretched before them. And so the afternoon crept away. About five o'clock they rose, smiled, stretched themselves, and throwing an affirmative glance at the great stretch of sand, disappeared. I waited till they should return, wondering why, indifferent to all other allurements, they should wait so patiently for the going down of the tide. Presently they reappeared, carrying a practising net, a bat, four stumps, and a ball. They walked briskly, talking eagerly, like men whose desire is at last within reach. Then they measured out the distance on the sands, pitched the stumps, and played at single wicket till night came up. I never saw them under any other conditions but those of waiting for the tide to go down, and playing cricket when the sand permitted. It was their Ruling Passion, and satiety touched them not.

Digitized by Google

The Search.

It was growing dusk, but from the corner of the omnibus where I sat I could see her face plainly enough as she stepped from the pavement into the roadway and raised her umbrella. The rusty bonnet, the straggling gray hair, the spectacles, the skew-hung mantle—all these were ordinary enough; but in the face there was something that arrested me—something of the fixed, foolish, purpose one sees in the faces at Broadmoor. But it did not arrest the omnibus; for the conductor, leaning against the stair rail, and flicking the bundle of tickets in his fingers, viewed her dispassionately. Just then another omnibus passed us, going in the opposite direction, and stopped. The woman entered it and disappeared. The conductor turned, caught my eye, and read my astonishment that a woman should be so indifferent to the direction in which she travelled. "I never stop for 'er," he explained. "She jest gets on and then gets off again. Does that all day. They say she's looking for 'er 'usband. I bin on this road three years and more, and I've known 'er all the time." "Still, why don't you stop for her?" I asked. "She's doing no harm; and her penny is as good as any other penny." The conductor looked over his passengers. "Well, live and let live, that's my motter," he replied. "'Sposin' 'er husband—I'm only putting the case, mind—'sposin' 'er 'usband was in the 'bus."

Plain United States.

If you want to study the development of speech, the little book called John Henry (Heinemann, 1s.) is worth an hour's reading, and will probably lead to months of investigation. Indeed, Dr. Murray, in his rare intervals of leisure from the contemplation of English on its native soil, might amuse himself with the strange developments of English in its newer home across the Atlantic, of which Mr. McHugh's John Henry is, no doubt, a skilled exponent. We drop the hint of a doubt, since we are hardly competent to act as a Court of Final Appeal on a book where, as John Henry says, "they talk plain United States, and where you get two cosy corners at fifty cents a throw." This in comparing "The New York" with the theatre at which Sarah Bernhardt and Coquelin were performing "one of those short-arm duets." This is probably United States, but to us it is not particularly plain. The difficulty began with the opening sentences, which set the key of the book's chastened style:

> I was down on the card to lead a lady friend of mine to a New York theatre where you can roll around in an orchestra chair at fifty cents a throw.
>
> When a guy can buy a couple of cosy corners in a dead swell theatre for fifty cents per coze, he's a mark to blow four plunks to squeeze into one of those joints where they feed you on problem plays and fricasseed pasts.
>
> I figured it out that way and stood pat.

Here is a special kind of slang that requires to be sent to the wash, mangled, ironed and folded straight before it can be recognised as literary wear. And John Henry is, we imagine, as special to New York to-day as Sam Weller was to the London of sixty years ago. He is apparently a young man about town in a small way; perhaps a store clerk whose love of a larger life leads him into acquaintance with "sawdust sports." But he has also a lady friend, and as he says in reference to "one of those swell grub stations" (he means restaurants), "it goes against the grain to stand up and introduce my lady friend to every labourer in the four-flush vineyard who trails up to the table and gives me a glad look." That same lady friend, too, has many synonyms. She is The Real Thing, the Proposition in Peaches, the Extreme Limit, the Whole Output, the Original Package of Sweetness, and on the last page but one John Henry remarks that "Clara Jane is a wise guyine"; so that we may conclude that the rose who is so sweet under so many names is merely Clara Jane, the lady friend who shares his experiences with Sarah Bernhardt's short-arm duets and the fancy feed store. It is not what happens to John Henry that is interesting, it is the way he describes it; not the thing he says, but the way he says it. Mysterious and engaging words spatter every paragraph, and it is a humiliating confession that we have to make when we say that we do not understand them. New York undoubtedly knows how much a "plunk" denotes, though Mr. Pierpont Morgan recognises it only when multiplied by a million. But what is a "goo-go"? And what is the change when it is a "con goo-goo"? How do you "tease a trolly"? What portion of a billiard saloon is "the dope"? What sort of people are "pikers," and "Torrid Tamales"? "Cinch," "dub," "gabby," "dago"—what mean they? These are the words in which John Henry thinks, and though they look like English they are "plain United States," or, rather, we should say, plain New York, in the sense that backslang is plain London.

But no man can write plain United States for nearly a hundred pages without being occasionally intelligible to a Britisher. And the acute reader—modesty forbids more personal indication—has in one instance at least a clue. Thus:

> She said she was svelte.
>
> I suppose that's dago for a shine.
>
> That's the way with some women. They can't come right out and call another woman a polish. They have to beat around the bush and chase their friends to the swamps by throwing things like "svelte" at them. Tush!

Now we get here some indication of what a shine is, and, by implication, what a polish is. But what about dago? It is an interesting little problem for those who like linguistic quadratic equations, and this little volume, appropriately adopted into the family of the "Dollar Library," is full of such problems, though in many of the equations the known quantities are sadly less than the unknown.

But it is the lover of language as a swift and easy conveyance for thought who will welcome John Henry. Put him on a shelf, and wait. On both sides of the Atlantic the decay and the rejuvenescence of the speech of Shakespeare is in simultaneous progress. Year by year words are buried, and words are born year by year—for they are very human, and follow the fortunes of men—stately words drop into degradation as descendants of kings are found in butchers' shops. Across the Atlantic we fire alternate sarcasms. "Elegant!" says England superciliously, naming a word that has come down in the Western world. "Awfully!" is America's return. So far we are quits. There are two honest words laid prone, impossible for all practical purposes of literature. Imagine—if imagination grasps anything so duo-hemispherical—the occurrence of something "awfully elegant." But while England and America are both engaged in slaying the old words, new ones, quite promising babies, are continually being born. They spring obscurely, and many die in infancy, being overlaid, or insufficiently published, or hypertrophied (such as the hydrocephalous offspring of science); now and then they are judiciously strangled by the firm fingers of a linguistic doctor. But the fittest survive, and come to maturity. Their origin is various. They may come like the "Boycotts" from the country, like the "Jingoes" from the London music-hall, or like the "Dabs" from a public school in the ordinary course. But if they are wanted they are accepted, and found their families, and win their way into Debrett or The New English Dictionary. And while in England slang—the slang of the streets, of the schools, of the Universities and of the Services—is always adding fresh blood to the language, the same process goes on in America. Indeed, in America at present we should say that the birth-rate of words and the rate of infant mortality are rather exceptional. For it is not enough to be a county word to get into The New English Dictionary; it must be a continent word. And with words, as with men, it takes three generations to make a gentleman, though we should hesitate to fix the period of a verbal generation.

Digitized by Google

Thus, perhaps, our intention of placing John Henry on the shelf and waiting developments is explained. How many out of John Henry's crêche will grow up into good, healthy dictionary words? Those that are wanted, is the obviously correct answer. And there is no reason why one should—even in nineteen hundred and fifty—"patter away for the pasteboards" when one need only go for the tickets. But will there come a time when Mr. Brodrick answers a question with: "Oh! ask me easy, just to tease me"; or Mr. Chamberlain squashes Mr. Labouchere with: "Quit your joshin'"? John Henry brings us a crowd of squalling linguistic infants. "There's no literary fiff that can give me the elbow," he remarks, and if we understand him aright he figures to put the whole bunch upon the rates. We must discriminate. Doubtless some of these baby words may reach manhood. But infanticide is inevitable. For, if we may steal John Henry's monumental phrase, he "talks like he'd been struck in the grammar by a ferry-boat."

M. Coppee Talks.

The New York Times Saturday Review prints an amusing interview with M. François Coppée, written by Mr. William Wallace Whitelock. Although M. Coppée's attitude in the Dreyfus case has not been that of his English admirers, he remains for them an interesting and typical literary figure of Paris. The talk, which we take the liberty of quoting, with abbreviations, ranged, it will be seen, over many literary topics:

"You continue out the Rue Bellechasse until it changes into the Rue Vaneau, cross the Rue Babylone, and a hundred steps further on you tumble into the Rue Oudinot." Such were the instructions of the wandering blanchisseuse whom I stopped in the Boulevard St. Germain to ask the way to the house of M. Coppée. Her instructions proved correct—at the end of the journey I tumbled into the Rue Oudinot. The room into which I was shown was the dining-room, and the author had come out of his sanctum to receive me. Unfortunately, however, we managed to get the hanging lamp directly between us, and for some time we bobbed around that lamp, trying to find one another, in the silly way that is so amusing to onlookers. At last, however, we caught each other, and the grave Academician, who had by this time become somewhat ruffled, led me into his study, in which were seated two gentlemen who looked exactly alike, save that one wore his beard pointed and the other wore his parted down the middle, doubtless for the sake of distinction.

"I suppose you received my card," I said, "stating the purpose of my visit."

"Yes. You want to interview me, don't you? Well, now, you won't mind my friends here, will you?"

I bowed to the friends, who had arisen and who bowed also, but no names were mentioned. The one with the pointed beard resembled the Czar of Russia strikingly, but I hardly believe it was he. It is not always an easy task to interview one man, but three at once are disconcerting, especially when they all stand looking inquiringly at you, in a foreign language. The first painful step, however, once over, friends are distinctly an advantage; they keep matters from dragging and bring out phases of conversation that would otherwise remain unillumined. The object of the friend with the parted beard, I found, was to keep in the conversation at all costs, while the Emperor was content to listen.

"Well, now, ask your questions, and I'll reply," said M. Coppée.

"Well, monsieur, in regard to foreign authors in France, who are those most read to-day?"

This was a fortunate question, asked at haphazard, as it started an animated converstion which continued for half an hour without flagging. Two other callers had arrived in the meantime, one of them a Greek who spoke French fluently, and the other a monosyllabic young man with a silk hat and a monocle.

"Ah!" cried Monsieur Coppée, in answer to my question, "who are the foreign authors most read in France! Don't make any mistake about literary internationality—such a thing does not exist, has never existed, will never exist; it is an impossibility. It does not exist even among literary men. As for me, I am an ignoramus; I'll tell you that right at the start. I know no other language than French. But, after all, what does the effect of the few foreign books we read amount to? Besides, when books are translated, they are transformed. I read Byron and I say to myself, 'That is fine!' but how do I know whether I am admiring the same Byron that you admire? What do I know of his style? Nothing. But, to speak frankly, the French nation is, on the whole, not open to the literary influence of other countries; it has exerted much more influence on the outside world, I think, than the outside world has exerted on it. A while ago everything was Ibsen, but we have recovered bravely from that. I would not like to say that Ibsen has no talent, but we were told that he was a second Shakespeare. Well, we found out that he was not. If you want to know who was the second Shakespeare, I will tell you who it was—Balzac. There is a man who has created a world and peopled it with the children of his imagination, an entire world."

"We are just learning to appreciate him in America," I said, "but in that we have simply taken a lesson from the French themselves; they did not appreciate him during his lifetime."

This remark brought down a veritable storm upon my head, even the Emperor and the monosyllabic young man doing their part to swell the uproar.

"Ah!" cried Monsieur Coppée, "that shows how little you know about it! You should have seen us in our youth all trying to live after the manner of Balzac, trying to imitate him in everything. We were carried away by him; there was nobody but Balzac."

"That reminds me of an anecdote," insisted the man with the pointed beard, "that reminds me of an anecdote that will show you how popular Balzac is in France; I'll tell you my anecdote."

"All right, do so," said M. Coppée, "I'll go out into the other room."

Unfortunately the rest of us could not go out into the other room, and we were enlightened as to the impossibility of exchanging a complete set of Voltaire for a set of Balzac as experienced by the narrator. All of this, however, seemed but to go to prove the truth of my statement that the great "comedian" was not appreciated in France until after his death, as there was not one of those present who could remember previous to 1850.

After M. Coppée's return from the other room the conversation turned on Kipling, although it was some time before I was clear as to whom we were talking about. The pronunciation of foreign names in France is one of those phenomena which never cease to hold fresh surprises.

"What is your opinion of him?" I asked the Academician.

Digitized by Google

"Ah, c'est bien un homme de talent, there is no doubt of that; but there is something hard, something rough about him which I don't like. He is more a man of action than of books. As to his poetry, I can't judge, as I have not read any of it; I must take your word for that." Imagine "Gunga Dhin" in French!

The monosyllabic young man, it seems, had just read Quo Vadis, which, for some reason, has only recently made its appearance in French, and as but a straw is needed to turn the course of conversation, M. Coppée was led to a discussion of the story.

"Ah, yes, it is all very pretty, but it is not up to Cardinal Wiseman's Roman historical novel Fabiola, which everybody was reading thirty years ago. You are all too young to remember it, of course, and no one ever talks about it now, but it was far ahead of Quo Vadis. And then Châteaubriand—ah, they are not to be mentioned in the same breath! That's the way with these things, people forget that they have read the same story before. When a few years ago everybody was reading Dostoiewsky's Crime and Punishment and exclaiming at the beauty of the last scene, where Raskolinkow takes leave of Sonja, they forget how Jean Valjean had taken leave of Fantine, although it is exactly the same thing over again."

"I will send you a copy of my latest book," said M. Coppée at parting. "Is your address on your card?"

The book, of course, did not come, but I have since read this propaganda of Ultramontanism, and with the reading came the revelation of the calling for which the author was really intended: he should have been a priest. This is a new phase in his activity, but it is, I feel sure, only a belated exposition of a long latent tendency. I had imagined his countenance with the background of field and forest as the appropriate setting; I was mistaken, it is from the lectern or from the twilight of the confessional that it would be seen to the fullest advantage. He would be a popular confessor, I am sure.

Correspondence.

Life and Literature.

SIR,—Although Mr. Podmore expresses himself as agreeing so entirely with Stevenson's remarks, I fail to see in what particular this coincidence of opinion takes place. Decidedly not in Mr. Podmore's disparagement of the study of life as the chief business of the literary man. Stevenson merely said that life was not a place where dialogue and incident could be found ready-made—that is all. In no way does he deprecate the study of life. He simply points out what not to expect to find by such study. The purport of his remarks seems to be roughly this: All things are body and soul, or something analogous. Life itself is the inward thing or soul which is manifested in the world around by observable incidents and occurrences. Each soul takes to itself a body, fit and suitable for that soul alone:

> For of the soul, the body form doth take,
> For soul is form and doth the body make.

In a book, the thought, the insight, is the soul. Being a new thing, it must have a new body for its expression—no ready-made thing will do which has already served its purpose for some greater or lesser object. The elements of it may be found in the world around, but they are detached fragments, that must be moulded and welded, and fitted together bit by bit—everything superfluous or foreign being rejected, and everything that can do aught towards the furtherance of the author's purpose being pressed into service. Life itself is infinitely too complex, and its normal manifestations far too heterogeneous in nature, for any of them to be taken as they stand, and made to play the part of exhibiting the development of the single, simple aim which is the essential of any and every literary work.

This, so far as I can see, appears to be the expanded meaning of Stevenson's remarks. Of the study of life itself, apart from its being made the hunting-ground for incident and dialogue, he says nothing, but if we are to judge by his own work, by the careful and minute observation that characterises it, and, more than all, by his own concentrated habit of mind, we cannot fail to be led to this conclusion—that Stevenson, of all men, made his work a record of what he learnt from life by careful and unremitting study.—I am, etc.,

T. W. COLE.

21, Coleford-road, Wandsworth, S.W.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 98 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best Apology supposed to have been written by a dead author. We award the prize to the Rev. R. F. McCausland, Hawsker, Whitby, for the following:

SIR EDWER LYTTON (LORD LYTTON).

"Pelham," writes one of my gentle critics, Mr. Hepworth Dixon, "is a wonderfully clever novel of the superfine, kid-glove, and silver-fork school." Well, I wrote Pelham in 1828, and between that date and 1869 I published more than forty volumes. They were all popular, and, if I mistake not, some of them in the twentieth century have achieved the posthumous honour of a sixpenny edition. "Kid-glove and silver-fork school!" Possibly. C'était mon coin de la vie. I was hurt, however, when Alfred Tennyson called me "a bandbox"; but I would rather look like a bandbox than a dirty monk with a plebeian clay pipe.

Again, I notice Mr. George Brimley, in criticising My Novel, writes: "It is only the amusements, the pleasures, and the passions of the idle members of English society which Sir Bulwer-Lytton has ever succeeded in painting." Que voulez-vous, mes amis? Il faut cultiver mon jardin. That wag, Mr. Calverley, has recommended his pupils to > "Listen how Maltravers and the orphan forgat all but love,

> And how Devereux's family chaplain made and unmade kings."

Yes, I wrote, an aristocrat myself (pardon the egotism), of the aristocracy, with an occasional scoundrel like Paul Clifford or Eugene Aram. Thus I offered the world of readers a clever blend of my contemporaries Messrs. Benjamin Disraeli and Harrison Ainsworth. Many liked my spice of philosophy about the Real and Ideal (capital letters, please).

> "Who killed the girls and thrilled the boys
> With dandy pathos, when you wrote."

Come, Alfred, that is too bad! But, granted I did no more, I have secured my niche as novelist, dramatist, and poet—not seventh-rate (pace Mr. A. C. Swinburne)—in what you later writers call the Early Victorian period, but I, the Temple of Fame.

Other replies are as follows:

ISAAC WALTON ON THE "COMPLETE ANGLER."

A quip, which will pleasure some good body, that was lately told to our company by a worthy Prelate, did vastly divert some who heard it. The Bishop was examining some students, and asking one of them, "Who was the judicious Hooker?" he promptly did reply: "Isaac Walton."

As for myself I was no less diverted by this wittiness than glad to perceive that the memory of my treatise is not lost among men. Wherefore I am the more emboldened to execute what hath long been my design, and to add a posthumous epilogue to my discourse on fishing.

And none the least of my reasons hereof is, that most anglers do now rashly affirm, that by reason of the subtlety and greater wariness of trouts in this generation, my treatise is well-nigh obsolete, and its perusal shall serve rather for curiosity than for instruction.

That the twelve flies, to be used in fishing on the top, of Master Cotton have been more cunningly devised by the new host of artificers is quite plain: as also, that gut is more choice than hair to be set next the fly. But they, who prate of the education of fish in this age, do but weave a cloak for their unskilfulness, or strive to enhance the wonderment thereof, if peradventure they shall have captured some silly trout.

What if the more captious make exception of my natural history, yet let them not talk as though Master Cotton did not let his fly come sailing over some goodly fish, which he had espied feeding far up the stream, and oft did draw him to the net; erstwhile mocking my long line down stream.

Digitized by Google

Nor do I count it a defect that my book treateth not of the rearing and hatching of trout and salmon: yea more, I deem it not to pertain to the office of a sportsman to speak of the coddling and nursing of the quarry which he shall pursue.

In all humility we confess the imperfections of our treatise, but we thank all honest anglers, that they have done us the compliment to make all their dainty volumes of such sort, that they be but new-fangled commentaries upon the ancient scripture of the Complete Angler. [F. G. C., Hull.]

ELIA DEFENDS HIMSELF FROM THE CHARGE OF BEING DEAD.

GENTLEMEN,—How seldom doth it happen, as in the present trial of wits, that an author's being a dead man is accounted to be a special qualification! Rather is there rooted in the minds of most of you a highly reprehensible fallacy: the notion, to wit, that to be still alive is some natural ground for self-complacency in a man, whilst to be dead is to have sustained the very last affront of which humanity is capable.

I have no wish to pick a quarrel with the living (I dare wager there are still some excellent fellows left among you). But why should they who are still in the flesh go out of their way, as many do, to imply a rascally comparison between our state and their own? Why should even a numbskull, who was wont to stand tongue-tied before a genius when in life, mumble his name familiarly as "Poor such-a-one" the moment the breath, forsooth, has left his body? Believe me, I cannot, for a moment, conceive of myself as being referred to in such a fashion but it arouses my spleen.

Without being puffed up in vainglory because we exist no longer (I speak here on behalf of several of the defunct literary crew around me), we are far from admitting that, in arriving at a state in which there is complete immunity from rates and taxes, we have any reason to quarrel with our condition.

Having said thus much, I will not deny the presence of some malcontents among us. On my honour, gentlemen, I had not been incorporate an hour, myself, before encountering those who openly twitted me with having been reduced to their level.—Your humble servant, "ELIA."

[DELIA, Gateshead-on-Tyne.]

JANE AUSTEN.

GENTLEMEN,—Since I quitted the retired neighbourhood in which, near a century past, I wrote and gave to the public certain little stories of mine, I find my name is become exalted to a tolerable eminence in the world of letters. It may be supposed that not even an extra-mundane author can be altogether insensible of so flattering a fact, yet is my satisfaction incomplete: for I protest it is too much that you should unite in ascribing to me the monopoly of the sense of humour amongst female writers.

So unique a distinction I the less desire as I know it to be wholly undeserved.

I have never been censured for lacking high spirits, and should they have called forth your generous but too exclusive ascription of the faculty, upon them must rest my apology for your criticism.

It were perhaps a merit in a woman that she should have a fine sense of humour, but none that she should be its sole possessor among her sex: else might she indeed claim to be less the perfect woman than the mere monster.

Pray let me not be thought to be the latter.

The reason for your oft-repeated eulogium of one woman's humour may lie in some vague anxiety on your part to discharge your conscience for the general libel.

When on earth I ever found an exquisite satisfaction in the delicate perfume of wild flowers: but, one day chancing to visit a neighbouring hot-house, I was assured by the gardener that such perfumes had no existence.

Wherefore I am led to ask—if a woman's humour, by her very nature, be of a more delicate quality than is a man's, is that a reason for allowing it no being?—Your perplexed Friend, JANE AUSTEN.

[SAGITTARIUS, Gateshead-on-Tyne.]

EDWARD, LORD LYTTON, TO THE EDITOR OF THE "THRUSH."

In the "puff" of your forthcoming pages I see my own name distinguished by the adjective "great." A contemporary considers the epithet misplaced. I ask myself: Should I be concerned? The truly great is the Ennobling. The many romances which flowed from my pen were coloured, perhaps, by a too exuberant Fancy, and marred by the too lavish use of Capital Letters; my excursions into the Unseen too wild and daring. Still, the humours and tendernesses of domestic life; the glorious opportunities of the traveller, discerning alike natural scenery and Man; the elevating power of Truth and Virtue—these things were depicted with affection and, I trust, with sincerity. I never stooped to portray villainy that was not thoroughly dramatic, nor poverty devoid of Dignity and a feeling for the picturesque. The Exalted in Society were in my eye the Exalted in mind as well as station. Those less favoured by circumstances were trustful and devout. Can your present writers say the same? To them, calumniators alike of rich and poor, I would quote the words of my own Philosopher: "Humble yourselves, my descendants, for your father was a twat (tadpole). Exalt yourselves, my descendants, for it was the same Divine thought which created your father that develops itself in exalting you."

E. BULWER LYTTON.

[M. E. J., Chorley Wood.]

FRANCIS BACON—LORD VERULAM.

GOOD MASTER EDITOR,—I come not to make "apology"—my philosophy, my writings, give no occasion: they are my pride, my life, my honour. But now another man's honour hath been foisted on me by certain unwise enthusiasts, to my pain and indignation. Vainly have I entreated the ingenius Master Shakspere to hereby claim his own—he doth but laugh, and pass it lightly by. Therefore I, who did once administer justice in England, now ask justice for my friend, the glory of England. To him must be given the sole honour of his noble work: I had no part in his exalted imaginings. Strange that I, who banished imagination from the study of Nature, am now declared the most imaginative poet of my time, and the most secret of all time.

He who hath done me this disservice (Passimum genus inimicorum hominum), Ignatius Donnelly, the foolish discoverer of a cryptogram that never existed, lately passed over to us. He craved speech of me—but I would none of him. He hath done me but a scurvy turn. Did ever man utter such nonsense as he hath credited me with, clumsily and foolishly enwrapped?

Here, we have but one language, Truth: and we know ourselves. Could I have written worthy Master Shakspere's plays? Read but my Essay on Love (I lost a rich wife by it—she liked not my view), could the man who wrote that essay have written "Romeo and Juilet," "Venus and Adonis," or any of that passionate poet's works? Never. But this wisdom at least have I—not to prank myself in another man's honour, having, God be thanked, enough of mine own. Suum cuique: let the Shakspere we love own the works that we love—they are his and his only.

FRANC, St. Albans, Canc.

[W. S. B., Blackheath.]

THE APOLOGY OF R. L. S.

My apology is many-sided. Here is one facet of it. A young fellow, loving me, though he had never seen me, subscribed to my Edinburgh Edition. The furnishing for his monthly visit to the bookseller spelt many a scanty meal, many a suspicion earned and expressed of a mean and miserly temper in him, yet his shelves gathered one by one my poor works. With a lovable rashness he married, and the little home was opulent in love, and in little else. Then I died, and those who had never loved me, but scented profit in my passing, avidly grasped the circumstance, and the edition doubled in value. Then, too, did sickness and illhap strike the new-made home. My volumes were there, and fifteen pounds profit might have been made for the asking for the damned stuff, yet, without a word between the two, it was an article of their faith, as perfectly shared as their love, that aught else in the little house should go before the books. And other treasures, dear to the heart of a young housewife, did go, and two of the six rooms were sorely stripped. But I remained, and they ate little and loved much; and, after the day's work, first hard against the window to save the oil, and then by lamplight, the boy read to the girl of the Sire de Maletroit's door, and of the night with Villon, and of Prince Otto and his Princess, and of that little beast Huish, and all the rest of the sorry trash. And they were happy.

To the devil with apologies. This one facet is a justification.

[W. B.]

Competition No. 99 (New Series).

We offer a prize of One Guinea for the best verses, not exceeding sixteen lines, entitled Sea Birds.

RULES.

Answers, addressed, "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, August 14. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon: otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

Special cloth cases for binding the half-yearly volume of the ACADEMY can be supplied for 1*s. each. The price of the bound half-yearly volume is* 8*s.* 9*d. Communications should be addressed to the Publisher,* 43, Chancery-lane.

Digitized by Google

Mr. WILLIAM HEINEMANN begs to announce that HALL CAINE'S New Novel, THE ETERNAL CITY, will be ready on Wednesday, August 21st, at all Libraries, Booksellers', and Bookstalls, in 1 vol., crown 8vo, price 6s., uniform with "The Christian," "The Manxman," "The Scapegoat," and "The Bondman." First English Edition of 100,000 copies.

NEW NOVELS FOR SUMMER READING.—Six Shillings each.

MAXWELL GRAY'S NEW NOVEL.
FOUR-LEAVED CLOVER.

MENIE MURIEL DOWIE.
LOVE AND HIS MASK.
ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.—"Amid the ocean of commonplace it is something to be more than usually thankful for to come across a book so refreshingly strong, original, thoughtful, and artistic. There is not a disagreeable character, nor a dishonourable action."

E. F. BENSON, Author of "Dodo."
THE LUCK OF THE VAILS.
SPECTATOR.—"Delightfully easy holiday reading.....calculated to give a proper Christmas thrill on the hottest afternoon."

MATILDE SERAO, Author of "Fantasy."
THE LAND OF COCKAYNE.
SPECTATOR.—"A great novel."

FRANCES HARROD (Frances Forbes-Robertson).
THE HIDDEN MODEL.
LITERATURE.—"A remarkably original and powerful story.....one of the most original and interesting books of the year."

JOSEPH CONRAD and F. M HUEFFER.
THE INHERITORS.
ATHENÆUM.—"A remarkable piece of work, possessing qualifications which before now have made a work of fiction the sensation of its year..... Exquisite keenness of style and a large fantastic daring in scheme."

E. L. VOYNICH, Author of "The Gadfly."
JACK RAYMOND.
PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"The strongest novel the season has produced."

DOROTHEA GERARD'S NEW NOVEL.
SAWDUST.
GRAPHIC.—"Exceptionally strong and brilliant."

JAMES PRIOR.
FOREST FOLK.
ATHENÆUM.—"An excellent performance. The people are such forest folk as we are little likely to forget."

BASIL MARNAN.
A DAUGHTER OF THE VELDT.
MORNING POST.—"Strong, clever, and striking."

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW,
For AUGUST 15th. price Half-a-Crown, contains:
THE WORLD'S NATIONAL INDEBTEDNESS. By O. P. AUSTIN.
HOW TRADE UNIONISM AFFECTS BRITISH INDUSTRIES. By BENJAMIN TAYLOR.
LIFE IN THE SEA. By Dr. C. M. BLACKFORD, Jun.
AND OTHER ARTICLES.

MR. HEINEMANN'S LIST ON APPLICATION. Any bound book in this List will be sent on approval on naming the nearest Bookseller through whom it may be sent.

LONDON: WM. HEINEMANN, 21, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!
6s., claret roan, gilt, Illustrated.
LONDON IN THE TIME OF THE DIAMOND JUBILEE.
London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.
Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.
Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING, A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST. THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.
THE NORFOLK BROADS. THE ISLE OF WIGHT.
BRECON and its BEACONS. THE WYE VALLEY.
ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW. THE SEVERN VALLEY.
BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.
BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.
LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR, LLANFAIRFECHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON.
ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.
CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, & FESTINIOG.
BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and PWLLHELI.
MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, & CHELTENHAM.
LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.
NORWICH, LOWESTOFT, YARMOUTH, and the NORFOLK BROADS.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.
"It very emphatically tops them all."—Daily Graphic.
"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 5s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.
LONDON AND ENVIRONS
By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.
With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.
London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT, & Co. Ltd., The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers.
Paris and New York: BRETANO'S.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY
(LIMITED).

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST
ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per annum.
LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.
COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum.
N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.
Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS
NOW OFFERED AT
GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)
Sent Gratis and post free to any address.
The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET;
241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C., LONDON:
And at Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

ADVERTISEMENTS (Select Trade) for the COVER PAGES of the ACADEMY should be sent not later than Noon on Thursday to 43, Chancery Lane. Terms, &c., on Application.

Digitized by Google

F. V. WHITE & CO.'S LIST.

Now ready, price 5s.

GUY BOOTHBY'S NEW NOVEL.

A MILLIONAIRE'S LOVE-STORY.

With Illustrations by E. FAIRHURST.

NEW & POPULAR NOVELS

Price 6s. each.

THE MAJOR-GENERAL:
A Story of Modern Florence.
By MONTGOMERY CARMICHAEL.

THE KING'S SECRET.
By RICHARD HENRY SAVAGE.

A HOUSE WITH A HISTORY.
By FLORENCE WARDEN.

MOSTLY FOOLS AND A DUCHESS.
By LUCAS CLEEVE.

DOL. SHACKFIELD.
By HEBER K. DANIELS.

Several thousands of this Novel have already been sold in America, where it is most popular.

AN UNCONGENIAL MARRIAGE.
By COSMO CLARKE.

F. V. WHITE & CO., LTD.,
14, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

NOW READY.

Was Alfred King of England?

By A SAXON.

Demy 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

A brief review of one of our latest text-books, showing the true relations of Prince Alfred both to the Saxon people in England and to her Roman invaders.

HARRISON & SONS, Publishers, 59, Pall Mall, S.W.

MR. EPICTETUS, JUN., HIS BOOK.

Wherein is set forth a Common-Sense Philosophy for the Conduct of Life.
Specially Written for Unsophisticated and Simple-minded Folk, and for those who ignore every form of Conventional Religion.
A Theme for the Twentieth Century and until the Millennium shall Dawn.
By BENJAMIN WALKER.
Now ready, cloth, price 3s. 6d., post free.
JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate and Ridgefield, Manchester.
London: 29 and 30, Shoe Lane, E.C.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

"THINGS THAT ARE MADE." Devotional Meditations in the Haunts of Nature. By Rev. A. J. BAMFORD, B.A., of Royton.

Now Ready, Second Edition, crown 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d., post free.

THE CHARTER of the CHURCH. Lectures on the Principle of Nonconformity. By P. T. FORSYTH, M.A., D.D.

"Explains the position of religious dissent with great force and eloquence."—Manchester Guardian.

London: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, LTD., 21 and 22, Furnival, Street, E.C.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS TO "THE ACADEMY,"

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE OLDEST AND BEST (1901 EDITION).

DEBRETT'S PEERAGE.
DEBRETT'S BARONETAGE.
DEBRETT'S KNIGHTAGE.
DEBRETT'S COMPANIONAGE.

(Illustrated and increased to 1,950 pp.)

Including all recent Honours and an Appendix of Royal Warrant Holders.

Royal Edition, complete work, 31s. 6d., cloth gilt; or Library Edition, 2 vols., 16s. 6d. each.

ALSO

DEBRETT'S HOUSE OF COMMONS AND THE JUDICIAL BENCH.

(Illustrated. 450 pp.)

Gives particulars of results at last two General Elections and at all Bye-Elections, Biographies of M.P.'s, Judges of High Courts, County Courts and Colonies, Recorders, &c, &c. Cloth gilt, 7s. 6d.

DEAN & SON, LIMITED, 160A, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

'Twixt Plate and Lip;

OR,

The Common Sense of Eating.

A HEALTH HAND-BOOK FOR EVERY DAY,

WITH SPECIAL ADVICE AS TO DIET AND REGIMEN IN HEALTH AND SICKNESS,

A POPULAR SUMMARY OF THE SYMPTOMS OF DYSPEPSIA AND INDIGESTION,

AND A NOTE ON THE SCIENTIFIC AND RATIONAL TREATMENT OF THOSE AILMENTS.

12th EDITION.

 This little book may be recommended to the general reader as a sound and safe guide to the common sense management of the stomach. The Publishers, at 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, will be pleased to send a free copy to any reader of the Academy. Early application necessary.

LONDON:
46, HOLBORN VIADUCT, E.C.

Chatto & Windus's Popular Novels

THE LATE SIR WALTER BESANT'S NEW NOVEL.

Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

THE LADY of LYNN. By Sir WALTER BESANT, Author of "The Orange Girl," &c. With 12 Illustrations by G. Demain-Hammond.

"A characteristic legacy of brisk incident and breezy philosophy."—Spectator.

"The old-world characters which the unflagging mind of Sir Walter Besant delighted to depict are here to be found at their best."—Sketch.

"Dramatic and highly successful..... Second only to 'The Chaplain of the Fleet.'"—World.

"A very clever and ingenious piece of intrigue."
Daily Chronicle.

M. ZOLA'S COLLECTED STORIES.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE HONOUR of the ARMY, &c. By EMILE ZOLA. Edited by ERNEST A. VIZETELLY.

"To many readers M. Zola's new volume will be at once a revelation and a delight. We have been accustomed to imagine the great French novelist as a prophet who hurls fiery denunciations at his foes..... a psychologist rather than a realist; and now he stands revealed as a humorist of the first order..... The story which gives its title to the volume is as impressive a piece of work as we have met with for some time. But 'Nantas' is our favourite. It is a story of extraordinary power and subtlety.—New Age.

FOURTH EDITION JUST READY OF MAX O'RELL'S NEW BOOK.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

HER ROYAL HIGHNESS WOMAN. By MAX O'RELL.

"A pleasant book, light, bright, even frothy; but by no means to be characterised as shallow."
Illustrated London News.

"Amusing and genial."—Punch.

"One of the brightest and wittiest books on woman. Will be enjoyed by everyone."—Woman.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

A FORBIDDEN NAME. A Story of the Court of Catherine the Great. By FRED. WHISHAW.

"The novel is one of notable merit."—Scotsman.

WILDERSMOOR. By C. L. Antrobus, Author of "Quality Corner." SECOND EDITION.

"Rarely excellent."—World.

A SORE TEMPTATION. By John K. LEYS.

"Might almost figure as a model for story-writers..... The interest never droops."—Daily Express.

THE MILLIONAIRE MYSTERY. By FERGUS HUME, Author of "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab," &c.

"Will be welcome to the author's large circle of readers and admirers."—Vanity Fair.

THIS TROUBLESOME WORLD. By L. T. MEADE and CLIFFORD HALIFAX, M.D. SECOND EDITION.

"Full of sparkling dialogue and stirring scenes."
Lady.

MONONIA: a Love Story. By JUSTIN McCARTHY, Author of "Dear Lady Disdain," &c.

"Mononia is a most attractive character, whose love affair invests an historical tale with pathos and romance."—Weekly Register.

RUNNING AMOK. A Story of Adventure. By GEO. MANVILLE FENN, Author of "A Crimson Crime," &c.

"An exciting story, well told."—Daily Mail.

HER LADYSHIP'S SECRET. By WILLIAM WESTALL, Author of "With the Red Eagle," &c.

"Mr. Westall's excellent story."—Spectator.

NEW THREE-AND-SIXPENNY BOOKS.

CHAPENGA'S WHITE MAN. By A. WERNER.

TOLD by the TAFFRAIL. By SUNDOWNER.

"Clever little impressions, full of keen observation."
Morning Leader.

WORK. By Emile Zola. Translated by ERNEST A. VIZETELLY.

"It is a powerful and impressive work."—Scotsman.

DEACON BRODIE. By Dick DONOVAN.

"The book is a most interesting one, and will be eagerly read from its opening to the close of the villainous hero's career."—Lloyd's News.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

Digitized by Google

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No 1528. Established 1869. 17 August, 1901. Price Threepence.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

We have received the following appeal in favour of a public memorial to the late Mr. Robert Buchanan—it is signed by the Rev. Thomas Varney, of Southend, where Buchanan spent several years of his life, and Mr. Coulson Kernahan:

> It has been suggested to us that the residents of this town would be pleased to see steps taken towards a public memorial to so distinguished a man, and we have good reason to believe that such a movement would meet with a generous response. But, sir, it seems to us that in the case of a poet of such eminence as Robert Buchanan a memorial of this sort should not be confined to any particular town.
>
> Will you therefore favour us by inserting this letter, and by allowing us to say that the Mayor of Southend-on-Sea (J. Francis, Esq., J.P., Wilson-road, Southend-on-Sea) has kindly consented to act as treasurer, and any contributions forwarded to him will be duly acknowledged in the public press?
>
> We should like to add that this letter has the approval of Mr. Buchanan's relatives, who hope, however, that the response will be marked, not by the extent of the amount subscribed, but by the number of subscribers. They venture to suggest, therefore, that subscriptions be limited to a comparatively small sum, so that Mr. Buchanan's humble admirers (of whom there are many) may not hesitate to contribute their mite.

The well-known author of the famous book, Siberia and the Exile System, Mr. George Kennan, who so freely and adversely criticised the methods of the Russian authorities, entered Russia through Finland about a fortnight ago. He assumed that, as several years have passed since the book was published, and a new set of officials has sprung up, he would be unmolested; but on Friday he was visited at the Hôtel d'Angleterre by a detective, who told him that he must consider himself under arrest in his room for the day, and then in the evening conducted him to the railway station, whence he was sent across the frontier. It is thought that an article with reference to him which appeared the other day in the Paris edition of the New York Herald accounts for the attention paid to him by the Government. In the article it was stated that it was audacity on Mr. Kennan's part to go to Russia, and surprise was expressed at his being allowed to remain there after the exposures in his book, which has been translated into several European languages.

Am Bàrd, which has for subsidiary title Ar Tir agus ar Teanga, is the latest born of magazines, and is devoted to Gaelic. It is not all Gaelic, however:

> With this number of Am Bàrd the youthful Cuchulain—fortissimus heros Scotorum—enters upon the second day of his life. His birth, as we have said, was difficult, and not unaccompanied by danger to the infant hero; but the morrow finds him refreshed and strengthened indeed. Following the precedent established by his illustrious ancestor, he has already begun to work miracles, rising irresistibly from his cradle and crushing under his thigh the heads of two saucy clò-bhuailtean that were brought him to play with. However, like the magnanimous nephew of King Conor, he is not given to boasting.

This masterful babe has our good wishes.

Mr. W. P. James pertinently points out that the "true story" of the publication of John Inglesant given by Mr. Linnell to the Athenæum a fortnight ago, directly contradicts the oft-repeated story that the book was rejected by James Payn as "reader" for Messrs. Smith, Elder. Mr. Linnell expressly stated: "The MS. was never sent to any publisher." It is known, however, that Mr. Linnell advised Mr. Shorthouse to send a copy of the book to Messrs. Smith, Elder. Perhaps this privately printed copy was regarded by the firm as an offer of the book for publication; but Mr. Linnell, who knows all the facts, will doubtless furnish an exact explanation.

A young writer of promise who hopes to hit the public taste with a novel is in these days provided with a kind of Morris tube, represented by the small committee of taste before whom his advance sheets come. "Those who have read the advance sheets" is the now familiar designation of the said committee, which may be taken to consist of the publisher, at least two readers, a wife or two, and half-a-dozen people who had no claim to see the MS., and are sworn to secrecy. Be this as it may, "O.O." of the Sketch, writes: "I hear great things of a novel, The Potter and the Clay, which is to be issued in the autumn. The author is a girl just out of her teens, but those who have read the advance sheets of her first book are confident that it will create something of a sensation. It is a romance of military life in India, and tells of the magnificent struggle of a young officer between love and honour."

The same literary gossiper tells an amusing story in connection with the dispute between Messrs. Pearson and Mr. Hall Caine, whose novel, The Eternal City, has been issued this week. A resident in the island gave a Douglas bookseller an order to send him the Lady's Magazine for twelve months. He now refuses to pay for the subscription, as he contends he ordered the magazine solely to read The Eternal City, and that when the story was stopped the Lady's Magazine was not according to its original promise and prospectus. The bookseller is suing for the amount of the subscription, and the case is to be most vigorously defended.

From Messrs. Newnes comes the announcement of a new quarterly publication, to be entitled The Ideal. Each issue is to contain forty pages of text, and a number of illustrations produced in as perfect a manner as possible, including not less than eight full-page etchings, photogravures, and mezzotints. Where it appears desirable, the illustrations will be reproduced in colour, and the letterpress is to be printed on hand-made paper. Sumptuousness appears to be the aim of the publishers, both in matter and price. The latter is fixed at thirty-eight guineas for the four parts, or ten guineas for a single part.

Digitized by Google

THE Linen Hall Library, Belfast, has lately received from Mrs. Burns Thomas a number of books and pictures relating to her great-grandfather, Robert Burns. Among them is a volume of pamphlets, which belonged to the poet, containing documents on the relations between the Scottish Parliament and Charles I., published in Edinburgh in 1640; an addition of Smectymnuus, printed in Edinburgh in 1708, etc. Another interesting book is A Manual of Religious Belief, written by William Burns, the poet's father, for the instruction of his children. Another is the Bible of Mrs. Everitt, the donor's mother, presented to her by her grand-uncle, Robert Armour, the brother of "Bonnie Jean." Among the pictures are an engraving of the original portrait of Burns, by Nasmyth, in the National Gallery of Scotland, and an engraving by Bengo of a picture of Burns by Hahnisch. In addition to this gift, the library possesses a valuable collection of books, pamphlets, and pictures, acquired a short time ago from Mr. Andrew Gibson, the well-known authority on Burns literature.

THE letter issued from the Works Department of the Town Hall, at Westminster, to the second-hand booksellers in Charing Cross-road, comes at a moment when we have to deplore the final closing of Holywell-street. Here is the text of the note:

> SIR,—I am directed by the City Council to call attention to the projecting shelves placed outside your premises, illegally, and to the obstruction of the public way; and to require the removal of the projections.—Your obedient servant, JOHN HUNT, Town Clerk.

There has naturally been a general outcry, both on the part of booksellers and bookbuyers against what appears to be an arbitrary and foolish regulation; a regulation which we believe, however, will never be put in force. We cannot conceive how the narrow tasting-shelves of literature in the Charing Cross-road can be described as an obstruction. The thoroughfare is wide, and not by any means overwhelmed with traffic; furthermore, the right to have these shelves constitutes part of the value of the premises, and to abolish them thus summarily would be to injure seriously a particular and most innocent trade. It would, indeed, be bad public policy to do away with what may be regarded as an inexpensive aid to the Education Department. Are we no longer to see Lamb's "poor gentry, who, not having wherewithal to buy or hire a book, filch a little learning at the open stalls"? There are many other matters, which constitute real abuses, to which the Works Department might profitably devote attention.

IN a note in the British Weekly, on a new translation of Salammbô, Ian Maclaren says: "It seems, indeed, impossible for any novelist to interest his readers in life long ago, for however much we appreciate the accuracy of the staging, we are always outside the characters." This, if it were true, were a hard saying, but is it true? The changelessness of human nature is the theme of novelists, and whether the subject be the revolt of the Carthaginian mercenaries, in the third century B.C., or a revolt of paid workers to-day, the essentials remain the same. If the writer fails, it is because his grip of life is weak, or he overlays his work with wearisome detail. Mr. Ian Maclaren's remarks, for a countryman of Scott, strike us as particularly unfortunate.

IN a recent issue of the Daily News, Mr. G. K. Chesterton has an admirable and timely article on "The Position of Sir Walter Scott." Mr. Chesterton is a critic to be reckoned with; he has the broad outlook which is so necessary, yet so rare, as well as the fine simplicity which sees to the core of things. He contends that if Scott is neglected to-day, it can only be because modern readers have lost touch with the true spirit of romance:

> Walter Scott is a great, and, therefore, mysterious man. He will never be understood until Romance is understood, and that will be only when Time, Man, and Eternity are understood. To say that Scott had more than any other man who ever lived a sense of the romantic seems, in these days, a slight and superficial tribute. The whole modern theory arises from one fundamental mistake—the idea that romance is in some way a playing with life, a figment, a conventionality, a thing upon the outside. No genuine criticism of romance will ever arise until we have grasped the fact that romance lies not upon the outside of life, but absolutely in the centre of it. The centre of every man's existence is a dream. Death, disease, insanity, are merely material accidents, like toothache or a twisted ankle. That these brutal forces always besiege and often capture the citadel does not prove that they are the citadel. The boast of the realist (applying what the reviewers call his scalpel) is that he cuts into the heart of life; but he makes a very shallow incision if he only reaches as deep as habits and calamities and sins. Deeper than all these lies a man's vision of himself, as swaggering and sentimental as a penny novelette.

SCOTT did not pile incident upon incident, he gave time for the blood to dry upon the sword; "the deeper presence of romance is far better felt when the sword is at the hip, ready for innumerable adventures, too tremendous to be pictured." And again: "Romance, indeed, does not consist by any means so much in experiencing adventures as in being ready for them." That, it seems to us, is perfectly true, and also the following:

> There is one quality which is supreme and continuous in Scott which is little appreciated at present. One of the values we have really lost in recent fiction is the value of eloquence. The modern literary artist is compounded of almost every man except the orator. Yet Shakespeare and Scott are certainly alike in this—that they could both, if literature had failed, have earned a living as professional demagogues. The feudal heroes in the "Waverley Novels" retort upon each other with a passionate dignity, haughty, and yet singularly human, which can hardly be paralleled in political eloquence except in Julius Cæsar. With a certain fiery impartiality which stirs the blood, Scott distributes his noble orations equally among saints and villains. He may deny a villain every virtue or triumph, but he cannot endure to deny him a telling word; he will ruin a man, but he will not silence him. In truth, one of Scott's most splendid traits is his difficulty—or, rather, incapacity—for despising any of his characters. He did not scorn the most revolting miscreant as the realist of to-day commonly scorns his own hero. Though his soul may be in rags, every man of Scott can speak like a king.

Mr. Chesterton's appreciation by no means blinds him to Scott's faults; he admits him to be "an unequal and chaotic writer," but his immeasurable zest and vitality carry him into the very strongholds of romance.

MR. CHARLES WHIBLEY gave us a Book of Scoundrels five years ago. Mr. Max Beerbohm has now written a Book of Rascals. There seems to be no opportunity of splitting hairs about these semi-synonyms, for we are told that this book of Rascals is "a series of sketches of famous scoundrels, from Jonathan Wild to the Tichborne Claimant."

THE revolt against the use of advertisements in literature seems to be making headway in America. The New York Nation has a scathing article on the subject, entitled, "Every Author His Own Press Agent." After pointing out that the author is nearly as much to blame as the publisher for the undignified methods now used to catch the eye of the reading public, the Nation traces the history of the change very amusingly:

Digitized by Google

> The change in the attitude of the author is illustrated by a little incident which occured in London in 1858—a prehistoric age, as far as the art of advertising is concerned. Edmund Yates then wrote, for a periodical called Town Talk, a short account of Thackeray's personal appearance and his literary successes. To be sure, the sketch was not wholly flattering, but so much the better, for no one could then accuse it of being simply a puff. What was Thackeray's proper course under the circumstances? No enlightened man in this year of grace 1901 will hesitate for a moment to say that he should have clipped the article and sent it with his own photograph to his publishers, Bradbury and Evans. They should have ordered immediately five hundred proof-slips and mailed one to each newspaper in the United Kingdom, with some such circular as this:
>
> "Dear Sir,—Since we advertise freely in your columns, you will probably wish to reprint in whole or in part, with proper credit to Town Talk, the enclosed sketch of Mr. Thackeray, whose popular novel, The Virginians, we are now publishing in monthly parts at 1s. each. The sale of this work is, as you doubtless know, absolutely unprecedented in the book trade. If you can use a cut we shall be happy to send you, carriage prepaid, an excellent electrotype portrait of Mr. Thackeray. [Was this before the days of electrotypes?] Trusting you will do your best for us, and will send us a marked copy, we remain, your obedient servants,
>
> "Bradbury and Evans.'
>
> Incredible as it may seem, however, nothing of the kind happened. Thackeray did not even offer Mr. Yates an autograph copy of The Newcomes. Instead, he demanded that Mr. Yates should apologise for printing facts about the colour of his hair and his manner of speech, learned in the privacy of the Garrick Club, of which both were members. Evidently Thackeray was labouring under the delusion that an author is a member of a learned profession, bound by some such fantastic code as that of reputable doctors and lawyers. It is conceivable that if he had seen on every bill-board the legend, "Read The Virginians! A Great Historical Novel! Incidents of the French and Indian War! Brilliant Characterisation of George Washington!" he would have felt as horrified as the President of the New York Academy of Medicine if he saw his name on a poster in every street-car with the advice, "Go to Dr. —— for Appendicitis! Operations While You Wait!" But we have left Thackeray's benighted notions far behind us.

Mr. T. Edwards Jones writes from Ipswich: "The following I take from my common-place book, written eighteen years ago, and I should be happy to find it was even now the means of sending further readers to Bailey's 'Festus,' which recently has been written of so much":

> Helen: Our life is comely as a whole; nay, more,
> Like rich brown ringlets, odd hairs all gold.
> We women have four seasons, like the year.
> Our spring is in our lightsome girlish days,
> When the heart laughs within us for sheer joy;
> Ere yet we know what love is or the ill
> Of being loved by those whom we love not.
> Summer is when we love and are beloved,
> And seems short; from its very splendour seems
> To pass the quickest; crowned with flowers it flies.
> Autumn, when some young thing with tiny hands,
> And rosy cheeks, and flossy tendrilled locks,
> Is wantoning about us day and night.
> And winter is when those we love have perished;
> For the heart ices then. And the next spring
> Is in another world, if one there be.
> Some miss one season, some another; this > Shall have them early, and that late; and yet
> The year wear round with all as best it may.
> There is no rule for it; but in the main
> It is as I have said.

We are accustomed to think that the modern book is very well designed and manufactured, but librarians think otherwise. A leading organ of the profession says:

> It is high time that something was said and something done, if possible, to bring home to publishers the discreditable get-up of many modern works. . . . Cheap books, of course, cannot be expected to be other than cheap and shoddy in these particulars, however artistic and fair their outer presentment may be; though, strange to say, some of the really cheap books are wonderfully tough, and stand handling well. But when one pays six shillings for a novel it seems to us not unreasonable that the book should be expected to hold together for, let us say, half-a-dozen perusals at least. Judged by this surely not wildly extravagant standard of durability, a great number of books at and about this price will be found wanting. But when really expensive works, ranging in cost from fifteen shillings to pounds, are issued in this shoddy manner, we feel that, as librarians, we are justly entitled to complain. Our readers will be able to recall many recent examples of the kind of thing we refer to, in all classes of literature, but we have specially in mind some of the fine-art monographs that have been issued from the press during the last two or three years. Apart from the bad stitching, and the fact that a heavy volume is attached to its case by mull and paper alone, the valuable plates—always a source of weakness—are innocent of guards, and, worse than all, the paper is all "surface," with no wear in it. This means that the book—which has, perhaps, cost three, four, or even five guineas—has to be rebound or recased before it is good for anything, which entails not only extra expense, but an irritating delay, before it can be put into circulation. And the badness of the paper is, of course, irremediable.

Even in America they are finding out the emptiness of the Omar Khayyam craze. Our readers would hardly believe the lengths to which it has been carried in the States. We have not seen the volume (The Rubaiyat, H. O. Sheppard, Chicago), to which the following abbreviated remarks, from the pen of Mr. Edgar Saltus, in the New York Journal's literary supplement, refer; but the free-and-easiness of his language is open to reproval:

> There is a malady known to pathologists as epilepsy of the epiglottis. We have symptoms of this complaint every time a new version of the Rubaiyat appears. We had a touch of it when the first dishwater was produced. We suffered at the spectacle of the succeeding slabs of veal and now nausea overcomes us again, for here is more drivel on an altar which should be sacred to every poetaster, however cheap.
>
> The present sacrilege, an anonymous Chicago production, deserves every kind of reception except perusal. From the mawkishness of the binding on through the abomination of its letterpress down to the petty misdemeanor of its illustrations it constitutes our beau idéal of what bad taste should be.
>
> But it will have its uses. Though just what it would not be honest to state.
>
> Last year or the year before a patient plodder produced an historical novel. The wretched book took. Now we are all so swamped by similar rubbish that History herself has become a horror.
>
> Prophesying along these lines, it is easy to foresee that, in view of the Rubaiyat inundation, sooner or later FitzGerald will be hated for having turned a dead bard into a noxious fad.
>
> "Save Goodness only," sang Omar, "there is nothing good." And what goodness could he or anyone possessed of as much taste as would fit on the head of a pin find in the present dilution or in the brew of the scavengers that have preceded it?
>
> When verse is not impeccable it has no excuse for being. It is true that as verse goes the original itself is not first chop. Sense it contains and profound philosophy with it, but you must fumble for the plums through layers of platitude.
>
> But here is the gist of it all. Those plums FitzGerald took and through a wizardry of his own turned into jewels. He did better by Omar than Omar did for himself.
>
> Though Prof. Cowell got to the grave before him, it was he who resurrected the corpse, revamped it, tore the shroud of platitudes aside and set the Tentmaker's tent with colours which it never knew.

Digitized by Google

The necromancy of the performance was applauded by all the world. And now to what base uses the grave has come this latest of its many defilements shows.

Obviously if this sort of thing is to continue the day is not distant when the Rubaiyat will be in letters what the "Carnival de Venise" is in music—a gem lost in the mire of its various and villainous variations.

Mr. Saltus is quite right. We will overlook his ink-slinging excesses.

The Shanklin Gazette prints an article by Dr. Dabbs, in which he comments on the "unconscious poetry" which is to be found in certain classic novels. He selects, in illustration of this, a passage from Barnaby Rudge, which, spaced as blank verse, runs thus:

He raised
His head; gazed upward at the quiet sky,
Which seemed to smile upon the earth in sadness,
As if the night, more thoughtful than the day,
Looked down in sorrow on the sufferings
And evil deeds of men; and felt its peace
Sink deep into his heart. He, a poor idiot,
Caged in his narrow cell, was as much lifted
Up to God, while gazing on that wild
Light, as the freest and most favoured man
In all the spacious city; and in his ill-
Remembered prayer, and in the fragment of
The childish hymn, with which he sung and crooned
Himself asleep, there breathed as true a spirit
As ever studied homily expressed,
Or old cathedral arches echoed.

Dickens, in this respect, was certainly a great sinner; the passage could be paralleled from almost any of the novels, particularly the later ones. His sentimental passages often have a tendency to slip into metre; one has only to read him aloud to become rather painfully aware of this. As to the unconsciousness of the mannerism, we are not so sure. Was Blackmore unconscious of it in Lorna Doone? It is certainly a blot upon an otherwise almost perfect book.

Bibliographical.

We are told that Mr. Henley's forthcoming volume of poems is to include his epilogues to "Beau Austin" and "Admiral Guinea." I was not aware that he had written anything of the kind. He did, indeed, pen a prologue to "Beau Austin," which is printed along with the text of the play. There has been rather a revival of the prologue and epilogue of late years. Mr. Swinburne, it will be remembered, wrote a couple of prologues for performances of the Elizabethan Stage Society ("Dr. Faustus" and "The Spanish Gipsy"); Mr. Watts-Dunton wrote an epilogue for an open-air representation of Banville's "Le Baiser"; and there are other modern instances which I cannot recall at this moment. It is not likely, however, that the revival will last. Present-day audiences are too impatient to tolerate either prologue or epilogue; they are in a hurry to see the curtain rise, and equally in a hurry to get away even before the curtain falls. A collection of the best prologues and epilogues in the language would be an interesting work. Who will compile it? Meanwhile, there is a little book on the history of the subject which the author (if he be alive) might well reprint. It is very readable.

Mr. Fraser Rae's projected edition of the plays of Sheridan will be welcome in so far as it is, I understand, to be based on the author's MSS. (or prompt-books?). One would certainly like to have a text which we could be sure Sheridan accepted as the right one. Otherwise, there are editions of the plays galore. There was one quite recently in the Macmillan "English Classics" series—a careful reproduction of the best of the early editions. That ought to satisfy most people. But, in truth, during the last ten or eleven years, Sheridan's plays have been much exploited. Messrs. Chatto issued them in 1890. In 1891 they engaged the active attention of Messrs. Ward and Lock, Walter Scott, and Gibbings. Messrs. Routledge reprinted them in 1892. Then, in 1897, came a reprint of a compact edition of the Works which Messrs. Chatto had published originally in 1874. This is excellently adapted for the general reader.

The name of "Max Adeler" is not nearly so well known in England as that of "Mark Twain," but there was a time when his books sold over here freely. In the late 'seventies and early 'eighties there were many English editions of his Old Fogey, his Elbow Room, his Out of the Hurly Burly, his Random Shots, his Transformations, and so forth. In 1898 there were new editions of the Elbow Room and the Hurly Burly, while last year there were reprints of the Hurly Burly and the Random Shots. This would seem to suggest that he still has a public in England, though probably not so large a one as when he first appealed to English readers. The taste for American humour seems to have gone off somewhat; we raise our own "humourists" now.

Among Messrs. Macmillan's announcements is one of a new translation of poems by Victor Hugo. This, if well done, should be a benefaction for those who cannot read the poems in the original. Not much of Hugo's verse is accessible in English. Fragments from his Legends and Lyrics appeared in 1894, but that was all in the 'nineties. In the 'eighties we had the versions by Dean Carrington (1885), and Selections, Chiefly Lyrical, Translated by Various Authors (1885 also). All of these left the field open for something more comprehensive and satisfactory. Messrs. Macmillan announce, further, a new edition of the Works of Goldsmith and a new translation of The Thoughts of Marcus Aurelius, neither of which appears to be imperatively called for, seeing how often Goldsmith has been edited and Marcus Aurelius translated of late years.

I see that Messrs. Chatto and Windus announce a new novel by Mrs. B. M. Croker, called The Catspaw, and a new book of short stories by Mr. G. R. Sims, entitled The Blind Marriage, &c. Each of these books illustrates the constant interchange of titles between prose fiction and the stage. Thus, a play called "A Blind Marriage" was produced in London just five years ago; and as for "The Catspaw," it is the name of at least three plays—one of them by Douglas Jerrold (1850) and another by the illustrious Max O'Rell (1895).

In the book to be called Shakespeare and Music, the compiler, I gather, will bring together all the bard's references to the gentle art, and illustrate them by a reproduction of the airs referred to in the text. He is aware, we may be sure, of the existence of A Collection of the Vocal Music in Shakespeare's Plays, including the whole of the Songs, Duets, Glees, Choruses, &c., engraved from original MS. and early printed copies, chiefly from the collection of William Kitchiner, M.D. This was edited by John Caulfield. The most modern work of the kind is The Handbook of Shakespeare Music, "being an account of 350 pieces of music, set to words taken from the plays and poems of Shakespeare." This was edited by the late Alfred Roffe, and published in 1878. It is a very readable and useful publication, though, necessarily, no longer "up to date."

A correspondent takes exception to my remark last week re Hazlitt and Mr. Birrell, and suggests that I should take down from the shelf my copy of Res Judicatæ and re-read what Mr. Birrell has already said about Hazlitt. "In this short essay," says "T. E. J.," "Mr. Birrell shows himself delightfully well-acquainted with the 'more than twenty volumes' of his hero, and readily shows how much he admires the author, if he does not love the man." That is just the point. Mr. Birrell, I gather, proposes to write, not a criticism on Hazlitt, but an account of his life. And a biographer, I think, ought to be more or less in sympathy with the person whose career and character he undertakes to unfold.

The Bookworm.

Digitized by Google

Reviews.

"'Tis Greece, but Living Greece ——"

Modern Greece. By Sir Richard Jebb. (Macmillan. 5s.)

ONE-AND-TWENTY years have passed since Sir Richard Jebb —then merely Prof. Jebb—published a little volume on Modern Greece, of which the second edition has just appeared. It consists merely of a couple of lectures addressed to the Edinburgh Philosophical Institution, a magazine article on "The Progress of Greece," and a supplementary paper on Lord Byron's connection with Greece. But the book had a wide influence on its first appearance. In the years which followed the Russo-Turkish War and the Berlin Congress, England had lost interest in Hellenism. The nation which had fought for freedom in the 'twenties of the last century, and welcomed as king a brother of our present Queen in the 'sixties, had rather disappointed expectations. No new Sophocles had sprung to light from the new-ploughed Hellas, no Plato of a later date had surveyed all time and all existence, no Demosthenes had emerged from among the mouthing journalists of Athens; no Pericles had arisen to turn modern Athens into the semblance of the old; nor had Epaminondas attained reincarnation as a warrior of a later day. Greece was a disappointment, a nation that had lost its way. And then came such enthusiasts as Dr. Mahaffy and Prof. Jebb to reassure us. Though much has happened in the one-and-twenty years since Modern Greece was published, the book remains as a curious instance of prophecy fulfilled. Even in 1880 the Prof. Jebb of those days could see the outcome of the virtues and the limitations of the defects of the modern Greek, defects and virtues which, as we shall presently show, marked his predecessor of twenty centuries ago. For, as Sir Richard brings out clearly in his masterly sketch of those twenty centuries, there is nothing more remarkable in the Greek race than its tremendous vitality. Nor is the vitality of the Greek that of the Jew, who maintains individuality by refusing to coalesce; it consists rather in the absorbent power which our own race has exhibited on the American continent. Englishman, Italian, German, Spaniard, Hittite, Hivite, and dweller in Mesopotamia, feel the magic as they touch American soil, and in a generation or so are lost in the general Anglo-Saxon solution. So it has been with the Greek. It was the mission of Rome to make laws for the world and "debellare superbos." But the Greek intellect conquered Rome, and made the Byzantine Empire its own in all but the framework of state. The Greek intellect absorbed Christianity and gave form and name to one-half of the Christian Church. For centuries the Greek spirit was Europe's barrier against Eastern barbarism. "Thrice a strong enemy came up against it," says Sir Richard Jebb, "and with each of the three that trusty warden of our marches waged a combat of four hundred years; it beat back the Persian; it beat back the Saracen; and, after a third struggle of four centuries, it was only in death that it yielded to the Turk."

Greece, however, was not dead; it suffered only the attack of catalepsy which has come upon it more than once when its spirit has seemed overwhelmed by the onrush of barbarism. The idea still lingers, and, indeed, has some basis in fact, that the ancient Greek type has been lost. It has certainly been blurred and defaced; but at the intervals of centuries it reappears almost in its pristine clearness. In race, in language, and in character the Greek of to-day is the manifest child of his remote forefathers, and the changes that are apparent are due mainly to the centuries of enslavement which have come between. Even in his best days the Greek was not brave with the bravery of the Anglo-Saxon, and Byron's sneer at the "hereditary bondsmen" has been echoed by many equally sincere admirers of the Greek spirit. But as he was two thousand years ago, so he is now. In 1830 Prof. Fallmerayer, of Munich, sought to show that racially the Greek was no Greek, but a Slav, and the paradox gained wide acceptance and applause, for the Byronic enthusiasm for the nation struggling to be free had died away. But Carl Hopf and Sir Richard Jebb have strained the paradox and shown its residuum of truth. Never, perhaps, was the Greek spirit so submerged as in the centuries which followed the great pestilence of 747 A.D. The country was depopulated, its numbers would probably have compared unfavourably with those of the population of South London to-day. Into the vacant places came Slavonians, who for a century and more remained in a majority—men of tall figure and blonde hair, diverging widely from the Greek type. By the time that the first crusade was waging, Greece had forgotten the names of her most famous places; Delphi was known as Kastri, and Marathon was Vrana; Salamis was Kiberi, and, strangest of all, Olympia, which had given its name to the popular calendar, was lost in Miraka. But even the tall men with blonde hair had to give way in the end; for the process of absorption was going on. "For every one Slavonic name of a place in the Peloponnesus there are now, according to Leake's computation, about ten Greek names, either ancient or early mediæval." With this is closely connected the question of language; and here we find an even more easily verifiable continuity. It is true that the classical language was by 900 A.D. practically unintelligible to the common folk, and that the current speech was infected and debased by Slavonian words. But by the twelfth century the people's language began to have a literature of its own, which lasted unchanged until the national awakening in the last century. Then the strength and beauty of the classical tongue began to reassert itself. Speech was purged of corruptions; dialects mutually unintelligible through the long isolation of villages separated by trackless mountains, found again the main stream of the national language; and the Greek of to-day, as any scholar may see by looking down the columns of an Athenian paper, differs from his classical language only in the development towards analysis, which is the tendency of all synthetic languages. The subjects of Agamemnon, could they make the experiment, would be able to make themselves reasonably intelligible to the subjects of George.

Persistence of national character is not so easy of rapid proof; but even here Sir Richard Jebb succeeded in making out a good case, which has by no means been damaged by the cross-examination of Greece in the stress of war. The Græculus esuriens of Juvenal survives, as everybody knows, the versatile gentleman who is ready for anything but the earning of a living with his hands. His preference for a town life persists, with his love of the market-place and the discussion of local affairs. But withal there remains his ancient inability to look beyond his city; the city to-day, as in the Athens of Pericles, remains the sum as well as the unit of political expression. As to this Sir Richard Jebb has a passage which must be quoted in his own words. Government, he points out, is centralised in Athens, and there is no public opinion elsewhere:

> Along with excessive centralisation another cause has been at work—the tendency of the Greek character to set the interests of a district or a town above the general interests of the nation. This "particularism"—scarcely less marked to-day than in the Greek commonwealths of old—may be traced now, as formerly, in some measure to the physical configuration of the country, and to the want, still seriously felt, of easy communication. The old Greeks had common national characteristics, but never formed a nation; the Greeks of to-day are a nation with a strong national sentiment, but sometimes with too little unity of national purpose.

Digitized by Google

There is the rock on which Greece has always split. In the old days this mattered little. The "Athenian Empire," which a modern ironclad could have blown into the air during a week's leisurely cruise, lasted but the lifetime of a short-lived man, and has left no more trace than the obscure struggles of Choctaws with Blackfoots. But the Athenian Empire of the mind remains firm. All men born of women are either Platonists or Aristotelians, though they may not know it. Is modern Greece going to choose the "rational" life or the "intellectual" life? We do not like the look of that "disproportionately large number of men who, having received a university education, become lawyers, physicians, journalists or politicians." Athens has too many Cleons who shout in the market-place, and Greece has too few tillers of the soil. If the choice were open—but no nation can choose its destiny—one would wish Greece to take its place among the "little nations," with Denmark, who gave it a king—maintaining the old Greek type and leaving to Great Britain the more expensive Roman task of giving laws to the nations. But those shouting Cleons, those screaming journalists, those out-at-elbow lawyers—while the currant crop is waiting and the roads call for engineers—these things make us fear that Greece has not yet found herself.

Why?

A Commentary on Tennyson's "In Memoriam." By A. C Bradley, LL.D., Professor of Poetry in the University of Oxford. (Macmillan. 4s. 6d. net.)

Here is a commentary, and a very good commentary, on a famous English poem. So far as the commentary proper is concerned, it could not be much better done, if it were to be done at all. Yet a certain portion of the Introduction (which, in this case, is a main and very important part of the book; so much so that the title of "Introduction" is misleading) makes us question whether that kind of thing needed to be done, and for whom. It describes how the poet, in the loss of the one beloved object, finds the world darkened. He longs for "the touch of a vanished hand," and only the solace of a physical presence can satisfy him. The soul is too abstract and awful a thing to be thought of with consolation. But gradually he realises that love may survive the loss of the physical presence: he begins to transfer his interest from the physical presence to the soul itself, which ceases to be a mere inhuman abstraction, and becomes a living and beloved object, no less present to him than the bodily presence had been. With this change, the bitterness of regret passes; while even the past loses its pang but retains its power: "the 'days that are no more' become a life in death instead of a 'death in life.'" At the same time, his distaste for the external world gives place to a renewed interest in it. "The dead man lives in the living, and 'moves him on to nobler ends.' His vision of the ideal man that is to be is a memory of the man that trod this planet with him in his youth." Such is Mr. Bradley's résumé of "In Memoriam," the poem in a nutshell of prose.

Now, all these things are true; but for whom did they need saying? What kind of reader is it who needed them to be "explained" to him? What kind of reader is it who could not deduce them from the poem itself? They are not subtle or remote. They are so little remote or subtle that we might expect to encounter them in many an "ideal" novelist. Why should they be solemnly expounded? We can discern but one answer. A large proportion of people "study" poetry who have no business dans cette galère, who are not native to it, and take a purely extra-poetic interest in it. To them it is merely "teaching," packed into verse—which they do not understand. They are congenitally inapprehensive of imagery and indirect speech, the putting of the part for the whole, of the seen for the unseen, of the high-priest's garments for the world and all the heavens; though this be the essence of the poetic method. Yet they ploddingly read it, by the aid of a "crib," as a dull boy reads his classics. To the poetic reader the "argument" which we have adduced from Mr. Bradley is the least important and most commonplace thing in Tennyson's poem (though we do not say it is unimportant or unessential). To them it is everything. To get at it, in a fashion of conscientious painstaking, before which one groans, they will laboriously master this unknown tongue—with a dictionary. No doubt they derive a pleasure from it; the pleasure which a man derives from the acquisition of a foreign language, the pleasure of his own cleverness, of successfully exercising his mental muscles. But to confound this with poetic pleasure! To suppose such people lovers of poetry! Yet for whom but them can such aids be meant? True lovers of poetry may need an aid to Dante; because, apart from his mediæval atmosphere and allusions, he is full of recondite subject-matter. Shelley's metaphysic subtleties may often demand exposition to those who are no Platonists. Much of Wordsworth is highly remote, so that none need be ashamed to ask an interpreter: and so with others. But did this Tennysonian nut need such formal cracking? Does anyone native to poetic speech find obscurities in "In Memoriam?" If so, how will he fare with those others we have named? And is it good that one should help the unpoetical to conceit themselves poetic-minded? For such seems to us the fruit—if it be not the object—of exposition like this.

Waiving the matter of its necessity, the book is well done. It should be, for "In Memoriam" is no very recondite poem, and a commentary on it, therefore, presented no formidable difficulty. Yet we would not be understood to mean that there are no points on which notes are useful and enlightening. Such points do crop up in every poem or poet, though they are hardly what we understand by "obscurities," and here Mr. Bradley's commentary is of undoubted value. Such, for example, as the note on "the primrose of the later year." On the other hand, it was scarce necessary to explain—

O friendship, equal-poised control, by adding, "Metaphor from a yoke." And the elucidations of possible difficulties in the sense may be useful to many, though it would torture us beyond endurance to read a poem with such "edification by the margent." But besides the commentary, there is an Introduction, from which we have quoted; and if we have found in it matter for cavil, let it also be admitted it contains much of real value. It begins, after dealing with the origin of the poem, by pointing out the measure of structural unity which exists in it; the grouping of certain sections, and the frequent connection between them and the sections immediately following. The whole of this portion on the structure of the period will be found very useful. It is the portion called "The Way of the Soul," on which we commented with some distaste: but that on the ideas employed in the poem is again very useful; being an attempt to give a synopsis of the religious and philosophic system (if system it can be called) of "In Memoriam." Here and there we hesitate to accept his conclusions: but there is every room for difference on such a matter. It is very difficult, for example, to determine the degree or kind of Tennyson's Pantheism. The section beginning—

Digitized by Google

Thy voice is on the rolling air seems as sharply pantheistic as Shelley's "Adonais"; yet he previously repudiates the theory of reabsorption in the universal soul:

Eternal form shall still divide
The eternal soul from all beside;
And I shall know him when we meet.

Mr. Bradley credits him with definitely holding the reimbodiment of the soul in another "star" after death. We should scarce have deduced this from "In Memoriam"; but, in truth, his utterances there are often vague and apparently contradictory, as though his views were in a state of incomplete condensation. This makes Mr. Bradley's résumé the more acceptable, coming, as it does, from a comparison of the poet's utterances throughout the range of his poetry. We would suggest, however, that the nature of the "feelings" on which Tennyson rested his higher beliefs might have been stated more forcibly. He undoubtedly meant intuitions received in an exalted state of the soul; internal, yet felt as coming from a source independent of one's individuality. Many passages show this.

It is quite true that Tennyson conceives of the soul "as detaching itself, or being detached, from the 'general soul;'" that it is regarded as developing self-consciousness through its bodily experiences; and that what is deepest in it is spoken of as will, the "main miracle, apparently an act of self-limitation by the Infinite, and yet a revelation of Himself by Himself." In this Tennyson seems clearly to Platonize; to regard the soul as a spark of the Anima Mundi, glowing and growing in the body, revealing the Infinite to the individual (as in those trances to which there are frequent allusions in his poetry), and tending always to reunion with that world-soul whence it came. This is not clearly expressed in him, but is a complement of that Platonic doctrine towards which he often appears to incline. No one, we think, has noted how that peculiar state of trance, into which Tennyson has told us he could throw himself by repeating over and over his name to himself, is alluded to in his poetry. For example, in the "Princess," where the hero repeatedly describes a seizure in which he seems to himself a shadow among shadows. Mr. Kipling, in his current story, Kim, mentions that such a power is common among Easterns, though rare among Europeans; and is exerted in the same way, by repeating one's name to oneself. It would be interesting had we further evidence of such peculiar states or faculties among poets. But if they exist, their biographies carefully eschew mention of them. We know a case of such neglect, or ignorance, in our own experience. Possibly they are withheld, as likely to be derided by a matter-of-fact generation.

Mr. Bradley concludes his Introduction by some comments on Tennyson's alleged plagiarisms. He inclines to the view that Tennyson was given, more than most poets, to unconscious reminiscence. It appears to us a most immaterial matter, in a poet whose power of imagery and expression is so marked, whether he took an occasional phrase or image from another writer, and why or how he did it. And this, indeed, seems Mr. Bradley's own conclusion. For the rest, let us say, once more, his commentary is all that any one can desire, if one should desire at all a commentary on "In Memoriam." But we are not yet convinced that one should desire it.

Carpet Drama.

Crabbed Age and Youth. By W. Kingsley Tarpey.

The Paying Guest: A Problem Farce in Two Acts. By Lucy Snowe. (Johnson. 6d. each.)

THESE two pieces are the third and fourth numbers of a series entitled "Carpet Plays," edited by Mr. Lucian Oldershaw, who was sometime secretary of the Oxford University Dramatic Society. The series is aimed at "amateurs, schools, society entertainers, or any persons outside the dramatic profession"; the contents are "selected for their literary and dramatic qualities"; finally, by means of diagrams, etc., "every attempt is made to supply a stage manager by the printed word."

We think that Crabbed Age and Youth may probably succeed among amateurs. It is thoroughly and uncompromisingly conventional; it exactly resembles a thousand and one curtain-raisers that we have seen; and there is not a trace of naturalism anywhere in it. It is mildly amusing and mildly sentimental. The histrionic amateur is one of the most nervous creatures on earth, and such "literary and dramatic qualities" as these are calculated to soothe and reassure him. He will accept the play because it contains nothing of alarm. "Scene: A morning room, comfortably and tastefully furnished. At the back a French window stands open to the garden, which is gay with flowers and shrubs." A French window is indispensable in these plays, but Mr. Lucian Oldershaw does not explain how such a "property" is to be managed in the T. R. Back-drawing-room. In the comfortable and tasteful morning-room we find Colonel Trevor (in this literature there are six names for Colonels, and Trevor is one—some of the others are Tremaine, Anstruther, and Carlyon), aged fifty; his young second wife, aged thirty; his daughter, aged twenty; a Major, aged forty-seven; and a boy named Frank, aged twenty-four. The Colonel designs that his daughter shall wed the Major, but the damsel loves Frank, who has more or less saved her life in a carriage accident. It is curious how gratitude as an incentive to marriage pervades the play. The Major has saved the Colonel's life, and so the Colonel wishes to reward the Major with his daughter. The Colonel was kind to his wife in a difficult situation of her career, and so she gratefully married him and learned to love him afterwards.

Of course Frank obtains the hand of his bright charmer, and the Major, who, by an accident not unknown on the stage, has overheard a certain conversation, is left out in the cold. Part of the result is that the Colonel discovers that he ought not to have married his wife. Here is a fragment of the scene:

> COL. [sadly—coming forward to table, L.C.]: Not angry, surely.
>
> LAURA: I ought to have said it to you—but—I was afraid——
>
> COL.: I can quite understand that, dear.
>
> LAURA: Oh, I can see you're hurt and disappointed—but think of Bertha's happiness.
>
> COL.: We won't think of Bertha just now, we must think of ourselves first.
>
> LAURA: Ourselves!
>
> COL.: I cannot undo the wrong I did you. But there are ways in which the burthen may be made less hard to bear.
>
> LAURA: Undo the wrong! Henry, what are you saying? What wrong have you done me?
>
> COL.: I ought to have thought of—"Crabbed Age and Youth." [LAURA stares at him in horror.] I took advantage of my temporary kindness to you, my paltry claim upon your gratitude. I ought to have known that these can never supply the place of love.

However, the end of all things is happy. The wife cries out that she has hurt her husband's feelings and that he can never respect her again, and he answers: "Laura, darling, don't speak so wildly." . . . And lo, a complete understanding!

Digitized by Google

The Paying Guest is less satisfactory. Preliminary instructions are given to the effect that "it cannot be played too briskly," that the "'problem' will look after itself," and that the "farcical elements" should be "developed." But Miss Snowe has depended for her humour on events which are too gorgeously impossible.

Satire at the expense of ducal families and their trading propensities is very well, though somewhat trite, but it must be managed with some discretion. The farcicality of the following passage seems to us to exceed even the bounds set by the canons of the Strand Theatre:

> VERITAS: The late Duke bought the title and inheritance from the rightful heir!
>
> DUCHESS: Bought—the title?
>
> VERITAS: He (the late Duke) was travelling in America—as plain Mr. Smith—having amassed a very large fortune in—ahem!—commerce. He happened to meet the heir to the ducal coronet of D'Outre-Mer, who was also travelling, but under less agreeable circumstances, being, in fact, exceedingly hard up. This young man had abandoned his native country on account of a quarrel with his father, and had by severe experience learnt that Money is a more potent factor of happiness than Birth! Mr. Smith——
>
> DUCHESS: Mr. Smith!

We think that the gifted amateur is likely to swerve badly when confronted by any of half-a-dozen situations in The Paying Guest. We permit ourselves to hope that Mr. Lucian Oldershaw's series will improve as it proceeds.

The Thirteen Colonies.

The Thirteen Colonies. By Helen Ainslie Smith. 2 vols. (Putnam's. 12s.)

THE romance of colonisation is, in the abstract, epical and heroic; it contains in itself all the elements which go to the building up of character and of nations. Yet to study in detail the histories of any colonies, and particularly those of the Thirteen, is to be confronted with such records of folly and failure as well as wisdom and success that one is left wondering at the marvellous outcome of such mixed activities. That the United States of America as they are to-day should have developed from their comparatively recent and obscure beginnings is surely the most extraordinary fact of the modern world, a fact which leaves far behind the wildest speculations. And that development dates mainly from the Declaration of Independence.

Mrs. Smith's narrative carries us, of course, only to the point of that Declaration. Her work is compact and well-ordered, and as full of detail as the limits of her scheme permit; indeed, we find the volumes rather overweighted with detail, in parts so scrappy and full of abrupt quotation as to be confusing. But in the main she is to be congratulated on an industry which gives us in so handy a form, and in one work, matter which has hitherto been scattered and not always easy of access. Each colony has its separate narrative, and each narrative is illustrated by reproductions of most interesting portraits, maps and early illustrations.

The discovery and settlement of the northern continent can be credited to no individual nation; it was the joint work of such European peoples as went down to the sea in ships. But the discoveries of John Cabot in the reign of Henry VII. certainly constituted England's claim: the King's patent was granted to him "for the discouerie of new and unknowen lands." His son Sebastian claimed to be the pioneer, but there appears to be no evidence that he ever even crossed the Atlantic; the honour must be credited to old John, of whom Lorenzo Pasqualigo wrote in August, 1497:

> The King has promised that in the spring our countryman shall have ten ships, armed to his order, and at his request conceded him all the prisoners, except such as are confined for high treason, to man his fleet. The King has also given him money wherewith to amuse himself till then, and he is now at Bristol with his wife, who is also a Venetian, and with his sons; his name is Zuan Cabot, and he is styled the great admiral. Vast honour is paid him; he dresses in silk, and these English run after him like mad people, so that he can enlist as many of them as he pleases, and a number of our own rogues besides.

In 1498 he coasted the continent between 67½ degrees and 36 degrees north latitude, and so, in spite of protests and papal bulls, established the English claim "to possess the land, with all its islands and waters, to settle it, and to drive out all intruders and compel their allegiance." Yet for many years France, Portugal and Spain were the chief colonists, their attempted rule over the natives being marked by hideous cruelties. It was not till the reign of Elizabeth, and the rise of Gilbert and Raleigh, that any serious efforts at colonisation were made, and those efforts failed lamentably. With the transfer of Raleigh's patents to Richard Hakluyt the younger there came a change; commercial colonisation began to draw the breath of life, and in 1606 James I. sanctioned the formation of two Virginia companies, and Virginia became a "Fifth Kingdom" of the Empire. By what was delightfully known as "the adventure of the purse," the South Virginia Company raised funds for the new enterprise, and in January, 1607, the nucleus of the first colony set sail from England.

It is impossible here to attempt to follow in any detail the history of even one of the Thirteen Colonies; in general outline each proceeded on much the same lines: in each there soon arose conflict between the colonists and the holders of the charters; in each the holders of the charters quarrelled with the sovereign power, and it, in turn, made exorbitant and impossible demands upon the people. Charles II., strangely enough, was wiser than many of his successors. When Sir William Berkeley put down rebellion with too high a hand the King exclaimed: "As I live, the old fool has put to death more people in that naked country than I did here for the murder of my father!" Most of the gradually growing colonies were in a state of continual tumult; the wonder is that anything was accomplished. Yet by degrees their strength increased; charters were granted and resumed; governors, for the most part self-seeking, though there were noble exceptions, came and went or were transferred to other fields, and all the time the ordinary occupations of life went on,—crops were cultivated, timber was cut down, the seas were swept with nets, and soon centres of education and religious instruction were established in spite of such off-handed gentlemen as Attorney-General Seymour, who, to the proposal that a church and college should be provided in Virginia, replied: "Damn your souls, grow tobacco."

The history of the great Quaker Colony of Pennsylvania, the eighth in order of foundation, presents features which distinguish it agreeably, in many respects, from its sisters. In consideration of the cancelling of a debt of £16,000 incurred by Charles II. to Admiral Sir William Penn, that complacent monarch granted to the Admiral's son a territory covering forty thousand square miles. It had always been a dream of Penn's to found a Quaker colony in the new world, and when the opportunity came he made the most of it. He was thirty-six at the time of his great acquisition, and for as many more years was absolute ruler. Says an historian of the colony:

Digitized by Google

> The creation by one man of such a huge, prosperous, and powerful empire, and its possession by himself and his children as a feudal barony for such a length of time, has, we believe, no parallel in the history of the world. Kings have possessed themselves of such domains, but never before a private citizen who scorned all titles.

Penn's success lay, no doubt, in his frank honesty and a kind of inspired common-sense. He was a man of commanding personality, and though a Quaker and a scorner of titles, by no means averse from the shows of this world. Indeed, he never ceased to be a courtier, and when, after the overthrow of James II., the Crown, in the person of William, assumed the government of the colony, though leaving the land untouched, he soon succeeded in clearing himself of the charge of being a favourite of James at no cost of faith and only £350 in money. But he was otherwise impoverished, and the colonists, who clamoured for his return, most ungenerously refused to advance him the £10,000 which he required. A deputy-governor proving a failure, Penn succeeded in freeing himself from his liabilities, and returned to the colony:

> Nothing in colonial history has more pleasing colour than this second visit—Penn's sessions with Council and Assembly; his meetings with the Indians, which gave them pleasure and lasting satisfaction; his travels on horseback into the interior of the province, to New York, and Maryland; his meetings with Friends everywhere; and his winning manners among all men, red and white, high and low. At Pennsbury Manor he lived with his family, it is said, in more luxury than any other colonial governor ever supported. When he chose he sent his barge down to the capital, twenty miles below, to bring the Council to confer and to dine with him. . . . The living rooms were richly furnished in Turkey work, plushes, satins, and even carpets, which were enjoyed by few but princes in those days. The house was upon an estate beautified by a landscape gardener from Europe.

This remarkable and luxurious Quaker did everything upon a lavish scale; his private generosities were numberless, he dressed in the manner of the Court, and even encouraged dancing. He was, too, a statesman of justice and foresight, certainly the greatest of all the governors of the Thirteen Colonies. He died under the shadow of debt, and had even offered to sell his government to the Crown; but before the matter was arranged he passed away, and the vast estates remained to the enrichment of his successors.

We have said enough to indicate the value and interest of Mrs. Smith's history. These volumes should certainly be on the shelves of any serious student of colonial expansion. If the lessons which they convey are obvious, they are lessons which cannot be too seriously considered.

Other New Books.

SOME LITERARY LANDMARKS FOR PILGRIMS ON WHEELS. By F. W. BOCKETT.

Mr. Bockett is of the company of mild cyclists. With an audacity for which he may hardly be forgiven, he says of cycling: "It is as the Gentle Art that it will be with us to the end." After which remarkable statement he proceeds to make one still more remarkable: "The fact is, that the art of angling has been able to flourish for so long under false colours simply because Isaac Walton wrote about it in so inimitable a manner." We had not ourselves thought the good old man's influence to be so powerful.

But Mr. Bockett may be allowed to cultivate his amiable heterodoxies for the sake of his agreeable gossip. For this is a pleasant little book, full of quiet observation, and it recalls many memories of names, all interesting and many great. Mr. Bockett thinks better of the author of Sandford and Merton than most people, and we agree with him. Thomas Day had convictions which took active shape, and he was no mean philanthropist. Certainly, as Mr. Bockett says, he deserved a more discriminating epitaph than that engraved upon the tablet in Wargrave Church.

Mr. Bockett's pilgrimages take us to Farnham, where Cobbett, that hard-headed smiter at governments, was born; to Albury, by way of Newland's Corner, where Martin Tupper continued to write forgotten books long after his name had become almost a byword (Mr. Bockett does not mention that his grave may be seen in Albury Old Churchyard); to Moor Park, redolent of the sweetness of Dorothy Osborn and less savoury memories of the author of the Tale of a Tub. Others of the papers are concerned with the homes and countrysides of Jane Austen and Gilbert White, of Charles Kingsley and Charles Lamb, of Tennyson and some of the moderns who have infected Hazelmere with literature and red bricks. Mr. Bockett does not tell us anything new, but he deals with the old associations in a kindly and reverent spirit, and he has an eye for scenery and the quietness of remote villages. Of Wargrave he says:

> I wonder whether you can find anywhere else so many pretty, flower-decked houses, so many smart-looking inns; has any other village such a wonderful, well-to-do, easy-going air about it? Every house seems to be a quaint little palace of quiet enjoyment. Surely all the male inhabitants must wear brown velvet coats and soft felt hats, and all the women must be beautiful dames of the Du Maurier type. But where were they all? Not a soul was to be seen.

That is pleasant enough; the kind of writing to fall in with the mood of a not too literary pilgrim who sits under a hedge with a pipe in his mouth.

The format of the book suits its subject: it is light, of reasonable pocket size, and has a number of pretty line drawings by Mr. Symington. It has also, unfortunately, three deplorable reproductions of portraits; that of Shelley, in particular, which stands as frontispiece, is a positive offence to the eyes. (Dent. 6d. net.)

A DIARY OF THE SIEGE OF THE LEGATIONS IN PEKING. By NIGEL OLIPHANT.

Mr. Oliphant, when the troubles of 1900 broke out, was occupying a civil post in the Chinese Postal Service; but he had previously seen some military service in India with the Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders, an experience which proved of great value when the siege began. The diary opens on June 1 and ends on September 30, the actual siege having been raised on August 14. The record is full of the details of defence works, small engagements, and constant and harassing alarms. Day after day the little garrison was reduced, often, it must be said, from the sheer carelessness of men who entertained the fatuous belief that the Chinese could not shoot; day after day the strain and deadly monotony became greater; day after day the rations dwindled, though never to starvation point. Again and again a more intelligent and determined enemy might—at any rate, in the earlier stages of the investment—have rushed the barricades; but, fortunately, no serious attempt to do this appears to have been made. They were content with occasional violent fusillades and continual sniping, day and night. On July 5 Mr. Oliphant's brother David, a most promising officer in the Chancery office of the Legation, volunteered to clear some trees from before one of our positions, and was killed; less than a week later Mr. Oliphant was wounded in the left knee, and had to retire to hospital and a period of compulsory inaction. The record of each day hardly varies from its predecessor; the horrible monotony of the affair must have constituted one of its most deadly elements. But the relief column, as all the world knows, arrived in time; indeed, there is not a little implicit evidence to suggest that the siege, after the first blaze, was a somewhat half-hearted venture.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Andrew Lang contributes a preface, mainly genealogical, to the volume, which has, further, a clear map of the Peking Foreign Quarter, showing the positions of the various legations and the Chinese and Foreign barricades. (Longmans. 5s. net.)

CHRISTIAN MYSTICISM. BY ELEANOR C. GREGORY.

This well-written, clear, and in its way useful little book, we, nevertheless, cannot commend for common or popular reading. The unguided and irresponsible use or following of such manuals opens the gates to all manner of mischievous errors, perverse or hysterical. Level-headed and sober people will find in it much information, of a not too recondite or technical kind, on the subject of which it treats. For, contrary to the popular notion, mysticism eminently demands that excellent quality we call sensibleness, which is far from being the common possession it is supposed to be. Miss Gregory's own book has much of this estimable quality. Though it entitles itself "Christian Mysticism," the greater part of it is devoted to a review of eminent mystics which is curiously eclectic. Plato and Plotinus rub shoulders with Origen and Dionysius the Areopagite, Paracelsus and Jacob Böhme with Eckhart, Tauler, and Thomas à Kempis; St. John of the Cross, facing St. Theresa, points uneasily over his shoulder to the unexpected vicinage of Maeterlinck. In a summary, Miss Gregory deals with the leading features of mysticism, finishing by some comments on its possibilities of error and abuse. With one remark we are inclined to disagree. The "modern Roman Church," she says, regards visions and ecstacies as "the very sign-manual of a mystic." May they not be accidental rather than integral to mysticism? But this, we believe, is in substance the view of "the modern Roman Church." Any dwelling on such things as principal and essential parts of the higher life is, we fancy, carefully discouraged. Such, at least, is the attitude of some recent writers belonging to that Church; as it was the attitude of many among her mystics themselves. Incidentally she quotes from Mr. Clifford Harrison (better known as an elocutionist than as a writer on such matters) a very good and pregnant passage regarding the possibility of action on others through media more subtle than the recognised external activities:

> If waves of force pass through earth and rock; if certain forms of light pass through our bodies and substances which we call solid; if the electric force can be transmitted . . . without the clumsy apparatus and medium of wires; it may well be that psychic and mental force can be and is transmitted and exercised in . . . unknown and mysterious, but absolutely natural, ways in the unrecognised ether of thought.

In another passage he further enforces this argument. To the few who can make any profitable use of such books, Miss Gregory's modest pages will be welcome. (H. R. Allinson. 1s. 6d. net.)

LIFE BY THE SEA SHORE. BY MARION NEWBIGIN, D.Sc.

This is a simple, helpful guide to the ordinary zoology of the seaside pools such as children take a too ignorant delight in. In the hands of a mother the book might be the making of a holiday. Special efforts have been made to make identification of specimens easy, an all-important point. In describing rock-pool life Miss Newbigin has the East Coast specially, but not exclusively, in mind. Her chapter headings are sixteen, and range from "Sponges, Zoophytes, and Sea-Firs" to "True Crabs" from "Sea Anemones and their Allies" to the more exciting "Bivalves and Cuttles." Miss Newbigin is a pleasant, patient teacher, and tries to persuade her young readers to face technical words with courage. After all, as she says, the term "Decapod Crustacea" gives a perfectly clear idea of a group of animals which would otherwise have to be called "hard-coated animals with ten legs," a longer and less descriptive phrase. We can cordially recommend this book, which, we should add, is illustrated with pen-and-ink drawings. (Sonnenschein. 3s. 6d. net.)

TIME-TABLE OF MODERN HISTORY, A.D. 400-1870. COMPILED AND ARRANGED BY M. MORISON.

A most invaluable work is Mr. Morison's, and in its way almost deserves the adjective monumental. It is a general compendium of historical dates, viewed from almost every possible aspect. It begins with parallel tables of dates. On the two large pages you have spread out, for instance, at the outset, England, Scotland, France, Spain, and the Western and Eastern Empires of Rome; in parallel columns, with parallel dates. Then follow genealogical tables of the dynasties belonging to the principal countries, the countries treated successively. To this succeed the names and dates of all the rulers of history. Finally, ancient and modern history, from the Egyptian dynasties downwards, is spread before you in one great chart. As an appendix, there is a succession of historical maps, from the barbarian migrations of Europe onwards, comprised in seven plates, which makes the volume also an excellent historical atlas—some of the maps not to be found in any other historical atlas. No student of history should think his shelves complete without this uniquely valuable book. (Constable. 12s. 6d. net.)

Messrs. Wells, Gardner, Darton and Co. have issued a second edition of Playing at Botany, by Phœbe Allen. We are not surprised that these nursery dialogues, making botany easy, and playfully accustoming childish lips to big words, has found favour. "'Dicotyledon, Monocotyledon,' spelt Rhoda to herself: 'Well, those certainly are hard words to begin with; perhaps if I say them over several times every day I shall get used to them. Still, for common use, I shall say 'crooked-veins and straight-veins, and I shall know what I mean, if nobody else does.'" In the company of Hugh and Rhoda, and their friends Miss Buttercup, Miss Ranunculus Bulbosus, Miss Dog-Rose, Master Peasblossom and the rest, a child may be expected to progress easily and happily in the knowledge of plant life.

His Most Gracious Majesty King Edward VII., by Mrs. Belloc-Lowndes, is an enlarged and chronologically extended edition of the same writer's Life of the Prince of Wales. The story is brought up to February 14 of this year, the day on which the King opened his first Parliament. Massive in blue and gold, with the royal arms on the cover, and well illustrated from many sources, this volume has the right look of regal solidity. When we add that Mrs. Belloc-Lowndes has discharged her task with care and discretion, there is little more to be said. "The King and State Policy," "The King as a Country Squire," "The King as a Philanthropist," "The King as a Sportsman," and "The King in London," are among the chapter headings.

Digitized by Google

Fiction.

Tristram of Blent. By Anthony Hope. (Murray. 6s.)

There is understood to be little of primal simplicity in Mr. Anthony Hope, the author. He has the reputation of being rusé, the product of an advanced civilisation, learned in the ways of the world. And yet, when you examine Tristram of Blent, which was chosen and set apart to be the first serial of an important monthly organ of culture, you cannot but perceive that even the inventor of Dolly Mickleham and Mr. Carter, those highly-subtilised wits, may not stray very far from the original naïveté of story-telling without soon straying back again into the safe middle of the beaten path. Put bluntly, the plot of Tristram of Blent is amusingly like the plot of a Family Herald novelette, with the addition of some scandal and a little cynicism. First you take an Old House, and to freshen up the conception you make the title descend when necessary through the female line. Such an Old House was the house of Tristram, of Blent. The Lady Tristram had sown her wild oats to the horror of society. She had, in fact, left her husband and run off with another man. But on the death of the husband the irregular union was instantly legalised, and within a fortnight Harry Tristram was born. After that the Lady Tristram's behaviour was unimpeachable. She lived at Blent with Harry, Harry's father being now dead, and Harry was brought up as the heir of a great name. You next indicate, as a deep secret, that the Lady Tristram's first husband did not, in fact, die until the day after she married her second, and that, therefore, Harry is illegitimate. Here, again, to freshen up a worn idea, you locate the death in Russia, thus involving a pretty confusion between the old and the new styles of chronology. Four persons are aware of this secret—Harry and his mother, a scholarly editor of memoirs, and a certain Madame Zabriska, a pert and lively young widow of much charm and some good-nature. You cause the widow to reside in the dower house of the Tristrams, you bring down the scholarly editor as a guest to a neighbouring mansion, and then your serial is fairly begun. Will the secret remain a secret? The reader is soon on tenter-hooks, and the more so when Madame Zabriska confides, out of mischief, in her bachelor uncle, who wishes to marry the rich heiress on whom Harry Tristram has set his heart. The uncle and Harry meet by a fine old melodramatic Pool:

> "You are paying attentions to Miss Iver—with a view to marriage, I presume?"
>
> Harry made no sign. Duplay proceeded, slowly and with careful deliberation:
>
> "Those attentions are offered and received as from Mr. Tristram—as from the future Lord Tristram of Blent. I can't believe that you're ignorant of what I'm about to say. If you are, I must beg forgiveness for the pain I shall inflict on you. You, sir, are not the future Lord Tristram of Blent."
>
> A silence followed: a slight drizzle had begun to fall, speckling the waters of the Pool; neither man heeded it.

In a few minutes they are at grips; and the uncle is just being thrown into the Pool by the vigorous illegitimate, when the rich heiress supervenes in a dog-cart.

This was called Plot in the excellent Wilkie Collins days, and it is plot still.

The rightful heiress of Blent is a poor young girl of the name of Cecily. When Lady Tristram dies, Harry, who has conquered all difficulties and deceived everyone, surrenders to this damsel of the Tristram blood. Her he cannot deceive. He confesses all, and Cecily becomes the Lady Tristram. Full of sympathy, she offers to marry the man whose place she has taken, but Harry very rudely refuses. About a hundred pages later, however, he accepts the offer and marries her. It needs, you will suppose, a singular audacity to make Harry the rightful heir after all. Mr. Anthony Hope is nothing if not audacious, and Harry accordingly is the rightful heir. Twenty pages of bickering between Lord and Lady Tristram concerning the deception practised upon her by him in the matter of their marriage, and the tale felicitously ends. It has been an interesting tale, studded with strong situations, and constantly stimulant of the reader's curiosity.

We find in the manner of the narrative less than usual of Mr. Hope's characteristic qualities. He seems to have put a bridle on his capricious wit, with the intention of telling a plain tale plainly. He seems, indeed, to have had the ambition to write a novel precisely in the style of Mr. W. E. Norris, and he has marvellously succeeded in imitating the imperturable calmness, coldness and correctness of that observer of modern society. His way of beginning a chapter is perfectly Norrisian:

> Not knowing your own mind, though generally referred to as an intellectual weakness and sometimes as a moral fault, is none the less, now and then, a pleasant state to live in for a while. There is a richness of possibility about it, a variety of prospects open, a choice of roads each in its own fashion attractive. Besides, you can always tell yourself that it is prudent to look all round the question and consider all alternatives. The pleasure, like most pleasures, is greater when it comes once in a way to a person unaccustomed to it.

The entirely obvious and innocuous could not be more neatly rendered. Sometimes, of course, like Mr. Norris, he unfortunately slips into a smartness which is merely feeble:

> Lord Southend was devoted to his wife—a state of feeling natural often, creditable always.

For the rest, the book shows accurate if superficial observation. It discloses a mind divided between cynicism and benevolent toleration, an author ingenious enough never to offend either the majority or the minority; an author, too, who is "settling down" into his niche after the vagaries of a brilliant youth. We suspect that Tristram of Blent is deficient in literary importance, but we should be doing it less than justice if we concealed the fact that it had mildly diverted us.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

The Striking Hours. By Eden Phillpotts.

Fourteen short stories of the Dartmoor country fill Mr. Phillpotts's new volume, which bears these words of Dr. Martineau's as its motto: "God has so arranged the chronometry of our spirits that there shall be thousands of silent moments between the striking hours." A few titles are: "Sam of Sorrow Corner," "Right of Way," "The Best of Three Falls," "The Devil's Tight Rope." (Methuen. 6s.)

By Rock and Pool on an Austral Shore, and Other Stories. By Louis Becke.

Fourteen short stories and sketches of those South Seas and their islands which Mr. Becke knows so well. Mr. Becke concludes with hints to travellers, wherein it is refreshing to read that "the reader must not imagine that the Samoan group is the only one in the South Pacific where an enjoyable holiday may be spent." The Society Group, the Hervey Group, etc., are "well worth visiting." We shall really think about running over to

Digitized by Google

Tahiti; it all sounds so simple. Mr. Becke insists, however, on the need of some knowledge of native etiquette. (Unwin. 6s.)

SOULS OF PASSAGE. By AMELIA E. BARR.

A Scottish love-story by the popular author of many stories. Glasgow, money, and match-making are the key-words to this pleasant novel. "'I expected a scene,' said Mr. Lockhart, 'and she made no more ado about one hundred thousand pounds than if I had been handing her a bawbee. . . . A wonderful lassie! She's as prudent as Angus Dunbrack himself, and I needna say mair than that. It implies a' things convenient and commendable." (Unwin. 6s.)

THE DEVASTATORS. By ADA CAMBRIDGE.

The devastators are the husbands and wives who devastate marriage, and the story is a tragedy of ill-assorted marriages, relieved by at least two delightful characters—Dr. Dallas, the lover of animals and the owner of innumerable white rats; and Margaret, the ill-starred young wife. The moral, or one of the morals, is this: "Taking the many sides of the case into consideration, a rough justice is done in the end: and the woman who makes herself cheap and miscellaneous, and still more the woman who uses her beauty treacherously—knowing its power and the physiological weakness of the man's defence against it—has not much to complain of in the final issue, which leaves her, usually, worse off than it leaves him." (Methuen. 6s.)

AN EPISODE ON A DESERT ISLAND. By the Author of "MISS MOLLY."

We have here a series of letters which, on a superficial examination, remind one of An Englishwoman's Love Letters. They are the outpouring of a woman's heart, and are first dated from a rectory, then from a yacht, and then from a desert island on which she is cast with John Elton and a placid sailor. John is not the hero of the story unfolded in the letters, but he has his points, and was right in insisting on giving the heroine her Christian name, Louise. "It's rotten to go shouting through a desert island, 'Good morning, Miss Mauvesyn.'" (Murray. 2s. 6d. net.)

NO VINDICATION. By MRS. COULSON KERNAHAN

When a baby boy is saved from shipwreck, adopted by a poor woman, and is known by his clothing to be a gentleman born, we know pretty well what to expect. Familiar as the general plot of this novel is, it is very pleasantly written by the author of Trewinnot of Guy's. There are several pairs of lovers, and the note of the story is happiness. (John Long. 6s.)

FOUR-LEAVED CLOVER. By MAXWELL GRAY.

This story, by the author of The Silence of Dean Maitland, is a country-house love-story, with soldiers and horses in it, and an act of peculiar blackguardism in the way of forgery of correspondence. But the total effect is cheerful, the story and its setting being alike gay and sunny. A serviceable August novel. (Heinemann. 6s.)

WOMEN MUST WEEP. By SARAH TYTLER.

Domestic humour and pathos are Mrs. Tytler's materials here, as in so many of her other stories; and we cannot describe Women Must Weep better than by quoting a few of its chapter headings: "Mrs. Hepburn's Visitor," "Lady Cumberbatch's Call," "Jane Knows," "Jane Goes," "Jane's Employer and Bob's Discovery," and "The Knot Cut." (John Long. 6s.)

A MODERN SLAVEDEALER. By A. P. CROUCH.

The hero goes to West Africa to grow rubber for the London market, and his adventures make the story, the clue to which we find on page 135: "You say that the men were bound, and that this tall negro was driving them on with the lash. . . . They were not ordinary labourers, then, who had been rioting. Our St. Thomé plantation hands would not submit to such treatment. Besides, there is no police-station inland nearer than fifteen miles, and if he wanted to put them into custody he would have brought them to this town. No, señor, those men were slaves! Slaves in a port belonging to a European nation at the end of the nineteenth century! It seemed incredible!" (Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.)

TOM GENUFLEX. By AUNT CHERRY.

Tom is a High Church curate, fresh from Oxford, and vowed to celibacy. On the Rectory lawn, surrounded by school-girls and women playing tennis, Tom "felt himself to be indeed in peril." Often he kissed the silver-gilt cross which hung under his long clerical coat, and murmured "Lead us not into temptation." Tom's dealings with a lively French governess, and his loyalty to his faith and duties are set forth in this naïve story, which can be obtained from "The writer, at Llwyn-y-brain, Whitland, South Wales."

THE HERETIC. By ROBERT JAMES LEE.

Religion and sceptism supply the motives of this story, which opens twenty years ago in a boarding-house in the now unlikely quarter of Aldersgate-street. Three young men are warmly discussing the preaching of Dr. Joseph Parker, who will find something to amuse and interest him in pages 16—20. After a man who has twice been pronounced dead by a doctor has come to life, the author says: "We have now reached a point where we may advantageously pause to ascertain where our story has led us, and the peculiarity of the spiritual phenomena by which we are surrounded." (John Long. 6s.)

THE FLY-WHEEL. By GEORGE WEMYSS.

The fly-wheel is moral, not mechanical; and its action is to equalise and moderate the good fortune of Hetty Acheson, who in the first chapter succeeds quite unexpectedly to £10,000 a year. One of her difficulties was the right bestowal of a living. "Oh, my power is great; but my power is crippled by the fact that I am a woman. My sex makes me impotent. I—I dare not offer Archie Fawcett this living." Daren't she, though? (Macmillan. 6s.)

THE COWARD. By R. L. JEFFERSON.

On the twenty-first birthday of Henry Catesby, the fascia on the front of his father's shop was altered by the proud father from "Samuel Catesby, Wholesale and Retail Grocer and Italian Warehouseman," to "Catesby and Son," etc. But Henry did not feel honoured by the honour, for he wanted to write books. Awhile he combined grocery with literature. "I shall not easily forget" [the story is autobiographical] "the day when one of our customers came to the store and, during the course of conversation, inquired, casually, if I were the Henry W. Catesby who was writing that splendid story in Paulton's Magazine." Later Henry comes to London, where he has literary and other experiences. (Ward, Lock. 6s.)

JESSE. By GEORGE MARLOWE.

We should call this a domestic melodrama if the author had not called it "A Realistic Fairy Tale." Anyhow, it is sumptuously written—in the sublimated novelette manner. The hero has "unutterable feelings." (Digby, Long. 6s.)

Digitized by Google

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage, One Halfpenny, Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscription, prepaid (including postage) 17/6
" Quarterly 5/0
" Price for one issue /5

London.

MR. AUGUSTUS HARE has revised his handbook entitled Walks in London; and Mr. Allen, his publisher, has issued it in the month which the country cousin unwisely dedicates to a round of London sight-seeing.

Sight-seeing—what a word! It means, perhaps, the negation of sight; but let it pass. The country cousin knows London, necessarily, by its conventional prominences; and it is unjust to deride his enthusiasm for the Tower and Madame Tussaud's. For him Mr. Hare's book is meat and drink, and it is useful to every Londoner who values the destiny which has permitted him to breathe the air of this city in which even a cold eye must find the population of Babylon, the learning of Athens, the power of Rome—we wish we could add the pride of Venice. For this very reason one's impulse is to close guide-books with a snap. How shall London be enclosed in a book? One does not walk its streets for twenty years without turning from their "sights" to their substance, and from their obvious to their inherent greatness. It is well to visit Lincoln's Inn, the Charterhouse, the Savoy, Mercers' Hall, the Royal Exchange, the Monument, the Museums, Printing House Square, and the old snuff shop in the Haymarket; no close student of London will neglect these. Yet these are not London, and it is not to them that a Londoner gives his heart. Last evening, walking along the Strand, we found Holywell-street "stopped." Only an hour before, a little board with half-a-dozen words painted on it had been planted at its east end, and this old London lane had been closed for ever. Soon the crowbars will be at work, and the tall houses that have nodded to the moon these many years will fall. Mr. Hare will note in his next edition that in the autumn of 1901 Holywell-street was demolished to make way for the new boulevard, and country cousins will pass over the entry as not concerning them. But a few Londoners will remember the grey and drizzling evening in which Holywell-street became a "no thoroughfare." They will see the shadows of its cavernous shops, and the last glow of its innumerable books, and they will remember how St. Mary's tower just peeped above its medley of leaning walls and sagging roofs. What is it that makes such vanishings poignant? Is it not that we are accustomed to see houses and streets outlive the men who dwelt in them? When a man dies we think "our turn is not yet," but when a house falls we feel the larger rhythm of mortality.

The "sights" of London are mostly of national, rather than of civic, interest; and London's real life must be studied in its streets, houses, and crowds. Mr. Henry James has said that even on its meanest and remotest streets London lays the stamp of the mighty whole to which they belong. We have always liked to think that, yet we have had our doubts since we saw Garratt-lane in Wandsworth, a long, unlovely road in the valley of the Wandle, overlooked by Wandsworth prison and the pleasant ridges of South Wimbledon. Here, within the four-mile radius, is a region in which you cannot easily feel that you are in London. The river, with its mills and factories and outlying flats, the unkempt new streets, busy but unpaved, and the thin, unfamiliar traffic, give one the idea of a dreary self-contained town; and the knowledge that it is part of London conveys a new impression of London's inexhaustible variety—as though she were so big that she is capable of forgetting some of her limbs. The sight is curious, but it is not a "sight" within the meaning of the country cousin's acts. Neither would it be safe to set him down in a great suburban highway and proceed to interpret its physiognomy. Yet such a study can be intensely interesting. After what law and manner does London creep outward over the fields? Well, she does not creep—she leaps. She plants a colony three miles out on a highway, intending an isle of quiet. The colony grows, and gradually the intervening space becomes peopled along its edges. But to the last you have London at one end and its busy colony at the other; Time never hides their duality or effaces the signs of their thin and early connection. Often, therefore, London seems to have advanced in rings or strata divided by emptier, greener neighbourhoods. Take the Kingsland-road. You know the Kingsland-road? There is no straighter march out of London than this highway, which runs north from Shoreditch to Dalston, and then, changing its name, flies on through Stoke Newington, Tottenham and Edmonton, to green Hertfordshire. A little way along it, from Shoreditch, you come to the Ironmongers' Almshouses, standing back from the road and spreading their long red roofs to the sun. You look through the railings; the sunshine glints on the gold necklet of Sir Robert Jeffery, the founder, standing in his niche; it falls softly on the garden grass; it gleams on the windows, where forty poor ladies are drinking tea. All through the eighteenth century these almshouses, which now flank a roaring highway, stood alone in the fields. The white country road wandered past them between hedgerows. Then a few Georgian houses rose opposite (they are there still), and Hoxton was seen forging its way through the fields. That dull area of factories and small houses which we know as Haggerston was a group of country seats, in one of which Halley, the astronomer, was born. To right and left of the road were meadows and market gardens. Some of these gardens flourished until sixty years ago, when they were built over; and the names of the streets tell where the myrtle (Myrtle-grove), and the laurel (Laurel-street), and the lavender (Lavender-grove), and the bosky thickets (Woodland-street) were frugally planted when the nineteenth century was young. Well, but we are anticipating. The old ladies who smelt the roses and dibbled their potatoes in the Almshouse garden when Swift was writing to Stella looked up to see the carriers' carts creaking up to Stoke Newington and Enfield. Stoke Newington was the colony, planted on the hill-top far from London. Newington Green, with its red-brick houses, its wrought-iron lamps and gateways, and the venerable sward with its weather-worn palings, is still a living witness of the eighteenth century. It shows how the Kingsland-road must have been dotted with carriages and the carts of wine-merchants and tea-men, while it yet ran between hedges, and was crossed by rabbits.

Now to this very day a rural character is seen between Shoreditch and Dalston. Shoreditch hums, Dalston hums, but between them there is calm. Not all these close populations, not all these tramcars and 'buses, and reforming vestrymen, have been able to disguise the country road joining two distinct and separated places. The moment it leaves Shoreditch the Kingsland-road takes a character of its own. It does not continue Shoreditch, but makes a new start. You find brush-makers, japanners, whip and harness-makers, glass bevellers, tin and plate workers, blind makers, shoe factors, paint rid on merchants, even a vendor of "materials for drum and tambourine makers." These miscellaneous trades are, as it were, "without the gate," and the road in which they cluster is just springing northward—a wide and hopeful highway. See how the draymen shake their reins and break into a trot! Soon—just after it crosses the Regent's Canal—the road widens with rural extravagance. The pavement becomes a market. Here are dumped articles that recall the 'sixties: queer kitchen utensils, seashells for garden and rockeries, a shade of wax fruit, a globe from a dame's school, a faded portrait of Palmerston. Observe the ancient, easy curve of the road, the broken sky-line, the red tiles, the wooden drinking trough outside the "Swan," the air of space, and leisure and quiet dealing. Observe, too, the little houses on the west side of the road, with their gardens, and hedges, and flowers, and plaster cherubs. Look at this faded name, "Sarah's Place," on a house half way to Dalston. The name is no longer used, the houses being absorbed in the great artery. But it recalls the time of the intermittent fringe of houses and of first ownership. Sarah was the helpful wife or daughter of the man who built the row. In "Susannah's Cottages, 1835," "Hiram's Cottages, 1827," "Mansfield's Cottages," and "Richard's Cottage," you read the same story of an extending London, and the exultation of her sons advancing up the Kingsland-road to sit under their own fig trees. You walk on up the great free road, and in ten minutes you are in the bustle of Dalston, and have passed from London to London. There is not a great or moderate road in London that does not reveal its story as plainly, for the persistence of early character in a street is astonishing. Eighty years ago the City-road set out to be a green suburban highway. Pleasant houses were built, and within living memory fruit was grown in their gardens. You may find these houses in patches of fallen grandeur around the Eagle Tavern. Their gardens are covered with workshops and cheap restaurants, projecting from the old building line; and their iron balconies, that were once twined with creepers, tell the tale of a green and comfortable suburb planted too near to London and overtaken by the Solway tide of business. The City-road resigned itself to a chaotic destiny. It is now a great work-a-day artery. It is of noble breadth, and the tramcars, climbing through the haze of a winter evening to Islington, seem freighted with the very burden of London's labour. At the hill-top the scene changes, and the traffic crowds merrily into the high-street of an old village, where you can almost see the toll-gate and the herds of cattle coming from the North of England to the slaughter.

Digitized by Google

The High-streets of London, mark you, are always worth study; and if you would know how a once rural street may preserve its sleep amid circumambient modernity, just turn from Oxford-street into Marylebone High-street. Or you may stand on Camberwell-green and see roaring tides of humanity go this way and that, but, by some miracle, leave Denmark-hill to be a place of quiet breathing, where the way-worn kerbs and weather-stained oak palings wander up a lovely hill, flanked with old houses and silent lawns, whose cedars imprison the night. You wander over Herne Hill, where apricots are ripening in Ruskin's garden, and descend to the new villadoms of Dulwich. Or you climb to Norwood, and just when you need to be reminded that London, though composite, is single, and that she embraces all this hill-and-dale of streets, you come to the crest of Gipsy Hill; and there, far away, over trees, over houses, over infinite haze and river smoke, in the very die-cast of your narrow view, majestically poised, the Dome and Cross! Incomparable, indeterminable, inviolable City, who shall praise or blame her enough? As the genius of Shakespeare has caused some to think him superhuman, so the magnitude and variety of London suggest thoughts that pass the bounds of reverence; and one is tempted to think that death itself must be mitigated to those who have known such plenitude of life; that even to the swathed ear there will be borne the innumerable sigh, the murmur of children playing in the streets, and the tinkling of the fire-bell in the station.

Things Seen.

The Snob.

The little museum was full of such things as render history actual, giving it that dignity of association which makes remoteness live. Through a narrow window I overlooked the plain where armies had clashed in civil contest; on the walls were displayed swords and spurs, pistols and accoutrements which that "old sloth, the plough," had discovered in its slow, unconscious fashion. I was conjuring up a vision of the opposing armies, and, indeed, had so far succeeded as to be aware of converging columns and the first thrill of onset, when my dream was broken by the arrival of other visitors. Of these, two were clergymen—one round and shining, with a full voice and crab-like eyes; the other lank and rather unkempt, with a manner which suggested polite boredom.

The little round man spoke with marked deference, and discoursed in set phrases of the museum's treasures; the other appeared to listen, but evidently his attention was not fixed, and once his eyes wandered to me; a flash of intelligence passed between us, and I could have supposed that the narrow shoulders rose to a shrug. Other people came in, but still I heard the voice flow on in dull and practised cadences.

On a little desk in the middle of the room lay a Visitors' Book. The round man planted himself before it and turned the leaves ostentatiously. The other stood indifferently by in an attitude of peaceful resignation. Then the little man, having secured an audience, wrote in the book, and said, in a full, pulpit voice, "I've entered your name, the Honourable and Reverend." At which the Honourable hurriedly departed, the audience grinned, and only the little man appeared not to understand.

The Swimmer.

We seemed to be sailing between sky and sky; the blue below was even deeper than the blue above, a colour more alive, more human in its variableness. Here and there the boat cut across lighter streaks, which indicated the set of a current about submerged rocks; again she swept on her musical way over incalculable depths. The tide was at the full; the island we had left lay astern, dimming to a purple cloud in the west; the island we were approaching gradually took shape, and revealed seaworn granite cliffs, from whose fanged summits swept up peaceful slopes aglow with heather. All about us, I knew, were the most deadly rocks and ledges, which at half-tide made the channel bristle with peril; but we sailed on under the bellying canvas with a security which made us brothers to the gulls screaming in our wake. I felt the freedom of wings.

A quarter of a mile from the little white landing-place to which we were bound, I was attracted by something moving above the water. As we neared it I saw a human face, the face of a man in whose eyes was the splendid joy of the strong swimmer. He seemed absolute master of the element in which he moved; now he turned upon his back to face the east, now he surged forward into the track of the westering sun. All at once my supposed freedom shrank into something hardly better than an exalted bondage. His was the true liberty, fearless and alone.

Digitized by Google

Insanity in Literature.

THE books published lately in Paris are certainly calculated to discourage the boldest reader. They reveal a curious double current of insanity: the insanity of hate and the insanity of indecency. The dominant note of both phases of insanity in this terrible literature is a lugubrious dulness. The old esprit Gaulois, as we understand it, was gay and gracious even when it was obscene. Wit, playfulness, good humour, went with its coarseness, and it was not without a human, healthy, sentimental touch. But all that seems fast becoming a memory. Anatole France is our single link with the urbane and classic school. The old-fashioned grace and gaiety of the race remain with us as long as he writes, and with him we still taste the beauty, the finish, the clarity, and simplicity of exquisite French prose. But Anatole France is one, and the others, alas! are many. They are so many and so very dreadful that I open a new book in dismay, asking myself if it can possibly prove worse than the preceding one. To do it justice, it nearly always does prove worse. But it is not the hate, the obscenity, the improbability of all this modern fiction I find its worst features: it is the awful dreariness, the dead level of its dulness. Not a trace of wit or humour, not a smile or a ray of sunshine; it is the astonishing absence of spontaneity and charm that most surprises me after this.

When you remember Daudet, both the man and his books, with his infinite tenderness, his humour, his charm, and laughing delicacy of touch, and then turn to the appalling books of his son, Léon Daudet, one asks oneself in sorrow what can be the value of heredity. Or rather, it would seem, we are forced to conclude, that only the evil remains, and blemishes of the father spread and grow to blight all freshness in the son. A. Daudet wrote one unjust and ugly book, L'Immortel, a book which revealed the rancour and hate at the bottom of his heart. It showed that this great, lovable child could hate with vindictiveness and bitter intensity. It was a blemish. But how charmingly redeemed, and what treasures of sweetness, indulgence, kindliness, and abundant good-humour went along with it! But see what a moral disease in the son this point of bitterness and rancour in the father has become. For Léon Daudet's literature is the very insanity of hate. He offered us a first taste of its quality in his abominable Les Morticoles. Still there was a vestige of lucidity left to give a kind of uncertain promise of talent. The author had not quite gone mad in the sombre depths of his hate. It was the mauvaise action of the father in his Immortel repeated in a more repulsive form. Léon Daudet had failed in medicine, and infamously avenged himself by black calumny of all the medical profession. Medicine survived the attacks, and doctors and surgeons were found to be as indispensable and respected as before. There was one bad doctor the less in the world and a worse author in his stead. Since then Léon Daudet has written many other books which have attracted slight notice, and deserved less. Having lost what meagre measure of freshness in style youth gave him, he has grown prematurely aged through dulness.

Léon Daudet's last book—which, along with the fresh monstrosity of Pierre Louys Le Roi Pausole, suggested to me the idea of insanity in modern French literature—Le Pays des Parlementeurs, tumbles us into such depths of gratuitous calumny as to make the book, if it were not offered in deadly seriousness as a study of the French politics of our day, a caricature of the wildest kind. The unfortunate Rothschilds, under the name of Warmeschwein, are incorporated in a single individual who "smells of death." He is the father of the sect which also "smells of death," and holds the fortunes of France in the hollow of his iniquitous hands. The book is dedicated with tenderness and admiration to Edouard Drumont, "prophet in his land." The servants who reply to Rothschild's imperious ring are senators and deputies. They crawl on their knees before him and receive weekly cheques. The Presidents Waldeck Rousseau and Brisson simultaneously brush his trousers and receive with gratitude a kick for their pains. He calls the Prime Minister his minister, and threatens him with a loss of office in case of disobedience. President Faure, Léon Daudet gravely asserts, was assassinated by the Jews in "a subtle and lewd way." This is a delicate reference to the cause of the late lamented President's death. Rothschild has a "bureau des souillures." This is where all the Christian Parliamentary consciences are purchased and Christian souls are irreparably soiled and corrupted. Those Parliamentarians rich enough not to need bribes go there "attracted by the odour of death and the delights of putrefaction." And this is supposed to be a serious picture of modern Paris! There is really supposed to exist somewhere in Paris a ghoul or vampire like Léon Daudet's caricatural Rothschild, in a sort of moral cavern, in which he devours poor Christian souls by the thousand. Ministries rise and fall at his potent will, and he holds the country through terror of war, which it knows he can proclaim by a nod. He has only to give the signal to his friend and slave the Emperor of Germany, or bid England prepare her battleships.

All this would be comic enough if it were not so lamentably sad. To witness this steady degradation of the wittiest, the most interesting and brightest race of the world through a pitiful and base army of raging pamphleteers and pornographers! To see what nationalism has made of a once charming and sprightly talent like Jules Lemaître's! To read such foaming and infamous nonsense written by men not regarded by their fellow citizens as fit subjects for Le Salpêtrière or some refuge for diseased minds! For all these shameless lunatics of the pen are stark, infuriated anti-Dreyfusards. Even Gyp, who used to make us laugh with her very improper but witty studies of fashionable and titled Paris, where, according to her, there does not seem to be a virtuous woman or an honourable man (I will not say "gentleman," for Gyp seems never to suspect what that article may be)—Gyp has become as dull and vulgar as Drumont or Rochefort. Her novels are now only gross attacks upon foreigners and Jews. In her latest, Friquette, she shows us a wicked Jewish millionaire planning to seduce a little circus star, an angel of purity and innocence. He, too, smells of death—is he not a Jew? How about St. Joseph, the Virgin Mary, the twelve Apostles, not to speak of Christ? Well, when Gyp wants to paint the superlative wickedness of the Hebrew millionaire she makes Friquette cry: "Oh, he is a dreadful man! He is a Dreyfusard. He subscribes to the Aurore and the Siècle!" Apart from the question of politics and race, is not this a frightful descent for the amusing and witty Gyp? To have written Le Petit Bob, and then gravely tell us that a man is an ogre of vice and villainy because he subscribes to the Aurore and the Siècle! Maurice Barrès, who once had real talent, who gave us a most remarkable description of that strange, beautiful little town of St. Louis amid dead lagoons, Aigues Mortes, lost it in the morass of hate invented by nationalism and the Ligue de la Patrie Française. He and his seven Lorrains have soothed our expectations into sleep that waketh not again. Bourget, dilettante in politics, has kept clear of virulence and hate. He only clamours for revived faith, which is legitimate; and is too elegant and intelligent, though dull enough, heaven knows! with his eternal psychology and intellectual casuistry, to wallow in anti-Semitism. Let all the world be Catholic, in the perfumed, artistic sense of the word, and M. Bourget will allow the poor Jews to live. There are domestic reasons why he cannot consistently talk of the race as "smelling of death."

Digitized by Google

The other phase of insanity in literature is even more deplorable and more hopelessly sad. It is scarcely drearier reading, but how much harder! To wade through the mire of virulent hate offered us as an intellectual promenade round Parisian parliamentarism by Léon Daudet is the sorriest entertainment for our leisure. But it is still less revolting, less marked by irremediable decay and deliberate prostitution of talent than Pierre Louys' singularly evil Roi Pausole. Worse books than this atrocious pornography have reached me since its appearance, but by more insignificant writers. All bear the same stamp: an absence of emotion, of one moment's sincerity among the host of foul personages who move in these countless pages; an unapproachable, inconceivable depth of callous depravity, a heartlessness surely never before exhibited by a whole class, however small, still representative; a lack of anything approaching hilarity, a morose, uniform, vicious sadness, the sadness of the damned soul condemned to sin, not because he likes it, but because it is his punishment as a damned soul; not even allowed the dignity of tears, remorse and repentance, but constrained to grin and sneer, to stain and dim with his infamous, pestilent breath the mirror of honest life. In Zola's books you hold your nose at times, but there was the writer's sincerity, a certain heavy conscientiousness and conviction to help you through the mire, and then sometimes Zola bursts out in the lyric and profoundly emotional mood. But these insane erotics have no lyric hours, no moments of emotion, no sincerity or conviction. They do not ask you to hold your nose. They simply make you long to build an asylum for the lost souls of literature. Not long ago I heard, at a dinner table, advanced the conclusion that the recovery of the consumptive Pierre Louys, some years ago, just after the appearance of his first literary crime, Aphrodite, is a proof against the existence of Providence, for had he died, as all expected then, he would not have perpetrated the worse horrors that have followed it. Certainly it would have been a clear gain to French letters had the Roi Pausole not been written. When writers, with as good a will as the ineffable Louys, who are just as sickly and inexpressibly corrupt, as destitute as he of gaiety, wit, humour, and virility in the best sense of the word, who, to quote his brother in literary insanity, Léon Daudet, are as morosely attracted by the delights of putrefaction and the odour of moral death, but who write less well, read this master's lucubrations, his persistent study of remorseless and infinite lubricity, they think success in such a path no difficult achievement, since all demanded of the writer is not to have a story to tell, not to try to tell one, not to be ashamed, to go one better than the last pornographer, to rob life of all joy and charm and sweetness and cleanliness.

HANNAH LYNCH.

"The English of the English."

UNDER this title Mr. Julian Ralph has written an article in Harper's Magazine, which, as we think, abounds in mistakes. Yet we have a certain sympathy with an American, whose intention it is to turn the tables on English censors of the American tongue. We have all railed at Americanisms, without sufficiently defining or qualifying our repugnances. And now Mr. Ralph comes along and levels a general charge of eccentricity against the English of the English. We like his courage. Unfortunately, Mr. Ralph does not seem to have ascertained what the English of the English really is. Again and again he attributes to us usages with which we are quite unfamiliar. His article goes to show how difficult it is for a stranger to find out what is typical of the country in which he finds himself and avoid taking accidents for essentials and freaks for habits.

Mr. Ralph's opening statement should have given a different tone to his article, which is written in a vein very near to taunt. He says of his own countrymen:

> We speak English; but we have built up our forms of English expression upon the English of a few shires of the old country as it was spoken between two and three centuries ago, while they have been blending and changing the speech of all their home peoples during the same period. The result is that an American can hardly utter a sentence in England without calling attention to the difference between his speech and that of the people about him.

Allowing this broad statement to pass as correct, ought it not to chasten Mr. Ralph's spirit, and give him a certain respect for that English which is based, not upon the speech of a few shires, as it was heard two and three centuries ago, but upon the speech of all the shires as it has been developed in the country of its birth and nurture? Little does this thought lower Mr. Ralph's crest. Just as little does the fact that several thousand miles of water divide England from the United States appear to suggest to him that differences are inevitable and even desirable.

Many of the differences of speech which Mr. Ralph names are so trivial and so easily grasped that they hardly seem worth mention; others are wrongly stated. Here is Mr. Ralph's first batch:

> If you ask a guest at your home in England whether he likes his meat rare, he asks what you said, because he does not understand you. He calls meat underdone when it is not thoroughly cooked. If you tell him you fear the asparagus is canned, he is at a loss again, because he would have said it was tinned. To ask him to pass the powdered sugar will again set him to wondering, for he calls it icing sugar, generally, though he knows that it is sometimes called caster or sifted sugar. And if you have candy on the table you may not call it so without betraying your foreign origin, for he calls candy "sweets," abbreviated from "sweetmeats," and used to designate all preserves, puddings, pies, candies, and jams.
>
> To go farther along the eccentricities of English at the dining-table, most persons know, I suppose, that the beet is called beet-root, corn-starch is corn flour, corned beef (or a particular cut of it) is called "silversides of beef," and napkins are serviettes.
>
> If in a shop I say, "I want a paper of pins," the clerk says, "Thank you. A great many Americans in London, now, aren't there?" "Oh yes," I say; "I meant a packet of pins." To ask for a spool of cotton is to set a clerk to staring at you, and to speak of a baby-carriage is to speak of the unknown, because spools of cotton or silk are called reels, and baby-carriages are known as perambulators—shortened to "prams" in the speech of millions.

English hosts who would not understand a request to be served with meat rare are surely themselves rare. "Underdone" is the more usual word, but the use of "rare" would be both understood and welcomed at most tables. The difference between canned and tinned is trivial. As for powdered sugar, the request for it would hardly excite remark, the expression being really more instantly intelligible, and, we believe, nearly as frequent in England as icing, caster, or sifted sugar. Candy on the table might be called sweets, if its identity were not immediately seen; but there would be no confusion with the "sweets" that had preceded it, an expression which is only used "to designate all preserves, puddings, pies, candies, and jams" collectively. Beet is not called beet-root, for beet is used of the vegetable as a basis of sugar in manufacture, beet-root of the vegetable served at dinner. "Napkins are serviettes." They are, but we rejoice to say that serviettes are napkins. Both words are used, and we believe that the elect prefer napkins; at any rate, we do. Similarly, if we wanted some pins we should be as likely to ask for a "paper" as a "packet," but we should not expect, on the strength of our use of "paper," to be asked what sort of passage we had. Mr. Ralph draws a pathetic picture of an English lady shopping in London, and asking for a dress preserver, an egg-whisk, a coal-scoop, and a camisole, instead of the American dress-shield, egg-beater, coal-scuttle, and corset-cover. He should know that an English housewife regularly speaks of an egg-beater. She certainly does not ask for a coal-scoop when she wants a coal-scuttle, though a small shop-keeper, intent on the jargon of his trade, may recommend a coal-scoop to her attention. She calls a coal-scuttle a coal-scuttle, meaning an open vessel made of galvanised iron. But when she buys a coal-box she asks whether the coal-scoop is with it, meaning its short-handled shovel. She may ask for a camisole in preference to the American corset-cover, but we can inform Mr. Ralph that she is far more likely to ask for an under-bodice or bodice-slip than either. Nor does our habit of calling a letter-box a pillar-box lead us, as Mr. Ralph supposes, to call a lamp-post a lamp-pillar. An elevator is certainly a lift, and as elevators become more common this brevity becomes more acceptable. "A picture-mat is a mount." We have no wish to recriminate; our whole point is that these differences are immaterial, or merely interesting. But we cannot conceal our satisfaction that in England a picture-mat is a mount. Mr. Ralph says that the American instalment plan is in England the hire-system. We use both expressions. "The American word yard, meaning the space around or beside a house, is unknown." Really! "The English do not understand what a pocket-book is. They understand the word porte-monnaie, but never use it. Purse is their word for the thing they carry money in." Are we to understand that the word purse is unknown in America? Because if so, it seems rather curious that the very first sentence of the latest addition to the American "Dollar Library" of novels describes the heroine as taking money from her "purse." "One buys most dry goods at a mercer's." Does one? "Chickens are not chickens, but are fowls." We have observed this to be so; but we always asked for chickens. "When you inquire after the health of anyone, he or she is always fit if in good health, and seedy if not well." Surely this does not exhaust our stock of health-reports. "Scrub-women are charwomen." That is true, and we fancy they will insist on remaining charwomen. But why call the word an "eccentricity"?

Digitized by Google

Mr. Ralph's least excusable fall comes at the end of his article. Tired of comparing the two languages on common ground, he says:

> I am going to be so bold as to say that Dickens, greatest celebrator of the London poor, either had no ear for even the coarsest variations of his mother-tongue, or else became so Londonese himself, that he did not notice the talk all around him. What he set down as the speech of the masses I never once heard in London, and what the cockney lingo really is he gives no hint of in a single line that I can recall in all his books. . . . It may be a shocking thing to say, but Barry Pain knows London better than the great genius at story-telling did, for the speech which has clung to these masses missed the ear of Dickens, who not only let it go, but invented out of the whole cloth, not any dialect, but a number of methods of expression such as I never heard in use in London or anywhere else.

Mr. Ralph has not suspected that the Cockney dialect is constantly changing, and has changed greatly within living memory. Dickens reproduced what he heard, but it was not the speech that Mr. Barry Pain hears to-day. Moreover, it is not possible for a novelist to reproduce the Cockney dialect faithfully and continuously. Mr. Pain does it in short verses and sketches; but a novel in which the pure lingo of 'Arry were kept up from page to page would be intolerable.

Correspondence.

Life and Literature.

SIR,—I am afraid that Mr. Cole does not quite apprehend either Stevenson's meaning or the purport of my own remarks.

Stevenson says: "People think that striking situations or good dialogue are got by studying life." This implies that a study of life is not directly essential to the production of a story, as the anonymous gentleman who first broached the subject clearly saw. Ergo, when I support this implication, do I not agree entirely with R. L. S.?

Mr. Cole misrepresents Stevenson when he says the latter "merely said that life was not a place where dialogue and incident could be found ready-made," etc.; he seems quite blind to the literary sense of the matter. Stevenson, by implication, and as a man of letters, certainly does put the study of life in a secondary place for the literary purpose. To say that he "deprecates" it is another matter; he need not go out of his way to do so; the study of life was a business altogether subservient to his art. As Mr. Cole says, "Life itself is infinitely too complex . . . for any of them to be taken as they stand," etc.; which is one reason why a novelist inclines to create a coherent world of his own, in which to try the depths of the wisdom he has half-unconsciously acquired while looking out upon the "heterogeneous normal manifestations" of ordinary life.

Mr. Cole's rather abstruse interpretation of Stevenson's meaning is really beside the point; we all know that art is largely imaginative selection. Of the study of life itself (which is the point), Stevenson, says Mr. Cole, "says nothing," apart from the quotation given above! Mr. Cole then boldly judges that Stevenson was a student of life, on the evidence of his work. "Stevenson, of all men, made his work a record of what he learnt from life by careful and unremitting study."

This is hard on Stevenson; for his books of travel and his essays are rather impressionistic than studious, and his novels are the work of one to whom romance and art were everything.—I am, etc.,

C. T. PODMORE.

22, Albert-place, Longsight, Manchester.

The New "Hazlitt."

SIR,—Of your grace, may I inquire through your columns whether it is too late for Messrs. Dent to reconsider the prospectus of their Library Edition of Hazlitt? These publishers have laid all lovers of the English classics under a heavy debt of gratitude for their admirable editions of the works of other authors, and I looked for this prospectus with considerable interest. But, now that I have seen it, I must confess frankly that I am much disappointed with it.

The type of the proposed page is much too small. In the edition of Hazlitt's writings comprised in seven volumes of the "Bohn Libraries" (containing three-fourths of the works mentioned in the present prospectus), with all its faults, the page is set up in a larger and more readable type; and I, for one, hesitate to spend four guineas upon a smaller type edition, which only promises to add about thirty per cent. (and that of less considerable matter) to what I already possess in Messrs. Bell's edition. The first volume, as projected, will contain essays which occupy 574 of Messrs. Bell's pages, and to that bulk of material must be added Mr. Henley's Introduction—which, it is to be hoped, will be long rather than short. Here is too much compression. Then, too, when one observes the infrequency of paragraphs in many of Hazlitt's writings, one cannot help thinking of the clumsy appearance which will be presented by page after page of unbroken print in Messrs. Dent's format.

Digitized by Google

Of the Napoleon enough has been said by competent critics. Although the latest edition is in the hands of the remainder booksellers, this work is an example of sustained literary effort, such as is afforded by none other of Hazlitt's.

I may say that I miss from the prospectus any promise of the indices which are the gravest want in the Bohn edition. For the purposes of ready reference, indices are especially invaluable in the case of works of a miscellaneous character, such as those of Hazlitt, who touches again and again upon the same topics—often in the most unlooked-for connections.

To sum up, I should have preferred to give, say, six or seven guineas for a really complete edition, printed in a larger type upon a lighter page, and furnished with ample indices. As it is, what with the close-printing, the small type, and the incomplete character of the proposed edition, I am not tempted to risk four guineas upon it. I know that I am not alone in holding the opinion which I have attempted to express in this letter, and would fain hope that Messrs. Dent might still see their way to issue a revised prospectus.—I am, etc.,

Edinburgh. "N."

Owing to pressure on our space several letters are held over.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 99 (New Series).

Last week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best verse, not exceeding sixteen lines, entitled "Sea Birds." We award the prize to the writer of the following (H. C. P.), whose full name and address do not appear to have reached us. Will he kindly send them?

O happy bird, low poised above the blue,
 Scorning the toilsome earth,
Since downward first thy circling pinions flew
 From the high crannied home which gave thee birth;
Two kingdoms are thy own: o'er sky and sea
Thou wanderest ever free.

O happy bird, thou hast no thought nor care—
 I would not have thee know—
Whether 'twas hate or love or wild despair
 That forced that yearning cry so long ago:
"Ah! could I with the halcyon take my flight,
When the blue wave flowers white!"

[H. C. P.]

Other verses are as follows:

With your grandly sweeping motion, O ye strong birds of the ocean,
 You are flying, dipping, flying o'er the waves that rise and fall;
In higher air soft gliding, or deep in waves low hiding,
 You mock their undulations as you float above them all.

Far, far at sea we meet you, and in wildest storms we greet you,
 With steadfast will, untiring wings, a-battling for your life;
A-swishing and a-swirling, through strongest winds self-hurling—
 And it's oh, the deep enjoyment of a strength divine—and strife!

You seem an incarnation of the spirit of the nation,
 With the roving and the force—the independence of the sea:
In the air there's room for wheeling—and there's no fear of the ceiling:
 And it's pleasant just to try your wings as far as you can see.

And you do not care a feather if it's bright or stormy weather,
 And rightly—given trust and stern endeavour—where's the care?
So, though salt sea-spray be blinding, we must go on never-minding,
 Like you, dear birds, for, truly—God and Love are everywhere!

[W. S. B., Blackheath.]

Ye who the seas outbraving,
 Wherever the black waves throng,
Make mock of the ocean's raving,
 Make mock of the storm-wind's song:

Who fill the air with your clamour
 Amid the Antarctic floes,
And shatter the silent glamour
 That broods o'er the northern snows.

Sea-birds, old ocean's daughters,
 Ye know our island race,
Sons of the winds and waters,
 Who roam from place to place,

Who follow your flight out yonder
 Betwixt the sea and the sky,
And crave no lot but to wander
 And rest not till they die.

[W. H. C., Cambridge.]

Like bow drawn light along the strings,
To the sea's lute, a soft wind sings;
Songs of faint, sweet, unworldly things—
Of breeze and surf—Ah! flash of wings—
 Sea-birds go by!

Poised on a wave's turn—then away!
Grace of white curves 'neath boulders grey,
Lost in the haze across the bay,
What long-shut doors open and stay,
 Sea-birds go by!

Gleaming and song with an empty sky,
Piercing call of a gull's long cry!
Far hundred leagues the cities lie,
We want them not, the sea nor I,
 Where birds go by!

[E. C. M. D., Devon.]

Other verses received from the following:

A. E. W. Greenock; A. A. B., West Bromwich; F. B. D., Torquay: T. C., Buxted; M. H. J. L., Folkestone; H. P. W., Otterburn: F. H. C., Tunbridge Wells; A. R. P., Hampstead; J. R. W., St. Ives; E. H., Chelsea; J. P., New Tredegar; P. R., Birmingham; R. R. W., Sudbury; A. D. B., Liverpool; E. R., London; E. C. J., Cairnforth: J. F. H., Ramsgate: E. H. H., Streatham; A. F., Exmouth: H. V. S., Shepherd's Bush; P. L. B., Tonbridge; C. C., London: M. A. M., Stirling.

Competition No. 100 (New Series).

"The Academy might offer a prize for the best list of the novels which have effected revolutions in law or manners." Thus Mr. W. P. James in the St. James's Gazette. A good suggestion: we will. Competitors should state briefly their reasons for the inclusion of each novel in their lists. For the sake of uniformity the following arrangement should be adopted:

Pickwick Papers (Charles Dickens).—Because until this novel appeared the theory of Tittlebats was unknown to science, and the source of the Hampstead ponds, now understood by every London child, was a dark and perplexing riddle.

——— ().—&c.

——— ().—&c.

Rules.

Answers, addressed, "Literary Competition, The Academy, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, August 21. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

Special cloth cases for binding the half-yearly volumes of the Academy can be supplied for 1s. each. The price of the bound half-yearly volume is 8s. 9d. Communications should be addressed to the Publisher, 43, Chancery-lane.

Digitized by Google

NOW READY.

WAS ALFRED KING OF ENGLAND?

By A SAXON.

Demy 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

A brief review of one of our latest text-books, showing the true relations of Prince Alfred both to the Saxon people in England and to her Roman invaders.

HARRISON & SONS, Publishers, 59, Pall Mall, S.W.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED).

ENLARGED AND CLASSIFIED CATALOGUE

(Over 500 pages, 8vo, bound in green cloth).

All the Principal Works in Circulation at the Library

ARRANGED under SUBJECTS.

Forming a Comprehensive Guide to Notable Publications in most Branches of Literature.

Books of Permanent Interest on POLITICAL and SOCIAL TOPICS, the ARMY, NAVY, ARTS, SCIENCE, PHILOSOPHY, SPORT, THEOLOGY, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, and FICTION.

Price 1s. 6d

Also a FOREIGN CATALOGUE containing BOOKS in FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, RUSSIAN, and SPANISH. Price 1s. 6d.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY,

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET;

241, Brompton Road; and 48, Queen Victoria Street, London.

LONDON LIBRARY,

ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.

Patron—HIS MAJESTY THE KING. President—LESLIE STEPHEN, ESQ.

Vice-Presidents—The Right Hon. LORD ACTON; the Right Hon. A. J. BALFOUR, M.P.; The Right Hon. W. E. H. LECKY, M.P., D.C.L.; HERBERT SPENCER, Esq.

Trustees—Right Hon. LORD AVEBURY, F.R.S.; Right Hon. EARL of ROSEBERY, K.G.; Right Hon. Sir M. GRANT DUFF, G.C.S.I.

Committee—Rev. Canon AINGER; Dr. J. H. BRIDGES; Professor LEWIS CAMPBELL; J. W. COURTHOPE, Esq., C.B.; EARL OF CREWE; AUSTIN DOBSON, Esq.; SYDNEY GEDGE, Esq.; Sir A. GEIKIE, F.R.S.; Sir R. GIFFEN, K.C.B., F.R.S.; EDMUND GOSSE, Esq., LL.D.; Mrs. J. R. GREEN; FREDERIC HARRISON, Esq.; Sir C. P. ILBERT, K.C.S.I.; Sir C. M. KENNEDY, C.B., K.C.M.G.; SIDNEY LEE, Esq.; W. S. LILLY, Esq.; SIDNEY J. LOW, Esq.; FRANK T. MARZIALS, Esq.; Sir F. POLLOCK, Bart.; Rev. J. RIGG, D.D.; S. ARTHUR STRONG, Esq.; H. R. TEDDER, Esq.; Sir SPENCER WALPOLE, K.C.B.; A. W. WARD, Esq., Litt.D.

The Library contains about 200,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in various Languages. Subscription, £3 a year; Life Membership, according to age. Fifteen Volumes are allowed to Country and Ten to Town Members. Reading Room open from Ten to Half-past Six. CATALOGUE, FIFTH EDITION, 2 vols., 1888, royal 8vo, price 21s.; to Members, 16s.

C. T. HAGBERG WRIGHT, LL.D., Secretary and Librarian.

'Twixt Plate and Lip;

OR,

The Common Sense of Eating.

A HEALTH HAND-BOOK FOR EVERY DAY,

WITH SPECIAL ADVICE AS TO DIET AND REGIMEN IN HEALTH AND SICKNESS,

A POPULAR SUMMARY OF THE SYMPTOMS OF DYSPEPSIA AND INDIGESTION,

AND A NOTE ON THE SCIENTIFIC AND RATIONAL TREATMENT OF THOSE AILMENTS.

12th EDITION.

 This little book may be recommended to the general reader as a sound and safe guide to the common sense management of the stomach. The Publishers, at 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, will be pleased to send a free copy to any reader of the Academy. Early application necessary.

LONDON: 46, HOLBORN VIADUCT, E.C.

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO., LTD.

NEW 6s. BOOKS.

CHRIST AND ANTI-CHRIST.

THE DEATH OF THE GODS.

BEING NO. 1 OF

DMITRI MEREJKOWSKI'S GREAT TRILOGY.

Authorised Translation by F. HERBERT TRENCH, M.A.

SIR HECTOR. ROBERT MACHRAY.

THE STORY OF A SCOTS GENTLEMAN.

THE SKIPPER OF BARNCRAIG.

GABRIEL SETOUN.

MARR'D IN MAKING.

BARONESS VON HUTTEN.

"Is arousing widespread interest."—The Bookman. "Beth is an extraordinarily real human being."—Daily Graphic. "As a study of womankind Beth is admirable."—Westminster Gazette. "The picture is excellent and most illuminating."—The Candid Friend.

THE STORY OF EVA. WILL PAYNE.

"Everything in this novel is wrought with care, and the conclusion is satisfying alike as a dramatic solution of a difficult problem and as a study of the highest human emotion. The book is of the frankest, but never evil."

Glasgow Herald.

KING'S END. ALICE BROWN.

"We give the palm to 'King's End.'"—Globe. "Instinct with sympathy, spiritual insight, and a most winsome blending of humour and pathos."—The Pilot. "Nobody who admires Miss Wilkins's delicate art should miss 'King's End.'"—The Bookman. "Should be acceptable to a wide circle of readers."—Athenæum. "Artistically conceived and finely wrought."

Manchester Guardian.

ENSIGN KNIGHTLEY. A. E. W. MASON.

"Excellent."—Athenæum. "We can recommend the book. A refreshing volume."—World. "Of particular excellence."—The Bookman.

RETALIATION. HERBERT FLOWERDEW.

"The climax of this original dramatic story is most successful, and there is not a wearisome line in the book."—Leeds Mercury. "A thoroughly good and sound piece of work.....We are personally interested as much in the characters as in the episodes; Essie in particular is most admirably done."

Daily Chronicle.

A JOURNEY TO NATURE.

P. J. MOWBRAY.

Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"A book in whose company one can spend a profitable and happy half-hour whether in town or country."—Scotsman. "Bright and original from cover to cover."—The Outlook.

ASIA AND EUROPE.

MEREDITH TOWNSEND.

Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

".....The work contains enough thought to furnish a careful reader with intellectual food for a twelvemonth, and is a worthy monument of a life spent in studying the relations between Asia and Europe. The record of its author is sufficient guarantee that it is inspired throughout by a wide and tolerant judgment."—Daily Chronicle.

LAKE GENEVA AND ITS LITERARY LANDMARKS. FRANCIS GRIBBLE.

Illustrated. Gilt top, 18s.

"A thoroughly charming book."—Daily Mail. "The volume is a happy medley of history, biography, and anecdote, written with grace and charm."

Manchester Guardian.

WOMEN AND MEN OF THE FRENCH RENAISSANCE. EDITH SICHEL.

Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 16s. net.

"The scenes have life and atmosphere, and testify to close and sympathetic study."—The Scotsman.

2, WHITEHALL GARDENS, WESTMINSTER.

Digitized by Google

Published To-day, price 6d.

LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE.

SEPTEMBER.

THE GOLD-STEALERS: a Story of Waddy. By EDWARD DYSON. Chapters IX.-XII.

EIGHTEENTH-CENTURY LONDON THROUGH FRENCH EYE-GLASSES. By GEORGE PASTON.

THE BIRDS' BATH. By W. H. POLLOCK.

PASSON'S DILEMMA. By EDITH C. M. DART.

ESSEX and the EARLY BOTANISTS. By the Rev. JOHN VAUGHAN.

ACCORDING to the CODE. By ELIZABETH L. BANKS.

ENGLISH FLOWERS in an EGYPTIAN GARDEN. By Mrs. BUTCHER.

AT the SIGN of the SHIP. By ANDREW LANG.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN & Co.

"The Thrush."

Edited by MULLETT ELLIS.

"THE THRUSH," a Periodical for original Poetry, is intended to bring thoughts of beauty and the consolation of exalted ideas into the hearts of the people.

Since its origin, on the first day of the new Century, "THE THRUSH" has published many beautiful Poems by the following writers:—

Dr. Richard Garnett, W. E. Henley, F. Prevost Battersby, Keble Howard, Harold Begbie, A. P. Graves, Nora Hopper, L. Alma-Tadema, Norman Gale, C. W. Wynne, Dr. Gilbert Murray, John Hutchinson, Hon. Albinia Brodrick, Arthur Symons, N. Carruthers Gould, Clifton Bingham, Lady Margaret Sackville, Hamilton Aidé, Edgar Fawcett, Lady Gilbert, Lady Florence Douglas, Rev. W. J. Dawson, Rev. F. Bentley Greeves, Victor Plarr, Sir Wyke Bayliss, P.R.I., the 1st Lord Lytton, and Mullett Ellis.

In future numbers we are promised the work of many of the leading Poets of our day, including the Right Rev. Lord Bishop of Derry and Raphoe, Dean of Armagh, the Rev. Canon H. D. Rawnsley, Herbert Morrah, Israel Gollancz, M.A., Wm. Canton, Edwin Hamilton, M.A., Justin Huntly McCarthy, Dollie Radford, Louise Chandler Moulton, Sir Lewis Morris, M.A., Frankfort Moore, and Thomas Hardy.

"THE THRUSH" for August contains the Prize Sonnets awarded by the Modern Language Lecturer in a Competition amongst the Students at Newnham College, Cambridge.

The Rules for a Prize Poem Competition, open to Subscribers to "THE THRUSH," are also contained in the August Number.

THE FIRST PRIZE IS £10 STERLING.

See "THE THRUSH."

By order at all Booksellers'.

THE OLDEST AND BEST (1901 EDITION).

DEBRETT'S PEERAGE.
DEBRETT'S BARONETAGE.
DEBRETT'S KNIGHTAGE.
DEBRETT'S COMPANIONAGE.

(Illustrated and increased to 1,950 pp.)

Including all recent Honours and an Appendix of Royal Warrant Holders.

Royal Edition, complete work, 31s. 6d., cloth gilt; or Library Edition, 2 vols., 16s. 6d. each.

ALSO

DEBRETT'S HOUSE OF COMMONS AND THE JUDICIAL BENCH.

(Illustrated. 450 pp.)

Gives particulars of results at last two General Elections and at all Bye-Elections, Biographies of M.P.'s, Judges of High Courts, County Courts and Colonies, Recorders, &c., &c. Cloth gilt, 7s. 6d.

DEAN & SON, LIMITED, 160A, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S POPULAR NOVELS.

THE LADY OF LYNN.

By Sir WALTER BESANT. Author of "The Orange Girl," &c.

With 12 Illustrations by G. DEMAIN-HAMMOND. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"Certain of wide popularity,.....Sir Walter Besant was a born story-teller, like another and greater Sir Walter before him; and so 'The Lady of Lynn' will not only obtain but deserve a wide and long-continued approbation."—Globe.

"The story is sure to please anybody who likes an English novel."—Scotsman.

THE HONOUR of the ARMY, &c. By Emile Zola.

Edited by E. A. VIZETELLY. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"To many readers M. Zola's new volume will be at once a revelation and a delight. He stands revealed as a humorist of the first order The story which gives its title to the volume is as impressive a piece of work as we have met with for some time. But 'Nantas' is our favourite. It is a story of extraordinary power and subtlety."—New Age.

POPULAR SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

A FORBIDDEN NAME: a Story of the Court of Catherine the Great. By FRED WHISHAW.

"Mr. Fred. Whishaw's customary skill in telling Russian stories has not deserted him in 'A Forbidden Name.'.....The tale is brightly written, and contains much thrilling incident."—Daily Telegraph.

THE MILLIONAIRE MYSTERY. By Fergus Hume, Author of "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab," &c.

"A capital novel, which no one will read without enjoying."—Scotsman.

WILDERSMOOR. By C. L. Antrobus, Author of "Quality Corner." SECOND EDITION.

"'Wildersmoor' is rarely excellent as a novel. Every character is well drawn; two are as new in fiction as each is true to the reader's perception.....Yet it is not so much these qualities that make the book so delightful, so memorable among novels, as the tone, the thought, the quiet, sad humour, the fine observation, the pity, and the poetry of it."—World.

MONONIA: a Love Story of "Forty-eight." By Justin McCARTHY, Author of "Dear Lady Disdain," &c.

"One of the most delightful Irish novels that hand ever penned.....and while everything that Mr. McCarthy has ever written is characteristic of himself, graceful, pure, and true, and essentially manly, in this his latest work he has excelled himself The book as a whole is a magnificent one."—Irish Independent.

THIS TROUBLESOME WORLD. By the Authors of "The Medicine Lady." SECOND EDITION.

"Full of sparkling dialogue and stirring scenes."—Lady.

HER LADYSHIP'S SECRET. By William Westall, Author of "With the Red Eagle," &c.

"A sound story, well conceived and capably told."—Outlook.

RUNNING AMOK: a Story of Adventure. By George MANVILLE FENN.

"If you are in the mood for stories of hairbreadth escapes you will enjoy Mr. Manville Fenn's 'Running Amok' at least sufficiently to pass pleasantly for you a couple of exciting hours."—Truth.

A SORE TEMPTATION. By John K. Leys.

"Mr. Leys possesses to perfection the knack of conceiving and constructing a good story.....'A Sore Temptation' might almost figure as a model for story-writers. The threads are always perfectly clear, and the interest never droops."—Daily Express.

THREE-AND-SIXPENNY STORIES.

DEACON BRODIE; or, Behind the Mask. By Dick DONOVAN, Author of "A Detective's Triumphs," &c.

"Bustling enough and 'bluggy' enough for the most insatiable schoolboy."—Scotsman.

TOLD by the TAFFRAIL. By Sundowner.

"The stories have the great merit of being brief and bright, and as interesting as they are varied in subject and vivacious in treatment Altogether, this is a delightful book, and will be thoroughly appreciated wherever a good story gracefully and cleverly told can find favour."—Sheffield Daily Telegraph.

CHAPENGA'S WHITE MAN. By A. Werner.

"The story of this little brown imp is fascinating: the easy, quaint, generally unexpected humorousness of the author's manner; the slight but effective touches by which the respective characters of the actors in the stirring little drama are portrayed; the diablerie and charm of Chapenga, and the quiet, masterly nobility of Beckford, combined with the entire novelty of the scene, the people, and the situation, are things to be grateful for."—World.

THE FAMILY SCAPEGRACE. By James Payn.

PAUL FERROLL. By Mrs. Archer Clive.

WHY PAUL FERROLL KILLED HIS WIFE. By Mrs. ARCHER CLIVE.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S SIX-SHILLING NOVELS in the Press

DESPAIR'S LAST JOURNEY. By D. Christie Murray.

THE TRIUMPH of HILARY BLACHLAND. By Bertram Mitford.

A SOWER of WHEAT. By Harold Bindloss.

A FIGHT to a FINISH. By Florence Warden.

THE CANKERWORM. By George Manville Fenn.

THE LOVER'S PROGRESS. Told by Himself.

THE PURPLE CLOUD. By M. P. Shiel.

THE HOUSE on the SCAR. By Bertha Thomas.

THREE MEN of MARK. By Sarah Tytler.

JUDAH PYECROFT, PURITAN. By Harry Lindsay.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

Digitized by Google

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1529. Established 1869. 24 August, 1901. Price Threepence.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

A good deal is being said in American papers about the decline of the "Kipling fad" in France. We are told that as soon as Frenchmen really began to read him, they found that they didn't like him in the least. But this is easily explained. The writings of Mr. Kipling have widened even our own vocabulary and vision to a remarkable extent. It would be strange if a writer who exacted attention and agility from readers of his own blood, and who, to begin with, is essentially English, should find an unquestioned home on Gallic bookshelves.

The vicissitudes of Editors would make an admirable subject for enquiry in the slack season. Newspapers go on, but editors do not. Mr. Lehmann, who threw himself so vigorously into the direction of the Daily News, has resigned his post, not on account of any change in his convictions, but because of certain difficulties in the domestic management of the paper. Mr. Lehmann talks of his experience as though it had been a kind of holiday task; but perhaps if it had been a more extended one, he would have come to think less complacently of the midnight oil.

Mr. George Moore, as was to be expected, has been drawn into replying to certain strictures passed upon the propriety of some of the details in Sister Teresa. Mr. Moore's defence, it must be said, is temperate and just. "It should never be forgotten," he writes, "that what seems good to-day seems wrong to-morrow, and critics of art and morals would save themselves from many mistakes if they waited for their opinions to ripen." As an instance of his own critical indiscretions, Mr. Moore cites his early opinion of Tolstoy's Resurrection, which he advised Messrs. Walter Scott not to publish on the strength of having read some thirty or forty pages. Mr. Moore adds: "When the book appeared it was sent to me, and before I had read half of it I regretted my foolish opinion, and as I approached the end of the book my remorse can be more easily imagined than described."

The Letters of T. E. Brown were so cordially received last year that Messrs. Archibald Constable and Co. are publishing a volume of sermons from the same hand. The sermons in this volume are a selection from a large number which Mr. Brown preached at Clifton, in the Isle of Man, and elsewhere. The Bishop of Hereford is to write a short introductory note to the volume.

Messrs. Dent have begun to issue Thackeray's novels in their all-embracing "Temple Classics." A beginning has been made with Vanity Fair, in three volumes. There is no need to say that the edition is neatness itself. It is a pity, however, that the dedication is printed "To B. W. Proctor." Bryan Walter Procter (Barry Cornwall) spelt his name thus, not Proct-o-r. Mr. Walter Jerrold is responsible for the notes and marginalia. Headings like the following, doubtless, act as a sort of index when looking up a passage, but do they conduce to one's enjoyment in reading?—"Of auction sales," "She is a social success," "Jos, in a pitiable state," "Lady Jane is indignant," "He thinks less of the Colonel," etc.

Another edition of Thackeray's works is to be issued by Messrs. Macmillan at 3s. 6d. the volume. The original illustrations, and facsimiles of the original paper wrappers, will be included.

A complete pocket edition of Dickens's works will shortly be issued jointly by Messrs. Chapman and Hall, the owners of the copyrights, and Mr. Henry Frowde, of the Oxford University Press. It will be printed on the Oxford India paper, and will include all the additional stories and sketches which appear in the Gadshill and authentic editions. Upwards of six hundred illustrations will appear, being reproductions from the original drawings by Seymour, "Phiz," Cruikshank, Landseer, Leech, etc. At the beginning of each book a list of the principal characters mentioned in the volume will appear.

A number of American writers, with some of whose names we are unfamiliar, have been confessing to the coinage of certain words. Most of these efforts do not strike us as happy or valuable, though Mrs. Atherton's "littleist," as a synonym for "realist," is suggestive. "Dendral," meaning woody, is, of course, accurate, but ugly; and "viewpoint," for point of view, is much too American for our taste. The verb "to fin" is not bad, but is it new? We suspect that fish have "finned the sea" before.

Mr. Henry Frowde informs us that the whole of the edition of the Oxford University Press collotype facsimile of the First Folio Shakespeare was subscribed for within six weeks of the issue of the preliminary prospectus. We understand that the volumes cannot be ready for distribution until the autumn of 1902.

Lovers of humorous verse have been astounded to learn that the unforgettable line,

> Where the Rudyards cease from kipling, and the Haggards ride no more, was not, after all, written by J. K. Stephen. At least, so Mr. H. Maurice Berkeley says, in a recent letter to the Outlook. Mr. Berkeley states that the line was his, and further, that he was the author of the Walt Whitman parody in Lapsus Calami. He had, however, no opportunity of communicating with "J. K. S." on the subject, as he was not aware of their inclusion in the volume until some years after its publication, and at a time when Stephen was mentally unfit. "Any one who knew the man at all well," says Mr. Berkeley, "would bear me out in saying that he was likely enough to have published the lines, in all good faith, believing them to be his own."

Digitized by Google

Poetry will not be wanting for our refreshment this autumn. Mrs. Meynell has a new volume of verse in preparation, which Mr. John Lane will issue. Mrs. Katharine Tynan Hinkson will also be represented by a collection of her verse, which Messrs. Lawrence and Bullen will issue; it will be dedicated to the Right Hon. George Wyndham, M.P.

The Dublin Evening Mail, kindly forwarded by a reader, brings us a catalogue of the books belonging to the late Mr. Charles S. Parnell, which were sold by auction in Dublin on the 14th, and the prices they fetched. The list is long and miscellaneous, representing, however, a well stocked library. The prices are small throughout, most of them being under a sovereign, and very many under ten shillings. The highest price paid for any book at the auction was for "Shakespeare's Works," in 1 vol. It is a fourth folio edition with Droehout's portrait (mounted) and Ben Jonson's lines beneath, a name cut from the top of title; the last four leaves are imperfect, portions of them being frayed away, otherwise a fairly good and clean copy. The book is almost 14 by 9 inches, old calf, London, 1685. When Colonel Tottenham, D.L., after a spirited competition, was declared the purchaser at £35, he was warmly applauded. Striking evidence of the value of Parliamentary eloquence was given when Mrs. Cassidy was declared the purchaser of 30 volumes (1857-80) of Hansard's Parliamentary Debates. They were put up at 2s. 6d., and the only bid was Mrs. Cassidy's.

As we anticipated, Mr. Charles Linnell has dealt with the apparent discrepancy (pointed out by Mr. W. P. James) in the history of the publication of John Inglesant, which we noted last week. Writing to the Athenæum, Mr. Linnell says: "Mr. James says this statement ('the MS was never sent to any publisher') 'seems to contradict, and to be intended to contradict, the story that the book was rejected by James Payn as "reader" for Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co.' Yes, Mr. Payn did reject the book, but not the MS. Let me confirm the statement 'The MS. was never sent to any publisher.' When Mr. Payn wrote: 'it had bored him in manuscript,' he had forgotten that he had read John Inglesant in print. Moreover, the identical copy sent to Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co., and read by Mr. Payn and returned by him to me, is still in my possession. Let me say that the book was sent to Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co., together with a letter. My letter was brief: 'Would Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co. read the book, and, if they thought well of it, could they undertake its publication?' The reply to that letter will be found in Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co.'s letter-book."

The same paper prints an "uncollected poem by Charles Lamb," contributed by Mr. R. A. Potts, who says that it was written for the Coleridge-Lloyd-Lamb volume in 1796, under the title "To a Young Lady Going out to India," but was rejected by Coleridge, whereupon Lamb sent it to the Monthly Magazine. There it appeared under the heading "To a Young Lady," over the initials C. L. It seems strange that it should have been overlooked by Lamb's editors, but we suppose that Mr. Potts is right in stating that this is the case. The lines are as follows:

To a Young Lady.

Hard is the heart that does not melt with ruth,
When care sits, cloudy, on the brow of youth;
When bitter griefs the female bosom swell,
And Beauty meditates a fond farewell
To her lov'd native land, prepar'd to roam,
And seek in climes afar the peace denied at home.
The Muse, with glance prophetic, sees her stand
(Forsaken, silent lady) on the strand
Of farthest India, sick'ning at the roar
Of each dull wave, slow dash'd upon the shore;
Sending, at intervals an aching eye
O'er the wide waters, vainly, to espy
The long-expected bark, in which to find
Some tidings of a world she left behind.
At such a time shall start the gushing tear,
For scenes her childhood lov'd, now doubly dear.
At such a time shall frantic memory wake
Pangs of remorse, for slighted England's sake;
And for the sake of many a tender tie
Of love, or friendship, pass'd too lightly by.
Unwept, unhonour'd, 'midst an alien race,
And the cold looks of many a stranger face,
How will her poor heart bleed, and chide the day,
That from her country took her far away.

Our contention, last week, that the Cockney dialect is constantly changing, and that, therefore, Mr. Julian Ralph's charge against Dickens that he does not reproduce it accurately falls to the ground, is borne out by Mr. Ashby-Sterry's remarks on the same subject in his popular "Bystander" column in the Graphic. Mr. Ashby-Sterry says:

> It is thirty-one years since the great novelist died, and it is sixty-four years since the publication of Pickwick. In sixty-four years a dialect, which everlastingly varies, becomes absolutely changed. Therefore, it is not to be wondered at that the conversation of Old Weller and Sam is entirely different to persons of the same class in the present day. . . . I have been informed by those who read Pickwick when it came out in shilling numbers that everyone was astonished at the accuracy with which the cockney dialect of those days was reproduced, and I myself can remember old people in the days of my youth, who perpetually substituted the "v" for the "w," and vice versâ, and used other Wellerisms. Language in a big city is constantly changing, and the slang of the streets of yesterday often becomes the polite conversation of next year. Years ago the elimination of the final "g" was considered to be the prerogative of the uneducated. Recently the custom has been annexed by the upper classes and accounted a sign of good breeding and refinement. Though no one knew the London language of his time better than Dickens, he never obtruded his knowledge pedantically. He was an artist, and he knew better than to make his dialect so realistic that the majority of his readers could not comprehend it. The writers of Scotch stories often make a mistake in this direction. They fancy because they understand a difficult dialect their readers are equally clever. The late William Black never made this mistake. Even if you have not been taught Scotch at school you can read his works with the keenest delight. Probably it is this element, among others, which makes his novels so everlastingly popular.

Mr. William Archer's "real conversations" in the Pall Mall Magazine are an unfailing mid-monthly joy. This month Mr. Archer, the dramatic critic, exchanges views with Mr. W. S. Gilbert, dramatist and librettist, and naturally some very smart things are said. Mr. Gilbert confesses himself a laudator temporis acti, and deplores the plays which do not round off the fortunes of their characters, but end in a frayed fourth act. Hence he praises the French plays and adaptations of twenty years ago for their artistic finish and aplomb, while Mr. Archer argues that the anti-climax of the fourth act of a play like "Mrs. Dane's Defence," is itself demanded by art. Incidentally Mr. Archer mentions Mr. Gilbert's own adapted play, "The Wedding March":

> Mr. Gilbert: Now, there was a thing that simply flowed from its French into its English form. I had only to reduce it from five acts to three. How long do you think it took me to write that? Just a day and a half—and it brought me in £2,500!

The conversation scintillates onward until it produces the following interesting passage:

> W. A.: Excuse my saying so, but, except on some purely technical points, I don't think you are a laudator temporis

Digitized by Google

acti at all. On the contrary, I think you take a very liberal view of the theatrical situation.

MR. GILBERT: Oh, I am far from denying that there has been progress in many ways; and I admire as much as you can a great deal of the work of such a man as Pinero. Indeed, I know there has been progress, by a very convincing proof—namely, that I find myself left altogether behind.

W. A.: Not left behind, surely—your energies have been diverted into another channel than that of comedy and drama.

MR. GILBERT: That is partly the fact; but it is true, none the less, that I have been left behind. On the one or two occasions when I have returned of late years to prose drama, I have found that the public did not care for my work. They were accustomed to something different, and no doubt something better. Most of my earlier work is forgotten by theatre-goers, who have learnt to look upon me simply as a writer of light libretti. They regard any attempt an my part to write seriously as they would regard an attempt on the part of Mr. Passmore to play Hamlet. It is convenient to "label" an author, and I am labelled "cynical librettist." Woe to me if I attempt to show that, in labelling me with so narrow a definition, audiences and critics are in error!

W. A.: I wonder if you are not drawing too large a conclusion from one or two experiments? At any rate, I am sure that if you had stuck to the non-musical stage, the non-musical public would have stuck to you. But I do think—pardon the pertinacity of my optimism—that if you were now beginning your career, you would find the circumstances more propitious to serious work than you did in the 'sixties and 'seventies. It was you yourself—was it not?—who complained in those days of the tyranny of "the young girl in the dress-circle." Well, the young girl in the dress-circle has—shall we say grown up?—in the past twenty years.

MR. GILBERT: It is a mistake to suppose that I ever complained of the influence of the "young girl in the dress-circle." It is to her that I attributed the fact that most of the plays produced in the 'sixties and 'seventies were sweet and clean. I have always held that maxima reverentia is due to that young lady. I am so old-fashioned as to believe that the test whether a story is fit to be presented to an audience in which there are many young ladies, is whether the details of that story can be decently told at (say) a dinner-party at which a number of ladies and gentlemen are present. I put forward this suggestion with diffidence, for I am convinced that it will not be received with approval. Nevertheless, I have always kept this test well before me in writing plays, and I have never found myself inconveniently hampered by it.

"MR JOSEPH CONRAD'S Lord Jim is the last great book of English literature," says Mr. G. K. Chesterton, in the same magazine. There are many who think with him. Mr. Chesterton proceeds in the following strain:

> The question almost arises whether it is worth while to keep pace with new books, whether there are not many other things more worth studying, such, for example, as old books. Moreover, the world existed for a long time before printing was invented, and will, we may hope, exist a long time after it is repudiated by humanity. Assuredly every book ever written by a living man is worth something, but it is doubtful whether reading any book is worth as much as watching a sunset or smoking a pipe. Then, again, there is the enormous neglect of the work that has already been done in literature. How ignorant we are of masterpieces! How few of the great works of the language we have each of us really read is a horrible mystery; it will probably never be known until the last day. I admit I should very much like to see what would happen if some poet with a talent for agreeable impudence were to include in his blank verse epic two or three comparatively little known pages from Paradise Lost. I doubt if he would be detected. I believe that if I were only gifted myself with moral courage, I could hail the author of Sartor Resartus as a young man of whom more might be expected, and point out that the faults of Mr. W. Wordsworth are only those that lend a fascination to youth. . . . As far as literature is concerned indeed, I think that a man might very well get as much cultivation as he is likely to get without coming within two hundred years of the present date. But no one who is fit to live in this world cares pre-eminently, or even especially, about literature. There are a great many books now being produced which will be forgotten twenty years hence, but which it is highly desirable that we should all read, precisely because they will be forgotten twenty years hence.

FROM Messrs. Black comes some excellent "holiday reading" in the shape of sixpenny editions of Mr. E. W. Hornung's novel, Under Two Skies, Mrs. W. K. Clifford's The Last Touches and Other Stories, and Dr. John Brown's Rab and His Friends, and Other Papers. The other papers include the personal memoirs of Dr. John Brown's father, "Mystifications," and "Marjorie Fleming." Messrs. Black also issue a sixpenny edition of Dr. Farrar's college story, Julian Home.

MRS. STEVENSON has explained, in a letter to a friend, why the task of writing the biography of R. L. S. was entrusted to Mr. Graham Balfour:

> I want to tell you why I insisted, in spite of his reluctance, that my husband's cousin, Mr. Graham Balfour, should write the biography. When Mr. Colvin, owing to continued ill-health and the peremptory claims of his official work, relinquished the task, I was at a loss for a time where to look for his successor. After much deliberation it seemed to me—and to Mr. Colvin—that Mr. Balfour, a relative, a friend, a member of the family at Vailima during the concluding and perhaps most interesting period of Mr. Stevenson's life, was more fitted than anyone else to take Mr. Colvin's place. Mr. Balfour's close intimacy during those troublous years in Samoa gave him a sympathetic insight into my husband's character that no other biographer could aspire to; while his ardent admiration, intensified by the ties of kinship, made him eager to know au fond the man whose mind and personality thus possessed for him a double fascination. Indeed, of all Mr. Stevenson's friends there was none so adequately equipped to write his biography. Though at first Mr. Balfour shrank from an undertaking so unforeseen and difficult, he in the end gave way to my wish, admitting the justness of my contention that the work was a duty he had no right to shirk. An added interest is that a great deal of my husband's unpublished manuscript has been incorporated in the work.

The life, as has already been announced, is to be published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

WE have before now acknowledged our respectful bewilderment at the book notices published in the Boston Conservator, the organ of Walt Whitmanism. A review of a book entitled, Cosmic Consciousness, by Mr. Richard Maurice Bucke, is written in a strain of saltatory and staccato encouragement to the possible reader, who will, at least, realise the necessity of perusing the book for himself if he wishes to learn anything about it. The reviewer is elaborately uninforming. Thus:

> The propositions of the cosmos are tested from a new point of view. You will doubt. You will denounce. You will think this discoverer a fool. The vision does not yield itself to the first reader. Nor does it surrender to the first glance of any reader. It evades, hides, shuffles, passes, returns, and flies away. It will make you mad. You will think many times that you have got it. Then when you look you will find that it has gone again. You will resort to the schools, whose professors will tell you that they never had such a theory on the lists of their teaching. You will go to the churches and look in vain in their creeds for some reflection of its central conviction. The drama is pushed a little farther into space. Insight goes a little deeper. A mystery has been invaded. The argument is to some extent mathematical. But it is nevertheless and chiefly pictorial. Bucke sets forth that which may be better seen than argued about. He declines to adopt the attitude of controversy. He is well aware that the notion is one which no amount of rudimentary logic can assist to clear. Either you see it or you do not. There is no harm done if you do not see it. You are simply postponed. That is all it means to you. The extra terrestriality of the vision does not make it one to be classed with vagaries. Though as for that term—"vagary"—no sound heart is much scared. But Bucke has gone about the chief business.

Digitized by Google

"It is proposed to prove by fairly clear and circumstantial evidence that Shakespeare visited Bath with his 'acting company' at least three times—in 1593, 1597, and 1603." Such is the aim of an article printed in the August number of the Bath Beacon, published in that town by Messrs. Meehan. The Beacon is a pleasant little paper, which is not afraid to attempt such feats. We notice in another column that the Beacon has recently raised "the question of the real meaning and purport of Art." We wish we had the Beacon's courage.

Count Charles de Soissons, in a volume entitled In the Path of the Soul, has printed a series of eighteen essays on modern writers, composers, artists, and musicians, whom he claims to belong to a distinct spiritual order. Here are their names:

Paul Verlaine.	Max Liebermann.
Gabriel D'Annunzio.	Sasha Schneider.
Gerhart Hauptmann.	George Sauter.
Henryk Sienkiewicz.	Theodore Roussel.
Count Albert du Bois.	H. B. Brabazon.
Charles G. D. Roberts.	Jan Matejko.
Ignacy Paderewski.	John Henry Lorimer.
Rudolf Zwintscher.	Augustin Rodin.
Giovanni Segantini.	Arnold Böcklin.

Bibliographical.

The notion of issuing Anthony Trollope's Barsetshire tales —The Warden, Barchester Towers, and Dr. Thorne—in a uniform style is excellent; but why not go farther, and add to the series the remaining "Chronicles" of Barset? The three stories named, having been issued in 1855, 1857, and 1858 respectively, are out of copyright; surely, however, an arrangement could be made with regard to the other Barsetshire books, the last of which came out in 1866? Why, I may add, should we not have a uniform edition of the Chronicles of Carlingford? Mrs. Oliphant's series of stories will last, I should say, at least as long as Trollope's, and should be similarly distinguished. There would be Salem Chapel (1863), The Rector and The Doctor's Family (1863), The Perpetual Curate (1864), Miss Marjoribanks (1866), and Phoebe Junior (1876). Here, again, there would be proprietorial rights to be considered; but I should think the difficulty could be readily got over. My own view is that it is by their Barsetshire and Carlingford books that Trollope and Mrs. Oliphant will be best remembered.

Mr. Frederic Harrison's monograph on Ruskin will, of course, be very interesting, and, no doubt, well worthy of the series in which it is to appear—which is not, perhaps, the most flattering thing to say when we remember the Goldsmith of William Black and the Sheridan of Mrs. Oliphant. It is at least questionable whether there is anything to be gained by adding to the "English Men of Letters" series. Mr. Harrison, to be sure, will give us his view of Ruskin, but there are so many others! Putting aside the little compilations by little writers, we have the essay by Mrs. Ritchie (1892), the two-volume biography by Mr. Collingwood (1893), the full-blown "study" by Mr. J. A. Hobson (1898), the book by M. de Sizeranne (1899), the handy memoir by Mr. Spielmann (1900), and the expository monograph by Mrs. Meynell (1900). These seem sufficient. Mr. Harrison's volume will be somewhat of a luxury.

As we are to have the Collected Poems of Miss Mary Robinson, why should we not have the Collected Poems of Miss Katharine Tynan, who is quite as true a singer as the Anglo-Frenchwoman? We are to have them, and they will find, of course, a heartily responsive public. As a writer in prose and verse, Miss Tynan (Mrs. Hinkson) has been tolerably fertile since 1887, when her Shamrocks appeared. We have had from her—A Nun, her Friends, and her Order (1891), Ballads and Lyrics (1892), Irish Love-Songs (1892), An Isle in the Water (1895), The Land of Mist and Mountain (1895), The Way of a Maid (1895) A Lover's Breast-Knot (1896), Oh, what a Plague is Love! (1896), The Wind in the Trees (1898), The Handsome Brandons (1898), The Dear Irish Girl (1899), The Land I Love Best (1899), She Walks in Beauty (1899), Three Fair Maids (1900), and A Daughter of the Fields (1900).

It is pleasant to find the publishers doing their own bibliography, if only in fragmentary fashion. Thus, at the back of the title-page of their new sixpenny edition of Dean Farrar's Julian Home, Messrs. A. & C. Black give a list of the successive editions of that story. Published in December 1859, the tale was reprinted in 1865, 1869, 1871, 1873, 1874, 1875, 1877, 1880, 1883, 1886, 1890, 1895 (with illustrations), 1896, and 1899. All this points to a pretty steady popularity, and will surprise those who thought that the Dean's school and college stories had practically dropped out of circulation. Clearly, the British public is a very loyal and persistent patron.

Mr. W. S. Gilbert's pronouncements in the current issue of the Pall Mall Magazine are notable for his lack of allusion to the fact that he himself was, at one time, one of the band of burlesque-writers on whom he offers some genial remarks. His first dramatic work was a burlesque—"Dulcamara, or The Great Quack and the Little Duck," a travesty of "L' Elixir d'Amore." This was in 1866. Then came "The Merry Zingara" (1868), "La Vivandière" (1868), "Robert the Devil" (1868), and "The Pretty Druidess" (1869)—all of them burlesques on popular operas. I mention the fact here, because none of these libretti have ever been brought together in volume form, and are to be picked up at the second-hand bookstall or nowhere.

The Théâtre Gilbert, as issued and recognised by himself, is contained in the three volumes of Original Plays published successively in 1876, 1881, and 1895. In addition to these are two volumes, each entitled Original Comic Operas, issued, with title-pages undated, by Messrs. Chappell & Co. in conjunction with Messrs. Chatto. Some of these comic opera libretti find a place among the Original Plays. A good deal, however, of Mr. Gilbert's dramatic work remains uncollected—not only his burlesques and his German Reed pieces, but "An Old Score," "Randall's Thumb," "Creatures of Impulse," "On Guard," "Thespis" (his first work with Sullivan), "Committed for Trial," "The Ne'er-do-well," "Brantinghame Hall," "The Fortune-Hunter," and so forth. It is singular that among his Original Plays he has not included "Iolanthe," one of the most witty of the Gilbert-Sullivan series.

Purchasers of Mr. Birrell's Collected Essays, which came out only about eighteen months ago, will not, perhaps, be wholly gratified to learn that he has another volume of Obiter Dicta in the press. This is to range, it seems, with the first series, which appeared in 1884. The second series dates from 1887, Res Judicatae from 1892, and Men, Women, and Books from 1894. Certainly Mr. Birrell is not overproductive.

In this week's Sketch, "O. O." makes the announcement that "The first volume of the translation of George Brandes' great work, 'Main Currents in Nineteenth Century Literature,' will be published next month. It is entitled The Emigrant Literature." For once in his life, "O. O." is a little behind the times. The first volume of the "Main Currents" has been "out" for weeks past.

The Bookworm.

Digitized by Google

Reviews.

Much Achievement and More Promise.

Aphrodite against Artemis. By T. Sturge Moore. (Unicorn Press. 2s. 6d. net.)

Mr. Sturge Moore has written a tragedy, mainly, but not wholly, in unrhymed verse; and this, again, mainly, but not wholly, decasyllabic, upon the story of Phædra and Hippolytus. The theme was a familiar one to the Greek dramatic poets. A treatment of it by Euripides is, of course, extant. It will be remembered that Browning contemplated a drama upon the same subject, and actually wrote for it a prologue of remarkable beauty. The root-idea of the story, the contest for the soul of man between the rival impulses, symbolised to the Greek mind by the two divine figures Artemis and Aphrodite, is also the root-idea of the most elaborate of Mr. Meredith's recent poems. Obviously the perpetual recurrence of fine minds to this and other shapings of the classical imagination cannot be dismissed as mere scholarship or archaism. Such an explanation may sum up Atalanta in Calydon; it is not adequate to Mr. Meredith's mythopoesy, and we do not think it is adequate to the play before us. The fact is, that polytheism is not altogether so obsolete or so untrue an expression of certain qualities of man and man's relation to the cosmos as has sometimes been thought. The concepts formed by the Greek poets of the dwellers in Olympus—concepts only in part determined by the more primitive characters of those divinities as objects of cult—do after all represent a view of life not wholly alien to modern speculation. The unity of things is a philosophical presupposition; but to the imaginative mind, especially in hours of reflection upon the baffling problems of psychology, the diversity of things is often the more apparent. To be concrete, the soul of youth is still, as it was in the days of Euripides, the sport, not seldom to tragic issues, of warring ascetic and amorous ideals; and while this is true the symbolic statement of the fact embodied by the Greeks in the personalities of Artemis and Aphrodite must continue to have its meaning.

So much for a justification of a poetic attitude towards classic myth, which goes far beyond Mr. Sturge Moore's play. His problem, like that of Mr. Gilbert Murray, in Andromache, is to preserve the immortal elements of the mythic ideas, and at the same time to find for them a rendering which shall be his own, and therefore modern, to re-create rather than to translate. That he has wholly succeeded we do not claim, but the experiment is exceedingly interesting. In the first place, Mr. Moore succeeds in realising that appeal to the imagination through the eye which is one of the subtlest engines of the higher modern dramaturgy. The pictorial qualities of the piece are high throughout. For example, the Attic conception of a chorus and its lyricism is modified and brought into closer relation to the action with the happiest results. Here is a charming scene in which the house maidens chaff Hippolytus, who has stung them by his indifference, upon his absorption in the woods:

CYDILLA.

He thinks a girl a silly thing.

HIPPO.

Prefers a nymph of Artemis
Who kilts her petticoat like this.

[She kilts hers, the others laugh, and, leaving CLYMENES with the fawn, gather round HIPPOLYTUS, pinning up their skirts.

CYDILLA.

[Lifts his bow and pretends to draw on him

They touch his heart this way.

MALIS.

And make
A wound that's real enough to ache.

DOTO.

Or may a dryad of the trees
Have tossed her rustling locks to the breeze. . .

[She looses her hair, and floats it on her hands, bowing towards him: the others do the same.

HIPPO.

[Continuing DOTO'S words.

Whispering dew-drenched secresies;
Sighing, "If at last I please."

CLYMENES.

[Leaves the fawn asleep, and, stooping beneath the table, peeps up.

Or just a head above the pool,
Through which down-trembles whiteness cool.

[PHÆDRA enters by the door on the left, but draws back without being observed; the others bob under.

DOTO.

Or, laughing 'mid the bubbling falls,
Glancing between the rocks, who calls?

MALIS.

With sand in her hair and bracken bed,
A roof of grey rock overhead,
Who peeps with eyes like blackberries,
Desirous of a mortal kiss!

After the crisis of the tragedy, the body of Hippolytus is borne off the stage with a dirge of litter-bearers and huntsmen, which again seems to us very effective from the point of view both of literature and of stage requirements:

He is young and dead, he is loved and mourned.
Who will remember him?
His mother is a shade,
Nor had he ever a maiden adorned
Slitting the stalks so slim
To make a daisy-braid,
And for him no bride had been carried home
No wife, to bid her boys
And girls to ne'er forget,
He leaves: of the sweet in a honeycomb
He hardly dreamed; his joys
Were horses, dogs to pet.
Such were his sport-fellows—such mourn
Briefly a week or two.
Yet surely did he vie
In promise with the summer dawn
Lavish in silver dew,
Pleasant to every eye.
Over him clip your locks and throw
Lentisk and dittany,
Anise and aloes-wood,
And Syrian essences—things which grow
At home, or o'er the sea
Are brought and reckoned good
To feed the flame that mantles a pyre,
As prowess graced his youth
Sob-ended like a song.

Mr. Moore is at his best in these lyrical passages. In handling the blank verse of dialogue he has curious lapses. His task was not an easy one—to be sufficiently modern to secure sincerity and poignancy, and not to depart so far from the classic manner as to sacrifice dignity or to incur the suspicion of caricature. He does not quite escape either pitfall. In such a speech, for instance, as the closing one of Hippolytus to Phædra:

HIPPOLYTUS.

Outrage no more my mother's cleanly soul, the idiom of the neatly-packed stichomythic line, always a little ludicrous in English, is too closely retained. On the other hand, there is a singularly pathetic touch when

Digitized by Google

Aphrodite talks of Phædra's "extra loveliness," as though she were a kind of soap, and when Theseus laments his wife with the words:

> Well,
> Thou wast a pretty bit, and mad'st me mad
> As others erst had.

One feels that the insistence on the vieux marcheur in the hero is out of the plane. We do not wish to discourage Mr. Sturge Moore, for there is much achievement in Aphrodite against Artemis, and more promise, but we hope he will bear in mind what a valuable aid a sense of humour is in writing a tragedy.

A Journalist's Apologia.

My Life's Record: a Fight for Justice. By F. Reginald Statham. (Gibbings. 3s. 6d.)

From the literary standpoint this book is disappointing. Seeing the writer's intimate personal connection with South African affairs, and the multifarious abilities for which he takes credit on the title-page, one hopes for considerable sidelights on South Africa and South African matters, and for an autobiography reflecting life and touching men from many standpoints. All such anticipations are unjustified. It is a strictly personal record, conditioned throughout by a narrowly controversial object—to defend the author from the aspersions which have been cast on his politico-journalistic career. Outside this purely personal object Mr. Statham will not go. It is, in fact, an apologia pro vitâ suâ. We know how interesting such an apologia may be made. We know how interesting Cardinal Newman made it. He had been connected with eminent men and remarkable events. With the defence of his own career he skilfully intermingled sidelights on those men and events, so that it became not merely the story of a man, but the story of men and a movement. Mr. Statham has not had Newman's opportunities. Yet it is obvious that his South African career closely intertwined his life with men and things—not to say a country—on which the British public is eager for knowledge, and on which he was competent to give knowledge from a standpoint other than that adopted by most of the writers who have poured forth information on South Africa. But he will have none of it. Whenever he touches such an opportunity, he either indifferently passes it with a few hard generalities, or refers you to his book on such and such a question. He will give you nothing but unalloyed Statham. The result is a dry and jejune volume, which largely defeats his own apologetic purpose by making it certain that few will read it. He gives us unimpeachable testimony that South Africa, or at least Natal, considered him a brilliant journalist. But the wit and brilliance of which these testimonies speak are severely absent from the present volume.

This springs partly from a defect of character so apparent in his book as greatly to handicap that sympathetic appeal without which no apologia can be successful, however ably argued. Mr. Statham displays an unconscious egotism of almost Rousseauish openness, though (let us add) without the attendant Rousseauish weakness. Down to the smallest particulars, his own interests and his own affairs seem solely to engross him; and other matters only as they revolve, dimly seen, around his own personality. Having set out to vindicate his character, no detail is too petty to be pressed into that service. He must put down an early copy of verses, with a dash of vague religious sentiment by which he sets especial store, "though I believe hardly a soul was aware of its existence" (referring to the religious sentiment, not the verses). You know them, reader. They are the verses of which you still say, with a pathetic mixture of pride and deprecation, "I was only sixteen when I wrote them." But they are an evidential document of some importance to Mr. Statham. "It will probably be agreed," he says, "that the lad who could write verses of this kind at sixteen was not very likely to be successful in the rough-and-tumble business of ordinary business competition. But neither was he, I think, likely to be a wilful organiser of fraud. . . . To myself, the reference to these earlier efforts conveys the assurance that whatever I was after the catastrophe of my life, which occurred in 1865, I was also before it." For our own part, we are nowise satisfied that Iago may not have written sentimental verses, with a little vaporous religiosity, at the age of sixteen. But we admit that we do think it very unlikely Iago would have published them at the age of discretion. The man who could do that is much more likely to organise sentiment than to organise fraud. On the like principle Mr. Statham unsparingly sets down every testimonial of conduct and progress from the masters of his various schools. Now a lad may conscientiously refrain from turning so much as a Latin verse at school, yet afterwards turn his coat with ease and fluency. Not that we accuse Mr. Statham of not turning the one or turning the other. But we do affirm that a scholastic report is no guarantee of subsequent character.

The same unconsciously self-centred note is struck throughout the book; as where (speaking of the Boer War) he says: "That calamity has come about because my warnings were disregarded, and other counsels were listened to." Would you not say a statesman, looking back on his administrative warnings, instead of an African journalist? Yet, apart from the form in which it is put, Mr. Statham has good reason for referring to his predictions. He held that our ruin (as he considers it) at the Cape began with the signing away of the whole Hinterland of South Africa, 400,000 square miles, to seven private persons; and that troubles would grow so long as the Chartered Company was dominant in South African affairs. Whether the premises were right or wrong, there can be no question that the prophecies read remarkably in the light of present events. A few weeks before the war Mr. Statham said in a lecture:

> This country can, if it likes, send fifty thousand or a hundred thousand soldiers to South Africa, and spend fifty millions or a hundred millions in shooting down men fighting simply for their liberty. And when England has done this, and earned the scorn and contempt of the whole world in doing it, the trouble will be only beginning.

One may dislike the language, but the thing has come true. Again, before the famous Parliamentary Committee on South Africa had begun its sittings, he wrote:

> It is possible that the crime [of rehabilitating Mr. Rhodes after the Raid] may be committed. If it is, the misfortunes that will follow will be appalling. The whole peace of South Africa will hang by a thread. Irritation and suspicion will infest every corner. Race enmities will be awakened, . . . and will infallibly lead up, sooner or later, to one of the most terrible and desolating wars of modern times. These men, whom you call Boers, whom you deride for their surface failings, are not men who can lightly be dispossessed of their independence. They have their faults, no doubt; but put them in the position of having to fight for their independence, and they will display all the endurance and valour of those whose descendants they are—the Huguenots, who sacrificed everything for freedom of thought and religion; the Netherlanders, who successfully stood out against the forces of the greatest European power of the sixteenth century. In the Transvaal, in the Free State, in the Cape Colony, in Natal, these men who constitute the dominant factor in South Africa are to be found, bound together by those subtle ties of blood and nationality which survive accumulated oppressions and the flight of years.

Digitized by Google

> The cause of one, when it comes to extremes, is the cause of all; and if they see the men whom they regard as an unpunished malefactor visibly supported by the British Government, it will be against the British Government that they will range themselves in sullen hatred or in open defiance. It is possible that this may happen, and if it happens, either the whole structure of civilisation in South Africa will be wiped out, or South Africa will cease to form in any respect a portion of the British Empire.

Again, you may distaste the bias of the writer; but the accuracy of his predictions is very striking—except the final prediction, which yet remains to be decided.

With regard to the general purpose of the book, it involves matters at once too political and too intricately private for discussion in these columns. Mr. Statham frankly relates an error of his youth which has since been brought against him. Without considering the excuse he alleges for it, it may certainly be said that he deserves admiration for the courage with which he has lived it down, and no right-minded person would remember it against him. In general, though we may sometimes doubt the prudence and judgment of his actions, one need not sympathise with his opinions (sufficiently shown in our extracts) to affirm that his book leaves the impression of an honest and honourable man, somewhat too sensitive, and rather inclined to let sentiment overbalance clear-headedness. His defence seems good—but we would it had been less drily personal and matter of fact. An apologia without the literary touch, without something more than a skeleton-record of personal facts and events, is like to fail of its own aim by not being read.

Parochial.

Before the Great Pillage. By Augustus Jessopp, D.D. (Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d.)

We read in Dr. Jessopp's preface an expression of surprise that Fate should have found for him no more distinguished career than that of a country parson. But as a country parson he magnifies his office. To be more just, it is rather that little world of the parish that he would magnify in its history while he makes moan over the present season of its decay. And you who read, though you may not be altogether of his world, cannot but become sorrowfully aware that what as a nation we have gained by the sub-division of labour, and the development of labour-saving mechanism, is in a great measure counterbalanced by the loss of individual versatility, variety, and initiative.

The parish, Dr. Jessopp would rather emphatically have you to know, is strictly and solely an ecclesiastical institution. It was in its flowery days, "before the great pillage," a little constitutional kingdom of which the coasts lay for the most part along the lines of the manor. Yet its corporate life was, as it were, in another dimension. It was the community of the township "organised for Church purposes, and subject to Church discipline," its autonomy limited by a system of inspection and restraint on the part of a central authority—the bishop and his representatives. The centre of the parochial interest was the church, and how the wonderful parish churches of England generally came into existence is a matter for conjecture. The monks? About as likely to build cavalry barracks as a church for anyone but themselves, replies Dr. Jessopp. He does not like monks; he even compares them to Dissenters; which is rather severe! The Freemasons? "I no more believe that the Freemasons, whoever the Freemasons may have been, built our churches than that they built Noah's ark." No:

> The evidence is abundant and positive, and is increasing upon us year by year, that the work done upon the fabrics of our churches, and the other work done in the beautifying of the interior of our churches, such as the wood-carving of our screens, the painting of lovely figures in the panels of those screens, the embroidery of the banners and vestments, the frescoes on the walls, the engraving of the monumental brasses, the stained glass in the windows, and all that vast aggregate of artistic achievements which existed in immense profusion in our village churches till the frightful spoliation of those churches in the sixteenth century stripped them bare—all this was executed by local craftsmen.

This conclusion is continually fortified as one antiquary after another unearths the old churchwardens' accounts:

> We have actual contracts for church building and church repairing undertaken by village contractors. We have the cost of a rood-screen paid to a village carpenter, of painting executed by local artists. We find the names of artificers, described as aurifaber, or worker in gold and silver, living in a parish which could never have had five hundred inhabitants; we find the people in another place casting a new bell and making the mould for it themselves; we find the blacksmith of another place forging the ironwork for the church door, or we get a payment entered for the carving of the bench-ends in a little church five hundred years ago, which bench-ends are to be seen in that church at the present moment. [Which is convincing evidence of the durability of the wood.] And we get fairly bewildered by the astonishing wealth of skill and artistic taste and æsthetic feeling which must have been in this England of ours in times which till lately we assumed to be barbaric times.

In these same churchwardens' accounts we see vestiges of England, merry with its holiday processions, miracle plays, athletic sports, church ales, and the like; just as in the more effectually preserved Rolls of the Manor Courts we see England punching its neighbour's nose, ploughing its neighbour's furrow, and kissing its neighbour's wife. We see, too, evidences of the extraordinary accumulations of wealth which the wardens were called on to administer, and Dr. Jessopp goes at length into its sources. In silken fabrics, gold and silver vessels, and jewelled shrines alone, so great was their wealth that in many cases a watchman "regularly slept" in a chamber constructed for him in the church. (It occurs to one that that watchman would have been more effectual if he had regularly watched.) Such chambers, no doubt, are those commonly pointed out by Mrs. Miffs as "the priest's." But at last this store of chalices, basins, crosses, candlesticks, rings, buckles, girdles, cloth of gold, raiment of needlework, pixes magni ponderis was the parish's undoing. Not only were almhouses and hospitals, richly endowed by the piety of ages, robbed to the last pound by the greedy ring that surrounded the boy king, but——

> The immense treasures in the churches, the joy and boast of every man and woman and child in England, who day by day and week by week assembled to worship in the old houses of God, which they and their fathers had built, and whose every vestment and chalice, and candlestick and banner, organs and bells, and picture and image, and altar and shrine, they looked upon as their own, and part of their birthright—all these were torn away by the rudest of spoilers, carted off, they knew not whither, with jeers and scoffs and ribald shoutings, while none dared raise a hand or let his voice be heard above the whisper of a prayer of bitter grief and agony.

This completed the disendowment of the parish; nothing was left but the bare fabric; and upon the disendowment of the parish (we quote Dr. Jessopp) came in Pauperism. The final blow was struck by the Local Government Act of 1894, by which a parish is defined as "a place for which a separate overseer is or can be appointed." In the parish council neither rector nor churchwarden has any standing; the old constitution is gone.

That, of course, is very lamentable, and Dr. Jessopp has written here a very interesting book about it all; but he cannot be said to take a large view of the matter. There stand the country churches of England, symbols of a unity that no longer is, like sacraments out of which the Presence is fled. The shrines were plundered, it is true; but the faith that reared and adorned them would have restored them. The faith was uprooted, overturned, extinguished, corrupted, reformed (according to your point of view), and thenceforward the ecclesiastical parish was an anachronism. In a country tender to anachronisms it lingered on for three centuries after it was logically defunct; now it is, in practice, superseded by the "congregation."

Digitized by Google

Running Reading.

A Book of Brittany. By S. Baring-Gould. (Methuen. 6s.)

On the first page of his preface Mr. Baring-Gould defines the purpose of this book as being "to prepare the mind of the traveller to appreciate what the guide-books point out to him as worth seeing." In other words, it is not a guide-book but a Discipline. Mr. Baring-Gould begins his disciplinary treatment by a quotation from Alphonse Allais, a licensed wild wag of Paris, whom, however, the author seems to take seriously. Alphonse Allais says in his subtly observant Gallic way: "What characterises the English tourist more than anything is the air of profound ennui which never leaves him from his arrival at Calais or Dieppe to the moment of his return to his native land. France visibly bores the Englishman; he is interested in nothing, listens with a distrait air to the explanations of the guide, takes a vague look at the monument or work of art pointed out to him, and never seems to arrive at any place save in order to go on immediately to another." Now, though this inclusive statement may have been fractionally true of the haughty generation which went to the East when Kinglake wrote Eothen, it is handsomely incorrect to-day. Everyone knows it is incorrect, including Alphonse Allais and Mr. Baring-Gould. Yet the latter endorses his quotation: "This is true, but it is true because the majority of visitors do not comprehend what they see."

The inference, of course, is that A Book of Brittany will cure that boredom, so far as Brittany is concerned. After reading this volume, illustrated with sixty-nine illustrations, the tourist, hitherto bored by non-comprehension, will piercingly understand.

Last year we had the opportunity of watching the effect of Mr. Baring-Gould's similar compilation about Dartmoor, on tourists in the middle of Dartmoor. A Book of Dartmoor has been sadly mauled by Devonian archæological and topographical experts, but it certainly did appear to suit the average Dartmoor tourist. It "prepared his mind" by putting him in a good humour with himself. He assimilated a chapter of "fine confused feeding" about menhirs, venville rights, and hut circles, and then went forth to "appreciate." He stood on tors, and remembered vaguely and inaccurately the accurate and inaccurate statements which Mr. Baring-Gould had set in heaps before him. In a few hours he had forgotten all. But those few hours were everything, for during them he "thought he knew," and to think one knows is the height of touristic bliss, the pinnacle of globe-trotting self-respect. A Book of Dartmoor flattered the weakness of those who imagine that useful knowledge can be picked up by casual perusals on a wet afternoon. And A Book of Brittany will do the same. It is a harmless book. It may, or may not, be grossly inaccurate—that is a point scarcely worth inquiring into. Much of it must be accurate, since Mr. Baring-Gould is an experienced craftsman, whom nothing but a miraculous celerity leads into error; and the simple gentle reader is continually diverted and amused by a pen which has learnt in the fields of fiction how never to be tedious.

The plan of the book is magnificently embracing. We start off with an ethnological chapter on "The Breton People," a perfect orgy of facts cited from the most erudite sources. Footnotes like this impress the amateur:

> See an article by M. le Casquet, "Etude Ethnographique sur les Bigaudens," in Bulletin de la Soc. Arch. du Finistère (p. xxvii., 1900).

It would be interesting to know how many tourists obey the injunction to "see." But one must not assume that Mr. Baring-Gould relies always on the opinions of others.

> It has been supposed and asserted roundly that there are traces among them of a still earlier type—of a people resembling the Mongols. Of this I have my doubts.

From ethnology we proceed to prehistoric stones, and this chapter is full of the picturesque:

> In some places childless women still rub themselves against menhirs, expecting thereby to be cured of barrenness, but in others, instead, they rub themselves against stone images of saints. Near Carnac is a menhir, at which a singular ceremony took place till comparatively recently, and may perhaps still be practised in secret. A married couple that have no family repair to this stone when the moon is full, strip themselves stark naked and course one another round it a prescribed number of times, whilst their relations keep guard against intrusion at a respectable distance.

There is no more tantalising phrase in your mind-preparing book than "comparatively recently."

Then follows "The History of Brittany," in fifteen pages, "so as to enable the reader to obtain something of historic perspective":

> The history of Brittany continued to be one of fratricida[1] conflict and slaughter.
>
> The death of Solomon was the signal for . . . internecine strife.
>
> The history of Brittany continued to be one of sanguinary internal strife.
>
> The miserable history of strife and bloodshed continued.
>
> Charles suffered his men to butcher fourteen hundred of the inhabitants of both sexes and of every age, whilst he was himself mumbling his prayers.
>
> France was crushed under the heel of England.
>
> We must now pass over a century that was not without broils and bloodshed.

We next arrive at architecture:

> To go through the province and not to be able to discriminate between architectural styles, and to estimate the approximate date of a building, or of its several parts, is to miss one great source of instruction and enjoyment.

What could be truer? Hence twenty-five pages, including an illustrated disquisition on the evolution of the arch! Finally, in the way of preliminary matter, is an essay on the Breton "pardons," interesting because it contains a fine example of Mr. Baring-Gould's spacious manner of beginning new paragraphs:

> One of the most remarkable pardons is now a thing of the past.
>
> The pardon referred to was that of S. Servais, &c.

Having thus cleared the ground, Mr. Baring-Gould divides Brittany out into sections, and becomes anecdotic about it, section by section. Legends seem to have an extraordinary fascination for him, and he pours them inexhaustibly forth in a sweeping torrent. Many of his legends comprise bits of what the American calls "snappy dialogue," but whether the novelist in Mr. Baring-Gould is responsible for this dialogue, or whether it is always veritably culled from venerable authorities, we should not like to say. Here is an example, apropos of the origin of the Abbey of Lehon:

> One day, Nominoe, King of Brittany, was hunting by the Rance, when he lighted on a few hermits living in this warm and secluded spot, who at once clamoured for a grant of land on which to erect a monastery.

Digitized by Google

"But where is your body?" inquired Nominoe. "No saint, no site."

To understand this we must go back to pre-Celtic usage.

The last town with which Mr. Baring-Gould deals is Rennes. What surprises us is that he does not give an account of the various legends of the bordereau and the attempted assassination of Labori.

The Treasure of the Simple.

A Saint of the Oratory: the Life of Blessed Antony Grassi of the Fermo Congregation. By Lady Amabel Kerr. (Burns & Oates. 4s. net.)

This is the story of a simple—of a onefold—man. He was born in the little walled town of Fermo, and there, but for his annual visit to the Holy House at Loreto, and a single journey to Rome, he lived out his blameless days. He was born at the end of the sixteenth century, and on sufficient evidence of heroic sanctity, confirmed by posthumous miracles, was raised to the altars of the Church in the recent year of Jubilee.

What was this old man, two hundred years dead, for whom a few months ago the great basilica of St. Peter was ablaze? A simple old clergyman in a country town, who had kept himself unspotted from the world, and had helped other people to be good. He had lived days of quiet regularity, humbly submissive in all things to the rule as it had been learned from the Roman Oratory, and in all things striving to model his conduct on that of St. Philip, its founder. Five or six hours each day he spent in the confessional, and his own cell was open to men at any time. Penitents declared that he read their hearts, and by intuition could discern the sins that in a hurried life had escaped their memory. He had an unequalled gift in exciting contrition, and the seven devils of scrupulosity yielded to his exorcism. Priests counted as a special grace the privilege of reciting the Divine Office with him. Members of religious communities besought him to say Mass in their chapels, as though the Holy Sacrifice itself gained in efficacy from his exquisite devotion and recollection.

This Life, by a devout Roman Catholic lady, bears every sign of being a labour of love, but is not therefore to be regarded as in any sense a critical work: and it is not easy always patiently to tolerate its rather conventional phrases. Only at one place do we find any betrayal of the secret man that lies hid even in those whom, by comparison, we call simple. This old man, who in the street would take off his hat to his enemy's guardian angel, who received revelations as to the dismissal of his friends from purgatory, and would employ his recreation time in packing, for application to sick persons, minute portions of the wrapper in which St. Philip's vest had been laid, was stricken at times with panic lest he should lose his faith. At least, a curious reader may be permitted to conjecture so much from such passionate protests as that to a certain nun: "I would rather lose my blood and my life than lose faith." The possibility, at least, was present to his mind.

Other New Books.

THE CHEVALIER DE ST. GEORGE AND THE JACOBITE MOVEMENT IN HIS FAVOUR, 1701-1720. EDITED BY CHARLES S. TERRY.

This is the fourth volume in the series of "Scottish History from Contemporary Writers." We some time ago noticed a history of America on the same plan; but (perhaps from the better availability of material) Mr. Terry's book is much superior to the American one. It is, in fact, of great interest and value. The plan is to set before the reader a sequent history related by contemporaries—as far as possible by the actual participators in events, men who helped to make the history they relate. For this purpose all contemporary memoirs, letters, and the like documents, have diligently been brought together, the requisite portions of each selected and arranged in historical sequence to form a connected narrative, and the whole mortised together by such brief passages of intermediate narration as were needed to fill in the gaps between the several documents, and lead intelligibly from one to the other. The result is a most lively and pictorial way of getting history: it is history actualised, allowing us to glimpse the hopes and fears of the actors themselves, with all those little dramatic touches thrown in of place, person, and surroundings which organic and unified history perforce eliminates. It is more kindred to recent histories of the Greek or Boer war, with their letters from correspondents, than to the grand style in history; but more vividly attractive than these because the narrators are not journalists looking on, but often the men who did the work in arms or diplomacy. You get their personalities at first hand, as in the case of the Comte de Forbin, who commanded the attempted landing of the Chevalier de St. George on the Scottish coast—a brusque, outspoken Southerner, who utters all his sentiments (to use his own words) "with the vivacity of a true Provençal." This gentleman tells the French authorities his opinion of their plans with the roundest contempt, and has the heartiest scorn for the English who surrounded the person of the Chevalier. When they were pursued by the English fleet, and one ship came near them, "it is almost inconceivable how much the sight of that single Vessel, some four leagues ahead of her consorts, alarmed the English on board my Ship. They gave themselves up for lost, and their alarm caused me considerable satisfaction." Of such delightfully characteristic touches his narrative is full. This volume covers the whole period of the elder Pretender's attempts; the story of Charles Edward and the forty-five having been dealt with in the previous volume. It has index and illustrations, and is compiled with excellent judgment. (Nutt. 4s.)

FROM SQUIRE TO PRINCE; BEING A HISTORY OF THE RISE OF THE HOUSE OF CIRKSENA. BY W. P. DODGE.

In spite of its romantic-sounding title, a concession to the spirit of modern publishing, when even sober history must strive to look as like romance as she may, to capture the public attention by a side-wind, this book is simply a history of the orthodox type. It is an account of the rulers of East Frisia, from the founder of the little kingdom, Count Ulrich I., to the extinction of the dynasty. It is history of the biographical kind, in which the people and matters of social or constitutional progress make small figure. Mr. Dodge's style is of the plain and practical order, with no special virtue save clearness: but this history of a little-known dynasty in an equally little-known country has a certain value and interest. It does not pretend to special research, and is absolutely silent as to sources and authorities. Indeed, it has not so much as a preface. (Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d.)

Digitized by Google

THE PORTER OF BAGDAD, AND OTHER FANTASIES. BY ARCHIBALD MACMECHAN.

A reviewer has some hard tasks set him, and one of the hardest is to decide how kind or severe he ought to be with essays so slight, and yet so prettily harmless, as these. The poor porter of Bagdad goes home each day and dreams himself into palaces, and sees in imagination the deeds and deaths of warriors and lovers, "one brightness and beauty melting into another." After this opening allegory Mr. Macmechan gives us "fantasies" on such subjects as "Madonna," "Ghosts," "Comrade Wind," "On Names," "Entrevues," "Mors Triumphans," etc. We cannot describe these brief compositions better than as rather sugary and sentimental "Things Seen." They would be improved by more quotation. As it is, we have a great deal of matter after the following pattern:

> The violin, the 'cello, and piano are weaving a three-plied magic web of rippling, floating sound. They have caught in their net the senses of the crowded drawing room, and hold them fast Although it has entered into our souls as a king takes possession of conquered cities, the music is at no time arrogant. Now and then the piano almost ceases from those notes that are like large raindrops falling into still water at sunset, and the strings sink into moanings gentler than a dove's; but not a silk rustles. The people seem scarcely to breathe.
>
> I do not know what the trio means to the other men and women; but to me it shifts and turns a hundred times, in endless variation of cadence about the simple theme,
>
> "Beata, mea Domina!"
>
> the old refrain that has sung itself all through my life, as it seems to me. There are many fair faces to fill up the pauses of the music; but I see only one—the face of the Lady who has many names and whose dearest title is Beata.

The book is produced in excellent taste. (Morang, Toronto.)

AN AUTUMN TOUR IN THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA. BY ANDREW IREDALE.

This is a bookseller's account of his visit to America with two members of his family. Mr. Iredale crossed the Atlantic with no more ambitious aim than to see something of the great cities and natural wonders of the States, and his book is ordinary in the sense that it records the impressions which these sights make on the minds of most Englishmen who travel. But the narrative is not the less pleasant reading, and Mr. Iredale's eye for books gives it a rather special character. His description of the Congressional Library in Washington has some points of interest. Who is the individual referred to as follows?

> Prominent amongst the readers was a distinguished-looking man who attracted our attention. He was tall and stately, and his hair abundant and long. His flowing white locks fell over his massive shoulders; quite a patriarch he looked; but we were told he was a poet. His coming work, which is to be his chef d'œuvre, is to eclipse in beauty of diction, in dignity of verse, and in versatility of thought, all that America has yet produced, and he dreams of being his country's laureate. This work is to be published in the coming autumn.

Sometimes Mr. Iredale was not so far from home as he thought himself. Thus:

> Mr. Hutcheson introduced us to the sanctum sanctorum of the Library, where every book is a treasure in itself, with some special history attaching to it, and where the rarest and most valuable books are kept. I was much amused when told the story of one book which was handed to me for my inspection. It contained the autograph of a famous English novelist. When Mr. Hall Caine was inspecting the Library two years ago, he took one of his own books and wrote his name in it. That volume is now actually in the holy of holies.

The following description of gambling by passengers on the ship's speed in great liners is interesting:

> In the smoking room, after dinner, the prospective mileages for the day are put up for auction; the committee or syndicate, guided by the previous day's performance, fix a range of, say, from 464 to 484 knots, and each number—464, 465, and so on—is sold separately. The sum realised for a fixed mile may run up to two pounds, more or less, and as there are twenty single miles to sell, it will be seen that these alone may yield a total of, say, £30. Then comes the excitement, the keenest competition, for all distances below 464 are sold in one lot, which is called the "low field"; and all above 484 in another lot, called the "high field." It sometimes happens that the "high field" will make ten to fifteen pounds; or the "low field" may make an equally large sum. One gentleman twice won the "pool" during the voyage, netting at least eighty pounds.

Commendably brief and bright, this little book deserves readers. (Iredale, Torquay.)

THE HISTORY OF THE PARISH OF HAILSHAM. BY L. F. SALZMANN.

We are always glad to welcome topographical history, particularly when it is done as well as this. Mr. Salzmann is to be cordially congratulated upon his work, which is unusually complete; and not only is it full of facts, but it also possesses considerable human interest, although the parish does not seem to have produced many men in any way remarkable beyond its own boundaries. The village is described almost house by house; its history is traced through the centuries, with such an occasional diversion as a contemporary record of a quaint drinking-bout affords; and the descents and holdings of land are carefully traced. The Abbey of Otham and the Priory of Michelham—the one founded in the reign of Henry II., the other in 1229—are fully dealt with, and in an appendix are printed the marriages which were celebrated between 1558-1600, and the Consents of Marriage between 1653-1658—lists thick with old Sussex names. Mr. Salzmann's conservatism is pleasantly indicated in his general devotion to the old order; he does not love your new institutions. It should be added that the volume has double indexes, which we have tested and not found wanting. (Farncombe, Lewes.)

American Diplomatic Questions, by John B. Henderson, jun. (The Macmillan Co., New York), may be described as being in two senses a weighty work. It is a careful history and discussion of some of the events and political conditions with which the diplomacy of the United States has had to deal in recent years. There are five sections, devoted respectively to the following subjects: "The Fur Seals and Behring Sea Award," "The Inter-oceanic Canal Problem," "The United States and Samoa," "The Monroe Doctrine," and "The North Coast Fisheries." Mr. Henderson's attitude to England is all that we can desire. The last words of his last paper are these: "And thus the lesson is once more taught that war postponed is the beginning of peace. Let it be hoped that the cordial relations between the two great nations thus cemented by time, may continue as long as life itself shall last."

In Democracy versus Socialism (Macmillan, 10s. net) Mr. Max Hirsch, of Melbourne, handles a large subject in a large way. His endeavour is to deal with Socialism as a whole, and to "expose the erroneous nature of its economic and ethical conceptions." But not more than a quarter of Mr. Hirsch's pages are destructive. He has social and ethical principles to put forward, and these may briefly be described by the author's dedication of his work "to the memory of Henry George, prophet and martyr of a new and higher faith," and by the following words from the last chapter: "Social well-being is not to be found outside of the happiness of those who constitute society; their happiness cannot be achieved by any one but themselves—by each for himself. [A sentence that will bear emendation.] All that the State can do is but negative . . . Equal rights and equal opportunities the State can secure. Beyond this, not only can it do nothing, but every step beyond involves a curtailment of opportunities for the happiness of all, and an infringement of the equal rights of some. The truth, so clear, so simple, so obvious, must guide all attempts at social reform. To have overlooked it is the central error of Socialism."

Digitized by Google

We have received from Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton the third volume of the sixth series of The Expositor, edited by the Rev. W. Robertson Nicoll.

Fiction.

Sister Carrie. By Theodore Dreiser. (Heinemann. 4s.)

In the prospectus of his "Dollar Library," of which Sister Carrie seems to be Number 6, Mr. Heinemann says: "More striking than the greatest of these successes [Richard Carvel, David Harum, etc.]—for popular successes are frequently scored by mediocre talents—is the fact that a young school of American writers is pressing for recognition, gifted with the sense of form, and not wanting either in pathos or in humour—real delineators of life and character." We admit we were unaware of the existence of such a school, but Sister Carrie has opened our eyes. It is a calm, reasoned, realistic study of American life in Chicago and New York, absolutely free from the slightest trace of sentimentality or prettiness, and dominated everywhere by a serious and strenuous desire for truth. We were impressed on the second page by this description of Carrie as she enters Chicago with the object of extracting a livelihood from the hard-fisted world:

> Caroline, or sister Carrie, as she had been affectionately termed by the family, was possessed of a mind rudimentary in its power of observation and analysis. Self-interest with her was high, but not strong. It was, nevertheless, her guiding characteristic. Warm with the fancies of youth, pretty with the insipid prettiness of the formative period, possessed of a figure promising eventual shapeliness and an eye alight with certain native intelligence, she was a fair example of the middle American class—two generations removed from the emigrant. Books were beyond her interest—knowledge a sealed book. In the intuitive graces she was still crude. She could scarcely toss her head gracefully. Her hands were almost ineffectual. The feet, though small, were set flatly. And yet she was interested in her charms, quick to understand the keener pleasures of life, ambitious to gain in material things. A half-equipped little knight she was, venturing to reconnoitre the mysterious ty, and dreaming wild dreams of some vague, far-off supremacy, which should make it prey and subject—the proper penitent, grovelling at a woman's slipper.

We do not remember to have met such a description of an American heroine before, and we were startled into interest. The book is thoroughly good, alike in accurate and synthetic observation, in human sympathy, in lyric appeal, and in dramatic power. We finished with genuine regret this record of the mediocre little creature who chanced to make a hit as an actress in musical comedy, and of her abandoned lover, who, from being the rosy manager of a flourishing "resort," descended to "chair-warming," mendicancy, and suicide. We shall not soon forget the chapter in which George Hurstwood robs the safe of ten thousand dollars, and then lures Carrie away to Canada; nor that in which an afternoon stroll down Broadway first impregnates Carrie with the lust of riches and success. Nor shall we soon forget many brief passages of insight like the following (Carrie has just returned from Broadway):

> The immediate result of this was nothing. Results from such things are usually long in growing. Morning brings a change of feeling. The existent condition invariably pleads for itself. It is only at odd moments that we get glimpses of the misery of things. The heart understands when it is confronted by contrasts. Take them away and the ache subsides.

Mr. Dreiser writes with a painful lack of dignity. His pages are crowded with the latest American slang, and yet he appears to be unable to use even this very piquant slang effectively. We cannot but think, however, that a writer of talent so conspicuous must soon realise the importance of acquiring a style worthy of his matter. If other American novels are being written in the school of Sister Carrie, Mr. Heinemann will do well to bring them over here.

The Grip of the Bookmaker. By Percy White. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

This is not a turf novel; indeed, racing is scarcely mentioned, for Alf Harris, the bookmaker, has become Mortimer Gordon of Rutland-square, and little but his loud clothes, manner, and speech, together with an occasional throw-back to old acquaintances, remains to suggest his past to Rutland-square. Now, given such a bookmaker, with wealth and a son at the bar, who falls in love with Miss Madryn (daughter of Colonel Madryn, of the same square), who happens to have become engaged to the wrong man, and goes as far as to marry him, what will happen? "That will depend upon the son," is the obvious answer. Here, in bare outline, is the problem which forms Mr. Percy White's plot. And if only Philip Gordon had had a tithe of the grit of his vulgar, drunken, bookmaking father, Miss Madryn would never have married Drayton, Sir Francis Jeune would have had one case less to decide, and Mr. Percy White could not have written this sparkling little story. As it is, Philip Gordon, who should be the hero, is the one failure of the book, which is otherwise full of convincing characters, drawn with the author's known lightness of touch. That centre of intrigue, "The Sisters Tea Club," for instance:

> Its members were limited to fifty; its local habitation was a long room, simply furnished with tea tables and spindle-legged chairs, at 295, Grafton-street, over Chardonnet's, the famous dressmaker, who "made" for all of the members, and where consequently they spent most of their time when in town.

The "Sisters" could do a deal in the matter of the bookmaker's son and the daughter of the Colonel (formerly of Pentash) who has married the wrong man. Frivolous, amusing, and well written, the story remains outside the catalogue of Mr. White's best work, because a young man of Philip Gordon's character and education could, and would, have stopped the story in the first five thousand words.

The Devastators. By Ada Cambridge. (Methuen. 6s.)

The plot chosen is a powerful and suggestive one, the drama, and more especially the drama of disastrous marriages, being too perpetually momentous ever to be without an intense and absorbing interest. But The Devastators, in spite of its realistic subject, appears to be written pre-eminently for a large public, and in consequence to be stultified by conventionalities. It seems incessantly hampered by the urgency of being neither too frank nor too original for the tastes of the average reader, the reader of the suburbs and the library, the reader, in fact, for whom the majority of novels are written, and whose terror of the unusual is insurmountable. Consequently, a powerful plot fritters out into a story, good enough as stories go, but without realism, without intensity, without the relentless penetration that would have made The Devastators a depressing book, possibly, but certainly one very considerably above the average. In reading it now, we have a feeling that tragedy, with its total lack of genial opportunities, is not the writer's forte, and that novels for the family, with a lighter domestic theme, would suit her manner better.

Digitized by Google

In choice of characters, as in plot, the authoress borders upon genuine artistic achievement. They are all the kind of people likely to be found in provincial places, only they also are allowed—it would seem for the same over-consciousness of a large public's prejudices—to sink into a certain unimpressiveness. The simplicity of the heroine Peggy, however, breathes out a charm no increase of analysis could have rendered more gracious or complete.

Mistress Nell. By George G. Hazelton, Jun. (Murray. 3s.)

A GENERATION ago Charles II. and Nell Gwyn would have been subjects for serious moral dissertations. Now they are material for a tale of rollicking love-making and intrigue. The change of aspect as regards these two, and their relations to one another, is curiously interesting, and the teaching of Mr. Hazelton's "merry tale" suggests reflections never intended by the author—that is as to whether moral dissertations, with their inevitable harshness of verdict, or genial farce, with its hearty acceptance of a notorious but jolly sinner, are the most desirable symptoms of a period's opinions. In either case, Nell Gwyn is a woman always written about. For vulgar, unbridled, destitute of moral sense as she was, she remains the most striking reminder that the virtuous have by no means the monopoly of generous actions.

The following examples of the dialogue give an admirable idea of the temper of the story:

> "Nay, come up if you love me," said Nell enticingly.
> "Egad! I am too old to climb," exclaimed the Merry Monarch.
> "Egad! I am too young yet for the downward path, your Majesty," retorted Nell.
> The king shrugged his shoulders impatiently.
> "You will fall if we give you time," he said.
> "To the king's level?" she asked slyly; then answered herself: "Mayhap.'

And again:

> "Tush," answered Nell coyly, "your tongue will lead you to perdition, sire."
> "No fear," replied he dryly; "I knelt in church with brother James but yesterday."
> "In sooth, quite true," said Nell approvingly. ". . . I sat in the next pew, sire, afraid to move for fear I might awake your Majesty."

The book is charmingly bound, with a conventional design on the title-page, both restful and decorative.

Severance. By Thomas Cobb. (Lane. 6s.)

MR. COBB'S books are always interesting, though most interesting when he deals with the slightest themes in the lightest possible manner. In Severance he has departed somewhat from his particular strongholds; he has adventured into regions in which we find him much less than conqueror. The story is well constructed; its parts fit together, indeed, with a precision happily remote from life, but, so far as the main plot is concerned, we are left unmoved and unconvinced. We admit that such a man as Danvers would almost inevitably have difficulties with such a woman as Dagma; but that they should have parted in the circumstances which Mr. Cobb describes is beyond our belief. And we are the more confirmed in that belief because their reconciliation strikes us as being superficial, and, in a way, mechanical. By far the best part of the book deals with the relations between a once rejected lover and his old sweetheart; there, Mr. Cobb is suggestive, human, and convincing. But we are left with the impression that he has attempted too much, for as a foil to the woman who regrets her early mistake, and is, in consequence, too blindly self-deluding, he introduces a girl who endeavours to cover an undue and misunderstood responsiveness by conduct which does not fall short of actual rudeness, not to say vulgarity. But the book is readable, at least, and there are passages of admirable dialogue.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE SKIPPER OF BARNCRAIG. BY GABRIEL SETOUN.

This story, by the author of Robert Urquhart, is of Scottish fisher life. Its first chapter is called, "Windy Wednesday," and others are called "The Carpenter's Foy," "The Rainy 'Amelia,'" etc. The story abounds in portrayal of homely and heroic character, and the philosophy and superstitions of seafarers. (Constable 6s.)

SIR HECTOR: THE STORY OF A SCOTS GENTLEMAN. BY ROBERT MACHRAY.

This story has plenty of plot interest, and is laid in the eighteenth century. On page 97 we find the hero and another character in Change-alley, in the year 1742. The din of business is deafening. "A Jew put his hand on Mercer's arm, and offered him £10,000 scrip. . . ." "'Your pleasure, sir,' said a waiter. 'Coffee—a dish of Bohea?'" (Constable. 6s.)

THE JOSS: A REVERSION. BY RICHARD MARSH.

"That's where it is; he's a Joss."
"A Joss? What do you mean? What are you grinning at? . . ."
"It's no joke, captain; it's dead earnest. The party is a Joss, and that's where it is."
"What do you mean by a Joss?"
"It seems that a Joss is a sort of a kind of god of the country, as it were."

That explains Josses in general, but this Joss was a live Englishman. Mr. Marsh swings along at his usual pace, and divides his story into five books, the last of which consists of an "Author's Postscript." (F. V. White. 6s.)

THE MAJOR-GENERAL. BY MONTGOMERY CARMICHAEL.

"This story of Tuscan life and English life in Tuscany was written nearly four years ago," says the author, whose book, In Tuscany, interested many. "Old-fashioned love at first sight still comes to pass in Tuscany. It is certain that when dark-eyed Tuscan Don Silvio Rinaldi was presented one morning during the summer holidays at the Baths of Lucca to blonde English Miss Mary Whalley, he lost the power of speech . . ." (F. V. White. 6s.)

Digitized by Google

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage, One Halfpenny, Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscription, prepaid (including postage) 17/6
" Quarterly 5/0
" Price for one issue /5

Smith.

SMITH, when he subscribes himself Smythe, has been the subject for a century's laughter. But he is quite justified; and he may read his title clear to spell his name in almost any manner he pleases in the late Canon Bardsley's Dictionary of English and Welsh Surnames, which has lately been issued from the University Press by Mr. Henry Frowde. The work is a monument of industrious research, the result of an invalid's hobby, and modestly described by Canon Bardsley as an attempt to supply materials for an etymological dictionary of surnames. The author did not live to see the publication of his dictionary; but it should at the least form the indispensable basis of any future researches into the names which label every little English girl and boy so soon as they are born into the world. Doubtless anyone who handles this dictionary will follow the example of the present writer, and having looked up his own name (discovering unexpected length of ancestry) turn to his old friend Smith. He will find Canon Bardsley twinkling with a humour rare in dictionaries and canons. "There are 300,000 Smiths in England," he says. "Very different from the state of Israel, when 'there was no smith found throughout all the land of Israel'"! And of these 300,000 many will welcome the information that their name—a trade name, of course—may, on the authority of records and registers, be spelled Smyght, if Smethe is an insufficient disguise.

Our names, under Canon Bardsley's handling, assume a delightful simplicity of origin; even such mysterious signatures as Ticklepeny being put in their place with a line from the Domesday Book, a county itinerary, or a parish register. Five sources supply our names. They are baptismal or personal—such as Thomas; they are local, they are official, they are occupative, or they are Nicknames. Sheepshank, for example, is a nickname, and "not complimentary"! And it is notable that nearly all the nations of Western Europe have agreed in selecting these five means of identifying and distinguishing each other, and the local names largely predominate. There is one curious exception—Wales. For Wales has none of the official surnames so common in England and Germany—Chamberlain and Hofmeister, for example—and scarcely any trade names. Wales depends on personal names, and the stock is too limited. Hence the heavy odds that a Welshman will be born a Jones, a Williams, a Thomas, a Roberts, or an Evans. He may be an Inions, or even an Onions; but even then he is merely the son of Eineon. And Canon Bardsley calls for a spirited effort on the part of Welshmen to remedy this defect, for at present the Welsh surname defeats its own intention, and instead of distinguishing, creates confusion. Unfortunately, with age, imagination has vanished. We no longer invent surnames, but can only develop, vary and mis-spell those which our child-like ancestors gaily—and sometimes rudely—devised. Indeed, Canon Bardsley might have added one more to his list of origins and admitted that many people possess their names because other people could not spell. The Blenkinsops supply the most unblushing instance of the unscrupulous spelling which has enabled Smith to write himself down as almost anything up to Marjoribanks (which is one of Canon Bardsley's rare omissions). Here are two lines written in a Northumberland record: "On April 23, 1470, Eliz. Blynkkynesoppye, of Blynkynsoppe, widow of Thomas Blynkyensope, of Blynkkensope, received a general pardon." Could anything be more innocently flagrant than the lack of orthographical conscience which allowed a man to spell the same name in four different ways in two lines? And could anything be more encouraging to Smith when he wants to spell his name Cholmondeley, or Holypeter, or Herringbreeder, or Bugg, or Strong-i'-th'-arm? For there is really no limit to what may be done by the speller with imagination and without conscience. Among the inheritors of local surnames the Mannerings are, perhaps, the worst spellers and the most generous contributors to the encyclopædia of proper names. They are said to have 137 different ways of spelling their name in their archives, though it would puzzle a Christmas fireside to reconstruct them. But the Mannerings' invention pales before that of the Cushions, who provide over 400 variations. The Cushions, by the way, who are also Cushings, and Cushens, give an excellent example of the personal name which has multiplied exceedingly. Custance is the original baptismal name, which was a favourite one in Cambridgeshire in the thirteenth century. By various ways the name became Custerson, Cussens, Cousins, Cosens, Cust, and Custlot. The last is a diminutive, and reminds one of Hewlett, which is a correspondingly diminutive form of Hugh—Hugh-elot. But Cutbush has no connection with the Cambridgeshire Custance, only a dictionary adjacency. It illustrates another common origin of surnames than mis-spelling, and that is the rough-and-ready translation from the French. The Cutbushes and the Talboys are cousins—or should we spell it cushions or cosens? They both represent the old French taillebois, or cut wood. Only the Talboys favour the French of Stratford-atte-Bowe, and the Cutbushes remain Englishmen. To criticise a dictionary is almost impossible unless by writing another one. And space, as newspapers say, forbids. One can but browse. Turn up Fry—for Ranjitsinhji is neither English nor Welsh—and you will find a quotation about "the child that was so fry"—meaning free. Well, that is Fry's style, and the name suits also Elizabeth Fry, the friend of prisoners, though it is less suited to other members of the family so famous on the bench. Maggot, again. One would at the first glance regard that as a nickname conferred by our rude forefathers. It is simply the name of the son of Margaret, and comes by way of the sweet French Margot. And Margaret has had an amazing number of sons with differing names; Margeson, Marginson, Margrie, Margetts, Maggs, Magson, Matchet, and obviously Madge, are among their number. And that variety of permutations and combinations should encourage Smith to further efforts in the direction of Honeybun, Basingthwaite, Piebaker, or Funk. The Funks, it should be added, are not modern cowards, but ancient Crosspatches; and here is another omission of Canon Bardsley.

One naturally looks in a dictionary for the things one knows, and is resentful if they are not there. The gaps in Canon Bardsley's dictionary are few, but to each careful reader they will be striking. He has run Tyzack to earth through an accidental reference to a Frenchman in a North of England register. But the river-man will look in vain for Messum and Redknap, names which every river-man knows and wonders at. Wirnam is a name we cannot explain, but have often heard shouted by Oxford undergraduates in a hurry for their scout and their lunch. Canon Bardsley, who spent so many years in retirement at Oxford, should have spotted that name, as he has spotted Boffin, and Slatter, who, being also Sclattere, redeems slaughter from his suggested bloodiness of ancestry. Vynne, too, a name known in Cumberland, finds no explanation, and Kent will ask in vain for the origin of the Barlings. But these are mere suggestions thrown out. A dictionary is never complete; and Canon Bardsley's hobby has resulted in a work which gives every student a happy day in an arm-chair and will interest everybody at least in one article. And with the example of Thomas before him, or Thoms Thomasson, Tomsett, Thomson, Tompkinson, Thomerson and Tom, our friend Smith should take fresh courage. There must be other ways of spelling and mis-spelling and plaiting him out.

Digitized by Google

Things Seen.

Food.

In the month of birds—that happy month—I was taking my breakfast in a cottage by a wood. My chair faced the open window, and beyond the garden, beyond the ribbon of road, stood an ancient wall, with cunning crannies, where tits nested. As I sipped my tea, my eyes resting vacantly on the wall, suddenly from one of the crannies a tiny, unfledged bird fell plump on to the dusty road. I ran out, returned for a chair, and standing upon it, gently pushed the infant back into the cranny. Then I resumed my breakfast. While I was engaged with the same cup of tea the foolish creature fell out again. Before I reached the road a companion was also lying in the dust. And while I was replacing them, a third fell with a squeak. I succeeded in inserting them all in their cranny. Within a few minutes they were again lying in the roadway. This happened, believe me, four times, and on the last occasion one of them only escaped death, by a beak, from a passing cart-wheel. Then I brought them into the room, inverted the tea-cosy, tucked them into it, and tried to close their gaping, squeaking mouths with a dozen kinds of messes. But they would have none of them. And the morning wearing away saw me an ignominious failure as a foster-mother. I went down into the village, and, sitting on the bridge, considered the case. "Suppose you were the mother-bird," I said to myself, "what would you seek for to drop into those gaping mouths?" Pat came the answer: "Why, worms!" I returned to the cottage, dug in the garden, and presently found three of the fattest, liveliest little worms I have ever encountered. Holding them in the palm of my hand, I proceeded gingerly indoors, but on the threshold I paused. "They are very happy little worms," I reflected, "much happier than those squealing birds." With that I was confronted by a great problem containing a principle none the less important, because it concerned merely birds and worms. It was this: "To save the lives of three unhappy little birds, is it justifiable to kill three happy little worms?" I could not answer. Neither could I take the lives of the worms.

Peril.

At the jetty I was somewhat disturbed to find that I was to be carried to the mainland in a battered cockle-shell, hardly bigger than a Thames launch. Worse—it was packed with an hilarious mob, plainly returning from a wayzgoose. Squeezing on board, I peered about for an official to assure myself that the boat's port was my port, and at last located the captain. He was swaying on the paltry deck amidships, his body rising like a yew-tree from an undergrowth of flowered hats and encircled waists. Everywhere on this cockle-shell men, women and children were wedged tight, as in a Bank Holiday third-class carriage. When at last I caught the captain's eye, and bawled my question down the wind, his manner was so confused, so enigmatical, that I looked around for a sight of the life-buoys. Then someone cast us off, and the tub gallantly pounded her way through the waves, which presently began to sweep her unpleasantly. A child fell and cut its face, a toy cannon burst its lashings, babies screamed, heads were bent over the side; then, suddenly, in the midst of all these little miseries, there came sailing out from the west, sweeping serenely over the turbulent waves, that noble, simple sight—a racing yacht in full sail. Swiftly she came, seeming to glide over the water rather than through it, and so quickly that I had hardly time to wipe the salt water from my face before I saw the tanned faces of her crew crouched, as if in ambush, in the stern. They were very quiet. Their faces were turned towards us, and I wondered if their minds had the same thought that jumped in mine—that, if we both kept on in our course, at a certain point, not far off, we must meet. I glanced towards our captain, who was still staring oddly at the oncoming boat—gloating on it almost; and as I looked at him there flashed into my mind a paragraph headed "A Mad Engine-driver's Freak," which I had read in a morning paper. Nearer we drew; still the captain stared; still our cockle-shell pounded on; still that great bird flew over the water; still her crew crouched, with faces turned to us, but making no movement. Nearer! I cried out some form of warning. Nearer! I could have thrown my hat on board. Then the captain gripped the wheel. Something beneath my feet groaned; we turned suddenly aside; the yacht swept across our bows. Her crew still watched us. But they spoke no word.

The Anonymity Business.

Students of current literature have observed what skilful and successful use of anonymity has been made in attracting the public to books in the last ten or fifteen years. Perhaps, like ourselves, they are rather weary of this device, and in that case they will welcome the announcement made in the following manifesto, in which both the strength and exhaustion of modern anonymity are set forth with many incidental surprises, on which our readers can supply their own suitable reflections. This manifesto, we must explain, has been communicated to the New York Saturday Review by a gentleman who signs himself "Secretary for the Anonymous Literary League (Limited)." He gives his address as "The Works, 1,105a, Campbellfield-street, Glasgow, Scotland."

"As no useful purpose is likely to be served by any longer maintaining the anonymity which has hitherto surrounded the production of a large number of literary works that has appeared under our auspices in the course of the past few years, we think it well, through the medium of your widely circulated journal, to make it public that we are, jointly and collectively, the authors of the works of Fiona McLeod, Elizabeth and Her German Garden, An Englishwoman's Love-Letters, The Martyrdom of an Empress, and The Tribulations of a Princess, as well as numerous no less important, though perhaps less celebrated works, purporting to be from the pens of Andrew Lang, S. R. Crockett, J. M. Barrie, Ian Maclaren, Mark Twain, and others, who have had no existence outside the brains of our talented and versatile staff.

"It is sufficient reason for our making the facts public that the device of anonymity, which was invented many years ago by our Mr. Walter J. Sparks, M.A., LL.D., Chairman of the League, has been so frequently and brazenly imitated within the past year or two, that we have determined to compete no longer in a field in which we must confess to have reaped very substantial rewards for our initiative and enterprise.

Digitized by Google

"Mr. Sparks, who is a distinguished graduate of Glasgow University, was, as I have stated, the first to suggest the latent possibilities of anonymity, and at his advice a small company was formed in 1872, and a modest trial made with a volume entitled Ballads and Lyrics of Old France. At first we had difficulty in deciding whether we should publish it with a nom de guerre or without any name at all. Fortunately it occurred to Mr. Sparks that, in the event of the book being a success, future works would have a better chance of identification and popularity if some author's name was attached to it, and it was proposed by one of our company (the late George Watson Watkinson) that the nom de guerre should be Andrew Lang. We have never regretted the decision to adopt that pen name, which has become famous in every part of the English-speaking world, and which has adorned the title-pages of countless poems, essays, reviews, novels, translations, histories, and even editorials. The Ballads and Lyrics venture was very successful. There was and still is a fair demand for the book, though that sort of material is now somewhat out of fashion since Love-letters became the vogue.

"But it was not until ten years later that the company received its largest impetus and widened its sphere of influence. Early in the 'eighties Mr. Sparks made the acquaintance of a young Scotch clergyman who, it seemed to him, was just the man he needed to strengthen and develop the growth and usefulness of the League. The services of Dr. Robinson Macnichol were at once engaged, and it was at his instigation that the Kailyard school of fiction was floated. Dr. Macnichol spent some months at our works in Kirriemuir (afterward known as Thrums), and in the heart of Perthshire (located later as Drumtochty), and then went to London, where it was believed he could best further the interests of the scheme.

"I need scarcely go into the matter of our Crocketts. There has been some doubt as to whether Dr. Macnichol or one of our staff in Glasgow (who was a stickit minister) originated the idea. But it does not much matter. The Crocketts were produced from by-products with great rapidity and in bulk by the general staff, when no more important work was on hand. I see from Who's Who, that a gentleman of the name of Samuel Rutherford Crockett, residing at 'Bank House, Penicuick, Midlothian,' claims to have written all the novels that have appeared since 1893 with the name of S. R. Crockett on the title-page. It is a harmless delusion on his part, and it must be obvious to any reflective person that one pen or one head, even when aided by a multiplicity of typewriters, could not have produced all the works in question.

"For years we have turned out Langs and Crocketts in bewildering number and variety, and it has naturally created a great deal of amusement among those in the secret to read frequently in the newspapers that Andrew Lang was golfing at St. Andrews, or fishing on the Tweed, or travelling in the Highlands; that S. R. Crockett was visiting Lord Rosebery, or wandering in Spain with his camera, while, in sober earnest, the half-dozen industrious gentlemen in our employ who produced the works ascribed to these wholly mythical individuals were at the moment perhaps working hard in their shirt-sleeves at the completion of a history, a novel, a collection of Stickit Minister stories, or the compilation of a fairy book.

"It was obviously, however, somewhat hazardous to have an unrestricted output of Langs and Crocketts, for if they were in any year in excess of what could be considered a reasonable production for two unaided pens, suspicion would be aroused on the part of the reading public. As it was, four and five volumes per annum (as we see from our ledger was the Lang output of the period between 1884 and 1897, and the Crockett product was not far behind that), not to mention the countless contributions of a fugitive character in the magazines and journals, were enough to create some speculation in the press as to the identity of these prolific and versatile gentlemen. It was even hinted that Andrew Lang was a syndicate, and that Crockett never travelled without a typewriter. Under these circumstances, common prudence suggested an extension of our operations in other directions, and in 1895 we were fortunate enough to secure the services of an ex-student of St. Andrews, named Dugald Macallister, a native of Skye, who, for conscientious reasons, had abruptly terminated his studies for a degree in the divinity. Under that gentleman's superintendence was formed what we call our Gloom Department. The first product of the new department was Pharais: A Romance of the Isles, which was speedily followed by The Mountain Lovers, The Sin Eater, The Washer at the Ford, and other works of a kindred nature, which will be familiar to students of so-called Celtic Renascence.

"For the production of the Gloom it was necessary to open a small factory in the Isle of Lewis, near Skye, so that the native might be studied at first hand and the local colour be absolutely true to nature. Our workmen laboured there under unparalleled hardships, due to the climate and the isolation from the mainland, but I am gratified to say that they never grumbled, and though recently our output of "Fionas" has been restricted, they were for a time to be heard of everywhere.

"At Dr. Macnichol's suggestion we started as a relief to our Gloom Department another product of Highland fiction, for the production of which we were successful in capturing a young Highlander named Donald MacArthur, who was running wild on the shores of Loch Awe. He was full of romance and Highland mist, and had the second sight. Under the pen name of Neil Munro we were successful in getting Blackwood's Magazine to publish a series of stories told to us in the rough by young Donald. These aroused the admiration of Mr. Kipling and Mr. W. E. Henley, and afterward we sent them out in book form under the title of The Lost Pibroch. These have been followed since by John Splendid, Gillian the Dreamer, and Doom Castle, and have amply fulfilled our expectations and served their purpose.

"A number of subsequent adventures in anonymity were scarcely so successful, but we made a great hit with what we call our 'Elusive Eliza Series'; in other words, the books of the Elizabeth and Her German Garden character. The Directors had long seen an opening for a garden book which would not convey so much sordid information, and would throw a sentimental veil, so to speak, over the unpleasant necessity for slug hunting, weeding, and keeping the gardener sober. To this end our Mr. Simpson (who had some horticultural experience with a small plot of ground in his backyard) organised the Garden Department, and early in the Spring of 1899 Elizabeth and Her German Garden came forth to be met with the rapturous acclamations of the critics, who to this day have failed to discover that a knowledge of all the practical gardening in that volume and its successors from the same department could be acquired with the simple aid of a three-foot window flower-box and some back numbers of The Amateur Gardener and Country Life.

"It was a much simpler task to float An Englishwoman's Love-Letters, for we had all the raw material and the experience in our workshop. In the case of that extremely profitable venture, as well as in the case of the 'Elusive Elizas' and our 'Mysterious Royalties,' we greatly extended our publicity system. You may remember that scores of contradictory rumours got abroad with regard to the authorship of Elizabeth and Her German Garden, and that several titled ladies were credited with having written the book. All the paragraphs, I need scarcely say, emanated from our publicity department, which up till now has been under the superintendence of a clever young Scotch-American, who received his preliminary training from the late Mr. P. T. Barnum and finished his education with a firm of religious publishers.

Digitized by Google

The Love-Letters benefited vastly by similar tactics, and although a statement (which did not emanate from us) was made with great show of authority by the ACADEMY that a certain Mr. Laurence Housman was the real author of the Letters, we can assure you that they were begun, continued, and ended in our factory in Campbellfield-street, all but a few parts that were adaptations of French designs.

"If there exists any doubt about our enterprise after this statement, we shall be glad to show any serious investigator through our works, on presentation of his visiting-card, accompanied with the card of a member of the League. The works are open from five o'clock in the morning until eight in the evening, except on Saturday, which is a half-holiday. There is no more commodious or better equiped factory of the kind in the kingdom, in spite of the frantic efforts of our newly arisen rivals to beat us in a field which, without exaggeration and without undue jealousy, we may call our own.

"We are not responsible for the failures which, as we have said, are cheap and brazen imitations of our works. Nevertheless, the League recognises that a critical hour approaches when the present competition with anonymous books will result in disaster all round. In our case, as an old-established, reputable, and solid firm, we might hope to weather the storm, if it were not for an additional drawback in the popularity of the rural novel and tawdry historical romance.

"We have another scheme on foot which you may hear of later on, but the League has unanimously agreed that it is impossible to be anonymous with any dignity under present conditions, and so we are reluctantly compelled to close our works. They will be open to any visitor until the 1st of September."

Correspondence.

The Influence of Literature.

SIR,—There is surely a tendency nowadays to credit literature with too great an influence upon life. Brought to the actual test, what is that influence? I do not wish to detract either from the value or joy of literature; I merely suggest that it has been too generously credited with powers which are neither necessary to, nor inherent in, its essence.

It has been said that the greatest literature is impersonal, that, at its best it is the expression of a mind steeped, as it were, in the strong salt of first causes, a mind having something of Olympian detachment, something of the sun's opulent dispassionateness of regard. Let this be admitted, and by way of illustration let the names of Homer, Shakespeare, and Goethe be set down. Has their influence upon the world's life, the average life of the average man, been great? How many soldiers have actually faced peril the more nobly for the story of Achilles? How many lovers have escaped the agonies of jealousy because they saw it so pitifully wrought to its conclusion in "Othello"? How many men, weak and passionate, have been turned aside from the oldest of transgressions by the tears of Marguerite? It is not from literature that a man learns, but from life; from what comes within his own experience or happens under his own eyes; in a word, from the travail of his own soul. And although literature may and does reflect that travail, it is from himself he acts, and from himself he feels. Just so much experience as he brings to the illuminating of his reading, by just so much will he appreciate the author's outlook or philosophy.

Thoreau expressed himself in literature with a completeness which stands solitary amongst moderns; he knew himself, as we say, in and out; he was so personal that we get the flavour of the man on every page. Yet it was in no mere mood that he wrote:

> Plutarch was good, and so was Homer too,
> Our Shakespeare's life were rich to live again.
> What Plutarch read, that was not good nor true,
> Nor Shakespeare's books, unless his books were men.
>
> Here while I lie beneath this walnut bough,
> What care I for the Greeks or for Troy town,
> If juster battles are enacted now
> Between the ants upon this hummock's crown?
>
> Bid Homer wait till I the issue learn,
> If red or black the gods will favour most,
> Or yonder Ajax will the phalanx turn,
> Struggling to heave some rock against the host.

The attitude of the active and self-reliant mind has been, and ever will be, thus. In its best moments it cries: Hang literature! let us have visible life, even though it be but the microcosm of an ant-hill.

If it be admitted that the greatest literature has small influence upon life, it must also be admitted that the lower forms of literature have an influence out of all proportion to their merits; or rather, perhaps, I should distinguish, and say that certain forms of printed words have that influence. For it must be remembered that the appeal, the intellectual appeal, of good literature, is necessarily to the few, the appeal of the multitudinous printed word is to the many. Indeed, the more intellectual the appeal the less likely is it to have practical effect, for the mind which grasps that appeal is already beyond its formative influence.

If we ask ourselves what writers have been most influential in the formation of character (or shall I say in certain temporary manifestations of character?) we have to name such writers as Voltaire, Carlyle, Ruskin; each in his own way admirable, each having amazing qualities of eloquence and intuition, yet each, as it seems to me, without that broad view which brings theory to the test of every day. To have an ideal is very well, but that ideal must be as many-sided as life itself. "The ideal," said Amiel, "poisons for me all imperfect possession." In that brief sentence lies not the condemnation of the ideal, but of the too frequent habit of mind of the idealist.

After all, we read what we wish to read; we go to an author, if we are anything more than mere casual openers of books, for such light as he can throw on ourselves, or on our knowledge of life. We do not go to him to be taught morality or nice points of conduct; we read him because he has stated that morality and those points of conduct in language beautiful, or witty, or nobly eloquent. We deceive ourselves in most matters—for nature has made kindly provision for the shortcomings of her children—and, certainly, amongst other things, we have come to deceive ourselves as to the influence of literature It is, no doubt, a pleasant fiction, but I believe it to be fiction none the less. It is agreeable to conjure up a kind of chamber of literary gods, and to that I have no objection whatever; but do not let us suppose that those benign figures are directing our lives. Those who live under our roof, the man with whom we dine, the friend who blames or praises us—these, together with duties fulfilled or left undone, make up the influences of life. Literature can well stand without being credited with alien virtues. It has influence, no doubt, but how much less than many of us suppose!—I am, etc. C. C. B.

Digitized by Google

'Insanity in Literature."

SIR,—With a violence as unfortunate as it is rare in the pages of the ACADEMY, your Paris correspondent mourned last week over the evil days upon which French literature had fallen. With a vehemence—may I say an "insanity"?—of disgust she reviled the anti-Dreyfusards and the whole school of writers who give to the play of sexual emotion a prominent place in their works. The bad taste displayed in her story regarding M. Pierre Louys' recovery is surely obvious, and one cannot help feeling surprised that a residence in France, and (presumably) a superficial acquaintance with the French character, should have been insufficient to save H. L. from so tactless and brutale an exhibition of her disgust.

Throughout her letter it was the tone of her arguments rather than the arguments themselves that was so unwise and undesirable. Possibly the books that fall under the ban of her displeasure are neither first-rate art nor good morality, but the presentation of these facts, as given by your correspondent, is hardly calculated to bring any conviction to the reader's mind, save as to H. L's. unfitness for the task of literary critic. As to the anti-Dreyfusards, it is necessary to remember that many excellent Frenchmen do honestly believe that the Jews are gradually ruining France; and their prejudices in this respect, if lamentable, are usually sincere. Being well acquainted with M. Louys' writings, I am aware how impossible any discussion of them is in a short letter, but I must ask your correspondent if she really cannot find any passages of beauty in Aphrodite or in Les Chansons de Bylitis, and whether there is no gaiety or lightness of touch in La Femme et le Pantin? I have not yet seen the "singularly evil" book she mentions, but be it as bad as it may, I cannot but protest against the sweeping assertions and vituperative epithets employed by her in an article professedly devoted to literary criticism.

Anatole France may be our sole link with the classic past, but many of us can find much of the best essence of French esprit in the works of M. Marcel Prévost.—I am, etc.,

PERCY L. BABINGTON.

Walmer House, Tonbridge.

[It will, perhaps, surprise Mr. Babington to learn that the views I express regarding the works of Pierre Louys are those held by every French writer of distinction I have met: and the article I sent you was discussed by me before writing it with two of the greatest French critics of the day, and met with their full approval.

When I ask for what market such deplorable literature is fabricated, I am answered in Paris: "For the foreign markets. Only ignorant foreigners revel in it, and fondly believe that they are making acquaintance with French life and wit." The story of M. Louys and Providence was told with general approbation at the table of a distinguished writer, where all the guests except myself were writers of scientific and literary renown, and no one found it offensive or "tactless and brutale," as Mr. Babington, with his superior British judgment, states it to be. I do not deny the talent of M. Louys. But that is just the saddest part of it. He can write, but to what purpose? Books that no respectable Frenchman can read with pleasure, and that few will even admit they have read. I am not now referring to the strait-laced bourgeois, but to Academicians, critics, and highly cultivated men and women, who can read the old French classics with pleasure and profit, and accept their coarseness as a wholesome revelation of the spirit of the times, which had the inestimable merit lacking in modern pornography of being simple, direct, and honest. I know young Frenchmen of the world, not writers and austere Academicians, but young men with plenty of leisure, and the taste and means for amusement, with quite sufficient culture and wit to appreciate good literature, who frankly admit that they cannot read Louys, and express their horror and disgust at finding hideous pornography appreciated abroad which at home is regarded as infamous and scandalous. I have been repeatedly asked by my literary French friends to state to your readers that no cultivated or honest French people read this class of literature, and certainly I can assert that I have never seen a volume of Louys in any of the many French houses in which I am received en intime.

Mr. Babington says he finds "much of the best essence of French esprit in the works of M. Marcel Prévost." Let me inform him that so distinguished a critic as M. René Doumie, lamenting to me the appalling pornography of to-day, even denied all literary qualities to M. Prévost, denied him wit, talent, or style. Until he redeemed his past by his serious books, Frédérique and Leâ, M. Doumie declined to include M. Prévost among contemporary writers. Now, though I detest much that he has written, I do find talent, sometimes brilliance, and even wit, in M. Prévost, but that he is by no means distinctively French in the best sense of the word will be discovered by anyone who, understanding French literature—or, for that matter, any literature—after reading a story of his, will read one of Mérimée's, or after a page of his, will take up a page of Renan; he will see what the best essence of French esprit really is. M. Prévost is far enough away from this gracious and charming quality.

But, alas! second-rate English people and Americans go over to Paris, do Montmartre and the Quarter, and then believe they knew all about literary Paris. They think it chic and Parisian to admire fervently all that is basest in modern French letters. It is a way of advertising one's artistic temperament, while all the time, real literary Paris, of which I know something, is much more formal, more correct, more fastidious, than any other literary society of Europe. Not a touch of Bohemianism to be found here, and art is not accepted by those who count on its creation as a legitimate outlet for all that is brutal, obscene, base, and malodorous in mankind.—HANNAH LYNCH.]

Life and Literature.

SIR,—May I take advantage of the lull after the violent expostulations of last week to quote Stevenson himself? Speaking of his earlier life, he characterises himself as one who was "insatiably curious in the aspects of life"; and who "spent much time in scraping acquaintance with all classes of man- and woman-kind"—which, to my mind, is forcibly suggestive of a very determined effort to "study life."—I am, etc.,

T. W. COLE.

21, Coleford-road, Wandsworth, S.W.

The New "Hazlitt."

SIR,—May we be allowed a line in which to refer to the two matters for which we are responsible, mentioned in "N's" letter in your last week's issue, respecting the forthcoming edition of Hazlitt?

(1) Following the example of Masson's edition of De Quincey, we intend to give in the last volume to be published a full index to the works.

(2) The "Life of Napoleon," though not forming part of the present collection, will be issued in supplemental volumes, should we receive any encouragement to take that course.—We are, etc.,

A. R. WALLER.
ARNOLD GLOVER.

Santon Lodge, Reigate Hill, Surrey.

Digitized by Google

"Tragedy": Ancient and Modern.

SIR,—For much would English popular literature, and, in particular, journalistic literature, have to answer before a tribunal of Linguistic Reason and Propriety, were such a tribunal in existence; such an one, for example, as that imagined by the wit of Lucian. Not so much in the way of addition, as of degradation of words and terms of well-established meaning.

One word there is, of noble and distinguished ancestry, the degradation of which—I know not for how long, but, at all events, during the two last decades—calls for no small degree of reprobation, not only upon academic, but also, and yet more, upon ethical grounds. I refer to the common and constant abuse of the word tragedy, a word distinguishing one of the highest achievements of the Hellenic intellect. What would not be the feeling of indignation and of disgust of Æschylus, or of Euripides, —if he were enabled to revisit the upper world and to read an English newspaper or magazine—to see the report of some commonplace, altogether non-"romantic," murder (perpetrated in some drunken brawl, it may be, or under yet more sordid and non-"heroic" circumstances) headed by the term which had been appropriated by his language to designate the drama, let us say, of the "Agamemnon" or of the "Medeia."

The mischief of this abuse of language is by no means imaginary. It tends to disguise all the horror and brutality of vulgar crime and violence, and even to invest it, so far as language can do so, with dramatic interest and dignity. It is not only newspapers of the Police News type that offend in this way—journals of much higher pretensions must plead guilty. Words and names—a truth recognised by every serious thinker—have exercised, and still exercise, immense, if generally ignored, influence upon human opinion and action: and it is of the utmost importance that this certain truth be constantly affirmed: "If things were only called by their right name, Cæsar himself might be ashamed of fame."—I am, etc.,

H. W.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 100 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best list of the novels which have effected revolutions in law or manners. We award the prize to Miss Helen G. Hirst, Ruswarp, Yorks, for the following:

Emile (J. J. Rousseau).—This book may be said to have revolutionised the attitude of the world with regard to the education of children.

Popular Tales (Maria Edgeworth).—Published in 1803 and succeeding years, these "Tales" almost certainly helped as a model for the great Sir Walter himself, and they certainly inaugurated the era of interesting and yet moral stories suitable for "general reading," in which the characters were as natural as those of the readers of the book, and the incidents were those of the ordinary kind in everyone's daily life.

Oliver Twist (C. Dickens).—In this novel such a picture was painted of the misery of children brought up by the parish that it certainly helped to form a strong public opinion in favour of Poor Law Reform.

Nicholas Nickleby (C. Dickens).—The descriptions of Dotheboys Hall and of Squeers' educational methods helped to abolish all such establishments of the kind in England.

Martin Chuzzlewit (C. Dickens).—This novel probably diminished the number of nurses of the kind of the immortal Mrs. Gamp. It certainly strengthened the hands of Miss Nightingale and of Miss Agnes Jones some years later, when they brought in the new era of private and hospital nursing.

Alton Locke (C. Kingsley).—This showed the evils of trade competition, and the misery of the industrial workers during the Chartist period.

Yeast (C. Kingsley).—Showed the condition of the agricultural labourers at the middle of the nineteenth century.

Uncle Tom's Cabin (H. B. Stowe).—By its graphic picture of the horrors of slavery, this book did much towards preparing people's minds for the great changes of 1861-1865 in the U.S.A.

Tom Brown's Schooldays (T. Hughes).—This great book was a fine illustration of Dr. Arnold's educational methods, which were soon to be the only ones practised in all good schools.

Hard Cash (C. Reade).—This novel certainly led to a greater vigilance being bestowed on the management of private lunatic asylums in England.

All Sorts and Conditions of Men (W. Besant).—This book was the direct means of the creation of the "People's Palace," and it also turned people's minds towards Settlement work.

From other lists sent in we select the following entries:

Don Quixote (Cervantes).—Because, according to Byron, "Cervantes" (in this book) "laughed Spain's chivalry away"—i.e., in reality, made ridiculous mock chivalry and such works as Amadis de Gaul.

The Simpleton (Reade).—Because this work directed attention to the evils of tight-lacing.

Evelina (Miss Burney). In reading this novel young ladies perceived that it was possible to be really too green. Hence the revolution, whose results amaze us to-day.

Little Dorrit (Dickens).—Hairdressers can testify to the change in "coiffeur" among ministers of all denominations caused by the exposure of the Patriarch.

Tess of the D'Urbervilles (Hardy).—Introduced to the reading public the sauce piquante, consisting of fatalism, devilry, and the beauties of nature, which has since flavoured many inferior dishes.

St. Bernard's ("Æsculapius Scalpel").—Because this novel directed notice to scandals in connection with hospital management.

Charles Lever in Harry Lorrequer first revealed to the world the prodigious capabilities of the Irish hunter (man and beast).

In Quatre-Vingt-Treize Victor Hugo first showed the world that a piece of ordnance on board ship could behave like a live animal.

In Le Ventre de Paris Emile Zola first showed us that the odours of French cheeses were reducible to a musical symphony.

The Heir of Redclyffe, The Daisy Chain (C. M. Yonge).—It did for English girls what the Oxford Tracts did for scholars: and after arousing them to the beauty of the early Anglican revelation, sent them to show forth their faith by their works.

Esther Waters (Moore) and Fécondité (Zola).—Because these works have both directed public attention to iniquities in connection with baby-farming.

Les Miserables (Hugo).—Because this leviathan work has done much to modify public opinion as to convicts.

Robert Elsmere (Mrs. Ward).—Society learned that the drawing-room is the place, and the afternoon tea-hour the time, for the discussion of Theology.

The winner of last week's competition (the best set of verses entitled "Sea Birds") was stated to be H. C. P., whose name and address had not reached us. A cheque for One Guinea has now been forwarded to Mr. H. C. Prideaux, Crugmeer, Padstow, Cornwall.

Competition No. 101 (New Series).

THIS week we offer a prize of One Guinea for the best set of new-coined words likely to be helpful in literary criticism. Miss Gertrude Atherton's suggestion of "littleist" as the equivalent of a would-be realist, noted on our first page, may serve as a not too brilliant example.

RULES.

Answers, addressed, "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, August 28. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon: otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

Special cloth cases for binding the half-yearly volumes of the ACADEMY can be supplied for 1*s. each. The price of the bound half-yearly volume is* 8*s.* 9*d. Communications should be addressed to the Publisher,* 43, Chancery-lane.

Digitized by Google

MESSRS. METHUEN'S LIST.

Messrs. METHUEN have much pleasure in announcing that they will publish on OCTOBER 18

THE LIFE OF ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

By GRAHAM BALFOUR. Demy 8vo, 2 vols., 25s. net.

This highly important Work is the authoritative life of Mr. Stevenson, and has been written by Mr. Balfour at the request of Mr. Stevenson's family. As the demand for it will be very great, orders should be placed with the Booksellers at once.

Messrs. METHUEN have much pleasure in announcing that they will publish on SEPTEMBER 13 a long and highly important Novel, entitled

THE HISTORY OF SIR RICHARD CALMADY.

By LUCAS MALET, Author of "The Wages of Sin," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

As there will be a considerable demand for this Book. Messrs. METHUEN suggest that the public place their orders with the Booksellers without delay. In view of the almost certain wish of a large number of the public to possess an Edition of this Book, somewhat more luxurious than the ordinary Edition, Messrs. METHUEN have arranged to print a small Edition in two volumes at 12s.

METHUEN'S POPULAR NOVELS.—SIX SHILLINGS each.

FORTUNE'S DARLING.	WALTER RAYMOND.	Sept. 3
The YEAR ONE.	J. BLOUNDELLE-BURTON.	Sept. 3
ROYAL GEORGIE.	S. BARING-GOULD.	Sept. 6
RICKERBY'S FOLLY.	TOM GALLON.	Sept. 10
SIR RICHARD CALMADY.	LUCAS MALET.	Sept. 13
MASTER of MEN.	E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM.	Sept. 20
A GALLANT QUAKER.	MARGARET ROBERTON.	Oct. 1
CLEMENTINA.	A. E. W. MASON.	Oct. 2
The ALIEN.	F. F. MONTRESSOR.	Oct. 2
TALES of DUNSTABLE WEIR.	ZACK.	Oct. 4
ANGEL.	Mrs. B. M. CROKER.	Oct. 4
LIGHT FREIGHTS. (3s. 6d.)	W. W. JACOBS.	Oct. 11
CHRISTINA McNAB.	Miss S. MACNAUGHTAN.	Oct. 11
A FOOL'S YEAR.	E. H. COOPER.	Oct. 18
The EMBARRASSING ORPHAN.	W. E. NORRIS.	Oct. 18
The PROPHET of BERKELEY SQUARE.	ROBERT HICHENS.	Oct. 25
FANCY FREE.	EDEN PHILLPOTTS.	Nov. 6

GENERAL LITERATURE.

The LETTERS of LORD CHESTERFIELD to his SON. Edited, with an Introduction, by C. Strachey, and Notes by A. CALTHORP. 2 vols., crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s. each. This is the most complete edition ever published, and gives the authentic text as it left the hands of its author.

"For excellence of topography, lightness in the hand, and scholarly revision, this edition is a worthy sequel to Dr. Birkbeck Hill's 'Memoirs of Gibbon,' and higher praise could not be given."—Morning Leader.

The MALVERN COUNTRY. By B. C. A. Windle, D.Sc., F.R.S. Illustrated by E. H. New. Pott 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 3s.; leather, 3s. 6d. net. [THE LITTLE GUIDES.

A BOOK of BRITTANY. By S. Baring-Gould. With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Uniform in scope and size with Mr. Baring-Gould's well-known books on Devon, Cornwall, and Dartmoor.

"Full of interesting matter, of gossip and antiquarian lore."—Literature.

FICTION.

A NEW NOVEL BY JOHN OLIVER HOBBES.

The SERIOUS WOOING. By John Oliver Hobbes, Author of "Robert Orange." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The book describes in brilliant fashion a characteristic page of modern social life with no little spirit and vivacity. It is full of good things."—Daily Telegraph.

"A constant flow of bright and lively talk. The most vivacious story that she has written."—Globe. "Entertaining from beginning to end."—Morning Post.

"Worked out with a singular cleverness and with masterly insight into character. The whole story is admirably written, and will achieve even greater popularity than any of its predecessors."—Punch.

"Mrs. Craigie is as brilliant as she ever has been; her characters are all illuminated with sparkling gems of description, and the conversation scintillates with an almost bewildering blaze."—Athenæum.

A WOMAN ALONE. By Mrs. W. K. Clifford, Author of "Aunt Anne." Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

"A book for which one is grateful. There are charming flashes of humour."—Morning Post.

The THIRTEEN EVENINGS. By George Bartram, Author of "The People of Clopton." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The stories impress us by their full-bloodedness. They have unflagging vivacity and carry us along in thunderous style."—Manchester Guardian.

JOHN TOPP, PIRATE. By Weatherby Chesney. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A good, breezy, sailory story, made for reading from cover to cover."—Outlook.

"It is well written, with that swing and dash which the subject seems to demand."—Glasgow Herald.

A GREAT LADY. By Adeline Sergeant, Author of "The Story of a Penitent Soul." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"There is much skill in the study of the female characters and the story is attractive."—Manchester Courier.

BOTH SIDES of the VEIL. By Richard Marsh, Author of "The Seen and the Unseen." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Here we have Mr. Marsh at his best."—Globe. "Quite engrossing."—Morning Leader. "All the stories are clever and ingenious."—Glasgow Herald.

MARY HAMILTON. By Lord Ernest Hamilton. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Will attract a multitude of admirers."—Daily Telegraph.

The WOOING of SHEILA. By Grace Rhys. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A really fine book; a book that deserves to live. Sheila is the sweetest heroine who has lived in a novelist's pages for many a day. Every scene and every incident has the impress of truth. It is a masterly romance, and one that should be widely read and appreciated."—Morning Leader.

"A remarkable study of Irish life."—Irish Times.

The SKIRTS of HAPPY CHANCE. By H. B. Marriott Watson. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Holds our attention completely."—World.

"The hero has a freshness, cynicism, and an engaging impudence which are admirably portrayed."—Saturday Review.

The STRIKING HOURS. By Eden Phillpotts, Author of "Children of the Mist," "Sons of the Morning," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Admirable both in conception and execution, and can do nothing but add to Mr. Phillpotts's high reputation."—Morning Post.

The DEVASTATORS. By Ada Cambridge, Author of "Path and Goal." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The plot chosen is a powerful and suggestive one. In choice of characters the authoress borders on genuine artistic achievement."—Academy.

The MILLION. By Dorothea Gerard, Author of "The Supreme Crime," "The Conquest of London," &c Crown 8vo, 6s.

FROM the LAND of the SHAMROCK. By Jane Barlow. Crown 8vo, 6s. [August 30.

MESSRS. METHUEN will send their NEW BOOK GAZETTE post free on application.

METHUEN & CO., 36, Essex Street, W.C.

Digitized by Google

READY SEPTEMBER 3.

A NEW BOOK by the BISHOP (DESIGNATE) OF DURHAM.

THOUGHTS FOR THE SUNDAYS OF THE YEAR.

By the Rev. HANDLEY C. G. MOULE, D.D.,

Bishop (Designate) of Durham. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

This book contains a brief study for each Sunday in the year, intended to aid the spiritual life. Readers acquainted with Dr. Moule's writings will know what to expect in this volume; but those who here for the first time come into touch with his gracious personality will find the book very helpful and stimulating to the inner life. The book contains admirable examples of Dr. Moule's clear insight into the deeper meanings of Scripture, and his ability to throw new and suggestive side-lights upon even the most familiar passages.

Published by the RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, 56, Paternoster Row, London.

A NEW BOOK by DR. J. AGAR BEET.

A KEY TO UNLOCK THE BIBLE.

By JOSEPH AGAR BEET, D.D.,

Author of "Commentaries on St. Paul's Epistles," &c.

"BIBLE KEYS SERIES," No. 1. Small crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 1s. 6d.

"Professor Beet, whose place among the best exegetical writers of the day is assured, gives us here an excellent summary of Biblical knowledge. He states conclusions ratner than arguments. The compass of his volume makes any other course impossible. He has, then, to be trusted by his readers. But he is so sane and cautious, and withal so obviously determined to be honest, that such trust is well deserved."—The Spectator.

Published by the RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, 56, Paternoster Row, London.

J. W. ARROWSMITH'S SHORT LIST.

THE GOOD RED EARTH. By EDEN PHILLPOTTS. 3s. 6d. The Times says: "This is the best story he has written."

THE "CHICOT" PAPERS. By KEBLE HOWARD. Illustrated with upwards of seventy of TOM BROWNE'S original sketches. Crown 8vo, stiff paper covers, 171 pp. "Delightfully racy reading."—Bristol Mercury. "Bright and amusing."—Outlook. ".....comic drawings are irresistible."—Oxford Times. One Shilling.

THE VIRGIN and the SCALES. By AGNES DAWSON. Fcap. 8vo, 212 pp. "Is distinctly one of the stories of the season."—Sheffield Independent. "A wholly delightful and attractive volume."—Weekly Dispatch. "A capital book."—Scotsman. One Shilling.

SPORTING SORROWS. By FOX RUSSELL, Author of "From a Bachelor Uncle's Diary," &c. Fcap. 8vo, 192 pp. One Shilling.

Bristol: J. W. ARROWSMITH.
London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

No. 1031.—SEPTEMBER, 1901.—2s. 6d.

PIANISTS OF THE PAST. PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS BY THE LATE CHARLES SALAMAN.
WITH THE PILCHARD FLEET. By STEPHEN GWYNN.
CRICKET RECORDS. By HAMISH STUART
THE CONQUEST OF CHARLOTTE. CHAPS. VI.—VIII.
SKINNER OF SKINNER'S HORSE.
A RECTOR'S STORY.
THE STATE OF IRELAND.
ÆLFRED THE KING. By MRS. ADA BARTRICK BAKER.
OUR L.-T.
MUSINGS WITHOUT METHOD:—THE PALM WITHOUT THE DUST—LORD ROSEBERY'S LASSITUDE—THE CREATION OF MR. GLADSTONE—LORD CHESTERFIELD'S "LETTARS"—THE WORLD'S MISUNDERSTANDING—HIS MORALITY—HIS POLITICAL WISDOM AND PRESCIENCE—MR CAINE AND HIS RIVAL—THE VIRTUE OF IMAGINATION—A SUBJECT OF EMOTION—AN EGYPTIAN PLEASANTRY.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

NOW READY.

Was Alfred King of England?

By A SAXON.

Demy 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

A brief review of one of our latest text-books, showing the true relations of Prince Alfred both to the Saxon people in England and to her Roman invaders.

HARRISON & SONS, Publishers, 59, Pall Mall, S.W.

"The Thrush."

Edited by MULLETT ELLIS.

"THE THRUSH," a Periodical for original Poetry, is intended to bring thoughts of beauty and the consolation of exalted ideas into the hearts of the people.

Since its origin, on the first day of the new Century, "THE THRUSH" has published many beautiful Poems by the following writers:—

Dr. Richard Garnett, W. E. Henley, F. Prevost Battersby, Keble Howard, Harold Begbie, A. P. Graves, Nora Hopper, L. Alma-Tadema, Norman Gale, C. W. Wynne, Dr. Gilbert Murray, John Hutchinson, Hon. Albinia Brodrick, Arthur Symons, N. Carruthers Gould, Clifton Bingham, Lady Margaret Sackville, Hamilton Aidé, Edgar Fawcett, Lady Gilbert, Lady Florence Douglas, Rev. W. J. Dawson, Rev. F. Bentley Greeves, Victor Plarr, Sir Wyke Bayliss, P.R.I., the 1st Lord Lytton, and Mullett Ellis.

In future numbers we are promised the work of many of the leading Poets of our day, including the Right Rev. Lord Bishop of Derry and Raphoe, Dean of Armagh, the Rev. Canon H. D. Rawnsley, Herbert Morrah, Israel Gollancz, M.A., Wm. Canton, Edwin Hamilton, M.A., Justin Huntly McCarthy, Dollie Radford, Louise Chandler Moulton, Sir Lewis Morris, M.A., Frankfort Moore, and Thomas Hardy.

"THE THRUSH" for September contains the Ode of Welcome to the Trades Union Congress by Sir LEWIS MORRIS.

The Rules for a Prize Poem Competition, open to Subscribers to "THE THRUSH," are contained in the August Number.

THE FIRST PRIZE IS £10 STERLING.

See "THE THRUSH."

By order at all Booksellers'.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

CHEAPER RE-ISSUE.

ALFRED THE GREAT.

By THOMAS HUGHES.

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

THREE NOTABLE NOVELS.

Crown 8vo, 6s each.

200,000 Copies sold

IN AMERICA AND ENGLAND.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "RICHARD CARVEL."

WINSTON CHURCHILL.

THE CRISIS.

ALBERT E. HANCOCK.

HENRY BOURLAND:

The Passing of the Cavalier.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

OWEN JOHNSON.

ARROWS of the ALMIGHTY.

LATEST VOLUME OF THE NEW ISSUE OF THE BORDER EDITION OF

THE WAVERLEY NOVELS.

QUENTIN DURWARD.

With 12 Etchings.

Crown 8vo, tastefully bound in cloth, gilt, 6s.

LATEST VOLUME OF THE NEW ISSUE OF

THE WORKS OF MARION CRAWFORD.

PIETRO GHISLERI.

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE.

Price 1s.—Contents for SEPTEMBER.

PRINCESS PUCK. By the Author of "The Enchanter." Chapters XV.—XVIII.
THE MONTENEGRIN JUBILEE. By W. MILLER.
DOWN the DANUBE in a CANADIAN CANOE. By ALGERNON BLACKWOOD. Part I.
PRIVATE PITCHER.
THE LAND of the POPPY. By G. A. LEVETT-YEATS II. Its Superstitions.
THE PARTY SYSTEM. By B. N. LANGDON-DAVIES.
ADMIRAL BENBOW. By W. J. FLETCHER.
OUR TITLE DEEDS in SOUTH AFRICA.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

Illustrated.—Price 1s. 4d.—Annual Subscription, post free, 16s.

The SEPTEMBER NUMBER contains—

The First Instalment of a New Story by BRET HARTE, entitled "TRENT'S TRUST."

EDMUND BURKE and the FRENCH REVOLUTION. By WOODROW WILSON.
THE CROWN of the CONTINENT. By GEORGE BIRD GRINNELL.

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE FOR CHILDREN.

ST. NICHOLAS.

Illustrated.—Price 1s.—Annual Subscription, post free, 12s.

The SEPTEMBER NUMBER contains:—

THE OBSERVING SPORTSMAN. By WILMOT TOWNSEND.
CAREERS of DANGER and DARING.—IX. The Dynamite Worker. By CLEVELAND MOFFETT.
A BOY of a THOUSAND YEARS AGO. Serial. By HARRIET T. COMSTOCK.
THE STORY of BARNABY LEE. Serial. By JOHN BENNETT.

And numerous other Stories for the Young.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., London.

Digitized by Google

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1530. Established 1869. 31 August, 1901. Price Threepence.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

We understand that M. Maeterlinck is now finishing a three act play of which the scene is an Italian city, and the period the fifteenth century.

Although things are at their quietest in the book world, the change from summer to autumnal weather seems to have strongly reminded the publishers that the autumn season is really knocking at their doors. Our table is already beginning to be strewn with preliminary lists. It is now well known that the output of novels, which in any case would be large, is to be of the nature of a "bumper."

Meanwhile the sales of The Eternal City are in full progress; not the less so because C. K. S., of the Sphere, insists that "it requires positive courage to say an appreciative word concerning Mr. Caine in a literary club of to-day." Fortunately for Mr. Caine, the clubs are empty and the resorts are full.

Of course the literary statistician already essays to ride the whirlwind and direct the boom. An individual, who is described with probable accuracy as a "Fleet Street journalist," has disseminated the information that "in the printing of the inside of Mr. Hall Caine's new novel, The Eternal City, 618 miles of paper have been used." We must try to remember that. One excellent thing the boom qua boom has brought us, and that is Mr. Heinemann's Eternal City poster. It is not large, yet owes its effect to the largeness of its design. Against a yellow sky filled with sunlight, St. Peter rises in the middle distance. A crowd of houses in the foreground indicates the blinking city. It is a success.

The title of Mrs. Craigie's new book, which Mr. Fisher Unwin will publish immediately, is A Study in Temperaments. The contents consist of three stories, severally entitled "Prince Toto," "The World that God Prepared," "'Tis an Ill Flight Without Wings." Following these comes Mrs. Craigie's one act drama, "A Repentance," which was produced at the St. James's Theatre in February, 1899.

Although the Monthly Review is not particularly strong in literary articles this month, it has two articles on subjects which have certainly had decided, though very different connections with literature: the one in matter of subject, the other of spirit. Mr. Lang deals with the "Man in the Iron Mask" and Mr. W. B. Yeats with Magic Mr. Yeats puts his general belief into these words:

> I believe in the practice and philosophy of what we have agreed to call magic, in what I must call the equivocation of spirits, though I do not know what they are, in the power of creating magical illusions, in the visions of truth in the depths of the mind when the eyes are closed; and I believe in three doctrines, which have, as I think, been handed down from early times, and been the foundations of nearly all magical practices. These doctrines are:
>
> (1) That the borders of our minds are ever shifting, and that many minds can flow into one another, as it were, and create or reveal a single mind, a single energy.
>
> (2) That the borders of our memories are as shifting, and that our memories are a part of one great memory, the memory of nature herself.
>
> (3) That this great mind and great memory can be evoked by symbols.

"It is not perhaps so bad as that of morphine; but it may be something like that of cocaine, and far worse than that of cigarettes." It is Mr. Howells who writes these words in the September Harper's, and his reference is to the habit of reading inferior fiction. We shall consider the wisdom of serving out quinine and other correctives to our reviewers. But does not Mr. Howells go too far when he says: "If one were fairly to take his honesty in both hands, he would probably be able to confess that the influence of any powerful story on his mind was stupefying"? We grant that the arrival on our table of a really powerful story is somewhat stupefying, but not its perusal. We have no doubt it is true, however, that many people read books "in the fear of being found out not to have read them." Even here Mr. Howells probably underrates the powers of dissimulation and allusiveness possessed by the discreet diner-out.

The Writer is a new monthly journal for literary people, published at Walsall. It leads off with a long report of an address on the "Power of the Pen," delivered before the Walsall Literary Institute by Miss Marie Corelli, who remarked: "With this little instrument, which rests so lightly in the hand, whole nations can be moved. It is nothing to look at; generally speaking, it is a mere bit of wood with a nib at the end of it—but when it is poised so—it becomes a living thing—it moves with the pulsations of the heart and brain, and writes down, almost unconsciously, the thoughts that live—the words that burn." Miss Corelli might, we think, consult with advantage the remarks on the use of the dash in the long article on another page dealing with punctuation. But perhaps the editor is responsible for the outbreak.

There is no doubt that general interest in George Eliot and her work has considerably revived of late. Messrs. Blackwood's new edition, on which we found an article this week, may be taken as one indication of this, and we believe that the libraries could furnish another. Mr. Frederic Harrison, in an article in Harper's Magazine, entitled "Reminiscences of George Eliot," quotes the prediction he made some years ago: "It will be the duty of the more serious criticism of another generation to revive the reputation of George Eliot as an abiding literary force." Now that the revival seems upon us, Mr. Harrison gives us these notes of his personal relations with the novelist. They deal mainly with matters of philosophy and George Eliot's interest in "the Positivist ideal of an organised Religion of Humanity," but there are many more purely personal touches:

> She had not a grain of self-importance in her manner, and took quite a simple and modest part in the general talk, listening to the brilliant sallies of George Lewes with undisguised delight, respecting Congreve's views as those of a trained historian and scholar, and showing me the kindly welcome of a gracious woman to the friend of her friends. I remember an argument in which she engaged me, wherein I thought, as I still think, she was mistaken. She maintained, apropos of a review of troops she had lately seen, that "the pomp and circumstance of glorious war" was more conspicuous in our day than it was in the Middle Ages. Having some knowledge of mediæval art, Italian war paintings, and illuminated Froissarts, I ventured to doubt. The company seemed to think me bold in venturing to differ from her opinion on a matter of local colour. But she did not think so herself; and nothing could be more graceful than the patience with which she listened to my points.

Digitized by Google

No one will be inclined to dispute Mr. Harrison's statement that George Eliot "raised the whole art of romance into a higher plane of thought, of culture, and of philosophic grasp."

Literary plagiarism affords a perennial subject for literary gossip. Apropos of the fact that Gabriele d'Annunzio is now engaged on a play based upon the tragic story of Francesca da Rimini, a story so recently treated by Mr. Stephen Phillips, the Daily News has an article entitled "Plagiarism and Coincidence," which we suspect to have come from the pen of the accomplished author of Men and Letters. The writer opens the article by a characteristically weighty quotation from Dr. Johnson: "As not every instance of similitude can be considered as a proof of imitation, so not every imitation ought to be stigmatised as plagiarism." He then proceeds to pile up similitudes which were not plagiarisms, ranging from modern comedy to Milton's line, "That last infirmity of noble minds," which is to be found in a little-known play written fifteen years before Lycidas. In this case the writer believes that Milton was guiltless. We are not at all sure. Certainly Milton owed to the lines prefixed to Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy more than mere suggestions for some lines in his Il Penseroso.

Apropos of the same subject, a writer in some newspaper has made the stale discovery that Macaulay borrowed his notorious New Zealander from one of Horace Walpole's letters. But the idea is so obvious that it would naturally occur to many writers, as indeed it did, in varying forms, to Voltaire, Kirke White, and Shelley. In the dedication to Peter Bell Shelley wrote:

> In the firm expectation that when London shall be an habitation of bitterns; when St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey shall stand shapeless and nameless ruins in the midst of an unpeopled marsh; when the piers of Waterloo Bridge shall become the nuclei of islets of reeds and osiers, and cast the jagged shadows of their broken arches on the solitary stream, some transatlantic commentator shall be weighing in the scales of some new and now unimagined system of criticism the respective merits of the Bells and the Fudges and their historians.

The current number of the Badminton Magazine prints an interesting and well-illustrated article on "Richard Jefferies at Home." Coate was always, in spirit at least, the home of Jefferies, and he continually returned to its memories when he was far from it in body. He said of the place in later years:

> I think I have heard that the oaks are down. They may be standing or down, it matters nothing to me; the leaves I last saw upon them are gone for evermore, nor shall I ever see them come there again ruddy in spring. I would not see them again even if I could; they could never look again as they used to do. There are too many memories there. The happiest days become the saddest afterwards; let us never go back, lest we too die.

The writer of the article finds in nearly all Jefferies's work passages intimately connected with Coate, its brook and its mere. He fished and shot about the neighbourhood, as well as observed and dreamed. There he handled his first gun, an old flint-lock, which he discovered in a garret. His method of practice from the garret window, and the discovery of his forbidden pastime are, it will be remembered, inimitably narrated in The Amateur Poacher. In Bevis, the Story of a Boy, Coate Mere plays an important part, and in a field near Jefferies shot his first wood-pigeon. The writer concludes:

> He was a good sportsman and a great naturalist. Of the latter little has been said here, for obvious reasons. Like the chaffinch of one of his occasional poems, while the world was large, and he knew it,
>
> His fir-tree is the centre of it all.
>
> For, like the chaffinch still, he never really wandered from the homestead all his days:
>
> The humble-bee the wide wood-world may roam;
> One feather's breadth I will not stir from home.
>
> He never did; for his heart was in Coate and Coate was in his heart from birth to sadly-too-early death; and he who would know Richard Jefferies, and read his books with understanding, must know him as he was at home.

In the New York Saturday Review Mr. T. C. Evans has an article dealing with his personal reminiscences of Thackeray, whom the writer first met in America, when the English Humourists lectures were being delivered. He looked, says Mr. Evans, > like a gentleman laid out by Nature on broad and generous lines; his head was large, and thrown slightly backward from his broad, erect shoulders; he had a fresh, clean-shaven look; his face was rather pale, but with a trace of colour. His hair was a trifle greyish; a British whisker, also greyish, ran down in front of each ear to his collar; his spectacles were large and insistent, and his nose more depressed than that of Michael Angelo after the mallet blow of Torrigiano. His gait and movement were free and swinging, his dress was of notable neatness and gentility, and his glance seemed to annex and appropriate everything it fell on.

Six years after the writer renewed his acquaintance with Thackeray in London in the shop of Sams, a gentleman who sold music and theatre tickets. A little later Mr. Evans saw him standing before Rogers's house, silently gazing up at it:

> What a procession of wit and wisdom had gone over that hospitable threshold—Byron and Moore, Scott, Sidney Smith, Disraeli, Macaulay, Sir James Macintosh—a list of their names would be a record of the literary glories of England almost since George IV. was king. The welcoming gates of that mansion had often been thrown open that Thackeray himself might enter therein—now closed to all welcoming and festivity.

Thackeray is also dealt with by a writer in Temple Bar. "One Aspect of Thackeray" is the subject of the article, that aspect being not of the man himself but of the carefulness of his work in matters of pedigree. The writer points out how accurately all the involved relationships of his characters fit, and has drawn up pedigrees clearly showing this. Here is an instance:

> Let us suppose that Lady Crawley (née Sharpe) occupied her retirement with genealogy—a not unlikely study for one who professed to be a Montmorency. In that case she probably discovered that the second Mrs. Clive Newcome was related to her old friend George Gustavus, first Marquis of Steyne, and that Arthur Pendennis and Laura his wife could claim connection with the noble house of Bareacres. The former relationship is easily established. Lady Louisa Joanna Gaunt, sister of the Marquis of Steyne, married the Earl of Kew, and one of the four children of this marriage was Anne, who, as wife to Sir Brian Newcome, became the mother of Ethel, the second Mrs. Clive Newcome, who was thus great-grand-niece to Becky's protector.

The rage for refining on Stevenson first editions has gone to much greater lengths in America than over here.

Digitized by Google

Mr. George M. Williamson, an American book-collector, has distanced all rivals so far. He is having printed privately a volume containing fac-simile reproductions of the title-pages of all Stevenson's works, including the very rare hand-printed books made by Lloyd Osbourne in California. The volume will also contain several unpublished portraits of Stevenson, one fine etching being a reproduction of a portrait given by Stevenson's mother to Miss Cunningham, who was for so many years the author's nurse. There is to be also a reproduction of a medallion brooch, also a former possession of Miss Cunningham's, but now owned by Mr. Williamson, containing a lock of Stevenson's hair when he was a child. There are to be only about twenty-five copies printed, but they will be upon the finest hand-made paper, some upon Japan paper. The work will be similar, on the whole to the volume of Eugene Field's Tribune Primer, published by Mr. Williamson last year.

An article in the Fortnightly Review, by Mr. W. Roberts, on "Book Collecting as an Investment," recalls some of the remarkable vicissitudes of price which have overtaken some libraries, and the extraordinary rise in value of others. Richard Heber's collection of books, which were stored abroad and in England in eight houses, cost £80,000 and realised only £57,000, whilst Prince L. L. Napoleon's philological collection, which cost £40,000, was finally disposed of quite recently to a Chicago library for £6,000. The Roxburge, Beckford, and Spencer libraries, on the other hand, realised more than double the money paid for them. But the prince of lucky buyers was the late Earl of Ashburnham, who purchased three works for 450 guineas, which subsequently realised £5,500. For the merely speculative book-collector Mr. Roberts has no pity; he is almost certain to lose, and deserves his fate.

Little or no attention has thus far been paid to the small—necessarily small, because of the scanty material available—and extremely interesting collection of MSS. and reliques of the Alfred period, now on view in the "Prehistoric Salon" at the British Museum. Yet the show, carefully arranged, under the able supervision of Dr. Birch, an "Anglo-Saxon" scholar of no mean repute, will deserve a visit on account of its historical value and its instructive nature. The MSS., nineteen in number, form nearly all part of the Cottonian collection, founded by the eminent antiquary and bibliophile, Sir Robert Bruce Cotton, whose library, bequeathed to the nation in 1700, was transferred to the British Museum after a somewhat checkered career—in 1731 it was partly destroyed by fire—in 1753. To give an idea of its wealth, it may be stated that the catalogue drawn up by Mr. Planta, now in use, contains 26,000 entries.

The MSS. in the British Museum directly connected with Alfred are the translation—we use the word in the sense in which it was understood by the King, who, as is well known, made considerable alterations and additions in the works which he undertook to Anglicise—of Orosius, a historian who wrote a history of the world, from an ecclesiastical point of view; the version of St. Gregory's Pastoral Cure, a work primarily intended for the clergy; the translation of Boethius, whose Consolation of Philosophy, with its semi-religious unction, was, until the days of Thomas à Kempis, the chief book of devotion in the Middle Ages; the rendering of Bede's history (the King's share in the work appears to be somewhat doubtful); the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle; the Laws of King Alfred, and his "Will." The MS. of "Orosius," mentioned in Dr. Smith's Catalogue of the Cotton Library (1696), is a beautiful specimen of its kind. The parchment is in an excellent state of preservation, and the writing is clear and regular. It is assigned, by general consent, to the tenth century. The version of "Gregory" is preserved in a MS. written during Alfred's reign. It was, unhappily, irretrievably injured in the fire, a fate shared to some extent by another MS. of about the same date, half of which was burnt. It appears to have been originally a quarto, containing forty-nine chapters. It mentions Plegmund as Archbishop of Canterbury (889), and was dedicated to him. Its interest, as presenting us with an authentic literary specimen of Alfred's times, can hardly be overrated. Of the rendering of Boethius two copies remain. The Cottonian copy contains a poetic version of Boethius's prose, which was probably not executed by the King, but by one of his courtiers. The "history of Bede," adapted for English use, is presented in a MS. of the tenth century, originally the property of a priory in Hampshire (in passing, it may be noticed how many of our most valuable literary possessions were purloined from convents). An interesting feature is a Saxon transcription of Cædmon's—the first religious poet of our race—Anglian verse. The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, compiled under Royal supervision, if not actually written by Alfred himself, is shown in several MSS. We have not left ourselves space to comment on the cases containing "Anglo-Saxon objects of art and coins." Alfred's coins are not remarkable for excellency of workmanship. The artistic achievements of the reign are of a much higher order, and give evidence of Alfred's personal skill and catholicity of taste. The so-called "Alfred's Jewel," a superb specimen of art, is reproduced in a copy, and some of the rings exhibited convey a not unfavourable idea of the condition of art during the Alfred period. Dr. Birch says that one of the results of the exhibition will probably be a "catalogue raisonne" of early English MSS.—a desideratum which is greatly felt.

One guesses that the tremendous new literary activity in the United States is not without its tragi-comic side. A writer in the American Independent tells various stories of authors who have learned wisdom from experience rashly courted. He says:

> About a year and a half ago, when the excitement over "The Man who Labours" and "The Man Who Doesn't Labour" was so widespread, a Connecticut lawyer (I am disguising the facts a little in order to save feelings), living in a small town, thought that it would be a fine thing to collect and publish in book form all the essays and poems then being written concerning the nobility of labour. I sent him something of my own on the subject, and he communicated his entire scheme to me. I did not like it, but did not feel at liberty to say so, he being a stranger, a man of mature years, and one who was looked up to by his townsmen as a local literary light. He corresponded with me very freely, and I thought I could detect the gradual failure of hope as he encountered, one after another, difficulties that to him were quite unexpected. I knew that he had laid aside his business in order to follow this will-o'-the-wisp, and I was genuinely anxious for him.
>
> Finally he sent me all the manuscript—about 100,000 words in all—asking me for criticism and advice. I looked the matter over, and found it full of glaring defects. It contained only one idea, and this was dished up by scores of writers in different forms, with a result that seemed to me infinitely tedious. I thought plain speaking was the only friendly thing, so I pointed out the defects, advised great pruning and the elimination of a large number of the articles, also the cutting down of the introduction (which my correspondent himself had written—it was very long and heavy). I also advised him not to pay for publication, but to tell publishers what he had in hand and drop the matter if they would not assume the risk. He took my advice, and escaped with the loss of a few hundred dollars cash and some sacrifice of business; but he has never written a reply to my advice and criticism, and I am afraid he has not forgiven me for destroying the delusion that was ruining him—though, I judge, from all his actions in the matter, that he is a noble and high-spirited gentleman. The surgeon's knife hurt.

Digitized by Google

I tell these things to point the fact that many writers are actually losing money on their laboured productions.

We open American literary papers to find their pages full of screaming praise of new novels and photographs of their young authors, male and female. There must be a great deal behind it all. The Independent writer says there is.

> I met, not long ago, a Chicago man of one of the best Western publishing-houses. He told me that during the previous year his firm had received and examined 1,700 manuscripts of books, and had accepted only one.
>
> "What do you think we paid for that?" he asked, grinning triumphantly.
>
> "How many words?" I inquired.
>
> "About 80,000," said he.
>
> "Did you buy outright?"
>
> "Yes."
>
> "About $500?"
>
> "No, sir. We paid only $80."
>
> And the Chicago publisher's reader grinned again when he thought of the vain hopes with which those 1,700 authors had been entertaining themselves.

Bibliographical.

The rumour that Mr. George Moore is cutting down both Evelyn Innes and Sister Theresa in order to get them into one volume is at once interesting and suggestive. Let us hope it is true. How grateful we should have been if Richardson had left behind him a condensed edition of Clarissa Harlowe! The question arises whether every novelist who has written an abnormally long story should not be compelled by statute to issue it also in a sort of Liebig's Extract. Then the public could take its choice. Some people like lengthy novels; they cannot have too much of them; others can do with very much less. Why not appeal simultaneously to the two different, and perhaps equally large, classes? There would be this further advantage—that posterity would have it in its power to decide which of the two editions it would preserve. One can hardly doubt which edition that would be. Why, for instance, should we not have a version of Mr. Hall Caine's Eternal City, in which there should be nothing but the bare story of Roma and David and the Baron and the Pope, all, or nearly all, of the padding about Rome and Roman society being excised? There are a few great works from which one would not like a word withdrawn; but they are few indeed.

Another thing. When a novel is abnormally long, a précis of the plot should be sent to the reviewers. Then fictionists would not have to complain that the newspapers misrepresented the action and characters of their work. A well known—and humane—firm already does this thing in the case of its books for boys and girls. On a sort of fly-leaf the reviewer finds a brief résumé of the narrative. This is philanthropy in its highest form, and, moreover, it probably pays. I suspect that tales of all kinds would get much fuller "notices" than they do if their publishers would but adopt this simple and sensible device. Moreover, no story should be issued as if quite new when it is not new. There should be a "bibliographical note." The memory of elderly reviewers is apt to fail them now and then; the young gentlemen "fresh from the universities" (see Oliphant's Piccadilly) have no memories at all. How can you remember what you have not read? On the other hand, it irritates even the youngest censor to discover by and by that he has been shedding a lot of ink and intellect over a "new edition."

To "Flowers of Parnassus," the pretty little series under the editorship of Mr. Money-Coutts, Mr. John Lane will add, during the autumn, Mr. Watts-Dunton's "Christmas at the Mermaid," at present a conspicuous feature of that writer's Coming of Love. The illustrator, Mr. Herbert Cole, is the admirable young artist who lately illustrated for the same series Omar Khayyám. It was, I believe, only by an accident that "Christmas at the Mermaid" did not figure as the title-poem of The Coming of Love. The author, it seems, was dubious about the acceptance by the public of a Romany love story, and, on the contrary, was somewhat sanguine about the reception of a poem upon such subjects as the Spanish Armada and Shakespeare's life at Stratford. He was, therefore, a little concerned when he discovered, too late, that through a mistake the Gypsy poem must take precedence of the other. As it happens, the love tragedy of Rhona Boswell caught on so firmly that "Christmas at the Mermaid" fell naturally into the second place.

Mr. W. S. Hunt writes to me: "You were speaking, in last week's Academy, of Mr. W. S. Gilbert's burlesques, and you mentioned several of them. I fancy Mr. Gilbert must have been the author of a great many parodies too—parodies that might perhaps be called burlesques. They appeared in the pages of Fun during, I think (I can't turn up the volumes just now) 1866-68, and they took the place of the ordinary play notices. Each occupied about a page of the paper, and every weak point of the play parodied, and of the acting too, was very funnily exposed—so funnily that even one who never saw the plays (as, e.g., myself) can hardly read the parodies of them without smiling and sometimes laughing outright. I daresay a hundred of these parodies appeared. Were they by Mr. Gilbert? There are several reasons for thinking so. One or two were illustrated by sketches signed "Bab"; one appeared in a Tom Hood's Comic Annual, with the author's name attached; and the reader seems to find in the wit of them the Gilbertian flavour. By the by, surely a history of Fun—a companion to Mr. Spielmann's Punch—would be a desirable possession."

I see that Mr. Fisher Unwin announces a volume on Barry Sullivan and his Contemporaries. This, I fancy, figured some little time ago in the list of Mr. George Redway. At present the only book dealing with Sullivan's career is a little brochure written by Mr. W. J. Lawrence, and published in 1893. The forthcoming work is, I understand, a very elaborate affair, Barry Sullivan being made a peg on which to hang notices of very many contemporary players. Unfortunately, though Sullivan was extremely popular in the provinces, the colonies, and America, he never took a high position in London; and to make him the central figure in a long panorama of notable actors and actresses would be, I should say, to place him in a rather ludicrous position. This, of course, would not prevent the work from being eminently useful to the student of English stage history.

The Reminiscences by Mr. Charles K. Salaman, with which the new number of Blackwood opens, are, I trust, only an instalment, the heralds of more to come. That Mr. Salaman should make a book of his Recollections was proposed to him a few years ago by a firm of publishers; but the project, unhappily, fell through. Mr. Malcolm C. Salaman, the son of the venerable composer, was to have undertaken the preparation and editing of the Recollections, and I hope he was able to make at least some progress with his task. Rapid progress was, no doubt, rendered impossible by the advanced age and consequent physical weakness of Mr. Salaman, sen.

Messrs. Macmillan are naturally reproducing Tom Hughes's Alfred the Great, which first saw the light in 1869, being issued originally in three parts. The three parts made up a volume which was issued from 1869 to 1871, when the book was reprinted. There have been several editions of it since. It is very pleasantly written, though, in a sense, not "up to date." I doubt, however, if we really know much more about Alfred now than Hughes did in 1869.

The Bookworm.

Digitized by Google

Reviews.

A Philologist's Commonplace Book.

Notes on English Etymology, chiefly Reprinted from the "Transactions" of the Philological Society. By the Rev. Walter W. Skeat. (Clarendon Press. 8s. 6d. net.)

It is certain that Dr. Skeat did not intend these Notes for the mitigation of wet days at the sea-side, the consolation of invalids, or the redemption of odd moments. Yet in all such times and seasons we could not desire a more filling and entertaining book than this. The entertainment it offers is of a high order. To profound scholarship exercised on the words of everyday life are added the humour, the enterprise, and the straight-hitting of that scholarship. The result is delightful. A personal interest which the book possesses has also to be named. The portrait of Dr. Skeat, painted by Mr. C. E. Brock, and now possessed by Christ's College, Cambridge, is reproduced in the frontispiece. Indeed, the book is nominally published by the help of the surplus of the fund which the author's friends raised to procure the portrait. We feel morally certain that the "risk of loss" which this overplus is supposed to cover is, in the case of this book, non-existent; if it does exist, then this is a naughtier world than we, in our least amiable moments, have supposed it to be.

We have here a philologist's commonplace book. After the appearance of his larger Etymological Dictionary in 1884, Dr. Skeat discovered that it required both corrections and additions. Scholars discover these things very contentedly. Also the first (A—Ant) part of the New English Dictionary was published. To "share the triumph and partake the gale" of Oxford's great lexicon has been the ambition of every earnest student of words during the last seventeen years. Partly, therefore, to improve his own results, and partly to anticipate the perplexities of the new lexicographers, Dr. Skeat began to make these notes, which from time to time were read as papers at the meetings of the Philological Society, forming a kind of serial contribution to the N.E.D., as well as a serial supplement to Dr. Skeat's own Etymological Dictionary. To pass a tit-bit of information to Dr. Murray in time for the great Dictionary has been Dr. Skeat's generous desire. Even in his sleep he seems to have kept an eye open for early quotations and an ear attentive for new etymologies. But such things arrive slowly or capriciously, and it has sometimes happened that Murrayan mail has missed the Skeatean letter-bag. That only adds to the romance. How slowly creeps the tortoise to the wall in philology, as in war, may be illustrated by a story which Dr. Skeat tells in his introduction. An important source of our knowledge of Middle English is the well-known "only Proclamation of Henry III." In 1868 Mr. A. J. Ellis printed this proclamation for the sixteenth time, in order to secure a correct copy of a document that had often been carelessly reproduced. He used the copy of the Proclamation in the Public Record Office, that being the only copy that was supposed to exist. Now observe:

> It had escaped observation that another copy of this document was printed in Ingram's Memorials of Oxford in 1837, from a contemporaneous copy said to be preserved at Oxford. This edition was brought to my notice about 1880 by Mr. Turner, who was then at work upon the Oxford documents, and I recognised at once that it was the famous "Proclamation." For Mr. Turner's death left the matter where it was, and I was the only person who was aware that such a document existed at Oxford, among the town records. In 1882 I made a serious effort to rediscover the MS., and it was found at last, at the very bottom of the last place which was searched. I then copied it out, and printed it in the Philological Society's Transactions for that year. It agreed with the other copy very closely, except that the last word was clearly inoge (i.e. enough), and not moge (a form never explained), as printed by Dr. Ingram and in the sixteen editions of the other MS. Hereupon the London MS. was again examined by Mr. Ellis, who reported as follows: "For moge read inoge. Error discovered on 19 June, 1882, the dash over the i being extremely faint and worn, and practically invisible to the naked eye." The result is highly satisfactory, viz., that the existence of the Oxford copy is now well known, and a correct edition of it has appeared. But it is somewhat singular that the right reading of this last word, which makes the grammatical construction of the last sentence obvious, did not appear till the document was printed for the eighteenth time.

Merely as an aperçu of Dr. Skeat's labours, this is interesting. But the Notes are the thing, and to them we pass without more delay. Necessarily they are full of curious matter, for they represent the bringing up of the last reserves of scholarship to difficult points of attack. The words here explained or elucidated are the worried bones of etymology. On many of them reams have been written, and in their study many a good man has gone astray. For example, the N.E.D. practically gives up the etymology of "burly," Dr. Murray remarking that "no plausible etymon for the first element has yet been found." Yet he is on the right track in identifying it with the provincial English "bowerly," and in drawing attention to the Middle English "borli," a word which, however, he cannot reconcile or connect with the modern "burly" and "bowerly." Now comes Dr. Skeat with a rustle of cheerful learning and a brisk "Here is the solution." The solution reads like a novelette. Burly is merely "bower," with the suffix "ly," or the Anglo-Saxon "būrlīc." Dr. Skeat shows how a long u has become a modern short u in "Thursday," "dust," "husband," and other words, pointing to the descent of burly from būrlīc. As for the form "borli," he does not find the difficulty any greater, and we will here combine Dr. Skeat's observations on this form, with his explanation of the sense development of the word. The gulf between "borli" and "burly," felt by Dr. Murray, all arises > from a well-known habit of the Anglo-French scribes, who used the symbol o to denote the short u, and thus introduced an element of great confusion, which, in a dozen cases or more, is extremely puzzling. Dr. Sweet has pointed out how commonly this occurs when the short u adjoins m or n; so that to this day, instead of writing "munk," "huney," "wonder," "tung," we all have to write "monk," "honey," "wonder," and "tongue," though the symbol o never indicated a short o at any time in the history of these words. Now the same scribes frequently did the very same thing when short u occurred before r. Examples will be found in Stratmann, where the forms "forther," "corsen," "torf," "scorf," "spornen," "tornen," "tortel" correspond, as a matter of course, to the modern "further," "curse," "turf," "scurf," "spurn," "turn," "turtle." . . . But how about the sense? Here, again, I see no great difficulty. A bower (see N.E.D.) was, usually, a lady's chamber or private apartment; and "bowerly," or "burly," meant, originally, suitable for such an apartment: cf. "homely." King Solomon was, we read, "a borli bachelere," i.e., a bachelor suitable for a lady's bower, a handsome, presentable man. In the Morte Arthure we find that someone is to "greet well the queen and all the burly birds (handsome ladies) that belong to her bower." Can anything be more suitable? In Rauf Coilyear there is a most telling quotation. We there read of "a burly bed," i.e., a bed adapted for a lady's bedroom. Once more, I ask, can anything be more suitable? The various developments really present no great difficulty. The modern "bowerly" is well defined as stately and comely. Such a woman adorns her own boudoir. A knight is "burly" if he is handsome, presentable, young, strong, valiant, goodly, comely, noble, and the like. The sense, like that of "stout," easily degenerates into large and corpulent.

Of such fascinating expositions these pages are full. Now supplementing, now correcting the N.E.D., but always paying it love and honour, Dr. Skeat works his way among these orchids of speech. Sometimes he reproves himself for his own mistakes in his Etymological Dictionary. "I regret to say my etymology of this word is wrong"; the word is "cresset." Sometimes he places his own and Dr. Murray's labours under one condemnation, as in the case of Hamper. Dr. Skeat, 1884, and Dr. Murray have both considered that the p in "hamper" is an insertion; but Dr. Skeat of 1899 declared that the m is the real insertion, the whole history of the word being, of course, affected by this theory. Again, Dr. Skeat ridicules his own earlier etymology of the word "souse," to plunge down suddenly. He had connected it with the substantive "souse," meaning pickle. The words he now finds are of "totally different origin." The true source of the word is "without a pun, the very word source itself, strange as this may appear, and past all guessing." We have not space to show how Dr. Skeat works this out; the article is charming. Having made confession of his error, Dr. Skeat does not then preserve an affected or exaggerated humility. On the contrary, he bids us know that his view is entirely new; "but," he adds, "I suppose the same thing will be said to me as was said when I discovered the etymology of the verb 'to surround'—viz., that, in the first place, it is not true; and secondly, as shown by our Dictionary-slips, though it is quite right, we knew it before." This famous etymology of 'surround" is found on page 286.

Digitized by Google

Among etymologies which Dr. Murray adopts and Dr. Skeat heartily approves, is the very curious one which attaches to the word crease. Crease is crest, with its t dropped. If you fold a piece of paper, and open it partially, you can invert it on a table so that the fold or "crest" resembles the ridge of a hill or a roof. In West Cornwall "crease" actually means "a ridge-tile." Dr. Skeat agrees that a "bon-fire," now lit for rejoicing, is really a "bone-fire" kindled to consume dead bodies in a pestilence, and he quotes a 1603 translation of Ovid:

> So either lothly on the ground vnburied they did lie,
> Or els without solemnitie were burnt in bone-fires hie.

The obvious derivation of catgut has often been disputed, but Dr. Skeat finds it good. For the identity of "cloak" and "clock" (originally a bell) Dr. Skeat finds an apt description of the Friar in Chaucer:

> Of double-worsted was his semi-cope,
> That rounded as a belle out of the presse,

where "rounded" means "stood out stiffly all round," and "presse" refers to the mould in which the bell was cast. Under "cowslip" Dr. Skeat accumulates evidence that the poetry of this word is a great deal more apparent than real. (We refer readers to page 48.) The account of "debut" is extraordinarily interesting. How many people know that dismal is dies mali (evil days) received through old French? One of Dr. Skeat's little triumphs over the N.E.D.—only he would never call it a triumph—is his convincing etymology of "gallop," which the N.E.D., following other dictionaries, has connected with the verb to leap. Dr. Skeat says that the word is really compounded of the two Norse words which exist separately in English as wold and hop. A man galloping on the downs of Beachy Head is a wold-hopper, though he may not know it. There was an old French phrase, "grans walos," meaning great leaps and strides, and the identity of gallop with walop seems certain. One of the strangest derivations in the language is that of pedigree, from Anglo-French "pe de grue," the foot of a crane. This was explained by C. Sweet in 1895. The three short lines radiating from one point, which are the impress of a crane's foot, were used in old pedigrees to signify the branching out of a family, and a similar sign is still used by genealogists. The article on "plot" is very interesting, and it is impossible not to find a sardonic element in the seemingly undoubted connection between plot and platform (often written plotform). To students of London the derivations of "lush" and "porter" are familiar. "Go to pot" does not, it seems, mean "go to the melting pot," as is generally supposed. Here, again, Dr. Skeat corrects his own earlier opinion. He now thinks that the pot is strictly the cooking pot, a view shared by Dr. Schmidt. "I venture to think," says Dr. Skeat, "that this expression is far more graphic, when we thus refer it, in the natural way, to the ordinary cooking pot." The following quotation from Dr. King's Art of Cookery (1708) is adduced:

> In days of old, our fathers went to war,
> Expecting sundry blows and hardy fare;
> Their beef they often in their murrions stew'd
> And in their basket-hilts their beverage brew'd.
> Some officer perhaps might give consent
> To a large cover'd pipkin in his tent,
> Where everything that every soldier got,
> Fowl, bacon, cabbage, mutton, and what not,
> Was all thrown into bank, and went to pot.

Hence Dr. Skeat thinks that when, in "Coriolanus," Act I., sc. 4, the soldiers before the walls of Corioli opine that the defenders have sent Coriolanus "to pot" they mean that they have cut him up like a vegetable and annihilated him.

One dip more, and we shall press this book home on its predestined and handy shelf. Dr. Skeat remarks under the difficult word Yankee that it is worth noting that Yanky was a surname more than two centuries ago. Dampier mentions a Captain Yanky. Under the verb "to yank," Dr. Skeat "yanks in" a good story sent him by an Oxford scholar, who went angling out West with an expensive fishing rig, including a luxurious artificial bait. Said a native to him: "I'm amazed, stranger, to see you slinging a dollar bug at the end of a ten-dollar pole, when you might yank 'em out with a wum and a stick."

The Brown Man.

Asia and Europe. By Meredith Townsend. (Constable 10s. 6d. net.)

THE object of these essays is defined by the author as "to make Asia stand out clearer to English eyes." They are the fruit of many years spent in patient study, from divers points of view, of the large subject with which they deal; nor do we know of any book, with the possible exception of Sir Alfred Lyall's Asiatic Studies, which states so clearly, or attempts so resolutely to solve the vast problems to which the clash of East and West in Asia gives rise. Mr. Townsend's survey is by no means confined to India, but naturally it is the English empire in India, the forces which make for and against it, the probability of its greater or less permanence, that form the centre of his speculation. His conclusion is an elaborate paraphrase and justification of the quotation which he takes from Matthew Arnold:

> The East bowed low before the blast,
> In patient, deep disdain;
> She let the legions thunder past,
> Then plunged in thought again.

Mr. Townsend believes that English domination in India will be a transitory thing, as the earlier domination of Alexander has been before it—that it will pass away with its glories and its triumphs, and become but a drop in the bucket of the ancient memories of the East.

> All the papers are directed to one end, a description of those inherent differences between Europe and Asia which forbid one continent permanently to conquer the other. The struggle between Europe and Asia is the binding thread of history; the trade between Europe and Asia is the foundation of commerce; the thought of Asia is the basis of all European religions; but the fusion of the continents has never occurred, and in the author's best judgment will never occur.

Digitized by Google

He qualifies his own view, frankly, as pessimism. He believes, if we understand him aright, that English rule in India—"the substitution of the idea of government by law for the idea of government by human volition"—is a blessing enjoyed by the peninsula. He believes that this blessing is fully appreciated by India, and that India would rather be without it; that it is an "experiment" doomed to failure; the "noblest dream ever dreamed by man," and "but a dream after all," because "the ineffaceable distinctions of race were all against it from the first." Similarly, he believes that Christianity is the absolute religion, and, at the same time, that, although it originated in Asia, it will never be accepted by the Asiatic peoples. For this the inherent imperfection of English missionary method is only the lesser reason; the greater is psychological, and therefore eternal. The passage in which this point is expounded is an excellent example of the subtle and original thinking with which this book abounds:

> The character of Christ is not, I am convinced, as acceptable to Indians as it is to the Northern races. It is not so completely their ideal, because it is not so completely beyond any point which they can, unassisted by Divine grace, hope to attain. The qualities which seemed to the warriors of Clovis so magnificently Divine—the self-sacrifice, the self-denial, the resignation, the sweet humility—are precisely the qualities the germs of which exist in the Hindoo. He seeks, like every other man, the complement of himself, and not himself again, and stands before Christ at first comparatively unattracted. The ideal in his mind is as separate as was the ideal in the Jews' mind of their expected Messiah; and though the ideals of Jew and Hindoo are different, the effect is in both cases the same—a passive, dull repulsion, scarcely to be overcome save by the special grace of God. I never talked frankly with a Hindoo in whom I did not detect this feeling to be one inner cause of his rejection of Christianity. He did not want that particular sublimity of character, but another, something more of the sovereign and legislator.

Obviously there is here involved, for a Christian, a most interesting paradox, and Mr. Townsend is under an intellectual compulsion to reconcile his pessimism with his theology. This also he does subtly:

> It is said that Christ gave an order to His disciples to teach all nations. That is true; and I for one believe the order to be binding, and that the Christian Church which sends out no missionaries is a dead Church; but where in the record has Christ promised to those missionaries universal success? Is it not at least possible that the missionaries carry in their hands the offer of eternal life, which a few accept, while the rest "perish everlastingly?"—that is, die like the flowers or the dumb creatures of God. This much at least is certain, that for eighteen hundred years it has been no part of the policy of Heaven—I write with reverence, though I use non-religious terminology—to convert Asiatics en masse, and there is no proof that this absence of Divine assistance to the teachers may not continue for an equal period in the future.

Mr. Townsend supports his main position by careful analysis in detail of the many differences between Eastern and Western psychology. He studies the appeal of Mahommedanism, so much more potent than that of Christianity, to the Hindu mind, the basis of the English Empire less on militarism than on the morale of the Civil Service, and the decay of native civilisation—"Indian art, Indian culture, Indian military skill," which that empire brings with it. To the inevitable question as to the ultimate reason for the irreconcilability of East and West, he has several answers to give. He attributes something to the bad manners of Englishmen, who talk and laugh too much, and are impatient at the loss of time, a thing to which the Asiatic does not attach a value. It should be, he thinks, a law of "inexorable etiquette" to treat every native with "a grave but distant courtesy, not unlike that of the native himself in his best mood." Something also to the fatuity which tries to press the accidentals of Western civilisation with its essentials, and to convince the native that it is better to spend his money on superfluous clothes for himself or superfluous furniture for his house, than on superfluous silver ornaments for his wife's arms and ankles. But these are comparatively superficial points, and in the long run Mr. Townsend falls back upon a somewhat mystical attitude, and maintains the existence of a "dull, unconquerable, unmitigable distaste of Asiatics for white men," of an "inherent antipathy, which is not hatred, but can at any moment blaze up into it."

We have preferred to expound Mr. Townsend's doctrine rather than to refute or to confirm it. But we are conscious that, in spite of the extreme candour and plausibility with which he puts it, there is, after all, a good deal to be said here and there on the other side. Is the notion of a rigid and permanent barrier between East and West Asiatic and European, quite consistent with the conclusions of modern ethnology? On the face of it, it would be curious if such a barrier were to coincide exactly with the somewhat artificial delimitation of continents. And the ethnologists trace for us at least two great racial stocks whose distribution is common to both Europe and Asia. The "Mediterranean" man seems to have developed a uniform civilisation on every shore of the great inland sea. And the Aryan, whether he began in this continent or that, at any rate streamed southwards, indifferently, below the Alps, the Balkans, and the Himalayas. To a certain extent a formal inconsistency may be traced even in Mr. Townsend's own language. He tells us:

> The chasm between the brown man and the white man is unfathomable, has existed in all ages, and exists still everywhere. No white man marries a brown wife, no brown man marries a white wife, without an inner sense of having been false to some unintelligible but irresistible command.

Yet four pages earlier one reads:

> The brown man of every shade who now monopolises Asia . . . is probably a half-caste, the result of a long series of early crossings between the dark and unimprovable aborigines, of whom a few relics still survive, and the white man.

This is probably not true of China, but it is of India, and it is inconsistent with the view that the respective endogamy of the brown and the white man "has existed in all ages." There is an "antipathy," of course, but is it really ultimate or "inherent." Does it differ in kind (it does, of course, in degree) from the antipathy between Germans and Frenchmen, Irishmen and Saxon, Cornishmen and Devonian? These antipathies, too, exist, but they are not incompatible with a common civilisation or necessarily with a common government (Mr. Townsend is probably not a Home Ruler), and we take them to depend upon habit and locality rather than upon race.

It is to be observed, again, that Mr. Townsend generalises immensely. And it is as difficult to generalise safely about India as Charles James Fox (was it?) found it to draw up an indictment against the French nation. After all, India is a geographical expression, covering an immense diversity of peoples. Mr. Townsend has devoted great pains and study to his problem, but he sees it, we gather, mainly from the point of view of the educated Brahmin. There are other points of view—that of Mr. Crooke with his knowledge of the wide diversity of custom amongst the tribes of the North-West; that of the late Sir Robert Burton, with his knowledge of brothel and bazaar. And we doubt whether theories based upon the tendencies of Hinduism as developed by Brahmin philosophies are quite universally applicable to the heterogeneous masses, on whom philosophical tenets sit lightly, and whose effective religion is some type or other of earth-worship closely akin to that of the primitive European peasant.

Digitized by Google

Whether you agree wholly with Asia and Europe or not, it is a fine book. Few publicists write upon Mr. Townsend's plane, with the same constant determination to see things as they are, and to handle ideas without prejudice or partisanship. And few share his accomplishment in the art of expression, of setting forth an idea completely, and without superfluity, in the course of a few incisive paragraphs. One recognises here an essential feature of that Spectator with which Mr. Townsend has been for so many years what a journalist less careful of his English would call "identified," and for which many of those papers were originally written. The passages already quoted afford more than one example of this admirable literary quality, which gives so unusual a distinction and charm to Mr. Townsend's writing. Let us add another, which puts in a nutshell a truth not always realised about Mahommedanism. The phase of this faith with which we are familiar in Europe is degenerating, but in India Mahommedanism is nothing if not progressive:

> Europeans habitually forget that every Mussulman is more or less of a missionary—that is, he intensely desires to secure converts from non-Mussulman peoples. Such converts not only increase his own chance of heaven, but they swell his own faction, his own army, his own means of conquering, governing, and taxing the remainder of mankind. All the emotions which impel a Christian to proselytise are in a Mussulman strengthened by all the motives which impel a political leader and all the motives which sway a recruiting sergeant, until proselytism has become a passion, which, wherever success seems practicable, and especially success on a large scale, develops in the quietest Mussulman a fury of ardour which induces him to break down every obstacle, his own strongest prejudices included, rather than stand for an instant in a neophyte's way. He welcomes him as a son, and whatever his own lineage, and whether the convert be Negro or Chinaman, or Indian, or even European, he will without hesitation or scruple give him his own child in marriage, and admit him fully, frankly, and finally into the most exclusive society in the world.

Two of Mr. Townsend's essays, although quite fitting into the unity of the volume, for whose leading ideas they afford concrete illustrations, are rather biographical than speculative in their character. One is a summary of Mr. Muir's life of "The Great Arabian," Mahommed: the other, under the title of "A Typical Asiatic," is a sketch of the strange career of the late Maharajah Dhuleep Singh, who died a broken man, but had more than once a vision of a Sikh Empire in India, and who serves Mr. Townsend as a witness to the indefinable something which makes it impossible wholly and irrevocably to Anglicise an Indian prince.

> The lad who seems so like an Etonian may turn out a saint or a Nana. What is certain is, that if his will closes, he will obey the dictate of that will, be what it may, and be the consequences as the Destinies shall choose.

These two studies add to the value of a volume already of extreme and unusual interest.

Not 'Awf Bad.

De Omnibus. By the Conductor (Barry Pain). (Fisher Unwin. 2s.)

The title and the idea of these papers are extremely happy. They appeared originally, as many will pleasantly remember, in To-Day; and now, with judicious—the Conductor spells his favourite word "joodishus," and we shall have a word to say about that—with judicious clipping and dovetailing, they certainly face the ordeal of "book form" with more success than most of the resurrection pies of our acquaintance. For Mr. Pain, though he elects to play Fool to the Republic of Letters, maintains the mediæval monarchic tradition, and your Fool is but the wise man standing on his head—to save it. The recurrence of the title to the original case and meaning of the omnibus was a happy stroke. For the monologues treat of nearly all the subjects which interest the man in the street. Still happier was the addition of the Conductor. For the 'bus conductor is a special product of London, born, like the 'bus driver and the cabman, of the necessity—and therefore the brother to the invention of swift retort following on immediate perception. The Conductor puts it thus, speaking of his friend 'Ankin, the driver. 'Ankin is a "sowshal reformer" and a power at meetings.

> It ain't like thet on a bus. Whort yer cawnt sye in 'awf a second ain't wuth syin' at all. It mye be all very fine, an' narcely expressed, and so on, but it don't git 'ome. 'Ankin stawts ter awnswer back, but before 'e's gort inter 'is stride, so ter speak, the bus 'as gone on, and the other chap sings out, "Call fur it termorrer," or "Write it art, an' post it," or some sich words as them.

The 'bus conductor, a man trained to immediate inference and speedy action, is also a man who several times a day cuts, as it were, through the heart of London, and, if he be intelligent, ought to know something "de omnibus." And Mr. Pain is certainly intelligent. Furthermore, the conductor is likely, before many more years have sped, to join the watchman, the linkboy, and the dodo in their extinction. We, or our children, will enjoy the company and the conversation of the motorneer—yes, the word has already been born and received its baptism of printing-ink in America, but the rich and leisurely experience of the 'bus conductor will no longer be ours or theirs for a penny and politeness. Therefore Mr. Barry Pain's title and idea again prove themselves good. It will be interesting to the men of A.D. 2000—if the paper-maker and binder have done their duty—to learn what an observant conductor thought of what he saw of human nature in the last year of the nineteenth century.

The Conductor has a happy knack of describing his friends. 'Ankin, we have met. Here is Ike:

> Ike is a 'ot un. 'E's a chap as 'as bin in many occypitions. 'E's drove a bus. 'E's drove a keb. 'E's bin clawk ter a bookey. 'E's dropped so low that one awd winter 'e took a dye at puttin' on skites fur people. Yer see, 'e'd bin misforchernit. 'Is bus 'ad bin ricin' another bus', an' the other bus 'ad knocked a 'ansom keb all ter pulp, which led ter ingquiries, and throwed ole Ike art of work fer a bit. Well, as I sye, 'e took a dye at puttin' on skites. I met 'im arterwards. 'E'd lorst 'is gimlick, but as 'e'd pinched it to stawt with that didn't carnt fur much. 'E'd cut both 'ands on a shawp skite-blide, but that 'ad meant a bob fur compensition. 'E'd got the rhoomatism crool, thro' stannin' abart in the cold. 'E'd got arf-a-crarn left art of whart 'e 'ad mide, and a sible muff as 'e said 'e were tikin' keer of fur a lyady. 'E'd gort as near drunk as no matter, and were goin' ter finish it horf. And when I left 'im 'e looked as likely ter git fourteen dyes as ever I seed a man.

That hits off Ike. But why this gratuitous torture of English spelling? As to the representation of the current Cockney in print, we have a long-standing grievance against Mr. Pain. There are many words which can be caught and printed as spoken. "Tikin' keer" is true enough, and legitimate. But the substratum of accent eludes all combinations of the alphabetic letters, and anything but the most moderate and careful mis-spelling annoys the reader and adds nothing to the verisimilitude of the page. The man of Thrums differs as far from polite English as the man who says "Verplestr Bink." But Mr. Barrie has brought him with gentle indication and no violent mis-spelling into the ken of London. Why does Mr. Pain make his conductor say "rhoomatism," which is precisely the same disease as rheumatism? And how can you distinguish in speech between "joodishus" and "judicious"?

Digitized by Google

One might make a long list of words which Mr. Pain mis-spells, as though he were one of the writers who think that the dislocation of aspirates is sufficient to indicate character. The point of view of the speaker is the thing, and Mr. Pain, having that, can afford to dispense with the lesser expedient. "Cottidge" he can afford to spell "cottage," "yoose" is merely "use," as generally pronounced. And "mirracles" are no more convincing for the extra liquid.

The Modern Stage.

His Excellency the Governor: a Farcical Romance in Three Acts. By R. Marshall. (Heinemann. 1s. 6d.)

CAPTAIN MARSHALL has stepped into commercial prosperity almost as quickly as Edmond Rostand. His pieces are fraught with innocent pleasure for tens of thousands of people, and their monetary value is unsurpassed by anything on the modern stage. The author of "The Second in Command" has provided the most successful of West-end theatres with its greatest success. He is certainly a phenomenon of the drama, an extremely striking illustration of the power of weakness when gracefully exerted. For, to us, the chief characteristic of his talent is its persuasive and elegant fragility. He never grips, nor seeks to grip. We have seen most of his plays, from the earlier amorphous attempts to the last shapely and rounded invention, and we do not remember a single scene to which the epithet "slight" might not be applied. He seems to triumph by refraining, by avoidance, and by a faint, witty charm, which, however diverting, is decidedly not beyond the reach of forty living novelists. "His Excellency the Governor" ran a victorious course for many nights. We recall the fact that we witnessed it with a certain comatose pleasure, and deemed it an ingenious expansion of a very trifling idea. And when we come to read the play, we are astonished at the slightness of the idea. It is, in truth, very much slighter than we had thought. Collect all your characters on a remote and beautiful island, and cause an epidemic of love—and there you are! The whole scheme of the play is to be perceived in this fragment of dialogue between the Governor of the Amandaland Islands and Captain Carew:

SIR MONTAGU: Where on earth has all this yellow dust come from?

CAREW: I believe it's from the century aloes that are flowering outside.

SIR MONTAGU: Ah! to be sure. You know the legend the islanders have?

CAREW: No, sir.

SIR MONTAGU: These particular aloes flower only once in a hundred years, and the yarn goes that in dying of love of their own consummation, the yellow dust of their blossom is blown about and causes an epidemic of love wherever it rests. They say it attacks one quite suddenly. Quaint idea, isn't it?

BAVERSTOCK: It's a comfort it's only an idea.

CAREW: Love itself is only an idea, my dear fellow, but a very charming one.

The idea so stated, it remains only to bring on the women. Captain Marshall makes them three—Mrs. Wentworth-Bolingbroke, type of the old, grotesque, and unsympathetic; Stella de Jex, type of the piquant and apparently naughty; and Ethel Carlton, type of the entirely youthful, beautiful, and good, the stage English maiden who subdues all men:

CAREW [Looking through doorway]: By Jove! she is a beautiful girl!

BAVERSTOCK: She's divine, absolutely divine!

CAREW: I say, we didn't bargain for this.

BAVERSTOCK: For what? Bargain for what?

CAREW: For such a vision of beauty.

The first act introduces the characters; the second and third acts are little but amiable chatter. One foresees that Ethel Carlton will marry Carew, and that Stella will probably catch the Cabinet Minister. These things happen, but there is nothing else beyond a comic opera sort of native rising, which is not a rising at all, and which gives opportunity for night alarms and some perfectly proper jokes about night-dresses. The sole positive quality of the play as distinguished from its negative qualities, is the easy attractiveness of the dialogue, mainly witty but sometimes sentimental—a dialogue which discloses no effort whatever after naturalness. This is a specimen of the sentimental:

STELLA: Brave fellows! Brave fellows!

CAREW: Ethel, listen! Our wedding march.

ETHEL: My soldier husband!

[ETHEL and CAREW embrace fervently, as do CARLTON and STELLA.

And this is a specimen of the witty, with a dash of sentimental added:

SIR MONTAGU: I beseech you, ladies, be calm! If we come to close quarters, I'll ensure your safety. I can conceal you in the coal cellar.

STELLA: I go to no coal cellar in this. Why, I've only worn it twice!

MRS. BOLINGBROKE: I have no desire to give trouble, but a more suitable fortress would be the wine cellar.

SIR MONTAGU: Well, well, we'll see. Perhaps, Carlton, you won't mind examining the cellars and deciding. Baverstock will take you. Come along, Carew!

[He goes out.

CAREW: Coming, sir. [Aside to ETHEL.] It's all right, Ethel. Cheer up! It's glorious to take up arms for you, darling! [Exit CAREW hurriedly.

BAVERSTOCK [Advancing to ETHEL]: As a signal to you that there is no immediate danger, I shall blow my nightingale at intervals in the garden. And when the hour of danger comes, you will find me in——

CARLTON [Who is waiting at door]: The cellars!

"His Excellency the Governor" belongs to a kind of work which, by the innocuousness of its unimportance and the neatness of its craftsmanship, leaves criticism silent. It is impossible to say anything about it. There it lies, in all its prettiness, tepidity, negligibleness, a little English hybrid garden-plant which flowers and fades and is forgotten.

Outposts of Civilisation.

The Father of St. Kilda. By Roderick Campbell. (Russell.)

THIS is a book of considerable value and interest. "The following pages," says Mr. Campbell, "contain a personal narrative—the history of my early years, and of my travels and adventures, strange and thrilling enough, in the territories around Hudson Bay." We have certainly found the volume to contain strange and thrilling passages, but in addition to these, and the vivid accounts of journeys undertaken alone through little-explored regions, we find much in the author's attitude and personality to admire. It is not merely a book of travel; it is a book of character as well.

Mr. Campbell's opening chapters are devoted to a sketch of his early years on the island of Lewis, where he was born. That event occurred when the Church of Scotland was a battlefield for warring theologies, and the parish school was closed in consequence. The "auld kirk" was defeated, and its minister driven forth. "Israel," says Mr. Campbell, "had taken to stoning her old prophets." The boy was ten years of age before he attacked the alphabet, which was a burdensome labour to him; but soon all regular instruction ceased, for the master flogged the minister's children, and was dismissed. One gathers that in the 'forties Lewis was a veritable teacup for such storms. After that the youngster educated himself, ran away from home, became a "herd loon," threw up that distinguished occupation, and returned to his father's house, only to leave it for ever soon after. In 1859 he set out for the Hudson Bay territory with abounding courage, and a stock of books which consisted of the Bible, a Johnson's Dictionary, Lennie's Grammar, and an unnamed "book on travels." Later in the same year he reached Fort York, whence he was drafted, as a servant of the great company, to the Red River.

Digitized by Google

The history of the next ten years, up to the surrender of the company's charter, is full of interest, but we pass it over to reach the narrative of Mr. Campbell's solitary wanderings. He had mastered most of the Indian dialects, and had the rare knack of commanding native confidence, but his expeditions into the wild Saskatchewan and Sioux countries were, to say the least, extremely bold undertakings:

> My outfit consisted of a horse and buggy, two guns, ammunition, and blanket, a few pounds of flour, tea, and salt. My steady horse, well named "Rock," deserves a word for himself, for a faithful and affectionate companion he proved himself during two lonely years in the wilderness. He was brown and of ordinary height. . . . He trotted delightfully ten miles an hour, and walked slowly, and was most docile. His eyes were hazel, the most beautiful I have ever seen.

Mr. Campbell makes us realise keenly the wide impressiveness of the prairies, their beauty, their solitude, their sameness, which is yet far from monotony. Some of his descriptions have real distinction, and his general estimate of the Indian character strikes us as sound and just: respecting and loving it in certain directions, he yet says: 'The truth is that the red man is incapable of civilisation, and since he cannot progress with it, he must be crushed under its weight." The horrible massacre of United States cavalry by "Sitting Bull," in 1876, is, in itself, almost sufficient evidence of this, although it is impossible to hold civilisation blameless; indeed, it gained foothold by little short of fraud. The winter of that year Mr. Campbell spent in the territory of "Star Blanket," an amiable chief who was baptized, apparently, for no other reason than that he wished to appear agreeable. He > appeared in church in Spartan simplicity, wrapped in a white blanket, not too clean; he and his braves, becoming impatient at the length of the preliminary service, filled their pipes, and beguiled the time by stolidly puffing forth clouds of smoke.

Mr. Campbell pertinently adds: "The best plan would have been to make a better man of him, not merely an indifferent Christian."

Of adventures and escapes Mr. Campbell had his fill; grizzlies, buffaloes, and Indians, all made exciting work for him, but he came through his perils without serious hurt. And in reading of these perils we feel that the author has set down bare fact; he never embroiders, never attempts to force effect. That is one of the qualities which we like about the book; it is honest, even in its self-complacency, and obviously sincere. And the life which he describes is already of the past, though the changes, no doubt, are mainly on the surface. The Indian barbarities of yesterday have given place to the white lynchings of to-day. Between the two such difference as there is may be set to the credit of the earlier inhabitants.

It must be added that the title of Mr. Campbell's book is altogether misleading; and why, upon the cover, do we read, "Literary Dawn on Lewis"? The matter is beyond our comprehension.

Other New Books.

ANSELM AND HIS WORK. BY REV. A. C. WELCH.

This volume, which belongs to the series called "The World's Epoch-Maker's," gives with sympathy and clearness the life of a very great man. Whether Anselm should in strictness be called an epoch-maker might, perhaps, be debated. Yet he was in some sense the precursor, if not in some degree the founder, of the Scholastic Philosophy, which left so profound an impress on the mediæval mind and its products, which is the very life-blood of Dante's great poem. Abelard, the overweening, studied under him in his later days, and despised the aged teacher. But Abelard despised most men, and modern criticism has not ratified his judgment. Devout with the most personal faith, he had yet (as Mr. Welch says) "a confidence in the power and validity of human thought which lends an extraordinary boldness to much of his speculation." Faith was the basis of reasoning, because he was so confident that no truth could ultimately be found in conflict with faith. "Credo ut intelligam" ("I believe that I may understand"), he said. Faith was the finger-post, pointing the direction in which solution would be found: but his confidence in that finger-post made him the bolder in the speculative use of reason. If difficulty arose, the remedy was not to draw back, but to push towards further understanding. Teacher and philosopher, a converser with kings, the steadfast withstander of the terrible William Rufus, most savage of the truculent Norman kings, he was yet a master of patient education, in a day when the rod lay as ready to men's hands as the sword. "Monks in the chapter were beaten for slight offences. The oblates were taught to chastise each other when their masters had finished with them." Anselm rebuked these coarse methods. "If," said he, "you take a young tree . . . and check a branch here and tie in another there, what will you have a right to expect when you unbind the lashings?" As he preached he did. A young monk who was set on by Anselm's enemies to harass him, he won over by indulgence, and then trained to an obedient disciple. Of this Osborn, who died prematurely, he ever spoke with tender affection. He hated secular affairs, and wailed pathetically over the burthen laid upon him as Primate of All England; yet it was his fate to pass his life in constant struggle with kings, the resolute and sagacious Henry following the fierce Rufus as his foe. Mr. Welch has described with understanding and excellent literary ability a lovable personality and a great career. (T. and T. Clark. 3s.)

SHELL LIFE: AN INTRODUCTION TO THE BRITISH MOLLUSCA. BY EDWARD STEP.

This is a very good introduction to the shell-bearing creatures of British waters, salt or fresh, and of British woods and lanes. It is not a guide to the collector, in the ordinary sense; that is, it does not pretend to classify and describe all the British mollusca. It does, in fact, describe and classify briefly the greater number of them. But its chief aim is to arouse interest in the organic structure of the creatures themselves, and the relation of that structure to their life and surroundings. The mollusc, in fact, is described with reference to his milieu, as Taine taught us to criticise writers. From this Darwinian standpoint the book has a place and value of its own, which should recommend it to the student of nature behind a shell. The numerous and particularly excellent illustrations increase its value for the amateur in particular, to whom it is chiefly addressed. (Warne. 6s.)

Messrs. Jack's "Edinburgh Waverley" makes rapid and punctual progress. Old Mortality in two volumes, and

Digitized by Google

The Black Dwarf in one volume are now added. The frontispieces in the Old Mortality volumes are the Leven portrait of Claverhouse, by an unknown Dutch master, and Patton's portrait of General Dalzell, whom the Covenanters hated for "acting the Muscovite too grossly"—he had been in the service of Russia.

The Stone Crosses of the County of Northampton, by Mr. Christopher A. Markham, F.S.A. (Simpkin, Marshall), is a well-digested and admirably illustrated monograph of 120 pages, in which the author deals with all the known crosses in the county. Mr. Markham's census of the Northamptonshire crosses is interesting. The remains exist of some forty churchyard, ten market, twenty village, four wayside, and five memorial crosses, besides sundry boundary stones. Although none of these crosses can compare in antiquity with many found in Cornwall, or in beauty with some of the market crosses in the South of England, yet they are full of interest; and the county is compensated by the possession of two out of the three remaining crosses built as memorials of Queen Eleanor. Many of the crosses are illustrated here for the first time. A useful introductory essay on crosses in general adds to the interest of the book, which, however, is first and foremost a careful personal record of all the crosses now to be found in Northamptonshire. A feature of Mr. Markham's descriptions is his tables of measurements, showing the exact dimensions of all the larger crosses.

How to Succeed in Your Examination, by Mr. George A. Wade (Richards, 2s. 6d.), is the last addition to the "How To" series. We observe much good advice and some practical hints.

Fiction.

The Striking Hours. By Eden Phillpotts. (Methuen. 6s.)

For this series of Dartmoor stories Mr. Phillpotts has chosen an apt title, from a passage in a too-little-known book of essays by Dr. Martineau—"God has so arranged the chronometry of our spirits that there shall be thousands of silent moments between the striking hours." It is the hours of Little Silver which strike in the present volume, and from the photograph placed at the beginning of the book, all the world and Gidleigh may now become aware that Little Silver is Gidleigh itself. Such, however, is Gidleigh, that Gidleigh will probably never know that fact. If ever a village was out of the world that village is Gidleigh, hidden on the edge of the moor under the shadows of Cosdon Beacon and Buttern Hill. Yet Gidleigh, or Little Silver, can no more help being in the world than London can get away from nature. Where man is, there is the world and there is nature, and this truth is well proclaimed and set forth by one of those extraordinarily sagacious and experienced old men into whose colloquial mouths Mr. Phillpotts has put most, but not all, of his recitals:

> "'Tis the fashion, 'mongst them as doan't knaw an' won't larn, to say as nothing never happens here, an' that theer ban't a deed falled out worth talking of since Queen Victoria comed to the Throne of England. But, for my part, us 'pears to have so many signs an' wonders as any other plaace of like size. An' if 'tis awnly a bull broke loose, or a strange hoss in the pound—why, theere's matter for discoorse; for nought never chances wi'out somethin' behind it: an' awftentimes a small item will plum out into a far-reachin' thing, big enough to make a wonder from sowin' to reapin'."

This passage indicates the tone and temper of the book; and what chiefly impresses us about the work as a whole, is the wonderful effectiveness of simple events when they are narrated simply, without unholy strivings after crises and climaxes. One notes the same thing in Wordsworth's narrative poems—those poems whose leading quality is utter homeliness, but which Matthew Arnold deemed the greatest since Shakespeare's. If one takes a couple of the tragic stories, like "The Maiden Bell," and "Another Little Heath-Hound," and tries to come at the essence of them, one discovers nothing but an incident, such as might excite a village and furnish a paragraph to a newspaper—just, for example, the mere suicide of a man crossed in love, told as it would be told by an "awld sawl" who had seen much and deeply into life, and to whom a suicide was scarcely a matter to get over-excited about; a man, indeed, who would crack his dry joke concerning even suicide. But it charms and it holds. One says, "This occurred. This is life." And probably it did occur. Certainly it is life. There is every sort of story in the book—idyll, tragedy, comedy, and one or two stories that remind you, by their richly humorous situations, of de Maupassant's farces normandes. An example of the last is the fate of the "Old Testament man," Judah Nymet, who lived according to his Old Testament in all things, and at an advanced age decided to introduce a Hagar into his household:

> "What wan man can do, another can; an' what was well thought 'pon by the Lord in Bible times would be equally well thought 'pon by Him now, for He knaws no shadow of changing. Never a man stood nearer His heart than Abraham, an' to do the same as the patriarch be ever my joy an' pride."
>
> "Sure, you'm just such another, if it ban't irreligious so to say," yawns Mrs. Nymet; for now the cannel was blawed out, an' her felt oncommon sleepy arter a busy day.
>
> "Ess, I be—or I try to be," answers back farmer; "an' I'd have slayed my awnly son 'fore the Lord so soon as a sheep if He'd but commanded. But as Abraham done, afore Sarah bore him the bwoy by a miracle of Nature in her dotage, so I be gwaine to do; an' I much hopes as you'll fall in wi' my lofty purpose an' onderstand an' judge accordin'."
>
> "I've never crossed 'e, man," sez his missis, "an' ban't like to begin now."

However, she did cross him when she grasped his "bowldacious idea"—which he termed "a seemly, patriarchial thing"—and family influence and family wiles ended in the triumph of a new-fangled morality in Little Silver. The whole story is delightful. But Mr. Phillpotts is at his best in the tragic vein.

The Skipper of Barncraig. By Gabriel Setoun. (Constable. 6s.)

This novel, by the author of Barncraig, takes us again to that interesting community. It is a story which is redeemed by unessentials.

Not that the main story is not well conceived—it is; but after the Skipper's son ceases to be a boy we lose interest in him. As a boy he was all very well; as a young man he needed stronger, as well as more delicate, handling.

It was a settled thing in the Russell family that every son should be a sailor, and that the sea should kill him in the end. The Skipper's son was born before his time on the night of "Windy Wednesday," and his mother died, so breaking, for the first time in many generations, the tradition that every Russell mother should bear two children, a boy and a girl. Says one of the delightful gossips who constitute the chief charm of the book:

> "This is the first break o' the kind that has ever been i' the Russell family. I've heard that even afore my day there has aye been twa i' the family—a laddie an' a lassie. That's no just tradition, for it's in black an' white in their big Bible. . . . The laddie grew up to be a sailor like his father afore him, married an' brought his twa into the world; but the lassie lived and died an auld maid. It's queer; but that's the family tradition, an' I suppose they maun bide by it. . ."

But the boy born on "Windy Wednesday" had a horror of the sea, and developed a passion for dreams and music.

Digitized by Google

The story centres about this temperamental fact, and the inevitable antagonism between father and son. The result is wholly tragic, but it is tragedy which hardly justifies itself. For so ambitious a theme more power were needed than Mr. Setoun brings to its development, though elements of power are by no means lacking. If the author has not quite succeeded, he has by no means altogether failed.

The minor characters, the chorus of gossips, are well drawn, and their wisdom and quaintness full of meat. Old John Burt, whose reputation for philosophy was founded on a library consisting of five solid volumes, is always good, and his devotion to the Skipper's son has strong points of humour and pathos. He had an annual joke which he got off on the boy's birthday, and liked to be reminded that he had made it before:

> "Did I, though?" he ejaculated. "Did I, though? That shows, surely, a reg'lar life. Ay, ay, I'm proud o' that, Ellen; no' that I mind o' it mysel'. . . . I wouldna' wonder though I might mak' it again next year, Ellen. That would be hard to beat for reg'lar livin.'"

The Skipper of Barncraig is certainly above the average of novels; it has both picturesqueness and life.

Fiander's Widow. By M. E. Francis. (Longmans. 6s.)

Fiander's Widow is just a "Pastoral of Dorset" attempted upon a larger scale, possibly a rather larger scale than there is quite enough stuff in the story to justify. It is a little difficult to write of Wessex after William Barnes and Thomas Hardy, and Mrs. Blundell does not display the same fine intimacy with "Dorset dear" that was hers with the Lancashire countryside of which she formerly made her study. Nevertheless, Fiander's Widow is readable enough. It runs easily and freshly. There are some pleasing pictures of idyllic life on a dairy farm. Rosalie Fiander herself and Farmer Isaac Sharpe are attractive personages, and the plot, although it seems at first to proceed on familiar lines, receives a neat twist in the closing chapter. On one point, however, we must really make a protest. Rosalie and her lover have a tiff in the morning over an apronful of primroses. In the evening he is guided towards the spot in the garden where she stands by a double line of white pinks. Primroses flower in April and white pinks in June. Surely some elementary attention to the process of the seasons is desirable, even in a story of country life.

The Coward. By R. L. Jefferson. (Ward, Lock. 6s.)

It is not easy to discover what Mr. Jefferson would be at in this novel, nor does the title help us. The narrator of the story, Henry Catesby, who resigns excellent prospects in the grocery business for a literary career, strikes us as not so much coward as cad, not so much fool as knave. At the best, it is an unpleasant narrative, unredeemed either by grace of style or vigour of conception. The earlier chapters are the best; but when the young man (he is always painfully young) gets up to London, and into the toils of an impossible journalist named Detheredge, we merely read on as a matter of duty. This Detheredge, we are informed, is a brilliant man of letters and a great editor He has also a passion for the prize-ring, and when an unfortunate meeting between Joe Banks (of England) and Jake Goodman (of Carolina) results in the death of the latter champion, the only way out of the difficulty which occurs to the egregious Detheredge is to set fire to the house and leave the police to discover a charred body. Need we say more about The Coward? The worst of such books is that some readers, who know no better, may take Detheredge for a portrait. But even the most inexperienced reader will perceive that the statement that Catesby wrote fascinating stories is nonsense.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

CHRIST AND ANTI-CHRIST. TRANSLATED BY H. TRENCH.

"Dimitri Merejkowski is perhaps the most interesting and powerful of the younger Russian novelists, the only writer that promises to carry on the work of Tolstoi, Turgeniev, and Dostoievski. His books, which are already numerous, are animated by a single master-idea, the Pagano-Christian dualism of our human nature. What specially interests him in the vast spectacle of human affairs is the everlasting contest between the idea of a God-Man and the idea of a Man God; that is to say, between the conception of a God incarnate for awhile (as in Christ), and the conception of Man as himself God—gradually evolving higher types of splendid and ruling character which draw after them the generations." Thus Mr. Herbert Trench introduces this Russian writer, following the critical remarks of M. Prozor in the Mercure de France. The story here translated is laid in the epoch of Salammbô and Quo Vadis. (Constable. 6s.)

QUEEN SWEETHEART. BY MRS. C. N. WILLIAMSON.

A great many novels now stand to Mrs. Williamson's credit. This one opens in the Savoy restaurant, into which Jeck Tredennis has "dropped" to be "cheered out of an aimless, discontented mood." Here "Jack Tredennis's grey, black-lashed Celtic eyes" find much employment, but are riveted to a woman's face that "in charm, in fascination, was a law unto itself." The story quickly widens out. We are in Cornwall. A Russian Colonel, a "veiled lady," and "The House with Grey Gables" appear. The "colonel" turns out to be something else, and elements of mystery and horror are not wanting to this melodramatic, not unskilful, story. (F. V. White and Co. 6s.)

THE CALL OF THE FUTURE. BY MRS. B. TANQUERAY.

A flower farm seems a delightful setting for a story. "Acres of splendid colour and sweet odours; between them narrow lanes from patch of glory to patch of glory . . . beyond that—still more inland—the little town of Nenequay—beyond that the World." A good beginning to a sunny and scented love-story. (Hurst and Blackett. 6s.)

CASH IS KING. BY WILLIAM A. REID.

This story would be better for some explanation clearer than the one provided. It is a kind of extravaganza, having for its material the contest between labour and capital in the United States, and sets forth the career of one Albert Alling, who, at the age of eighteen, arrives at Boston, and becomes an employé in the Automatic Syndicate Works. The moral of the book is that "Union for good ends is beneficent and is of God; union for any other purpose is malignant, and is of the devil." (Drane. 6s.)

GYDA THE GOTH. BY ERNEST WESTERN.

An historical romance of Constantinople, opening in 1066, and full of war and intrigue. Its setting affords at least a fine mixture of races and creeds. "With ever-increasing wonder I waded down the contents of the document . . . I was to swear by 'the hammer of Thor,' by 'the Sacred Ring on the Altar,' by 'the Cross of Christ,' by 'the bolts of Zeus,' by 'Heaven,' and by 'Hell,' by my soul, by my hope of salvation . . . that what I saw, heard, smelt, tasted, thought, felt, when with her, was to be as if it had not been when I moved beyond the circle of her presence." The "presence" is that of the Empress Eudocia. (Burleigh. 6s.)

Digitized by Google

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage, One Halfpenny, Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscription, prepaid (including postage) 17/6
" Quarterly 5/0
" Price for one issue /5

George Eliot.

SELDOM could a moment seem more incongruous, while in reality very rarely could a moment be more fit than the present for a new and popular edition of George Eliot. And by a singular accident of time, the approaching falling in of Messrs. Blackwood's copyright has produced two equally desirable re-publications—the Library Edition, large volumes in blue-grey linen, at ten shillings net, and a small popular edition, light, portable, with thin pages, but excellent large print, at two shillings. Perhaps the latter is the more attractive of the two, being readable anywhere—in bed, travelling, out of doors, at any moment of available time. The other is, essentially, as it is called, a Library volume, dignified and sober, but a little large and heavy for enjoyable reading, except under the best conditions.

Will these new editions be much read, however? We wonder, for the mental and spiritual outlook of a generation past and the mental and spiritual outlook of to-day are enormously different. The peculiar interest of this particular re-publication, in fact, apart from the literary greatness of George Eliot, is the contrast this spiritual idealist presents to the undeniable spiritual movement now struggling into life. For it is long since the culture of the soul has been more conscious and absorbed. Preoccupation with the life above, and beyond the material, temporary, and earthly life, is spreading like a wave from continent to continent. And George Eliot was one of the most pre-eminently spiritual novelists in the English language. The motive below all she undertook was the awakening of the soul and the revealing of the beauty and contagion of it. In every volume she ever wrote it was the soul only she wrestled with, analysed, anguished for, the soul alone that became of moment to her. Nevertheless, between the idealism of George Eliot and the idealism of to-day is one great point of divergence. The spiritualism of to-day regards itself above all as an inspiration due to a higher condition of soul, independent of the material life and the concessions made to it. In its most perfect form it is the beautiful spiritualism of Doffkiosky's Crime and Punishment, where Sonia, the girl who has long led a debased life, is shown to possess a soul of Christ-like beauty and radiance. The nature of her means of livelihood has never been able to reach or corrupt her soul. The former was a disaster of the earthly life, a bitterness brought upon it by the harsh complexities of temporary existence, but the compromise was of the body, not of the spirit; and it is the inner life of the spirit that is alone of importance. Nothing can exceed the spiritual insight of Doffkiosky in the delineation of Sonia. It is as if for a moment the blindfolded condition of human judgments had ceased, and for a second the true value of man's earth failures and earth condemnations had bewilderingly emerged. But in its development and expansion this new spiritualism has taken on elements not visible in Sonia. To have mystic vision, to feel security and communion with the unknown worlds, has grown to exert a preponderating influence. To the demands of one's soul everything must be sacrificed, and the reward comes largely in visions—in stirring signs of another existence surrounding and continuing this. The spiritualism of George Eliot was of a sterner and more sombre material. Devoid of mystic qualities, it possessed, on the other hand, an undeviating courage in grasping the laws of life, and in accepting the impossibility of all escape from them. Disregarding the soul's thirst for inspiration and ecstasy, George Eliot yearned to see it always in action—action being to her the final and irreparable test upon which to render judgment. The self-soothing attempt to make evil bear the same fruit as good she fought incessantly as a bitter and corrupting delusion. And the question with her remained unalterably what had been done, never what had been felt, of spiritual comfort and loveliness.

No book George Eliot wrote can quite touch the sustained beauty of Adam Bede, and in none has she unfolded the whole extent of her spiritual belief with more completeness and clarity. And in opposition to the leniency of to-day, George Eliot's spiritualism forgave no sin, accepted no weakness, passed over no debts not paid back to the uttermost farthing. The kingdom of heaven, she believed, could not be got otherwise than painfully. Without wrestlings and agonies, and fierce battles against temptations, no soul could gain security of foothold. Unrelaxing self-abnegation was the only means of journeying upward. This terror of earthly care, moreover, speaks with a wistful loveliness from nearly all her best characters, but never with a more moving power than from the mouth of Dinah Morris—Dinah Morris, who brings with every page tears of love and envy into one's throat. And very early in the book Dinah says, speaking of the results of her preaching in various places:

> It's wonderful how rich is the harvest of souls up those high-walled streets, where you seem to walk as in a prison yard, and the ear is deafened with the sounds of worldly toil. I think, may be, it is because the promise is sweeter when this life is so dark and weary, and the soul gets more hungry when the body is ill at ease.

This is the conviction of all George Eliot's writing. Dinah, moreover, repeats the same belief towards the end of the book, when urged by delightful Mrs. Poyser to stay with her:

> Your wish for me to stay is not a call of duty which I refuse to hearken to because it is against my own desires; it is a temptation I must resist, lest the love of the creature should become like a mist on my soul shutting out the heavenly light.

A few lines previously she had explained that she felt the life one of "too great ease and luxury, in which we have all things too richly to enjoy." Curiously enough, nevertheless, in spite of this overmastering religious ardour, George Eliot has never exerted a great influence upon emotion or character. She makes no disciples, submerges no temperament, constitutes no turning-point in the career of the bewildered and guide-seeking soul. Probably she was too great a thinker. The gigantic force of her work goes inevitably through the brain to the heart, and not from the heart to the intelligence. Also, she lacked one great quality—the moving power of any intense enthusiasm. To the very essence of her being, George Eliot was a pessimist. Even of love she wrote: "It is not true that love makes all things easy; it makes us choose what is difficult." And just because of this preponderating sense of the implacable tragic and suffering, George Eliot can never become to any great extent an epoch-marking author. Moreover, she saw and understood everything; her comprehension, indeed, is often appealing in its profundity, but she saw without imagination, without fancy, without a moment's submerging emotion, and always with a perfectly clear consciousness of the physiological law behind. To a great extent she may be said to have been an enormous brain, but not an enormous personality.

Digitized by Google

Nothing, for instance, is so difficult to realise as the fact that she was practically twice married. The impression given is of a woman incapable of inspiring a great love—of a woman who has hungered for, but never known, the humanising experience of a boundless human tenderness. For the feeling is invariably of an imagination idle behind its pity, of a sensibility chill below its knowledge. Sometimes even George Eliot suggests a thin streak of unconscious cruelty—a fleeting insensitiveness of temperament. Certainly she never flinched before the just punishment of sinners, and there are one or two little phrases as regards the hanging of poor Hetty that tighten the reader's throat with a sense of absolute physical sickness. To discuss George Eliot, however, in passing, is impossible. There is no manageable point to stop at under a volume. The colossal dimensions of the figure pygmies words, while a handful of them reach cover about a nail's breadth of the gigantic whole. Her attitude, however, towards the grim, perpetual problem of disastrous marriages has at the moment as intense and special an interest as her religious outlook. For it is time when this familiar tragedy has fastened itself like a vice upon the imagination. And again and again—in Romola, in Janet's Repentance, in the case of Dorothea Casaubon, of Grandcourt and Gwendolin, of Rosamund and Lydgate—she returned to the subject, and to the question of a man or woman's duty—their soul's duty—in the face of the insurpassably difficult situation of a calamitous marriage. Nothing concerned her more deeply, in fact, than the discovery of how much or how little should be endured, physically, mentally, and spiritually, before conscience could rightfully be absolved from a continuance of responsibility. That she should choose the most difficult solution was in keeping with her temperament, and the fine asceticism of her religious conceptions. Moreover, a mistake to her, no less than a crime, constituted a thing rigorously to be paid for. It is the law of nature that every nature mistake should bring inevitable retribution, and the effort to escape from any natural law struck her as a piteous futility. Secondly, that the soul could shake off the yoke of any accepted responsibility would never have been accepted by her for a second.

On the other hand, Nora, in Ibsen's The Doll's House, is a superb example of the modern view of a soul's righteous course in the grip of an overwhelming materialism. Half dazed by a magnificent instant of inner illumination, Nora takes knowledge that her soul and her husband's had never communicated, that he was not her soul's husband, that her soul, indeed, was the very last thing he could realise or desire. And with a wonderful vision of the truth below all surface appearances, she goes, shutting the door behind her. Dealt with by George Eliot, she would have been kept there, to reap the seeds of the poor blind past, and to bring forth the blossoms of her soul, only through anguished endurance of the conditions created by them both.

Nevertheless, though the contrast is very marked between George Eliot and the idealists of to-day, there is a certain value in thinking of them together. For between the growing increase of spiritual serenity and George Eliot's thirst—not for what may be seen and foretasted, but what must be done and suffered—there is no root antagonism. They round and complete each other. George Eliot missed the smiling gaiety of those who have, as in a vision, realised how small an item are both the tears and the sins of earth, but she had a tragic courage, a strength and nobleness of endurance in dark places, and an immovable integrity of conscience that can never depreciate in beauty.

Things Seen.

The Candlesticks.

It seemed a perfect ending to a dusty day of tramping to sup in that inn-parlour. It was as though I had suddenly been transported to the cool twilight of an earlier century, and at any moment I was prepared to hear the tootling of a coach horn and the clash of hoofs on the cobble-stones without. The room gleamed contentedly; light was reflected from polished, black oak beams, from copper-warming pans, copper kettles, and a set of old brass pestles and mortars. But what took me particularly was a pair of brass candlesticks, which served to hold the illumination for my feast. They were simple candlesticks enough, but had an exquisiteness of line which somehow reminded me of "The Vicar of Wakefield." I could fancy wigged heads nodding near them, old stories circling about them, old wine sparkling in their neighbourhood. And then the marks of the hammer were plain upon them, the authentic touches of the artificer. I felt that I might be happy for a week if I could possess myself of such a treasure.

The landlord came in. I praised his beef, his beer, and—more cautiously—his candlesticks. "Oh, them!" he said. "Like 'em, do you, sir? Well, that's queer! My son, he made 'em only t'other day. We haves a kind of wot they calls a handicraft exhibition in the village every year. But my son never gets no prize."

I had no heart to praise the candlesticks after that. The awful thought came to me that perhaps the son had made the kettles, the warming-pans, even the brass pestles and mortars, as well.

Mother Earth

I came out of the Temple, and walked westward, sick of everything. The day was hateful, the Strand was full of idle people, mere obstructors of the passage of those who possessed a purpose. To avoid them I turned aside from the main thoroughfare, and in Tavistock-street, to the south of the yard where vegetables are dealt with at Covent Garden, I got relief. It was simply an odour: the smell of country earth, the smell you get when you are wandering in deep Cornish lanes, and something tempts you to pull a fern by its roots from the hedge. That changed everything, for as I went on my way I was no longer in London. I was away in the West again, and I had dined with the doctor, and had smoked and talked of books, and of the slow-moving life of the country, in a beautiful old garden. Then, conscious of an infirmity of the eyes, and of an utter lack of the sense of locality, I entreated him and his friend to see me some part of the way home across the sand hills, to the bungalow where I was stopping. So we set out, three of us, and left the sleeping town, and gained the wide expanse of the sand-hills, overgrown with a short turf for the most part, but sometimes rising into high mounds, and these covered with the reedy spire-grass. There was a sea fog, and the moon was not yet up. The white stones, set for the guidance of travellers, were far apart, and frequently we wandered from the track. Suddenly I stood still. One could have sworn that there was nothing but sand for a good mile, and yet here, hidden in the white fog, there was a patch of ground from which there came just that same odour—the smell of the roots of a fern newly torn from the ground. We stood for a long time, and when we continued our journey, I still had that surprise of the night in mind. It all came back to me now in Covent Garden, and there was a sea-fog, and the breath of Mother Earth in it, all the way from Tavistock-street to Piccadilly

Digitized by Google

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

M. Marcel Prevost has written a pretty, somewhat fragmentary story, Le Domino Jaune, the youthful romance of a diplomat. The volume is charmingly illustrated, and might be offered as an acceptable gift to a married woman. For the traditional Young Person will never be so emancipated in the esteem of her elders as to be allowed an indiscriminate abuse of the literature of M. Prevost. But he is now a convert. He has sown his literary wild oats, which, unlike the process generally with the sons of perdition, has been one of exceeding lucrativeness. Discreet and virtuous fiction, like M. Réné Bazin's exquisite Terre qui meurt, or M. Le Roy's striking and charming Jacquou le Croquart, does not run at a bound into several editions, and nobody yearns to dramatise it, like the too deplorably famous Demi-Vierges. So M. Prévost, with an attentive eye upon the next vacant arm-chair under the Cupola, has settled down to take life and fiction seriously, and accept the fact that men and women have a thousand other interests besides mere sexual relations. He is beginning to take a healthier and larger view of love itself, and in time I have hopes that he will even come to understand what love really is. This is an old quarrel between M. Prévost and myself, a quarrel carried on, however, on the best of terms. I belabour him most dreadfully, and he smiles—like the Heathen Chinee. He is not even put out when I tell him that the greater part of his books should be burnt on the public place; he only strives to persuade me that English novels are greatly more immoral than his. He once, good-humouredly and perfidiously, wrote an article in the Journal to prove that a novel of mine was worse than anything he would have dared to write in sober French. The Journal believed him, and possibly he believed himself. Anyhow, we have mutually forgiven each other, and I welcome him to the fold of respectable fiction as a sort of recovered soul. Still the suppression of a word here, a suggestion there, would have bettered this new little work—a sort of holiday task. He meets a diplomat abroad, who sentimentally confides the broken romance of his youth to him. The lad has been brought up by his mother and the inevitable M. l'Abbé in the most delicate fashion. He is pure, incurious, and well-bred. His chief sends him into the arms of oblique adventure by asking him to go in his stead to a masked charity ball. There he meets and is pursued by a yellow domino. She asks him to carry her off. It is the first time he has come in contact with Woman—lovely Woman—and it would not be in nature to expect him to back out of the obvious responsibilities of his position. He hails a fiacre, and drives her to a fast and fashionable night restaurant he had heard his polished uncle mention. There he endeavours to make love in the usual way, having, by a stroke of inexperienced genius, ordered a perfectly correct supper. To his stupefaction the lady, who has practically carried him off, is ice to his advances, and at a given moment behaves with incredible impropriety. Just as she does so, and his puzzled brain is swimming from emotion and surprise, the door opens, and they are confronted with the injured and irate husband and the majesty of the law. The lady disappears, leaving him broken-hearted, and the mystery is only cleared up years afterwards. She hated her husband and loved another. She longed for divorce, but French law forbids marriage with the co-respondent, so she seized hold of this well-bred and sympathetic "youth" to play the part of false co-respondent, which brought about the desired divorce, and enabled her to marry her lover.

M. Paul Marguerite assures us, in his preface to the late Jean Lombard's extraordinary Byzance, that the writer is a prosateur of great genius, that Byzance is a seizing poem. The word "vast," which he applies to it, is in its place, if it implies an insatiable ambition and an immense effort, not in any way crowned by a proportionate achievement. If Jean Lombard was thinking of Salammbô, he went to work after the fashion of Zola, without the style, the tact, the taste of such an artist as Flaubert, or the force of the king of naturalists. The result is a nightmare of erudition and wildly eccentric French—French that defies the custom of ear and eye, and looks like a remarkably ugly foreign tongue, and a desperate crowding of Byzantine characters. Perhaps some ingenious and painstaking person would read this book at a sitting, but it took me a week, with compulsory pauses of twenty-four hours after each half-dozen chapters. At the end I was no better off. I closed the volume with the sensations of a schoolboy who has reluctantly got through a dull and difficult task. This is the way Jean Lombard writes: "Des hymnes, vivacement; chacun debout." And again: "Seule elle se rasseyait, avec toujours en soa intellectualité, pas assez, rudimentaire pour n'avoir conscience de ce qui adviendrait, l'aiguë aperception des dangers obscurément latents pour Ouvraque." Any sentence out of the four hundred long, closely-printed pages might be offered as a puzzle to those who know French well enough to feel confronted with the unintelligible. The author had been hearing of the Browning and Meredith laurels in the path of obscurity, or perhaps he hoped to retire into poetic darkness with the late Mallarmé. But he has none of Mallarmé's musical suggestiveness. He is simply rough and barbarous. For those who like to follow M. Paul Marguerite in his admiration of Jean Lombard, I add this passage from his preface: "His forgotten work reappears, beautified, with a fresh youth; it is vivified, it rises, and behold it coming towards us glittering with gems, in the hieratic stiffness of its robe, incrusted with golden enamel athwart this strange book, Byzance!"

M. Eugène d'Eichthal has published a very lucid, learned, and interesting study of Socialism, Collectivism, and Communism. He shows us how socialism is not of our days, but existed throughout every civilisation that has flourished and disappeared. The war between the rich and the poor is as old as wealth and poverty, and has confronted all forms of government with unsolvable problems, animated with irrational sentiments towards each other. M. d'Eichthal does well to recall to a Christian race that cradled its religion, that the Ancient Testament is "profoundly impregnated with a sentiment of protestation against social inequalities; with an appeal to a Providential plan in favour of the oppressed, to which the history of humanity has responded by long echoes"; and that the law of Moses, which commands the Sabbath rest, is but a legal protection of the labouring classes. I have not space to write more fully about this interesting study of a burning theme, but, in the face of this quotation from a curé of the seventeenth century, we may admit that social unrest in France dates long before the Revolution: "Poor people, you bear all the burden of your kings and princes, who are your first tyrants; you are then charged with all the nobility, the clergy, all the monkery, the men of justice and of war, and finally with all the idlers. For it is but by the fruits of your harsh labour that they all exist. And yet by nature all men are equal, and have equal rights to the goods of earth."

H. L.

Digitized by Google

The Red-Hot Library.

In that vast, intricate, and seething organisation known as the Salvation Army there are many departments, and one of these, probably one of the least, is the Book Department, which, from No. 100, Clerkenwell-road, diffuses a highly specialised literature of saintliness. The Army Book Department flourishes. It is forced to flourish, by the ecstatic and yet calculating energy which radiates from General Booth, whose last vibration distends the cheek of the salvation cornet-player on the Indian plain. Salvation Army publications do not fail; they enjoy no tepid success of curiosity. They have got to "go"; therefore they go: it is ordained. The Departmental catalogue lies now before us, and it strikes us as an admirable instance of the adaptation of means to an end. One can perceive in it the shrewd native skill, the rough and careless power, the tireless faculty for ramming-home, which have made the Salvation Army what it is. You must not suppose that the Army has encircled the world by dint of wearing out trousers at the knees, or of catching pneumonia at the street corner on wet nights. Behind all these public phenomena of yearning and of appeal is a great brain, a brain which we have no hesitation in describing as Napoleonic in its imagination, its genius for detail, and its choice of assistance. If such a brain were not at this moment tyrannising over the Army, the Army would be a miracle; and there are no miracles. Take this item from the Catalogue: "Books that Bless.—A series of Pungent Reviews reprinted, by request, from the War Cry. Not a dry paragraph in the whole book. Just the sort of literature to keep the heart warm and enthusiastic for souls. 191 pages. Cloth, 1s. 6d.; Paper, 1s." Or titles like these—Bible Battle-Axes, A Ladder to Holiness, Life and Death: Stirring Addresses to the Unsaved, Red Flowers of Martyrdom. Such telling phrases were not chanced on by luck; they came from some subordinate brain, at the bidding of the same imperious, original force which causes the drum to vex the drowsy ear of Sunday morning on village greens and municipal squares. It is a rare fine thing to rule, and General Booth rules. He informs, energises, and inspires. One can hear him saying to his Chief of the Staff, Mr. Bramwell Booth, who has dominion over literature, that literature must just set to and save souls by any means it can; that any stick is good enough to beat the devil with; and that the Book Department had better move along with the times—and quick, too! Then Mr. Bramwell Booth, and all his, begin to look round and observe what the literary world is doing. The literary world happens to be in the midst of a predilection for "series" and "libraries," outcome of a device for making one book sell another. Obviously, then, the Salvation Army Book Department must have its Library. A name, a name for that Library, a name that shall startle, arrest, and lay the reader prone! What epithet so fitting, so entirely apposite and descriptive, as "Red Hot"? Lo, therefore, the "Red Hot Library," in red-paper covers, price sixpence, stern, ugly, and magnificently in earnest!

The particular volume of the Red Hot Library which has reached and impressed us is Commissioner Dowdle, the Saved Railway Guard, by Commissioner Railton. One can smile the superior smile of indulgence at the title-page, but nobody who admires force and singleness could possibly condescend patronisingly towards the actual contents of the book. The biography is a document of genuine interest. There is no question of any literary performance, of the various arts and wiles of the penman. Commissioner Railton's sole object is to get the stuff down on the paper, somehow, anyhow. He revels in the abundance of his material, and never wastes a word. Subject is everything with him, treatment nothing. This is not literature; it is soul-saving, a contrivance to keep you out of hell, and despatch you to glory. Naught else matters in all the world, but the fear of hell. Commissioner Railton would certainly have no patience with people who chattered about art, while one soul was left on the broad road. And if you told him that he wrote much better prose than many novelists, he would probably regard you as tedious. If you said that this life of James Dowdle was a remarkable piece of work, he would, no doubt, refer you to his apostrophe on p. 110: "Oh, that God may raise at least a few readers of the story to be proper Blood and Fire followers of the Saved Railway Guard!" One is not in the least surprised at his enthusiasm for James Dowdle, for James Dowdle was an astonishing man. The recital of his career makes you forget even the absurdity of that name—Dowdle. As a youth he played the bass-viol for the Church of England. Then he went to London in service of the Great Western, and took to evil courses. After some "weeks of agony" he was converted at a religious service held by a converted actor in a music-hall. He slid back, however, once or twice, and it was not till the age of thirty-two that he appeared publicly as the agent of God among sinners. From this time henceforward his God, that exceedingly anthropomorphic conception of the Salvation Army, directed his activities. One is bound to admit that the man was never left in the lurch. He kept an intermittent diary, which is full of the superior influence: "The hall was full at six. At 6.30 perfect jam. Preached. The power of God rested upon the meeting. Three souls professed conversion." Again: "Monday, Nov. 10th—Felt rather Mondayish. Visited several. God is working. Took tea with Mr. S———, an old saint that has prayed much for Kettering. Seventy-nine years of age Happy in the Saviour. Hallelujah!" Again: "My faith seems stronger Band meeting. Good attendance. Speakers too long. May God give us point and power." Mrs. Dowdle helped efficiently in these meetings. She writes: "I had often to put some out, and if I did it there was no row; but if any man tried, there would be a fight. So I just used to stick my knuckles into their neck, and out they would have to go." And after this the Diary proceeds: "Chatham. I desire to be like a flame of fire here . . . Lord give us power!" "Open air, very cold, but the people listened." That was at 10 a.m., but an hour later, when "Mr. M. preached at the Lecture Hall, the people were very restless." We like the following, at 3 p.m. on the same day: "Mrs. Booth preached. Body of the Hall full. They heard the truth for once." On his thirty-third birthday he writes: "My desire is to be all for God, and to spend and be spent for God in winning souls, and for this make me wise." Over twenty years later comes this entry: "My 55th birthday—a reconsecration of myself to God for His service. This last year we have held 521 indoor meetings, besides open-air meetings, and marches, and demonstrations; 2,403 seeking God at the penitent-form; travelled 8,820 miles by rail and water, spending six weeks with The General in his Australian Campaign, being in 84 indoor meetings, and travelling 3,195 miles; making a grand total this year of 12,015 miles and 605 meetings." On which Commissioner Railton comments, with the brutal directness characteristic of the Army: "Suppose your last fighting year has ended, have you left any tales of victory for God that will do anybody good to read? If not, may God bless this story to you!"

God comes into every sentence, and every sentence shows the trust of the Army in God's special alertness on its behalf. Here is an instance: An officer wanted a certain Town Hall for a certain night, and announced the meeting. But the hall had been previously hired for a secular entertainment. "All that night, unable to sleep, the officer wandered the floor, praying." The next day a delay on the railway made it impossible for the agent of the entertainment company to carry out his contract. "So delighted was the officer . . . that he praised God aloud . . ." Whereupon the agent remarked—and it is difficult not to sympathise with him—"I wish God would let my engagements alone."

Digitized by Google

It was in the streets that James Dowdle seems most brightly to have shone. He formed the habit of stopping in mid-street for silent prayer. The stones which inevitably greeted him he calmly ignored, and his reply to the curious Bradford gentleman, who asked him what he meant to accomplish by this silent prayer, is unforgettable: "Raise the dead!" he said. Nothing could abash him. He said to a light woman: "We want you to go to Heaven, for there is no happiness in sin," and the light woman succinctly answered, "Not much," a retort which might have discouraged Dwight L. Moody himself. But Dowdle replied: "The wages of sin is death," whereupon the woman burst into tears. He followed her to her room, and shortly she was converted. "What do you know about what God says?" demanded an angry adulterer in the street. Dowdle answered: "I know He says 'Marriage is honourable in all, and the bed undefiled; but whoremongers and adulterers God will judge." The adulterer's face fell before Dowdle's solemn gaze, and "he walked silently away." He must have had an extraordinary way with cabmen. When the Dowdles removed to 37, Mayola-road, Clapton (three rooms), this entry occurs in the Diary: "The cabman who brought us got saved in the passage—the first trophy in this new house. Praise God!" The catalogue of such episodes might be continued indefinitely.

Towards the end of the volume are a number of letters written to Dowdle by his "affectionate general." We like them; they show the man. He writes on the voyage to India: "Have I not thought of you? Of course I have. And do I not pray for you, and all my comrades who are at the battle's front? Of course I do. And I know you remember me before the Throne O Lord, have mercy on the littleness of our faith! And help us to open wide our mouths . . . We must go ahead faster. We don't believe in ourselves half enough, and we don't believe in God hardly at all." And thus, when Dowdle was ill: "I hope He comforts and keeps you—and dear Mrs. Dowdle. I have prayed for you. I have asked Him to heal you. He must. I am middling in health. I keep at it. Yours very busy, but very sincerely." And later: "Now, we are all praying for you. You are in God's hands; He keeps your heart in peace. The cleansing blood is applied—all will be well. Much love to Mrs. Dowdle. Pray for me, and believe for me as well. We are lost for want of faith. Believe me, yours, determined to believe through thick and thin, William Booth." "Nothing will do," says the General in another letter, "without the Holy Ghost. We must push the spiritual side of things this autumn. Oh, that I had a thousand tongues, and a thousand lives! But I have not. Keep believing, and working, and saving; and always think of me as Your Affectionate General." The letters of the late Mrs. Booth are equally striking. We have noted particularly the epistle to the Oldham Corps, written with her dying hand: "My comrades, as I lie here, just outside the gate of the City, looking back on the path upon which I have been travelling for so many years gone by, I find nothing that gives me real satisfaction but what has been done in God, and for God, and for the benefit and blessing of the poor dying world Good-bye. I will meet you in the Morning.—Yours, washed in the Blood of the Lamb." We say this is fine. We say it is not grotesque, despite the atrocious image—that image which seems to have a sinister fascination for all militant Christianity.

The saved railway guard died last year, aged fifty-nine. "'Hold me up!' he said; and the Brigadier raised him a little—but it was only to see him go 'up higher,' to the eternal welcome." The General telegraphed to his widow, "He has fought a good fight and won the crown." We think so. We shall remember Dowdle as a man who, amidst a world of despicable dilletantism, was in earnest about something. The phenomenon is rare. We can almost envy him his funeral procession, with the Flag on the coffin, and his cap and fiddle on the Flag, and the five thousand who wept at the grave. This is fame. After all, what is culture? Not exactly all in all. Creeds are dying, and what creeds shall follow them? The sea of faith withdraws. Only the Dowdles find depth in it now. They triumph by the very insolence of their faith. Once when "Mrs. D." was in trouble over her washing, Mr. Dowdle said: "Don't you think the Lord is as much concerned about it as you are?" Such an intimate possession of such a Lord—and "Dover Beach" would never have been written.

The book is as fierce as the Crusades. Jagged fragments of it stick themselves into the mind in the most absurd manner. Among these is the author's rude query on p. 78: "Do you ever go anywhere out of your usual pathway to do anybody any good?"

To a Tudor Tune.

When all the little hills are hid in snow,
And all the small brown birds by frost are slain,
And sad and slow the silly sheep do go,
All seeking shelter to and fro,
Come once again,
To these familiar, silent, misty lands,
Unlatch the lockless door,
And cross the drifted floor,
Ignite the waiting, ever-willing brands,
And warm thy frozen hands,
By the old flame once more.
Ah, heart's desire, once more by the old fire, stretch out thy hands.

Ford M. Hueffer.

A Night Piece.

But, of those better tides of dark and melancholy,
When one's abroad in a field, the night very deep, very holy,
The turf very sodden a-foot, walking heavy, the small ring of light,
Of the lanthorn one carries, a-swinging to left and to right,
Revealing a flicker of hedge-row, a flicker of rushes—and night
Ev'rywhere; ev'rywhere sleep and a hushing to sleep—
I know that I never shall utter the uttermost secrets aright,
They lie so deep.

Ford M. Hueffer.

Digitized by Google

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 101 (New Series).

Last week we offered a prize for the best set of new coined words likely to be helpful in literary criticism. Perhaps this task was ill-suited to the languors of August. We have received very few replies, and these are more conspicuous for reckless humour than for serious invention. The best list, however, does not fall under this criticism, though in its own kind it is, perhaps, a little alarming. To the sender, Mr. H. G. Turner, 20, Camden-street, Oakley-square, a cheque for One Guinea has been sent.

Mr. Turner's list is as follows:

Phonoscribe—a writer who uses the phonograph.
Phonoscribed—spoken into a phonograph.
Noisicrucians—writers of the sensational religious novel.
Sangferratic—tending to blood and iron; writing of the Kipling order.
Grapomania—excessive Omarism.
Scriptograde—rate of writing.
Monotonist—a writer of uninspired verse.

From other papers sent in we take the following proposed words:

Shamorist—the writer of imaginary love-letters and confessions.
Jamian—pertaining to the school of Henry James: Mrs. Edith Wharton is a Jamian writer.
Mudistic—writing with an eye to success at the circulating libraries: instances are too numerous to mention. From this root we also get Mudiolatry, Mudism, &c.
Fictioneer—a writer of "machine-made" fiction.
Jingler—a would-be poet with more rhyme than reason.
Lullery—prosy, ineffective writing.
Magazinist—the average reader (usually as a term of contempt).

One competitor throws his list into paragraph form as follows:

As a poet the critics sometimes called him a minim, sometimes a hardlet; later on he achieved the dignity of a Thrushling. In prose he attempted birrelling, and succeeded in cultivating macaulayflowers in a fascicle of historical studies. He wrote a play which failed, though he introduced the charley-antics of the farcical histrion. He courted the weeklies, who by prizes encourage lotterytwre; as a toady of celebrities in the Society papers he was a thorough Bozzytwist. In his monograph on the Bard of Avon he adopted the shaconistic hypothesis. Always something of a Whitmaniac, in his diction he tried to steer between the Scylla of Pater-patter and the Charybdis of Carlylese. On Sundays his churchmanity was undeniable, and he eschewed Byronic nature-worship and the blue-domer religionists.

Competition No. 102 (New Series).

We offer a prize of One Guinea for the best prose eulogy of The Tomato. Not to exceed 250 words.

Rules.

Answers, addressed, "Literary Competition, The Academy, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, September 4. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

An American Transport in the Crimean War.

By Capt. CODMAN.

In this work Capt. Codman relates his experiences of an American Chartered Transport in the Crimean War..... The Crimean War is the connecting link between old and modern methods of warfare.

Frontispiece. 198 pp. Price 3s. 6d.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON & CO.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY AND AFTER.

No. 295.—SEPTEMBER, 1901.

THE IRISH NUISANCE and HOW TO ABATE IT. By Edward Dicey, C.B.

LORD ROSEBERY'S ESCAPE from HOUNDSDITCH. By Sidney Webb.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY and the CORONATION. (With Plans.) By Somers Clarke, F.S.A. (Architect to St. Paul's Cathedral).

THE FIRST BRITISH SETTLERS in SOUTH AFRICA. By the Rev. Dr. Wirgman (Canon of Grahamstown Cathedral).

RECENT SCIENCE. By Prince Kropotkin.

INTERNATIONAL BOAT-RACING. By W. B. Woodgate (ex-Amateur Champion of the Thames).

LORD LYTTON'S NOVELS. By Walter Frewen Lord.

THE SIEGES of DERRY and LIMERICK. By Henry Mangan.

SKETCHES in a NORTHERN TOWN. By Mrs. Henry Birchenhaugh.

ASSUMING the FOUNDATIONS. (Concluded.) By the Hon. Auberon Herbert.

"TENNIS." By His Excellency Mons. Jusserand.

AN ALTERNATIVE to KAFFIR LABOUR. By Jonkheer Van Citters.

LAST MONTH. By Sir Wemyss Reid.

London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., Ltd.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY
(LIMITED).

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per ANNUM.
LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.
COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum.
N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS
Now Offered at
GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)
Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

30 to 34, NEW OXFORD STREET:
241, Brompton Road, S.W: 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C., LONDON;
And at Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

THE OLDEST AND BEST (1901 EDITION).

DEBRETT'S PEERAGE.
DEBRETT'S BARONETAGE.
DEBRETT'S KNIGHTAGE.
DEBRETT'S COMPANIONAGE
(Illustrated and Increased to 1,950 pp.)

Including all recent Honours and an Appendix of Royal Warrant Holders. Royal Edition, complete work, 31s. 6d., cloth gilt; or Library Edition, 2 vols., 16s. 6d. each.

ALSO

DEBRETT'S HOUSE OF COMMONS AND THE JUDICIAL BENCH.
(Illustrated. 450 pp.)

Gives particulars of results at last two General Elections and at all Bye-Elections, Biographies of M.P.'s, Judges of High Courts, County Courts and Colonies, Recorders, &c., &c. Cloth gilt, 7s 6d.

DEAN & SON, Limited, 160A, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

NOW READY.

Was Alfred King of England?

By A SAXON.

Demy 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

A brief review of one of our latest text-books, showing the true relations of Prince Alfred both to the Saxon people in England and to her Roman invaders.

HARRISON & SONS, Publishers, 59, Pall Mall, S.W.

THE OLDEST AND BEST (1901 EDITION).

DEBRETT'S PEERAGE.
DEBRETT'S BARONETAGE.
DEBRETT'S KNIGHTAGE.
DEBRETT'S COMPANIONAGE.

(Illustrated and increased to 1,950 pp.)

Including all recent Honours and an Appendix of Royal Warrant Holders.

Royal Edition, complete work, 31s. 6d., cloth gilt; or Library Edition, 2 vols., 16s. 6d. each.

ALSO

DEBRETT'S HOUSE OF COMMONS AND THE JUDICIAL BENCH.

(Illustrated. 450 pp.)

Gives particulars of results at last two General Elections and at all Bye-Elections, Biographies of M.P.'s, Judges of High Courts, County Courts and Colonies, Recorders, &c, &c. Cloth gilt, 7s. 6d.

DEAN & SON, LIMITED, 160A, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

"The Thrush."

Edited by MULLETT ELLIS.

"THE THRUSH," a Periodical for original Poetry, is intended to bring thoughts of beauty and the consolation of exalted ideas into the hearts of the people.

Since its origin, on the first day of the new Century, "THE THRUSH" has published many beautiful Poems by the following writers:—

Dr. Richard Garnett, W. E. Henley, F. Prevost Battersby, Keble Howard, Harold Begbie, A. P. Graves, Nora Hopper, L. Alma-Tadema, Norman Gale, C. W. Wynne, Dr. Gilbert Murray, John Hutchinson, Hon. Albania Brodrick, Arthur Symons, N. Carruthers Gould, Clifton Bingham, Lady Margaret Sackville, Hamilton Aidé, Edgar Fawcett, Lady Gilbert, Lady Florence Douglas, Rev. W. J. Dawson, Rev. F. Bentley Greeves, Victor Plarr, Sir Wyke Bayliss, P.R.I., the 1st Lord Lytton, and Mullett Ellis.

In future numbers we are promised the work of many of the leading Poets of our day, including the Right Rev. Lord Bishop of Derry and Raphoe, Dean of Armagh, the Rev. Canon H. D. Rawnsley, Herbert Morrah, Israel Gollancz, M.A., Wm. Canton, Edwin Hamilton, M.A., Justin Huntly McCarthy, Dollie Radford, Louise Chandler Moulton, Sir Lewis Morris, M.A., Frankfort Moore, and Thomas Hardy.

"THE THRUSH" for September contains the Ode of Welcome to the Trades Union Congress by Sir LEWIS MORRIS.

The Rules for a Prize Poem Competition, open to Subscribers to "THE THRUSH," are contained in the August Number.

THE FIRST PRIZE IS £10 STERLING.

See "THE THRUSH."

By order at all Booksellers'.

SELECTIONS FROM

ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD'S PUBLICATIONS.

WORKS BY DR. MACLAREN.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 5s. each, post free.

THE GOD of the AMEN, and other Sermons.

THE WEARIED CHRIST, and other Sermons.

THE BEATITUDES, and other Sermons.

THE UNCHANGING CHRIST, and other Sermons.

CHRIST'S "MUSTS," and other Sermons.

London: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, Limited, 21 and 22, Furnival Street, Holborn, W.C.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING, A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.
THE NORFOLK BROADS.
BRECON and its BEACONS.
ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.
THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.
THE ISLE OF WIGHT.
THE WYE VALLEY.
THE SEVERN VALLEY.
BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.
BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.
LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR, LLANFAIRFECHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON.
ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.
CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, & FESTINIOG.
BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and PWLLHELI.
MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, & CHELTENHAM.
LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.
NORWICH, LOWESTOFT, YARMOUTH, and the NORFOLK BROADS.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.
"It very emphatically tops them all."—Daily Graphic.
"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 5s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT, & Co. Ltd., The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers.
Paris and New York: BRENTANO'S.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S NEW BOOKS.

"RITA'S" NEW NOVEL.

A JILT'S JOURNAL. By "Rita," Author of "Vanity," "The Confessions of a Court Modiste," &c. (Unwin's Green Cloth Library.) 6s.

New Book by the Author of "The Treasure Seekers."

NINE UNLIKELY TALES for CHILDREN. Told by E. NESBIT. Pictured by H. R. MILLAR. Cloth, 6s.

A STORY FOR GIRLS.

MARGARET HETHERTON. By E. L. KIESOW. With Frontispiece. Cloth, 5s.

JOSEPHINE, EMPRESS of the FRENCH. By FREDERICK A. OBER. Fully Illustrated. Cloth, 7s. 6d. net.
A Life of Josephine, presenting her childhood as well as her brilliant and tragic womanhood, and containing a collection of letters that passed between Josephine and Napoleon.

FROM SQUIRE to PRINCE. Being the History of the House of Cirksena. By WALTER PHELPS DODGE. Author of "Piers Gaveston," &c. Illustrated. Cloth, 10s. 6d.

AMELIA E. BARR'S NEW NOVEL.

SOULS of PASSAGE. By the Author of "The Maid of Maiden Lane," &c. (Unwin's Green Cloth Library.) 6s.

A NEW BOOK BY LOUIS BECKE.

BY ROCK and POOL; or, An Austral Shore. By the Author of "By Reef and Palm," &c. (Unwin's Green Cloth Library.) 6s.

BARRY PAIN'S NEW BOOK.

DE OMNIBUS. By the Conductor (Barry PAIN). Cloth, 2s.; paper, 1s.

London: T. FISHER UNWIN, Paternoster Square, E.C.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED).

SUBSCRIPTIONS for 3 Months, 6 Months, and 12 Months

CAN BE ENTERED AT ANY DATE.

THE BEST and MOST POPULAR BOOKS of the SEASON ARE NOW in CIRCULATION.

Prospectuses of Terms free on application.

BOOK SALE DEPARTMENT.

Many Thousand Surplus Copies of Books always ON SALE (Second Hand). Also a large Selection of

BOOKS IN LEATHER BINDINGS

SUITABLE FOR

BIRTHDAY AND WEDDING PRESENTS.

30 to 34, NEW OXFORD STREET;

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C., LONDON;

And at 10-12, Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

TO

"THE ACADEMY,"

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

Digitized by Google

MESSRS. METHUEN'S LIST.

Messrs. METHUEN have much pleasure in announcing that they will publish on OCTOBER 18

THE LIFE OF ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

By GRAHAM BALFOUR. Demy 8vo, 2 vols., 25s. net.

This highly important Work is the authoritative life of Mr. Stevenson, and has been written by Mr. Balfour at the request of Mr. Stevenson's family. As the demand for it will be very great, orders should be placed with the Booksellers at once.

Messrs. METHUEN have much pleasure in announcing that they will publish on SEPTEMBER 13 a long and highly important Novel, entitled

THE HISTORY OF SIR RICHARD CALMADY.

By LUCAS MALET, Author of "The Wages of Sin," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

As there will be a considerable demand for this Book, Messrs. METHUEN suggest that the public place their orders with the Booksellers without delay. In view of the almost certain wish of a large number of the public to possess an Edition of this Book, somewhat more luxurious than the ordinary Edition, Messrs. METHUEN have arranged to print a small Edition in two volumes at 12s.

METHUEN'S POPULAR NOVELS.—SIX SHILLINGS each.

FORTUNE'S DARLING.	WALTER RAYMOND.	Sept. 3
The YEAR ONE.	J. BLOUNDELLE-BURTON.	Sept. 3
ROYAL GEORGIE.	S. BARING-GOULD.	Sept. 6
RICKERBY'S FOLLY.	TOM GALLON.	Sept. 10
SIR RICHARD CALMADY.	LUCAS MALET.	Sept. 13
MASTER of MEN.	E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM.	Sept. 20
A GALLANT QUAKER.	MARGARET ROBERTON.	Oct. 1
CLEMENTINA.	A. E. W. MASON.	Oct. 2
The ALIEN.	F. F. MONTRESSOR.	Oct. 2
TALES of DUNSTABLE WEIR.	ZACK.	Oct. 4
ANGEL.	Mrs. B. M. CROKER.	Oct. 4
LIGHT FREIGHTS. (3s. 6d.)	W. W. JACOBS.	Oct. 11
CHRISTINA McNAB.	Miss S. MACNAUGHTAN.	Oct. 11
A FOOL'S YEAR.	E. H. COOPER.	Oct. 18
The EMBARRASSING ORPHAN.	W. E. NORRIS.	Oct. 18
The PROPHET of BERKELEY SQUARE.	ROBERT HICHENS.	Oct. 25
FANCY FREE.	EDEN PHILLPOTTS.	Nov. 6

GENERAL LITERATURE.

The LETTERS of LORD CHESTERFIELD to his SON. Edited, with an Introduction, by C. Strachey, and Notes by A. CALTHORP. 2 vols., crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s. each. This is the most complete edition ever published, and gives the authentic text as it left the hands of its author.

"For excellence of topography, lightness in the hand, and scholarly revision, this edition is a worthy sequel to Dr. Birkbeck Hill's 'Memoirs of Gibbon,' and higher praise could not be given."—Morning Leader.

The MALVERN COUNTRY. By B. C. A. Windle, D.Sc., F.R.S. Illustrated by E. H. New. Pott 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 3s.; leather, 3s. 6d. net. [THE LITTLE GUIDES.

A BOOK of BRITTANY. By S. Baring-Gould. With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Uniform in scope and size with Mr. Baring-Gould's well-known books on Devon, Cornwall, and Dartmoor.

"Full of interesting matter, of gossip and antiquarian lore."—Literature.

FICTION.

A NEW NOVEL BY JOHN OLIVER HOBBES.

The SERIOUS WOOING. By John Oliver Hobbes, Author of "Robert Orange." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The book describes in brilliant fashion a characteristic page of modern social life with no little spirit and vivacity. It is full of good things."—Daily Telegraph.

"A constant flow of bright and lively talk. The most vivacious story that she has written."—Globe. "Entertaining from beginning to end."—Morning Post.

"Worked out with a singular cleverness and with masterly insight into character. The whole story is admirably written, and will achieve even greater popularity than any of its predecessors."—Punch.

"Mrs. Craigie is as brilliant as she ever has been; her characters are all illuminated with sparkling gems of description, and the conversation scintillates with an almost bewildering blaze."—Athenæum.

A WOMAN ALONE. By Mrs. W. K. Clifford, Author of "Aunt Anne." Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

"A book for which one is grateful. There are charming flashes of humour."—Morning Post.

The THIRTEEN EVENINGS. By George Bartram, Author of "The People of Clopton." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The stories impress us by their full-bloodedness. They have unflagging vivacity and carry us along in thunderous style."—Manchester Guardian.

JOHN TOPP, PIRATE. By Weatherby Chesney. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A good, breezy, sailory story, made for reading from cover to cover."—Outlook.

"It is well written, with that swing and dash which the subject seems to demand."—Glasgow Herald.

A GREAT LADY. By Adeline Sergeant, Author of "The Story of a Penitent Soul." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"There is much skill in the study of the female characters and the story is attractive."—Manchester Courier.

BOTH SIDES of the VEIL. By Richard Marsh, Author of "The Seen and the Unseen." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Here we have Mr. Marsh at his best."—Globe. "Quite engrossing."—Morning Leader. "All the stories are clever and ingenious."—Glasgow Herald.

MARY HAMILTON. By Lord Ernest Hamilton. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Will attract a multitude of admirers."—Daily Telegraph.

The WOOING of SHEILA. By Grace Rhys. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A really fine book; a book that deserves to live. Sheila is the sweetest heroine who has lived in a novelist's pages for many a day. Every scene and every incident has the impress of truth. It is a masterly romance, and one that should be widely read and appreciated."—Morning Leader.

"A remarkable study of Irish life."—Irish Times.

The SKIRTS of HAPPY CHANCE. By H. B. Marriott Watson. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Holds our attention completely."—World.

"The hero has a freshness, cynicism, and an engaging impudence which are admirably portrayed."—Saturday Review.

The STRIKING HOURS. By Eden Phillpotts, Author of "Children of the Mist," "Sons of the Morning," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Admirable both in conception and execution, and can do nothing but add to Mr. Phillpotts's high reputation."—Morning Post.

The DEVASTATORS. By Ada Cambridge, Author of "Path and Goal." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The plot chosen is a powerful and suggestive one. In choice of characters the authoress borders on genuine artistic achievement."—Academy.

The MILLION. By Dorothea Gerard, Author of "The Supreme Crime," "The Conquest of London," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

FROM the LAND of the SHAMROCK. By Jane Barlow. Crown 8vo, 6s.

MESSRS. METHUEN will send their NEW BOOK GAZETTE post free on application.

METHUEN & CO., 36, Essex Street, W.C.

Digitized by Google

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1531. Established 1869. 7 September, 1901. Price Threepence.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

Next week, following our September custom, we shall publish a supplement dealing with educational subjects and text-books.

We have pleasure in announcing that many of the "Enquiry" articles which have appeared in the Academy during the past two years are to be published in book form by Mr. Grant Richards. Their author, Mr. E. A. Bennett, has himself practised the crafts of the novelist and the playwright, and we need not at this date extol the vigour and originality of his articles on fiction. Among the authors he has dealt with are Miss Braddon, Mr. J. M Barrie, Madame Sarah Grand, Miss Marie Corelli, Mr. George Gissing, and Mr. George Moore.

We are glad to learn that Mrs. Meynell, who is about to travel in the United States and Mexico, will contribute to the Pall Mall Gazette impressions of her journeyings.

The handsomest and most interesting book that the week has brought us is Messrs. Macmillan's issue of Walter Pater's Essays from the Guardian. The delicate green cover and gold acanthus design are, of course, uniform with the new complete "édition de luxe" issued by the same publishers. The volume consists of nine papers, which originally appeared anonymously. It may be of interest to give a list of the contents, and the dates on which they appeared in the Guardian:

1. English Literature: Four Books for Students of English Literature, February 17, 1886.
2. Amiel's Journal Intime, March 17, 1886.
3. Browning, November 9, 1887.
4. Robert Elsmere, March 28, 1888.
5. Their Majesties' Servants, Annals of the English Stage, from Thomas Betterton to Edmund Kean. By Dr. Doran. June 27, 1888.
6. Wordsworth, February 27, 1889.
7. Mr. Gosse's Poems, On Viol and Flute, October 29, 1890.
8. Ferdinand Fabre, Norine, June 12, 1889.
9. The Contes of M. Augustin Filon, July 16, 1890.

Since we wrote the foregoing paragraph, the supremacy in this week's publications of Mr. Pater's Essays has been challenged by the arrival of the first volume of Mr. Augustine Birrell's long-expected edition of Boswell's Johnson. The book is neatness itself in its maroon buckram cover and its white paper title-label. The page is a pretty one. We advance to the Life through 64 pages of preliminary matter. First we have a Preface by Mr. Ernest Radford, which we should have thought scarcely fulfils the duties of a preface, since it is really an essay on portraits of Dr. Johnson, Boswell, and their friends. We gather, indeed, from the title-page that Mr. Radford's share in the edition is limited to the selection of portraits. These will be a very strong feature. Following this "preface" comes an eighteen-page introduction by Mr. Birrell. This is followed by Boswell's dedication to Sir Joshua Reynolds, and the "Advertisements" to the first five editions of his immortal work. Then, and then only, do we reach Bozzy's fine opening sentence: "To write the Life of him who excelled all mankind in writing the lives of others, and who, whether we consider his extraordinary endowments, or his various works, has been equalled by few in any age, is an arduous, and may be reckoned in me a presumptuous task."

Referring to a paragraph which recently appeared in an American contemporary, in which it was stated that a party of pilgrims, on a visit to Mr. Thomas Hardy, "found that the Wessex country was not intrinsically romantic and beautiful, but could only move as viewed through the illusions produced by the novelist," Mr. Hardy has addressed the following letter to C. K. S., of the Sphere:

> "This statement is rather unfair to Wessex, and, indeed, quite inaccurate, as will be evident when it is explained that the party of visitors did not go near the 'intrinsically romantic' spots imperfectly described in the novels, but, like almost all tourists, adhered for the most part to the London highway and the branch highway passing through the heath district, which is rather impressive and lonely than 'romantic' or 'beautiful.' Had they, for instance, visited Shaston or Shaftesbury, Bullbarrow, Nettlecombe Tout, Dogberry Hill, High Stoy, Cross in Hand, Bubb Down Hill, Toller Down, Wynyard's Gap, and a dozen other such places for inland scenery, and the coast cliffs between Swanage and Lyme Regis for marine, such a remark could not have been made. But then, most of these spots lie miles out of the regular way, and few of them can be reached except on foot. The pilgrims were not absent from London much more than twelve hours altogether, returning there the same evening; and it is utterly impossible to see the recesses of this county in such a manner, not to mention those adjoining."

Congratulations to the Bookman on completing ten years of its life. Dr. Robertson Nicoll, its editor, gives an account of the inception of the magazine. It is interesting to learn that the late Professor Drummond urged that Literature should be adopted as the title, as being rounder, fuller, and more dignified. In recalling the services of many distinguished contributors, whose portraits run along the tops of the pages like a frieze, Dr. Nicoll mentions that from the beginning Miss Annie Macdonell, known as the writer of a monograph on Thomas Hardy, has assisted him in the editorship. To the second number Walter Pater sent a critical article which was probably the last criticism he ever wrote. Mr. J. E. Hodder Williams has also rendered excellent aid of late years as assistant editor. Finally, Dr. Nicoll makes an interesting, though, at present, somewhat vague, announcement, as follows:

> Other projects are in view. To those who have seriously engaged in it literary history is the most fascinating of all studies; but in the literary history of England there is still much to be accomplished. Already I have planned a history of English literature which will first be published in connection with the Bookman, probably in monthly parts, and will be issued in two or three years from this time. For this many novel features have been arranged. It is a dream of mine to establish a quarterly wholly devoted to English literary history and criticism. Such an organ is greatly needed for the publication of texts, the discussion of problems, the making known of discoveries. Many figures in our literature ought to be deliberately re-estimated. Such an organ cannot, in the nature of things, bring much money to anyone connected with it; but I think that, in the British Empire and in America, a constituency could be found numerous enough to provide against loss. I shall greatly value communications on this subject, and shall do my best to answer them.

Digitized by Google

Commenting on Mr. Alfred Nutt's letter to ourselves, in a recent issue, on the relations between literature and success, Mr. Andrew Lang criticises Mr. Nutt's contention that there have always been successes among bad books. Mr. Nutt doubted if Dickens sold so well as G. P. R. James and Harrison Ainsworth. On this point, says Mr. Lang, > statistics are not perhaps to be procured, unless the publishers of James and Ainsworth look over their old books and accounts in the interests of science. But Forster's Life of Dickens certainly seems to imply that the successes of the author of Pickwick were infinitely greater than those of the authors of The Tower of London, and of—well, I don't know what G. P. R. James did write. As to Reynolds (I am no better seen in Reynolds), his was a subterranean success. Nobody called his work "literature." He was not perused by the class which now lays down its six shillings for a novel by the authors who are censured by the Quarterly Review. Deans did not give readings to ladies from the works of Reynolds, nor of G. P. R. J. These gentlemen were not recommended or denounced in sermons. They were not, like the foes of the Quarterly to-day, looked on as oracles in matters of social philosophy, science, and religion. The great popular novelists whom the educated classes read were Scott, Dickens, Thackeray, Bulwer Lytton, George Eliot, and Kingsley.

A correspondent writes on books for Dante readers: "Messrs. Methuen have almost ready Mr. Toynbee's Dante Studies and Researches; and although the volume is made up principally of articles which have appeared before in English or Continental reviews, yet even those who are familiar with them will be glad to have them collected into a single volume, and, of course, to others the book will be new. Another book, of which Messrs. Wicksteed and Gardner are the authors, will treat of the correspondence between Virgilio and Dante, and much other related matter, and will include, besides introduction, critical text of the Latin verses, translation and notes, the literary remains of Virgilio and Musatto. Also Dr. Elsner's translation of the 'Purgatorio' will be published shortly by Dent's, completing their edition of the comedy. It is to be hoped that the editors of this series will continue their good work, and give us translations of the 'Convito,' 'De Vulgari Eloquentia,' and the 'Vita Nuova.' Altogether disproportionate attention is bestowed by editors upon the 'Commedia,' to the almost complete neglect of the minor works. Now that we are in a Dante floodtide, may we hope that it will bring, before ebbing, some non-Comedic studies?"

Mr. Fortescue, Keeper of Printed Books at the British Museum, has been telling the Library Association that "there is always a tendency among such as are close to the abyss of insanity to cleave to the public library." This has reminded a contemporary of the evidence given by Carlyle before a Commission on the British Museum, which sat fifty years ago. Said that writer of books, "There are several persons who come to read in the British Museum in a state of imbecility. They are sent there by their friends to pass away their time. I remember there was one gentleman who used to blow his nose very loudly every half hour. I inquired who he was, and I was informed that he was a mad person sent by his friends. He made extracts out of books and puddled away his time there."

Apropos of insanity and reading, the bibliomaniac is certainly sometimes a kleptomaniac. Under the heading of "Losses," in a report to the State Library of Kansas, its late librarian writes:

> All the world over there are more or less kleptomaniacs among bibliomaniacs. The disease spreads in all seasons of the year, and in all climates with equal facility. Persons exposed to old libraries containing many rare books filled with choice plates and illustrations, seem most liable to the contagion. The symptoms of the disease are so variable that it is difficult to detect it, and it often requires long and patient watching to make the proper diagnosis. It may be chronic in the least suspected individual. The mild-mannered gentleman of middle age, with a bald head, whose language is precise and cultivated, and who is a zealous student of some scientific specialty, may be in the worst stages of the malady, and the librarian not know it until too late. This is but one specimen of the bookworm that destroys more than he devours. Nothing approaching a specific has ever been discovered for this devastating disease. Probably the nearest to it is detection, trial, conviction, and speedy execution.

The writer then proceeds to set forth the missing items and concludes as follows:

> It seems an incongruous collection for purposes of larceny The party in pursuit of knowledge under difficulties, who purloined Mr. Young's work on The Conduct, Manners, &c., of the Most Refined Society, will scarcely find in it a precedent for this act. Dillon on the Removal of Causes might have suggested its removal; but the moral hunger of the man who abstracted the Revised New Testament is something appalling.

In the New York Times Saturday Review Mr. J. C. Evans continues his reminiscences of Thackeray, whom he met, among other places, at the Garrick Club.

> He told some curious stories of his American experiences, one of them being of a waiter at the Planters' Hotel in St. Louis, who nudged a fellow-servitor and said to him, in a hoarse whisper: "See that man?" "Yes, who's he?" "That's the great Thacker." "Hell! What's he done?" "D——d if I know."

Thackeray appears to have had a passion for the American oyster, and frequently feasted on what Mr. Evans calls "the gentle substance of that marine concretion."

The same paper prints an interview with Mr. George Moore, who delivered himself of these astonishing remarks:

> There can be no revival of English literature, for the simple reason that the medium through which it must speak is not capable of revivification; the English language is dead, just as surely as the Latin and Greek languages are dead. . . . There has never been a really good English novel written; they are all simply about classes, not about humanity.

Asked by the interviewer whether he would not except Thackeray's novels, Mr. Moore replied:

> Thackeray? Certainly not. The way one thinks of Thackeray is carving a round of beef, after piously giving thanks for belonging to the glorious Brixton Empire, with its highly respectable standards of tradesman's morality.

If Mr. Moore really believes that the English language is dead he has our profound sympathy in his efforts to resuscitate the Irish.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Dooley has been translating Lord Kitchener's Proclamation to the Boers. His version is not unfair, though it is farcical, hitting:

> Lord Kitchener wrote th' notice. He's a good writer. "Ladies an' Gintlemen," he says, "this war as a war is now over. Ye may not know it, but it's so. Ye've broke th' rules, an' we give th' fight to oursilves on a foul. Th' first principle iv a war again England is that th' inimy shall wear r-red or purple coats with black marks f'r to indicate the location iv vital organs be day an' a locomotive headlight be night. They shall thin gather within aisy range an' at th' wurrud 'Fire!' shall fall down dead. Anny remainin' standin' aftherward will be considhered as spies. Shootin' back is not allowed be th' rules, an' is severely discountenanced be our ladin' military authorities. Any attimpt at concealmint is treachery. Th' scand'lous habit iv pluggin' our gallant sojers from behind rocks an' trees is a breach iv internaytional law. Rethreatin' when pursooed is wan iv our copyrighted manoovers, an' all infringmints will be prosecuted. At a wurrud fr'm us th' war is over an' we own ye'er counthry."

It is not altogether surprising that Mr. Joseph Conrad, having departed from his usual sea matter, should have found his critics somewhat bewildered over The Inheritors. In a long letter to the New York Times Saturday Review he explains the intention of the book, written, it will be remembered, in collaboration with Mr. F. M. Hueffer. We cannot enter into the broad question which Mr. Conrad opens up, but his concluding words are interesting in themselves, and may be quoted alone:

> Fiction, at the point of development at which it has arrived, demands from the writer a spirit of scrupulous abnegation. The only legitimate basis of creative work lies in the courageous recognition of all the irreconcilable antagonisms that make our life so enigmatic, so burdensome, so fascinating, so dangerous—so full of hope. They exist! And this is the only fundamental truth of fiction. Its recognition must be critical in its nature, inasmuch that in its character it may be joyous, it may be sad, it may be angry with revolt, or submissive in resignation. The mood does not matter. It is only the writer's self-forgetful fidelity to his sensations that matters. But, whatever light he flashes on it, the fundamental truth remains, and it is only in its name that the barren struggle of contradictions assumes the dignity of moral strife going on ceaselessly to a mysterious end—with our consciousness powerless but concerned sitting enthroned like a melancholy parody of eternal wisdom above the dust of the contest.

We review in this issue Mr. Caine's Eternal City. The incorrigible wag of Books of To-day and Books of To-morrow has written a "pocket version" of the story. Here are some extracts:

Prologue.

On a doorstep in Soho crouched a little Italian boy with an accordion and a monkey. As is usual in such cases, it was Christmas Eve and the boy had lost his way. He was hungry and homeless, and it was snowing as it never does on December 24 in real life. He moved further into the limelight and prepared to die. At that moment an Italian refugee Doctor fell over him.

"Corpo di Bacco!" he cried.

He looked at the boy closely.

"Italiano?" asked the Doctor.

"Si Signore."

It was enough. He led him into the house, where they were met by Roba, his tiny daughter.

"Oo a boy?" she asked.

He smiled.

"Oo me brudder?

He paled.

"Oo lub me?"

"This is rather sudden," he managed to gasp.

So are destinies moulded.

Book II.—Bona Roba.

II.

Bona Roba was a type of the fair lady who has appeared in the history of every nation since the days of Helen of Troy—one of those exquisite creatures whose lovely eyes and rosy mouth exercise a function in the State. This is as broad a hint as one can give in a ladies' magazine, without losing serial rights.

But Bona Roba's diplomatic wit and influence were alike exploded before our story begins: you will find no trace of them here.

She had raven hair worn over the forehead, a golden complexion and violet eyes—a curious blend.

.

Book V.—Love.

I.

Bona Roba was notorious in Rome, but she had but to tell the Hon. Rossi that Rome was mistaken, and he believed it. Then they went fox-hunting together.

"Oo lub me?" he said as the night fell wonderfully over the old Campagna.

The words awakened in her a memory—Soho, a cold night, a little Italian boy, an accordion, a monkey.

She saw it all.

It was Fate.

Book VII.—The Vatican.

II.

"Eminence," said the Pope one day to the chief of his staff, "may I have a word with you?"

"Holiness, you may."

"Eminence, is there any reason why a Pope, before he becomes Pope, should not have a wife and a family?"

"Holiness, none whatever. But it is not usual."

"Eminence, I thank you."

. .

III.

At that moment a ring was heard at the Vatican door.

"What is it, Eminence?"

"Holiness, the army wish to come in."

"I will go to them," said the Pontiff.

He slowly descended, and standing on the doorstep, bade the army enter and do its worst.

Not a man but wept, and, flinging aside his arms, fled away.

Book IX.—Mrs. Grundy.

I.

And Bona Roba? Alas! Young women who misbehave with Prime Ministers cannot be let off by Manx moralists. She died young.

An educational establishment is to be opened shortly in London, with the object of making the study of Russian both easy and pleasant. Hitherto, those wishing to acquire the language have had to take the usual course of lessons or reside for a time in Russia, the latter course being expensive and inconvenient to many. The new establishment for resident students will supply all the advantages of a Russian home, without certain of its inconveniences. It will give the student opportunities to converse in Russian, and will familiarise him in a practical manner with such Russian customs as would be helpful should he ultimately have to travel or reside in Russia. A house in the Anerley-road, Upper Norwood (facing the Crystal Palace), has been secured for the purpose by a Russian family which has had educational experience in Russia. Qualified native teachers will be resident in the house; all attendants, too, will be Russians, whilst the management of the house will be in the hands of an English lady. Regular courses of readings, musical and literary recitals, and other entertainments and games, will be organised, everything to be performed in Russian. Several collections characteristic of Russian art, industry, ethnography, etc., have already been acquired, and certain rooms will be fitted up in Muscovite style. There will also be a Russian library of classical authors, and current periodical papers and magazines. It is intended to receive resident students on the ordinary terms of a good boarding-house, extra charges to be made only in case individual tuition is required.

Digitized by Google

A CONTEMPORARY comments upon the fact that the libraries have declared that any novels which they circulate must have their edges cut all round. We are entirely with the libraries. The reasons which hold good with other uncut books do not, save in the rarest instances, apply to novels. Most novels, to say the least, are ephemeral, and are not likely to need rebinding. It has always appeared to us most unwise in publishers to issue uncut fiction, and it is certainly unfair to young and unknown writers. The book which one likes to cut and linger over in the process is not the novel; and, after all, the value of novels to the bookseller cannot be much affected either way. It is a question which public convenience should decide, and there is no doubt that the public prefers its light literature cut.

EVERYTHING nowadays comes under the eye of the specialist—tailors go to the Academy to criticise pictures, and genealogists pick holes in novels. Mr. Anthony Hope, it appears, according to a writer in the Genealogical Magazine, went to an actual case in the Peerage books for the groundwork of Tristram of Blent, but failed to understand just why his hero was illegitimate. It is a nice point, but Mr. Hope's genealogy and law are near enough for the ordinary reader.

MESSRS BELL are to publish this month a biography and study of Professor Hubert von Herkomer, by Mr. A. L. Baldry. The volume is to contain sixteen photogravure plates and about ninety half-tone blocks, and will be bound in a cover specially designed by Professor Herkomer. The price of the ordinary edition is fixed at three guineas, that of a large paper edition, with duplicate plates on India paper, at five guineas. All the latter are already sold.

WE have received from Messrs. Blackwood the fifth and sixth volumes of their "Warwick Edition" of George Eliot, consisting of Scenes of Clerical Life and Silas Marner.

Bibliographical.

I NOTE that Miss Edna Lyall's new novel, In Spite of All (embodying, I presume, the same story as that of her recent drama so-named), is to be published by Messrs. Hurst & Blackett. Miss Lyall issued her Doreen (1894), her Wayfaring Men (1897), and her Hope the Hermit (1898) through Messrs. Longman, who had previously published her Autobiographies of a Truth (1886) and of a Slander (1887). Her Derrick Vaughan (1889) is in Messrs. Methuen's list, and some minor things of hers have the imprint of W. & R. Chambers, J. Clarke, and Simpkin. Messrs. Hurst & Blackett were, however, Miss Lyall's first publishers, and still issue the best known of her fictions. These, I take it, are Donovan (1882), We Two (1884), In the Golden Days (1885), Won by Waiting (1886), Knight Errant (1887), The Hardy Norseman (1889), and To Right the Wrong (1893). These seven novels, by the way, were brought out by Messrs. Hurst & Blackett, in uniform style and in a case, so recently as 1900.

In the current British Weekly "Claudius Clear" quotes the following lines by Anna Seward:

> Come that I may not hear the winds of night,
> Nor count the heavy eave-drops as they fall.

"My belief," he remarks, "is not only that these are Tennysonian lines, but that they are the only Tennysonian lines before Tennyson. This is a bold thing to say." It is; and it implies a limited acquaintance with English poetry. Long ago, for instance, was it pointed out that in the old tragedy of "Gorboduc" there are at least two lines quite quaintly Tennysonian both in style and sentiment:

> For right will always live, and rise at length,
> But wrong can never take deep root to last.

The subject, however, is too large to be disposed of in a paragraph.

The "Cloister Library" of Messrs. Dent is really a good idea, and one is glad to see that it is to contain a reprint of Digby's Broad Stone of Honour, which is well worthy of reproduction, but has not been reprinted for many years. Welcome also will be the resuscitation of Sir Arthur Helps's Cloister and the Crowd and Companions of My Solitude. Of the former there was a cheap reprint in 1883. The latter reached its tenth edition in 1885. Both are deserving of revival. In the "Temple Library" Reade's Peg Woffington is to be included. It looks as if it were going to be accepted definitely as a "classic." Into their "Little Library" Messrs. Methuen will introduce Crashaw's Steps to the Temple and Sterne's Sentimental Journey. Both works are accessible, but the first of the two has yet to be popularised, as, no doubt, it now will be.

A selection from the writings of James Anthony Froude, such as Messrs. Longman announce, should find a large public, the more especially as it is to be part and parcel of the Silver Library. The thing ought to have been done before, and one wonders why no one thought of it. Books of this class are, of course, "snippety" and unsatisfying, but they do good when they send the reader to the works which have been drawn upon. The list of prose "selections" extant is now a long one. Thackeray, Charles Reade, Ruskin, Matthew Arnold—these are among the first that occur to one as having successively survived this process, always very trying to an author. Books of "gems" and "sayings," "wit and humour," and so forth, are, of course, on a different plane, though not without uses of their own.

The Mr. John Buchan who has been appointed secretary to Lord Milner is, it seems, the young Oxford man who, during the last five or six years, has been so fertile in literary production. Mr. Buchan already has to his credit the following works of fiction: Sir Quixote of the Moors (1895), Scholar Gipsies (1896), John Burnet of Barns (1898), A Lost Lady of Old Years (1899), Grey Weather: Moorland Tales (1899), and Half-Hearted (1900). We also owe to this writer a book on Brazenose College (1898), and Musa Piscatrix (1896), one of the Bodley anthologies. (Where are those anthologies now?) I presume, too, that the Stanhope Essay on Sir Walter Raleigh (1897) and the Newdigate Prize poem on the Pilgrim Fathers (1898) are from Mr. Buchan's pen.

This month's "new writer" in the Bookman is Mr. Joseph Conrad, who is so far from being new that his first book—Almayer's Folly—appeared in 1895. Since then we have had his An Outcast of the Islands (1896), The Nigger of the "Narcissus" (1897), Tales of Unrest (1898), Lord Jim (1900), and, with Mr. F. M. Hueffer, The Inheritors (1901). If the enterprising conductor of the Bookman could not think of any really "new" writer, why did he not "discover" one? There is a lot of latent genius in Scotland!

I have commented before now on the interchange of titles going on between the novelists and the dramatists. I see that Mr. W. Le Queux proposes to call his new romance The Court of Honour, which is the name of a clever and interesting play produced a few years ago at the Royalty Theatre. Then I see that Mr. G. W. Cable has written a story called The Cavalier, which makes one think at once of "The Cavalier" of Charles Whitehead.

THE BOOKWORM.

Digitized by Google

Reviews.

Florence and Dante.

The Two First Centuries of Florentine History. By Prof. Pasquale Villari. (Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d.)

An English Commentary on Dante's "Divina Commedia." By Rev. H. F. Tozer. (Clarendon Press. 8s. 6d.)

THIS cheap edition of Prof. Villari's essays in Florentine history, for which we have had to wait so long, is still more than 15 per cent. dearer than the original Italian edition, published eight years ago, that is, the English demand for a work of this kind is one-fifth of the Italian, or the publisher in this country will not work except at a much larger profit than satisfies his Italian confrère, or the price of the English version was put up to nearly five times that of the original (accurately, the ratio is 8 lire to 30s.) in the hope that if the first harvest failed the aftermath would more than make up for any loss on the venture. Whatever the explanation—and the above alternatives by no means exhaust them—the poor student is too often rewarded for his unusual taste by being compelled to defer purchase until the work has lost its first freshness.

Fortunately, the value of Prof. Villari's researches in Italian archives has not, as the indebtedness of Dante experts show, been diminished by later work, although the first essay appeared in the Milan Politecnico so far back as 1866; indeed, we may securely accept the author's statement that the many monographs, dissertations, and treatises born since these lectures were first delivered not only do not weaken his arguments, but not infrequently corroborate them. Although the essays have been written during a period extending over a quarter of a century, and each is complete in itself, yet collected they form a coherent whole, and present, competently and vividly, many aspects of the Republic and Parties at the time of Dante. If occasionally the language is diffuse, and sometimes tautological, we are not sure that it is not a gain, remembering how intricate the problem is, the most intricate, perhaps, ever set the scientific historian—the causes which led to the rise and dominance of Florence.

As the author's intention is to get behind the phenomena which appealed to contemporary diarists and chroniclers, he is necessarily concerned with the philosophy and interpretation of events rather than with their portrayal; but, for all that, the reader will find his interest in the chronicler historians, like Villani and Campagni, sharpen as his insight into the forces controlling the political revolution deepens. Villani's story is too fascinating, his manner too charming for us ever to consent to his neglect, were he ten times more inaccurate, and his causal conceptions a hundred times more childish; in point of fact, he is an invaluable authority when treating of his own times. Had the modern historian no need of him the student of the Comedy would be in sorry case could he not illuminate many a trenchant and brief phrase in the poem by Villani's or Compagni's brightly quaint descriptions. Compare, for instance, Dante's reference to the Buondelmonte tragedy—"O Buondelmonte, quanto mal fuggisti le nozze sue per gli altrui comforti," ("O Buondelmonte, how ill thou fledst its marriage at another's suggestion") with Villani's; in the latter one reads how Buondelmonte, on Easter Day, 1215, returning from his nuptials, elegantly attired, with a wreath on his head, and riding a white horse, was slain, at the foot of the statue of Mars, by the friends of the lady he had abandoned, and how this was the cause of the wretched Ghibelline and Guelf factions, although long before there were disputes among the nobles, and these disputes existed because the Church and Empire were at variance. Commendation is, however, superfluous. "Giovanni Villani," writes the author, "with his incomparable gift of observation, supplies such minute descriptions of events, reports so many details, that, almost unawares, we find ourselves carried back to his day. Sometimes, when descending to particulars, he apologises for detaining the reader on topics of small moment, little foreseeing what value we later generations would attach to all those details of the trade, instruction, revenue, and expenditure of the Republic, or how we should long for more facts of the same kind."

Prof. Villari hints at his own ideal in distinguishing between the work of the historian and the philosophic interpretation of the age of which he treats:

> The genius of the historian emits, as it were, flashes of light; but these, while illuminating some occasional point, only leave a confused and uncertain view of past ages in our mind. We require to know men and institutions, parties and laws, as they really were. Nor is this enough: we must also comprehend how all these elements were fused into unity, and how laws and institutions were begotten by these men in those times.

We do not think any philosophy of history will ever succeed in fusing all these elements into one. There is no golden rule for connecting events nor for distinguishing between immediate and essential causes, nor, again, for detecting—a most important matter—whether the cause of an event is simple or complex. The interpreter of history selects from the whole body of documents just those facts which seem sufficient to make up a causal system; even then he is driven to transform some of the records, to ignore others, and ultimately he depends on his intuition to help him to string together his events so that there shall seem no unnatural break in their succession. Prof. Villari's theory compels acceptance because it is competent to describe the phenomena—political, social, and commercial. But we are still left asking, as we close this volume, with its tremendous array of facts and demonstrations, why Florence became pre-eminent in art and letters at the close of the fourteenth century. An excellent a priori demonstration could be made out from the data given in this volume, that Florence was poorer, artistically, at the close of the fourteenth century than London at the beginning of the twentieth. Briefly, in the following passage the author suggests the difficult problem, well-nigh insoluble, which the philosophic historian has to solve:

> The vicissitudes of the Florentine Republic can only be paralleled with those of the most flourishing periods of Athenian freedom. Throughout modern history we might seek in vain the example of another city simultaneously so turbulent and prosperous, where, despite so much internecine carnage, fine arts, letters, commerce, and industry all flourished equally. The historian almost doubts his own veracity when bound to recount how a handful of men settled on a small spot of earth, extended their trade to the East and the West, establishing banks throughout Europe, and accumulated such vast wealth that private fortunes sometimes sufficed to support tottering thrones. He has also to relate how these merchants founded modern poetry with their Dante, painting with their Giotto; how with the aid of Arnolfo and Brunelleschi, and of their Michaelangelo, who was poet, painter, sculptor, and architect in one, they raised the stupendous buildings which the world will lastingly admire. The first and subtlest of European diplomatists were Florentines: political science and civil history were born in Florence with Machiavelli. Towards the end of the Middle Ages this narrow township seems a small point of fire shedding light over the whole world.

Much of the political and social history of Florence can be shown to be a natural outcome of its geographical position. Florence is in a valley, girdled by hills studded with castles, at that time the strongholds of Teutonic knights, left over from the Longobard and Frank invasions; these knights used to raid the Florentines' lands and levy blackmail on the merchants passing along the great trade routes. Here, then, we have a barbaric society brought into conflict with a city of artizans. The history of that conflict begins about 1100, and ends with the passing of the Enactments of Justice—the Florentine Magna Charta—in 1283, when, politically, the nobles lost every vestige of their power. Whilst Florence was peculiar in the form of its struggle, every important Commune in Italy had to determine whether the lower or higher society should become dominant. This race conflict and contact is the real significance of the Guelf and Ghibelline contentions. But this struggle for supremacy may be interpreted in other ways: it may be regarded as a fusion of Roman law with a Feudal code: or, better still, as the building of a Roman edifice on Germanic foundation; or as a result of the Emperor and Pope both striving for temporal power. After the battle of Campaldino the nature of the conflict changes. The fat burghers (popolani grassi) became arrogant, and resisted the efforts of the ever-growing populace to obtain political representation, and they were always opposed to the members of the lesser guilds. This is the real origin of the Bianchi and Neri factions. Guelf and Ghibelline have ceased to be significant terms. Class distinctions within the walls does what racial hate had been unable to do; it undermines the power of Florence, and prepares it for the Medici. The history of the collapse of this wonderful Commune is only hinted at in this volume. Before giving in one word the causes which brought about the collapse of the Communes, or which prevented the Communes from giving birth to the State without first becoming principalities, and the prey of despots with mercenary troops, we desire to leave this glowing description on the reader's mind of what was happening in Florence at the moment of her greatness and the beginning of her fall:

Digitized by Google

> Every page of the Chronicles records the undertakings of very important public works—the erection of city squares, canals, bridges, and walls; and simultaneously with these the most enduring monuments of modern art were springing up from the ground. During the same period Arnolfo di Cambio worked on the Baptistery, began the church of Santa Croce, and, according to the chroniclers, received from the Signory a solemnly worded order to reconstruct the old cathedral from the foundations by erecting a new one "of the most magnificent the mind of man could conceive, rendering it worthy of a heart expanded to much greatness by the union of many spirits in one." Undoubtedly it was then that Arnolfo laid the first stone of the fane considered by many the finest church in the world. At the same time, a great number of monumental buildings and public works were being also carried on: Santo Spirito, for instance, Orsanmichele, and Santa Maria Novella. In 1299 Arnolfo likewise began the Palace of the Signoria, another marvel of modern architecture, that seems to be so thoroughly in character with the Republic and expressive of the youthful vigour then animating the Florentine people. In the same year the construction of new walls suspended since 1285 was also resumed. . . . What, too, are the names most frequently occurring in the records of those times amid the struggles promoting or following the Enactments of Justice? At every turn among the Priors, the Gonfaloniers and ambassadors, or at hot debates in Council, we meet with Dante Alighieri, Brunetto Latini, Giovanni Villani, Dino Compagni, and Guido Cavalcante, the creators of Italian poetry and prose.

The methods of war after Campaldino began to change; the citizen soldier gave place to the trained mercenary horseman, who hired himself, regardless of the cause for which he was to fight, to the best paymaster. Soldiering became a profession. Another fact hastened the passing of the Commune: myopia of the magnates, who withheld from the clamouring populace those civil privileges, devotion to which in the past had enabled them to overcome every obstacle to wealth and fame.

The two concluding essays, on Dante's exile and Henry VII., need not delay us, as the story has been told more than once, quite recently, in Dante text-books. In closing the book we ask ourselves the question: What is the seed which, in a democracy of free institutions, will in time efflorese into art and letters and political wisdom? It is a question of first importance to the State democracies of England and America.

Mr. Tozer's volume on the Comedy is a very serviceable and carefully compiled commentary; the fact that Mr. Paget Toynbee read the proof-sheets, and that the text followed is Dr. Moore's, is a warrant of its accuracy, and of the currency of its conclusions. Attention is constantly called to the metre, grammar, and archaic words—to mention unusual features first—and the difficult lines are paraphrased or translated; the allusions, and every serious difficulty in topography and chronology receive concise, but generally adequate, explanation. We regret that, since the aim was "to make Dante's meaning clear to the reader of his poem," he did not let slip into the volume a few diagrams, tables, maps, and plans—why, for instance, is there no plan of Florence and no map of Italy?—occasional reproductions, and an index. As a commentary is at best a necessary evil, and as this particular one lays no claim to originality or research, no efforts should have been spared to tone down its harshness, and make the whole volume more attractive.

In the matter of interpretation, where the meaning cannot be determined by appeal to documents, or where the principle of explaining Dante by Dante does not conclusively close the controversy, the reader will reserve judgment. As only six pages on an average can be given to a canto each luogo oscuro can receive but one explanation, and that necessarily the one which commends itself to the author. This method of annotating, none the less misleading because inevitable: it binds the author over to a dogmatism which might really be alien to his nature. As we turned over the leaves, and our eyes caught a word or phrase which recalled many a dubious conflict, we thought surely here the author will give a sign; but no, rarely was a sign given that there had been a conflict at all, and if the alert reader occasionally suspects a difference in interpretation he will be convinced by the time he has worked through the commentary that every battle is either won or lost:

> If divine justice (nostra, as it appears to us in Heaven) seems to men to be unjust, this is an argument in favour, not of unbelief, but of belief (because it shows that God's judgments are incomprehensible, and therefore should be accepted without questioning).

Who would suspect that the above is an explanation of a passage for which, so far, no entirely satisfactory explanation has been given, and we would ask how many are there who will credit Dante with such a banal thought? This is by no means an isolated example: it is a pity that the device of enclosing within square brackets was not adopted, as an indication that one out of many explanations had been chosen. For another kind of interpretation which we cannot classify in a few words, but which we advise the young student diligently to scrutinise before accepting, we select the following:

> "Wherefore I confer on thee plenary jurisdiction over thyself." The two words corono and mitrio are used to strengthen by repetition the force of the expression. No doubt they contain a reference to the Imperial and Papal crowns as being emblems of the two supreme powers which governed the world; but they must not be regarded as implying that Virgil conferred on Dante self-government in spiritual as well as temporal matters; to do this would be beyond his powers, and a usurpation of the function of Beatrice, who was Dante's spiritual guide. Consequently all reference to religious belief, and even to religious life, in mitrio must be excluded; and if anything is intended by the passage beyond the simple meaning which has been given above, it can hardly be more than that corono should refer to conduct and mitrio to conscience; and even this seems doubtful.

Digitized by Google

Most of this note is entirely irrelevant; the simple facts of the case are that, as Dante is now purified from all his sins, he assumes the state which Adam enjoyed before his expulsion from Eden. In other words, now that his judgment is free, right, and healthy ("Libero, dritto e sano è tuo arbitrio") he is entirely outside the jurisdiction of Pope or Emperor. That Dante used the words corono and mitrio deliberately is evident from a sentence in the De Monarchia (Bk. iii., chap. iv.), which says in effect that if man had remained in the state of innocence in which he had been made by God he would have had no need of either imperial or ecclesiastical guidance. There is, therefore, no attempt on the part of Virgil to invade Beatrice's domain, and had Mr. Tozer been content to explain Dante by Dante he would not assuredly have subtracted from the exquisite beauty of Virgil's final charge, nor detracted from the full significance of the lines by such enervating criticism.

The Chariot of Aminadab.

S. Gilbert of Sempringham and the Gilbertines. By Rose Graham. (Elliot Stock. 7s. 6d.)

The only religious order of English origin was founded in the reign of Stephen. It was distinguished particularly by the attempt to combine in a single community members of the two sexes, as had been done in the Order of St. Benedict, according to its primitive institution. The relations between the canons and nuns are fitly symbolised by the plan upon which the churches were built. A wall ran down the middle of the nave, parting the men from the women—a wall five feet thick.

> The wall was high enough to prevent the men and women from seeing each other, but it did not reach to the roof, that the women might hear High Mass, celebrated daily at canons' altar by two or three canons chosen by the Prior, and the sermon preached on feast days. A few feet from the east end stood the door in the dividing wall, which was opened for the processions, in which the whole community took part on the fourteen great festivals of the Order. Just beyond the door was the turn-table window of the communion, through which the canons passed the chalice and restored it to their care when Mass was over. [One would have supposed that the primary use of the window of communion would have been the administration of communion.] The window of confession . . . was of "the length of the finger and hardly of a thumb in breadth," and was protected by an iron plate.

The rule was based for the canons mainly on that of St. Augustine, and for the women on that of St. Benedict; to all," adds John Capgrave, the original biographer of the founder, "was offered the example of Christ and His saints." The national spirit of puritanism outcrops in the regulations of life and conduct peculiar to the order. Prioresses, and all others who cut the garments of the canons, shall "take care that neither cloaks, tunics, nor cowls touch the ground by their exceeding length, because he who boasts himself in this kind of garment is, without doubt, reprobate of God." Even the horses were docked of their tails and manes. "He who writes letters shall write simply, and, above all, shall avoid the vanity of profound and swelling words." Well, that, anyway, is very good puritanism. Organs and every kind of chant were prohibited. Like the Cistercians, the Gilbertines had no sculpture or "superfluous" pictures in their churches; nor was a multitude of lights permitted, save on the feast of the Purification or Candlemas, and at the office of Tenebrae, in what Miss Graham (following Sir Henry Irving) calls Passion Week.

The Order found favour with Henry II., who granted it his charters as "free and special alms." And his protection was invoked against aggressors. Such, for instance, was that Agnes de Vescy who, "with a great number of women and dogs and other things," insisted on making a hostel of the house at Watton. Anyway, she was a sporting lady whose importance rendered necessary an appeal to the royal patron; and he ordered the sheriff to approach her in person and admonish her to find another hunting lodge. With the Roman Pontiffs, too, did the sons of St. Gilbert find favour. Thus, when in the evil days of John Plantagenet the land lay under an interdict, they were permitted to recite their office and celebrate mass as usual, save only that it must be without ringing of bells, in low voices, and within closed doors. Their modest high-water mark of prosperity was reached in the reign of Edward I. The sons and daughters of the nobility enriched the houses of the Order which they entered; money bought from the needy king the right to acquire lands and churches, the Statute of Mortmain notwithstanding; and the wool trade, in which it was greatly interested, flourished. Then, partly in consequence of the encroachments of greedy neighbours, a decline set in. Here is an unpleasant sidelight on the dark side of mediæval life:

> In 1337 fifty men broke into the Priory of St. Margaret at Marlborough, and burnt the trees and timber there. In 1316 the Priory of St. Catherine, Lincoln, lost "by hunger" the greater part of five hundred sheep, which were driven out of the close. In 1330 certain knights broke the banks of the fishery at Haverholme, so that the water which flowed to the priory mills ran out through the breaches and flooded three hundred acres of meadow.

In 1348 half the representatives of the Order perished from the epidemic known as the Black Death. And the gaps in its ranks were never afterwards filled up. When the days of pillage came, the Gilbertine houses were indeed spared in the earlier raid, though only four of them could show the statutory income of over £200 a year. When, later, the greater houses also were doomed, the Gilbertines melted rather ingloriously away. They furnished no martyr to the cause of ecclesiastical liberty. Only we read of the Prioress of Ambresbury that > she rested and so remaineth in these terms: "If the king's highness command me to go from this house I will gladly go, though I beg my bread; and as for pension, I care for none."

The canons of Sempringham slavishly wrote:

> Know that by unanimous assent and consent, with deliberate purpose, with certain knowledge and free impulse for some just and reasonable causes, being especially moved by our minds and consciences, we have of our own will and desire granted the Priory of Sempringham to our most illustrious prince and lord, Henry VIII., Supreme Head of the English Church.

It is hardly matter for wonder if, while Black Friars, Grey Friars, White Friars, Monks of St. Benedict, flourish again in the twentieth century, no attempt has been made to revive the only English Order.

The man to whose initiative the Order owed its inception was an English squire, and by his personal peculiarities might have furnished the text for one of Nietszche's diatribes against the Slave. By some personal deformity he was rendered repulsive even to the servants in his father's hall. In his youth he showed no great aptitude for learning; nevertheless, he was sent abroad, and studied at Paris in the days when Abelard was the rival of William of Champeaux. Upon his return he received at his father's hands the benefices of Sempringham and West Torrington, and at once, according to his biographer, began to devote himself to the education of the boys and girls of those parishes, and to the practices of personal piety. His reputation for sanctity was presently spread abroad, and he was able to sacrifice to the Lord seven virgins whom he kept safe under lock and key for the Heavenly Bridegroom. In the form into which it ultimately grew, the Order is likened by this biographer to the chariot of Aminadab, "having four wheels: two of men, clerk and lay; and two of women, lettered and unlettered." Gilbert died in 1188 at the age of a hundred years, leaving behind him nine chariots of four wheels and four of two—that is, houses of canons and lay brothers only. Upon the evidence of numerous miracles he was raised to the altars of the Church in 1201.

Digitized by Google

As to the manner in which Miss (?) Graham has carried out her task, it may be said that, great as are the pains she has bestowed upon it, they are less than would be necessary to an exhaustive work. Many of the houses, or their remains, she admits she has been unable to visit, and for information regarding them has been compelled to fall back on "courteous help" from local correspondents. Yet even so she appears to have been unable to make the best use of the matter to her hand, so that the book is heavy, not to say tedious, reading. Her ideas, too, of the Catholic liturgy are loose: no writer acquainted with the service books, for instance, would talk of the night office as vigils, or the hebdomada major as Passion Week, or imply, as she seems to imply, in a passage quoted above, that the nuns received communion under both species.

A Teacher with Many Texts.

Robert Browning as a Religious Teacher: Being the Burney Essay for 1900. By Arthur Cecil Pigou. (Clay & Sons.)

IT is hard to give a coherent account of a philosopher's philosophy, but it is harder to give any account at all of a poet's.

> I shut myself in with my soul,
> And the shapes come eddying forth, wrote Rossetti. Browning also shut himself in with his soul, "and the shapes [came] eddying forth," for, as a brilliant Irishman put it, he ranks as a creator of character "next to him who made Hamlet." But the creator of character is in essence the novelist, and such a man is, in proportion to the greatness of his art, elusive and undiscoverable. And so Mr. Pigou found it easier to gain the Burney prize than to fasten a lens over the ultimate Browning; of the shapes he possibly missed not one, but the shaper remained aloof.

Another Robert has stated that his namesake "thundered" a negative when asked if he was a Christian. In that response he was, no doubt, anti-dogmatic rather than anti-Christian. Sympathy with Christianity is, as Mr. Pigou suggests, implied by the bare fact that he has dramatically created St. John, David, and others who were "presumably believers in the Gospel story." Indeed, Mr. Pigou glides into the view that, "for practical purposes, he accepted the main doctrines of Christianity." "Practical!" It is an admirable paradox that so solid an adjective should so often be at the service of ambiguity.

It is certain that, as a poet, Browning needed beautiful conceptions. Christianity gave him the conception of God martyred of His own will by man as an atonement for the sins of man. In the crucible of the poet:

> The agony in the Garden expands throughout the ages, and becomes a
>
> "divine instance of self-sacrifice
> Which never ends and aye begins for man."
>
> The face of the Crucified stirs from the fixed point that has been assigned to it in time, and, soaring beyond the range of historical criticism, neither falters before the gaze of philosophy, nor dwindles across the darkness, but
>
> "rather grows,
> Or decomposes but to recompose,
> Become my universe that feels and knows."

Obviously, if such ideas were to be labelled "Browning's Philosophy," his reputation as an optimist should sink low. There is nothing really more repugnant to optimism of the purest type than the idea of God in pain. If the Heart of the Universe suffer for the world's sin, how callous must the world be that is all "right." But Browning was an optimist, and we may be pretty certain that a God in pain was not a stationary vision in his mind. Of evil and good he had the confused notions resulting from the inexorable prejudices of the flesh. He would not believe in a black that white could not disintensify, and the only hell he allotted mortals was the inevitable detention in grosser moulds due to their unfitness for finer ones. Heaven, he seems, in "Prince Hohenstiel Schwangau," to have figured as an equivalent of an unquiet Nirvana:

> The thunder-glow from pole to pole
> Abolishing, a blissful moment space,
> Great cloud alike and small cloud, in one fire.

To seek truth is, in his opinion, more important than to find it. We must

> . . . shake
> This torpor of assurance from our creed

Our agnostical age may smile wanly at that. But to shake off assurance is not to shake off hope. That is strong in Browning; it has, like the sea-mew of another poet:

> Wide eyes that weary never,
> And wings that search the sea.

We note that "La Saisiaz" and "A Beanstripe" are among the poems to which Mr. Pigou has most frequent recourse. His little book is intelligent, though necessarily rather futile. We part with it not without some "private smiling" for thinking of Mr. Alfred Austin's admonition of 1870: "Let the sane general public take heart and bluntly forswear Mr. Browning and all his works," lest they incur "the misery of living in an age which gibbeted itself beforehand for the pity of posterity, by deliberately calling a man a poet who . . . is not specifically a poet at all." Fortunately, Mr. Pigou has called him in his title "a religious teacher."

The Return of the Jews.

Menasseh Ben Israel's Mission to Oliver Cromwell. Edited by Lucien Wolf. (Macmillan.)

AMONG the volumes dealing with quaint by-paths of history there are few more curious than those published for the Jewish Historical Society of England. The Return of the Jews to England has fascinated others besides Mr. Lucien Wolf, to whom we owe this reprint of the pamphlets published by Menasseh Ben Israel to promote the re-admission of the Jews to England in 1649-1656. The book has been edited, with an introduction and notes, by Mr. Lucien Wolf, and is illustrated by some excellent reproductions of portraits of the great Jewish writer and diplomatist. The tracts have been printed in facsimile; not reproduced by any photographic process, but entirely reset in types similar to those employed in the original. Mr. Wolf's introduction will naturally be found by the general reader to be the most interesting part of the book, and it represents what is the last word, at any rate for the present, in the matter by the light of fifteen years' study and investigation.

The Jews, who came into England with the Normans, were expelled by Edward I. in 1290, and for two centuries and more this country was to them little more than a bitter memory. Then, when the Jews were also expelled from Spain by Ferdinand and Isabella, the people wandered all over the earth, to those countries in which they were tolerated. But they left behind them in Spain and Portugal the less scrupulous remnant of their race—rich Jews, who were disinclined to make sacrifices for the faith of their fathers, and who accepted the terms of the Inquisition rather than abandon their wealth. But their conversion to Christianity was only simulated, and for two centuries they preserved in secret their allegiance to Judaism. These Iberian Crypto-Jews—or Marranos, as they were called—fought the Jesuits with their own weapons, and then "the Jewish blood and the Jewish heresy became distributed all over the peninsula, and crept into the highest ranks of the nation. The Court, the Church, the army, even the dread tribunals of the Holy Office itself, were not free from the taint." At a very early epoch the Marranos reached England, and we hear of them almost immediately after the expulsion from Spain figuring in a lawsuit in London. A Marrano, Roderigo Lopes, was Court Physician to Queen Elizabeth, and the original of Shakespeare's Shylock. The Reformation in England first turned Jewish eyes towards the land from which they had been so long excluded. "They were especially interested by Henry VIII.'s appeal to Jewish scholars during his conflict with the Papacy in regard to his divorce from Catherine of Aragon. Still more deeply must their feelings have been stirred by Elizabeth's struggle with Spain. All over Europe, indeed, the Jewish sympathies were with Elizabeth."

Digitized by Google

But what chiefly attracted the Jews was the increasing Hebraism of English religious thought, as represented by the Puritan movement; and when the Commonwealth, with its pronounced Judaical tendencies, emerged from this movement, the more mystical Jews began to dream of the Golden Age, and the more practical to see that the time had arrived when it might be reasonably hoped to obtain the revocation of Edward I.'s edict of banishment. Towards the end of 1655 the question of the re-admission of the Jews was brought to a climax by Menasseh Ben Israel's famous mission to Oliver Cromwell:

> The evolution of English thought which rendered Menasseh Ben Israel's enterprise possible is of considerable complexity, but its main features are easily distinguishable. The idea of religious liberty in England was due, in its broader aspects, to the struggle between the Baptists and the Calvinists. The Reformation established only a restricted form of religious liberty, and it was not until the Baptists found themselves persecuted as the Reformers had been before them that the cry arose for a liberty of conscience that would embrace all religions. In the Separatist Churches founded by English refugees in Amsterdam and Geneva, the idea grew and strengthened. The earliest noteworthy tract on the subject—Leonard Prosper's "Religious Peace; or, a Plea for Liberty of Conscience," published in 1614—was written under the influence of these exiles, and it is noteworthy that already in that work the extension of religious liberty to the Jews was specifically demanded. Amsterdam was at that time the seat of a flourishing Jewish community, some of whose members came into contact with the philo-Jewish refugees. In this way they probably learned to understand the political significance of the successive rises of the Puritans and Independents, for at the very beginning of the Civil War the Royalist spies in Holland noted that the Jews sympathised with the Republicans, and even alleged that they had offered them "considerable sums of money to carry on their designs."

Thus it was that the way was paved for Menasseh Ben Israel's mission, which was also helped by the fact that there were few men in England whose minds had not been influenced by Messianic and other mystical beliefs. Menasseh himself was the son of a Marrano of Lisbon who had suffered at the hands of the Inquisition, and had, as a result, taken up his abode in Amsterdam. Menasseh was ordained a Rabbi at eighteen, and became a mine of learning, an accomplished linguist, a fluent writer, and a notable preacher. His attainments made a considerable noise in the world at a time when public attention was riveted on Biblical prophecy, and the question of its fulfilment, through the Jews. A solution of the Jewish question was arrived at towards the end of 1656, which to Menasseh Ben Israel was a compromise of a purely selfish nature, for it left his idea of a proclamation of a free asylum to the persecuted and scattered remnants of Israel as remote as ever. However, it seemed to the local Marranos all they required, and as it disturbed little, it enabled the Jews to survive the fall of the Commonwealth. Charles II. was indebted to the Jews, and he refused to expel them again, and so the agitation against them died down, and they were allowed to remain. Mr. Wolf has produced a fascinating historical work, which is of interest not only to Jews, but to all students of English history.

Other New Books.

MISS MARIE CORELLI. BY KENT CARR.

"The critics will not like it, but her public will, unless I am greatly mistaken, eagerly welcome it." Thus the editor of the "Bijou Biographies," introducing this book. We dare say he is right. Mr. Carr has sewn together a great number of published accounts of Miss Corelli's life, ambitions, quarrels, adventures, and, above all, her mission. We really cannot pretend to criticise a book which, so far as it is a book at all, does not interest us. We see no earthly reason why Miss Corelli's life should be written yet; and we object to the style of this premature effort. A photograph of two pages of The Murder of Delicia, found in the Boer trenches after the battle of Colenso, and bearing, it is alleged, the marks of shots and bloodstains, leaves us cold. The circumstance is, of course, interesting to Miss Corelli and her bodyguard of admirers.

We will make a little anthology of extracts from Mr. Carr's book, which will help to fulfil the admitted destiny of the book—to annoy the critics and please the public.

> That Hall Caine should have rejected that astounding production [A Romance of Two Worlds, which Mr. Caine "read" for Mr. Bentley] says nothing for his business capacity. A reader's duty is to float the stuff which has the best marketable value, and not to pander to private literary predilections. It is easy enough to prophesy after the event, but it seems incredible that any man with average commercial instincts should have failed to perceive that in this young girl's novel a very riot of saleable qualities lay to his hand.

By the way, Mr. Hall Caine's business capacity has still some rather conspicuous supports left:

> Milton, as we know, essayed to justify the ways of God to men by a great epic. It was by "a plain history of strange occurrences happening to oneself" that Miss Corelli sought to prove the actual certainty of a future state of being, and to clear up all knotty points on the subject of the Creation.

As Miss Corelli has been taken very seriously by her public, it is not surprising to read:

> All sorts and conditions of people write to Miss Corelli. There are letters from Indian princes, addressed with a fine reverence to "one who is inspired with the truths of the Divine"; and curious communications from mites in the schoolroom, who have discovered with amazement that commiseration in their scholastic woes is to be had from a grown-up source. . . . She has received many appreciative letters from various Royal personages. But on this subject she exhibits a perhaps exaggerated sensitiveness.

We do not think that Miss Corelli's hostile critics ought wantonly to make her seem tiresome or ridiculous. But this book is written by an admirer. (Drane. 1s.)

Digitized by Google

THE SAINTS AND MISSIONARIES OF THE ANGLO-SAXON ERA. BY THE REV. D. C. O. ADAMS.

Mr. Adams deserves thanks for this second series of his biographies of the Anglo-Saxon saints. Even those, and they are not many, who nowadays take an interest in hagiography probably know better the saints of any country and any period than our early Saxon saints. Nor is it quite surprising or blameworthy. Their names survive in many a church or township scattered over England; but even Mr. Adams has been able to discover very little about the careers of many, or, indeed, most of them. All the more we welcome what is knowable. St. Boniface, St. Dunstan, and the like, we know somewhat of. (Did not the latter perform a delightful, if apocryphal, exploit on the devil with a pair of tongues?) But St. Ives, for instance, we know solely as an indispensable rhyme in connection with cats and old wives. Here you shall find that, alas! he is "not historical," and a mere Persian bishop into the bargain, about whom nothing is known beyond the discovery of his body in the eleventh century. Not even Cornish, and nowise connected with kits or cats, or old wives—not even by the latter's traditional narrative capacity! But that is not Mr. Adams's fault. (Mowbray. 5s. net.)

A SHORT HISTORY OF THE HEBREWS. BY R. L. OTTLEY.

This is a brief history of the Judaic kingdom such as has long been needed, wherein the Scriptural records are eked out and illustrated by the most recent results of archæological research, and treated in the light of modern Scriptural criticism. It is a very able, symmetrical, clear, and well-informed volume, which forms an excellent companion and supplement to the Biblical narrative. At the same time, it must be borne in mind that Mr. Ottley leans towards the so-called "Higher Criticism," and is disposed to adopt with a bold confidence some of the adventurous speculative conclusions of this and the archæologists or archæological writers who have treated Hebraic history. Therefore it will be well for the cool-headed and dispassionate student to maintain an open and somewhat critical mind in regard to his more conjectural though confidently stated views, since no school of Biblical criticism or archæological research has reached within a measure of scientific surety. This caution apart, the book may be recommended with warm praise to the general student who wishes to understand the Bible narrative as it appears in the light of our recent ethnological, antiquarian, and historical discoveries. (Cambridge University Press. 5s.)

Fiction.

The Eternal City. By Hall Caine. (Heinemann. 6s.)

THERE is scarcely any sentiment more widespread among mankind than the feeling of revolt against injustice, a feeling which always includes a vague desire to set things right. It is almost the most facile of sentiments, transitory, feeble, and liable to be aroused by trifling and theatrical phenomena of distress, while callous to the appeal of a profound and universal wrong. One characteristic of the ignorant and superficial thinker is that injustice seems to him so unnecessary, foolish, and easily curable. Make him landlord, or magistrate, or legislator, or prime minister, or monarch, or God, and he would fix up Utopia in about a fortnight. His scheme is usually such a simple one that he wonders that no one else has ever hit on it. It comprises everything, allows for everything, adjusts everything—except human nature. On the other hand, the man who has acquired wisdom and prudence from history, who has learnt the extremely difficult arts of looking a fact in the face, and of conquering the tyranny of his own emotions, hesitates long before even tentatively suggesting a social remedy. He is aware that Nature will not be hurried, and that an assemblage of legislators is as much within the dominion of Nature as the crowded florets on a dandelion. Above all, he knows that systems are an effect, never a cause. Intimidated by Nature's carelessness, cruelty, obstinacy, and her magnificent leisureliness, he is most probably content to sit and watch her, and to endure in silence the scorn of the neck-or-nothing reformer. We make these preliminary observations in order to throw a little light on the genesis of Mr. Hall Caine's new novel. It is not unfair to him to say that his consciousness of a mission to the world has deepened in proportion to the increase of his popularity as a novelist. Practically, he has been unable to refuse the world's invitation to him to take himself very seriously. Book by book, his tendency to teach righteousness grows more high-flown and grandiose. This tendency seems to be inseparable from sales in six figures: other striking instances of it are Emile Zola and Miss Marie Corelli. It must result, sooner or later, in an attempt to produce what is conveniently termed a "world-novel," a novel in which are presented supreme types, comprehensively significant, and of a universal symbolism. In the case of Mr. Hall Caine, it was of course necessary that he should surpass The Christian. He goes to Rome, or he happens to go to Rome—"the eternal city" of the popular preacher who rounds a period with the impressive phrase, "Ave Roma immortalis." What more suitable theatre for a sociological prophetic romance could be found? It is the religious centre of the occident, the grave of civilisations, the battlefield of two expiring forces, the Mecca of the artist, the archæologist, and the historian; it is the goodness-knows-what! In short, it is the type-city. He seizes and fearlessly embraces it. The melodramatist in him selects by instinct the sheer melodrama of its history and its present situation, and uses it to give a picturesque life and movement to the dry bones of a social theory. And what is that social theory? It is the theory of a born sentimentalist who chances to be an industrious novelist. It is given to few men to be both novelist and publicist. And Mr. Hall Caine is certainly not both. Apart from his craft, he stands revealed as your ordinary social reformer. It is "the last day of the last month of the last year of the century" (no doubt 31st December, 1900) when the novel begins, and in a few years of propaganda, plot, counterplot, and insurrection, Italy—far more than Turkey "the sick man of Europe"—is cured of her ills. Bureaucracy is scotched; militarism is rooted out; vested interests are abandoned; inherited instincts are annihilated; the Pope abdicates temporal power (Can't you see him doing it?); the "young" King also abdicates temporal power, and the world city, pattern of all future cities, whose builder and maker is Mr. Hall Caine, comes into existence. And this proves that the pen is mightier than the sword; for the pen—at least, the novelist's pen—can force men to act in accordance with reason instead of in accordance with emotion—to think instead of to feel: a feat of which no large mixed body of men ever yet showed itself capable.

The main fact of the novel is so wildly impossible, so unthinkable, as to render any serious criticism of the book as a realistic study entirely supererogatory. There is no humanity in the work, no genuine observation of life. Sentimentality stalks through it on the stilts of obviousness. You cannot choose a single episode—from the first, of the Italian accordion-boy and his squirrel dying in a snowstorm under the portico of the great house in Soho-square, to the last, where the old gentleman, with a face "full of tenderness and a white head full of Jovian grandeur," stands in front of "a marble tomb which bears an inscription of one word only, Volonna"—which is not both sentimental and melodramatic to the extremity of crudeness. In the invention of the heroine's name, Roma Volonna, all crudeness is comprised. The hero is such a hero as Mr. Wilson Barrett would play with éclat for three hundred nights. The incident, which frequently shows constructional ingenuity, is consistently theatrical. We will give one example, chosen at random from dozens we have noted:

Digitized by Google

> She felt a sensation of swelling in her throbbing heart, and rose up with shining eyes.
> "Roma, I confess that when I escaped from the police I came here to avenge myself. They are following me, and I shall inevitably be taken. But if you tell me that it was only your love that led you to denounce me—your love, and nothing but your love—though I am betrayed and fallen, and may be banished or condemned to death—still . . ."
> "I do say so! I do! I do!"
> "Swear it, Roma."
> "I swear. . . ."
> "The woman lies," said a voice behind them.
> The Baron stood in the bedroom doorway.

Excellent old Baron, always ready for a crisis in the bedroom doorway. Even the venerable Pope is not allowed to abdicate without being convicted of youthful immorality. The chief villain is, of course, a roué. Listen:

> "Let me pass," said the Baron.
> "Not yet, sir," said Rossi, and he flung his soft hat on to the side table. "You have something to do before you go. The lives of men like you are insults to every man who has a mother, a daughter, or a wife, and before you leave this room you will go down on your knees and beg the pardon of your victim in the sacred name of Woman."

These two extracts will condemn the book more effectively than much analytic criticism. And if we multiplied them a hundredfold, as we could, their condemnation would not be more unanswerable.

Judged as an exercise in popularity, The Eternal City has the grave fault of being tedious. In the matter of narrative, Mr. Hall Caine has much to learn from Miss Marie Corelli. It was an error of discretion to set forth in full the ponderous correspondence of the hero and heroine and the proclamations of the reforming hero.

Love and His Mask. By Ménie Muriel Dowie. (Heinemann. 6s.)

Love and war are the themes of Mrs. Norman's new novel. She has chosen a larger canvas than in The Crook of the Bough, but the underlying motive of this clever story has not the significance of the former book. There she analysed the emotions of a Turk under the dominion of one of the many counterfeits of love. Here we have a long and sensitive study of a modern woman—pretty, clever, complex, rich—who is always in love with love, and in the end finds the reality. But Mrs. Norman stops short of proving that it was really the reality.

Her name was Leslie Rose, widow of Urquhart Rose, the sculptor. In many ways Mrs. Rose had been a happy wife. "But the man to whom she would become all woman was not Urquhart Rose." At the opening of the book the Boer War is in its early stages, and Mrs. Rose, having bought a typewriter, uses it to send long letters to a bachelor brigadier at the front whom she has never seen—General Reddington. The letters, of which some specimens are given, are not in the least sentimental. Kindly, informative, touched with feeling, they are eagerly read by the bachelor brigadier, and later, when he returns, invalided, to England, to fall in love with Mrs. Rose, he does not guess that she was his unknown correspondent. Having refused the general, this emotional lady, by devious ways, finds her affinity in her old friend, Sergeant the Hon. Sir Aubyn Tollemache, known as Tobey. The general returns to the front. This novel could only have been written by a woman. No man writer, no ordinary man writer, could sustain for over three hundred pages such a keen analytical interest in the ways and throes of love. Philanderers should learn something from this passage:

> Every woman of temperament would willingly go so far with any man who interests her. If he will keep quiet and do and say nothing alarming, she will—to change the simile—approach nearer and nearer, staring with all her soul, as beasts in a field will draw close to an artist seated with an easel. But let him stay still! At the first "Hoosh" she is frightened. At a touch, should she have ventured within range, the emotions are set quivering; if each emotion has its pulse, what a racket in her veins. And then the self-questioning, the self-reproach, the discomfortable sensations after.

Love and His Mask is a spirited and readable story, with an unaffected tenderness that lingers in the memory.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE OCTOPUS. BY FRANK NORRIS.

This is the first story in Mr. Norris's promised trilogy of the "Epic of the Wheat." What has an octopus to do with wheat? Everything, when, as in this case, the Octopus is a tract of country in California which goes by that name. Mr. Norris gives a very business-like air to this novel by including a map of the Octopus district, and a list of the characters. These number twenty-seven. We have Magnus Derrick (the "Governor"), proprietor of the Los Muertos Rancho, his wife, his two sons, his neighbours and friends, and many humbler folk. Dipping into the book we find the loading of a grain ship put to a tragic use. The novel, it should be explained, is complete in itself. The scene throughout is California. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

A SOWER OF WHEAT. BY HAROLD BINDLOSS.

We are accustomed to the coincidences that lay two novels like The Octopus and A Sower of Wheat on our table almost on the same day. Here also we are on the great corn prairies of the West, and the wheat rustles or tinkles through all. Fields, railways, and gold mines form the spacious background of this story of industry and love. (Chatto and Windus. 6s.)

THE MILLION. BY DOROTHEA GERARD.

Madame Longard de Longarde's newest novel is founded on the following announcement in the Wernowice News: "Thomas Morawek, notary in Lyczyu, has presented a million florins to his native town for the foundation of an orphanage, destined for the education of motherless girls. We are informed that the money has already been deposited. . . ." The story does not relate to the orphanage, but to the means by which, to the amazement of his fellow citizens, Notary Morawek had accumulated his million. (Methuen. 6s.)

FROM THE LAND OF THE SHAMROCK. BY JANE BARLOW.

Readers of Miss Barlow's Irish stories are likely to welcome this volume of short stories. Among the titles we notice "Dinny and the Dans," "The Counsel of Widdy Coyle," "The Vengeance of Joe Mahony," and "Cocky's Conscience." (Methuen. 6s.)

Digitized by Google

THE AWAKENING OF ANTHONY WEIR. BY S. K. HOCKING.

Mr. Hocking's readers love to see a minister tempted (in books, we mean), and to watch his behaviour under the ordeal. One of Anthony Weir's temptations occurs on page 151, where we find him watching the gambling at Monte Carlo. "In his pulpit ministrations he had often denounced gambling as one of the most pernicious vices of the age . . . yet now . . . the moral or immoral aspect of the question seemed to pass completely from his mind: the chance of winning a heap of gold seemed to dominate every other consideration." (Religious Tract Society. 3s. 6d.)

HEATHER'S MISTRESS. BY AMY LE FEUVRE.

A pleasant wholesome story for the young girl, with fifteen illustrations. "Heather's thoughts went back to that dreadful day, when she had sobbed out her heart upon the old dial. . . . So to the cosy little thatched cottage they went, and Abigail opened the door herself. . . . 'Ay, sir, you have the best of the two, but I'm thankful Miss Bluebell has seen the error of her ways. . . . And Miss Heather has chosen well, for we've heard you are on the Lord's side yourself, sir.'" (Religious Tract Society. 3s. 6d.)

THE GOLD THAT PERISHETH. BY DAVID LYALL.

Another story of the "fireside" type, by the author of The Land o' the Leal. Mr. Lyall here forsakes Scotland for Essex. The story is built up on homely virtues and on the vanity of riches. "There were no millionaires in Christ's time, and I am sure He never intended there should be," says the heroine. (Religious Tract Society. 3s. 6d.)

THE YEAR ONE. BY JOHN BLOUNDELLE-BURTON.

This "Page of the French Revolution," the author explains, is laid principally in Paris during the Reign of Terror. He has not taken any of the great historical figures of the Revolution into his "dramatis personæ," but has endeavoured to show the effects of their actions on the fortunes of humbler people; and in this attempt he has gone to many original family records. Mr. Bloundelle-Burton now has eleven "romances" to his credit, and five "novels of to-day." (Methuen. 6s.)

THE WARRIGALS' WELL. BY DONALD MACDONALD AND JOHN F. EDGAR.

This "North Australian Story" is inspired by the Imperial idea, and sets forth the adventures of Jasper Meredith and Allan Ogilvie as the agents of the "Outer Empire Exploration Company," of which Sir Samuel Warrington is chairman. After a good dinner Sir Samuel said to the two heroes: "A week ago there called at my office a man who told me a remarkable story. For a sum of money he undertook to divulge the whereabouts of a region rich in many minerals, and to lead the way to it in person. . . . This man was wrecked some time ago on the north coast of Australia." "There may be Millions in it" is the title of the next chapter. How the Megaphone Mine was found is set forth in the later chapters of this novel of pioneering. (Ward, Lock. 6s.)

A SET OF FLATS. BY MAJOR ARTHUR GRIFFITHS.

No. 520, Victoria-street is the scene of the murder, and a list of the tenants in nine sets of flats is one of the first documents in the case. The murderer is believed to be a tenant. To extract him from the general population of the flats is the problem. A German professor, a journalist, a lady typewriter, and others, fall under the scrutiny of Inspector Phillipson. A brisk Scotland Yard story. (Milne. 3s. 6d.)

THE STRANGE DISAPPEARANCE OF LADY DELIA. BY LOUIS TRACY.

The cover of this melodramatic story of a disappearance would almost run to meet you in a drawing-room, its yellow and black are so emphatic. Lady Delia was last seen at Victoria Station, and inquiry showed that she had entered a block of mansions at Chelsea in which there were six main entrances, seventy-two flats, and no hall porters. The story lacks nothing of mystery and horror. (Pearson. 6s.)

THE SNARES OF THE WORLD. BY HAMILTON AIDÉ.

Mr. Aidé's new novel opens in Westminster in 1897, and we are at once interested in Moyra O'Connell, a poor but proud Irish girl of good birth who, in her aunt's opinion, has a great deal too much poetry and idealism about her, and ought to have accepted Lord Kilhaven. Moyra remains true to herself, yet gets into a false position in the house of Lord Desmond, whose ill-assorted marriage is important to the story. Moyra's handsome looks and well-filled mind give her rather more power than she can wisely control, but after some tribulation and much experience of modern society she is made happy. A wholesome Society story, rather longer than the average novel. (Murray. 6s.)

WHILE CHARLIE WAS AWAY. BY MRS. POULTNEY BIGELOW.

Another book of letters with fold-over covers. We dip at a venture, and read: "Her little house in Belgravia is the prettiest thing of the kind I ever saw—white outside and in, everything in it white, except its owner. It goes by the name of the White Sepulchre, and certainly it is in one sense a mausoleum, where are bleaching the bones of many a nice, robust reputation." (Heinemann. 2s. 6d.)

THE DARLINGTONS. BY ELMORE ELLIOTT PEAKE.

We found a good novel—Sister Carrie—in the "Dollar Library" the other day. This may be another. It opens at Ashboro', where President Darlington, of the High Point, Rankelman, Ashboro' and Southern Railroad, is addressing his fellow citizens on the prospects of the railway. He is followed by his daughter, the Auditor of the railway. The story is complex, and American to its inmost sentence. (Heinemann. 4s.)

GOD'S REBEL. BY HULBERT FULLER.

Stories dealing with sociological questions in America are reaching us rather frequently. This is one, and the publishers think it will be of interest at the present time, in view of the great strikes of steel workers and engineers now proceeding. The story is long and full of varied matter. In the chapter called "The Evolution of a Grease Pot" we are among oil tanks and pipe-lines; in the chapter "Going Down" we are in a publisher's office; and in "The Crimson Sign" we are in the throes of a great American strike, with the militia out. (Jarrold. 6s.)

REAL LIFE. BY CHARLES S. MARSHALL.

A very artless story laid at a sea-side boarding-house. The author has everything to learn about narration. "'Are you comfortable, Alice dear?' 'Yes, thank you, dear, I am. It is so kind, so good of you to evince such a deep interest in me. I shall never be able to reciprocate your kindness.'" We cannot understand how such stories as this find their way into print. (Drane. 6s.)

Digitized by Google

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Cancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage, One Halfpenny, Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscription, prepaid (including postage) 17/6
" Quarterly 5/0
" Price for one issue /5

On Certain Affinities.

It is generally assumed that the curious phenomena in sensitiveness known as correspondances, are intimately and uniquely associated with the decadent school of thought. In these correspondances certain sense impressions stimulate in the mind the consciousness of a different sense: light awakens sensations of sound; perfume awakens sensations of colour. The name of correspondances was first applied to these abnormal sense-parallels in the works of Baudelaire, where the most striking examples of them are to be found.

> Il est des parfums frais comme des chairs d'enfant,
> Doux comme les hautbois, verts comme les prairies.

Verhaeren has written:

> Dites, la paix des grands couchants en mer!
> Dites, et leur douceur et leur splendeur penchante,
> Le soir, lorsque l'on croit, là-bas, dans le soleil,
> Que la lumière chante!

Indeed, all the French "Decadent" poets have been more or less subject to a like experience of sense transference.

It is, of course, a mistake to consider this inter-relation of impressions as necessarily dependent on a state of decadence, which is a state of disease. It is easy to prove that correspondances have, in English literature, been experienced and acknowledged by poets of robust and vigorous mentality. Was not the author of Job before Verhaeren when he heard sound in light: "All the morning stars sang together"? Did not Browning's "Abt Vogler" rear out of sound a palace visible to the eye in colour and form, with "rampired walls of gold as transparent as glass"? Have not Swinburne and Fiona Macleod and Edward Carpenter given us "grey winds," and "green winds," and "blue winds"? And to take an example from another art, does not Whistler intend to suggest music in his nocturnes in blue and silver, his symphonies in gold and grey? Indeed, there are not wanting signs of a time when these correspondances shall be scientifically scheduled, and an actual relationship demonstrated between, say, certain sounds and corresponding forms. Already experiments have proved that the notes of a scale have subtle parallels in colour.

All the processes of the arts dovetail one into the other. Turner's sunrises dissolve into music. Where shall we find a gallery of such pictures as the "Faery Queene" opens to us? What sculpture is there to equal the sublime group of Milton's "Samson Agonistes"?

This tragedy of strength is written for us, as it were, in a medium of stone. The movement is so slow as to seem almost stationary: the despair is so huge as to lose the minor details of colour in an overwhelming grey. There is no flush of the emotions of the flesh: the poem is blocked in the sombre and shadowy lines of spirit. Like the grandest examples of sculpture, it is ascetic in conception: cold, restrained, spare. This Samson is the man of epic achievement, but even more he is the Nazarite, the ascetic of Hebrew times, avoiding strong drinks, temperate in the indulgence of the senses. His mental and spiritual fibre is as heroic as his physical; he has the practical eye of the statesman for opportunities, as well as the insight of the seer. Hence the tragedy of his fall, out of which he has courage to distil the bitterest essence, and bear with a large, patient helplessness the evil days and evil tongues. "Samson Agonistes" dwells in the mind like the memory of some of those earliest sculptures, strong with the freshness of a vigorous world, and bearing in every line that sense of unmeasured tragedy, of exquisiteness eternally frustrated, which in such stones as the Elgin Marbles stir to tears.

Blake's fragment of "Samson" is, on the other hand, almost entirely pictorial. You feel as if you had been looking through a portfolio of Blake's own drawings, inchoate, fraught with terrible and dazzling suggestion, or dim with tenderness. Indeed, could any drawing more adequately render the scene to the eyes of Dalila (importuning than these few words?

> He seemed a mountain, his brow among the clouds;
> She seemed a silver stream, his feet embracing.

Could a drawing as adequately render this description of Dalila?

> Put on fair linen that with the lily vies,
> Purple and silver; neglect thy hair, to seem
> More lovely in thy loose attire; put on
> Thy country's pride, deceit, and eyes of love
> Decked in mild sorrow; and sell thy lord for gold.

As Milton is sublime in stone, so Blake is tender in painting. To place, for instance, side by side these two descriptions of the Angel, reveals a whole world of difference, not only in method, but in fundamental conception. Here is Milton's account:

> . . . An angel, who at last in sight
> Of both my parents all in flames ascended
> From off the altar, where an offering burned
> As in a fiery column charioting
> His godlike presence . . .

These are Blake's lovely lines:

> An angel from the fields of light entered the house.
> His form was manhood in the prime,
> And from his spacious brow shot terrors through the evening shade,
> But mild he hailed her. . . .

It is to be noted that Dalila, not Samson, is the chief figure of Blake's poem, which deals solely with the incident of the betrayal. The name of Dalila has become a byword through the ages for the woman who tempts and who deceives. Octave Feuillet has adapted her to modern conditions, and given her to us in all her fascinating repulsiveness in his fine play "Dalila." Blake has chosen the moment when, lovely, tearful, she brings all her sinuous charms to bear upon the strong man's heart. Milton has chosen the moment when she comes to mock him in his despair, revealing herself, "a manifest serpent, by her sting discovered in the end." Is there any passage in literature more poignant with burning scorn than this description of the temptress?

> But who is this? What thing of sea or land?
> Female of sex it seems,
> That so bedeck'd ornate and gay
> Comes this way sailing
> Like a stately ship
> Of Tarsus, bound for th' isles
> Of Javan or Gadire,
> With all her bravery on, and tackle trim,
> Sails filled and streamers waving,
> Courted of all the winds that hold them play,
> An amber scent of odorous perfume
> Her harbinger, a damsel train behind . . .

The woman is hardly to be found here at all, and one marvels how Samson should have fallen. But there is one medium of art that makes his fall seem simple, credible, inevitable: it is the medium that frames out of three sounds, "not a fourth sound but a star." In Saint-Saëns' "Samson and Delilah," Delilah is just a golden voice—young, fresh, exquisite; in his music the passion, dead for aeons, relives and thrills once more through the hearts of us: the voice, sweet, persistent, wins to our very souls. What is there that moves like a voice? "That low voice my soul hears, as a bird the fowler's pipe, and follows to the snare." In listening, a soft forgetfulness steals over the senses; the being is absorbed in exquisite sound. And then you realise—for the first time, perhaps—how Samson loved: and the love-song that he and Delilah sing together echoes among the fairest love-notes that float about the temple of music.

Digitized by Google

Music covers so vast a field of emotion that the other arts find little place in it. It would seem almost impossible to visualise this opera of "Samson and Delilah." It is a-throb with crowded excitement—an excitment infinitely remote from the Hebrew spirit of Milton, the mild mysticism of Blake. There is a sense of crowds and clashing contrast, of glaring and exotic colour. The first prayer of the Hebrew captives has the softness and thickness of incense, all interpenetrated with pain. The dances—and in especial the dance of the priestesses of Dagon—are barbaric, terrifying; they verge on the paths of unexplored feeling. Even the crystal vitality of the maiden choruses is at times poignant with foreboding; you hear the sound of elusive wind that foretells gathering disaster. The music completes the circle of the story that Milton has sculptured and Blake painted. But in the music there is practically no Samson: the grindstone at Gaza is mute. And this is well; we could brook no music for this period of desolation beside the music of Milton's verse:

> O dark, dark, dark, amid the blaze of noon,
> Irrecoverably dark, total eclipse
> Without all hope of day!
> O first created beam, and thou great word,
> Let there be light and light was over all;
> Why am I thus bereaved thy prime decree?
> The sun to me is dark
> And silent as the moon,
> When she deserts the night
> Hid in her vacant interlunar cave. . . .

E. W.

Things Seen.

The Younger Generation.

He was a thick-set, sun-tanned boatman, and he spent the day lounging on the parade, wheedling the passers-by to sail or row. Many times I passed him with a shake of the head, but one day I said, suddenly, "Yes!" It was as I half expected. The coax went out of his voice, and I deduced that he would a deal rather sun himself on the parade than be at the trouble of dragging his boat down to the sea. We went out a mile. Willingly he rested on his oars while I talked to him. For he was a sailorman, and it is good to be with those simple, sterling souls who are beyond the trivialities of civilisation, and who know danger outside the printed page. "You like being here?" I asked, waving my hand towards the sea front, with its dignified hotels, and parade bordered with trim beds of tamarisks, geraniums, and cornflowers, and hoping that they would call forth his scorn. "I like it very well," was what he said. "And you don't want to travel?" "No, this suits me very well." "You have never been away from here?" He shook his head. I was silent, asking myself, "Is this the new generation of sailor-men?" Presently his eye fell on my white, rubber-soled shoes, and he said, "Those are nice shoes, sir." I assented, and lit a cigarette. He also lit a cigarette. "I thought sailors smoked pipes," I remarked. "Pipes make me ill," he replied. "And what do you give for your cigarettes?" I asked. "They're five a penny." Then we talked of sad things, of a bather who had been drowned that week. But dead or living, nothing roused this summer-day sailor of the younger generation. "I've often found dead bodies," he said. "The sea's full of dead men. I found one the day before yesterday." "Horrible! And did you bring him ashore?" I asked. "No," he answered, lighting another cigarette, "I got a rope round him, but his arm fell off. He'd have fallen to pieces before I could have pulled him ashore. It's a pretty place," he added, nodding his head towards the beds of tamarisks, geraniums, and cornflowers. Suddenly he threw his cigarette away, leant forward, and fixed his eyes on mine. For the first time I saw a light in them. "Once," he said, "I found a foreigner in the sea. He had a belt on, with a knife stuck into it." And for a moment the trim flower-beds and the monster hotels faded away, and Romance stalked on the waters and beckoned. "A belt with a knife in it," he repeated, and his voice dropped.

The Harbour.

While we leaned on the pier-railing we were aware of two big steamers approaching the harbour—the one from the north (perhaps from Leith), the other from the south (perhaps from London). It was lazily pleasant to mark their august approach, to see funnels divide, masts shine out, and the upper works grow organic against the blue and moaning sea. It was Sunday, and but for these toilers the whole horizon was blank.

As the boats drew nearer it seemed that they must end their voyages by entering the harbour abreast. And they did. Suddenly, as by a common convulsion, we leapt on whatever platform offered, and held our breaths. This coincidence of arrival was like to end in a collision. The final curves seemed impossible. The furious screw actions of the ships told us that our fears were not idle. A moment later the leviathans were mingled in a straining conflict of avoidance. Every ear anticipated the crash. But none came. There had been just sufficient room, and the steamers, drawing slowly apart, passed up the great harbour, a tiny figure showing on each bridge. The Leith boat pushed its nose close behind the London boat; and even as the dusk deepened and the night, pure and quiet, came down on the immense waters, we knew by the very posture of the ships that the captains were swearing at each other, from bridge to bridge, as only Britons can.

The Chief Baker.

The cab dropped me at the corner, and a church clock somewhere off the Fulham-road chimed the third quarter after one. "Good morning, sir," said the cabman, who drives me every night from Fleet-street. "Good night," I replied. That is our invariable joke. And then, as I started up the quiet street which contains my garden gate, I was arrested—not in the ordinary sense—by a policeman. He was clambering laboriously upon a railing which guarded the quiet side of the corner shop. I wondered, and watched. Gaining his foothold, he felt carefully about the ledge above his head, and having found something, he tugged. It was surely a rope. "What are you doing?" I enquired, with a sudden hope of catching a constable on the wrong side of the law. He said nothing, but seemed, like Pope's spider, to live along the line he held in his hand. After a few moments tense silence relinquished the rope, returned to the pavement, and recognised me as a respectable ratepayer. "It's the baker," he explained. "He ties that rope to the corner of his blanket, and one of us calls him every morning. It pays him." And as my baker rose to bake my morning roll, I wearily undressed in the hope of a night's rest which would give me an appetite to eat it.

Digitized by Google

A Good Old Book.

A WRITER who has bright things to say on a great many subjects can hardly do better than produce a humorous or sentimental lexicon. This form excuses the brevity of his remarks, and softens the offence of his versatility. And if he needs a model he may find worse ones than the book, which, in its first edition, is thus entitled:

THE TIN TRUMPET;
OR,
HEADS AND TAILS
FOR THE WISE AND WAGGISH; TO WHICH ARE ADDED
POETICAL SELECTIONS
BY THE LATE
PAUL CHATFIELD, M.D.
EDITED BY JEFFERSON SAUNDERS, ESQ.

"Misce stultiliam consiliis."—Horace.

IN TWO VOLUMES.

LONDON:
PRINTED FOR WHITTAKER & Co.
AVE MARIA LANE.
1836.

The author of this book is Horace Smith, and we may wave Paul Chatfield, M.D., and Jefferson Saunders, Esq., aside without much ado. The venerable doctor is pictured in the frontispiece, sitting in an attitude of benevolence and complacency, with a trumpet suspended by a cord from his neck. It pleased Horace Smith to describe him as a good man who in his old age travelled through Yorkshire administering advice and medicine gratis to the poor. But in the season he repaired to Harrogate to enjoy the society of his own class, and here he founded a little society called "The Tea Party," for tea-drinking and "rational conversation." Anything in the nature of a club he held in abhorrence, and certainly "The Tea Party" did not resemble one. To avoid the use of a hammer, which his simple mind associated with the chairman of a club, the Doctor employed an instrument which combined the offices of a trumpet and a pen. With the pen he registered the society's proceedings, with the trumpet he regulated them. Set subjects were debated, and the Doctor's commonplace book was much in evidence. He was a mighty collector of stories, epigrams, antithetical phrases, and what not; taking his own and other people's wisdom wherever he found it. This commonplace book, we are to believe, is presented to us by his editor and legatee in The Tin Trumpet.

The book is a sort of meditative lexicon progressing alphabetically from A.B.C.DARIAN, ABLATIVE CASE, and ABLUTION, to the final YAWNING, YEARS, and YOUTH. A wide and wise Liberalism stamps the book, which often gives the impression of being in advance of its time. The style does not share this modernity. It has the gravity and balance which are now voted laboured. Yet the warmest champion of staccato writing must acknowledge that here and there the slower pace of Horace Smith's prose has both dignity and effect. Take the following passage under Jews:

> Our Saviour was a Jew; the greater portion of the Bible is Jewish; the ten commandments, which constitute the basis of our morality, are Jewish. Why, then, should we dislike our fellow-subjects, and spiritual half-brethren, because they happen to be Jews, more even than we hate Turks and Pagans, who are utter aliens and infidels? All persecution is demoralising, and the Jews have been long exposed to its worst species—that of public prejudice, aggravated by civil and other disabilities. Abolish all religious pains, penalties, and distinctions, and this oppressed race will quickly become elevated in the moral, as well as in the political scale.
>
> What a picturesqueness do these descendants of Abraham impart to the otherwise monotonous surface of society! Far and wide do we travel, to behold the inanimate mouldering remains of Greece and Rome; while in the Israelites, our neighbours and fellow-townsmen, we may contemplate the living ruins of a nation still more ancient and illustrious. Who can survey their adust complexions, oriental physiognomies, and dark-flowing beards, converting them into unfaded portraits of the old Scripture characters, without being carried back, in imagination, to the crowded streets of Solyma, and the glories of King David.

It is idle to say that this is not good writing; yet hardly a clause would be accepted from a living writer. It would be worth while to examine the question of pace in style. In the above passage the pace is about half as rapid as the normal pace in the prose of to-day. Who now would call the Jews "descendants of Abraham"? or write of the "inanimate mouldering remains of Greece and Rome"? We should blue-pencil all that, and sweat the passage down to something like this:

> Christ was a Jew; the Old Testament is a Jewish miscellany; the Decalogue was to the Jews. Why, then, annoy the Jew? He pays his rates, helps us to pay ours, and thinks with us as far as Malachi. All bullying is a mistake, and the Jew proves it. Treat him properly, and see if it does not pay.
>
> What a colour-note is the Jew! We rush to look at stones in the Forum and the Parthenon, while the débris of a race gives majesty to Whitechapel. To jostle in that synagogue crowd is to see Laban and Leah at the well. To read the market report of Rothschilds is to vision the apes and peacocks of Solomon.

This is quite by the way. The digression at least permits us to remark that the Tin Trumpet is always blown on the side of the oppressed, against the oppressor. Horace Smith was a hater of every form of violence and cruelty. He defines an Angler as "A fish-butcher—a piscatory assassin—a Jack Ketch (catcher of jack), an impaler of live worms, frogs, and flies, a torturer of trout, a killer of carp, a great gudgeon who sacrifices the best part of his life in taking away the life of a little gudgeon." It is clear that Izaak will have a bad time on the next page. The high priest of anglers, he is denounced as the "HOOKER of their piscatory polity." How can anglers be pious? queries the Trumpet. Old Izaak must either have been a demure hypocrite or a blockhead. But because he could write a line as well as throw one he is supposed to have shed classical dignity on the art. What profanation! It is a pleasant characteristic of the Trumpet that its fiercest blare usually dies away in the cachinnations of a jest, and it is a relief, after hearing Izaak Walton damned, to learn of a wealthy tradesman who, when his foreman told him he had found a "chalybeate" at the bottom of his fish-pond, told him to throw it into the basket with the other fish.

It is unnecessary to state that the Trumpet calls men from War, not to it. War is "national madness." Under Soldier we have a neat meditation on the British officer which can offend no one:

> Nothing so much shows the triumph of usage over fact, of the conventional over the abstract, as that a profession, apparently so much at variance with all their feelings, should be chosen by gentlemen of independence, humanity, and reflection. Nothing is more redeeming to our common nature than that such men, placed in a sphere so expressly calculated to make them both slavish and tyrannical, should generally preserve their good qualities from contamination. Few characters so honourable, few gentlemen so courteous, few companions so agreeable as a British officer; but this is not in consequence, but in spite of his being in the army. Why he ever entered it we presume not to inquire, but we are bound to believe that his motive was not less rational and amiable than that of the affectionate Irishman, who enlisted in the seventy-fifth regiment in order to be near his brother, who was a corporal in the seventy-sixth.

Digitized by Google

Not the oppressor and the man of violence, only, draw admonitory notes from the Trumpet. The Trumpet has its everyday bêtes noirs. Smoking and snuff-taking are among these. "As it was said of Virgil that, in his Georgics, he threw his dung about him with an air of dignity, so may we allow Vesuvius and Etna to smoke, without conceding that privilege to every puny whaffler who may think fit to poison the air with the contents of his mouth." The man who makes "a sort of concubine of his Club" fares no better. The Game Laws are fair game to the Trumpet, which defines a Partridge as "A bird to which the Squirearchy are so strangely attached, that they will shoot, trap, and transport their fellow creatures for the pleasure of destroying it themselves." It cannot be denied that prejudice and even vulgarity steal into pages which as a whole are radiantly sensible and witty. Celibacy is certainly not "a vow by which the priesthood, in some countries, swear to content themselves with the wives of other people," though it may sound witty to say so.

We find no fault with the castigation of critics Criticism, says the Trumpet, very often consists in measuring the learning and the wisdom of others, either by our own ignorance, or by our little technical and pedantic partialities and prejudices. Everyone has heard of the mathematician who objected to Shakespeare, that his works "proved" nothing. Equally luminous was the remark of the lawyer, who, happening to catch the words "a deed without a name," uttered by the witches in "Macbeth," repeated: "A deed without a name!—why, 'tis void." We hope it is not quite true to say nowadays:

> Of much of our contemporary criticism, which consists rather in reviewing writers than writings, we may find a fair type in the following passage from a letter of the celebrated Waller: "The old blind schoolmaster, John Milton, hath published a tedious poem on the fall of man; if its length be not considered as merit, it hath no other."

On the other hand, the following witty definition of a Book seems to have been written to be quoted in this enterprising year of grace:

> Book.—A thing formerly put aside to be read, and now read to be put aside. The world is, at present, divided into two classes—those who forget to read, and those who read to forget. Book-making, which used to be a science, is now a manufacture, with which, as in everything else, the market is so completely over-stocked that our literary operatives, if they wish to avoid starving, must eat up one another. They have, for some time, been employed in cutting up each other as if to prepare for the meal. Alas! they may have reason for their feast, without finding it a feast of reason.

The stories in The Tin Trumpet are nearly all of the first water, and they range from the merest accidental funniment to the set story with a moral, told with consummate skill. The absurd ones are delightfully absurd, like that of the man who, being invited to dine at the Green Man at Dulwich, unluckily told the cabman to drive him to the Dull Man at Greenwich, and lost his dinner; or that of the lady who, when reproached with having made a most inconsistent marriage, allowed that she had said she would never marry a Scotchman, a Presbyterian, or a parson, but protested that she had never said she would not marry a Scotch Presbyterian parson; or the story of the Frenchman who when he saw Ironmonger Lane written on the corner of a street in London read it as "Irons manger l'ane," and exclaimed: "Comment! Est ce qu'on mange des anes dans ce pays ci? Mais, quelle absurdité!"

Through the book a low clarion note of cheerful, humble philosophy persists, and at last triumphs in verses of which these are not easily forgotten:

> Life—death—are links of one unbroken chain;
> Heirs to each other interchangeably,
> All things now dead have lived—will live again,
> And all that lives was dead—again will die.
>
> Our ancestors are in the corn and trees;
> The living fields are fertilised by death;
> The dust was human once, and every breeze
> That blows around us has been human breath.

Cement.

He was superbly unaware of his deficiencies. For him the world was divided into halves—those who know "cement," and those who did not. "I've bin in cement ever since I was so 'igh," he said proudly, "an' I'd like to meet anyone who knows more about it. It's queer stuff, cement; takes a lifetime to know, it does. Why, these fellers that write about it in the papers, nine out o' ten don't know what it tastes like—an' you got to know that if you want to know cement. Their articles look all right—learned, and all that—but, lor! when you come to read 'em, 'arf of 'em's wrong, and the other 'arf's cribbed out of the text-books word for word. I'll bet yer what yer like they're young fellers green out o' college, but they might as well be babies. It takes a lifetime, cement."

We were seated at the ordinary of a small hotel in a little country town. Presently the talk fell, curiously enough, on Tennyson and Browning. One or two spoke with knowledge, the rest were vaguely conventional in their remarks. Then spake the man of cement:

"I can't say as I'm a thick 'un on potery meself," he began. "I never could make out what them chaps could find to gazzle about. Sometimes I take up a potery book and 'ave a look at it, but, lor bless my soul! in five minutes I 'ave to chuck it away and go and get a drink, it's such beastly dry stuff to read. What people want it for I can't make out: give me a paper and a pipe, and I'm alright—but potery, good lor!"

The table was already amused, and he was serenely happy, blissfully ignorant of the fact that some of us were laughing, not with him, but at him.

"I was going up to Scotland once," he went on, "and a little old feller got into the carriage after me. Nice little old chap 'e was, an' you'd never 'ave thought there was anything wrong with 'im to look at; but he was clean gone on potery, fair dotty on it. He'd got a bootifully bound volume with 'im that 'e kept looking at, an' presently 'e said to me: 'Do you like Browning?' 'Well,' I said, 'I can't say as I know much about 'im, but I 'ave 'eard 'e's a reg'lar out an' outer in the potery line.' 'That 'e is,' said 'e. ''Ere,' he said, 'let me read you this,' an' he fumbled about till 'e found a pome called—I can't remember exactly, something about a busted statue, or something——"

"You mean 'The Statue and the Bust,'" I interjected. "That's it; you're right," he cried, and continued, not a whit disconcerted: "Well, what with the noise of the train, and 'im reading too fast, and it being potery, an' all that, I couldn't make 'ead or tail of it, and never 'eard anything about the bust from beginning to end. When 'e finished 'e said: 'That's one of the finest pomes in the English language, don't you think so?' 'Out an' away,' I said, wanting to please 'im. 'I knew you'd like it,' 'e answered. 'Now just you read this and tell me what you think of it,' an' 'e gave me something all about a rose-tree. Thank goodness, it was short, but I couldn't make sense out o' that either. 'Owever, I said it was lovely, very bootiful indeed, thinking to please him. But I couldn't get off with that. 'E gave me another, much longer, and much worse. That made me fairly savage. 'Ere was I, holding this blessed book and pretending to read as if I understood. 'E watched me all the time, an' whenever I squinted my eye to look out of the winder, there 'e was staring at me to see what effect the pome 'ad, I suppose. Well, it reg'lar got on my nerves, an' I felt as if I could chuck the blessed book down on the floor and jump on it. I got thro' it some'ow, and gave 'im back the book, saying it was bootiful, to please 'im, 'e looked so anxious to see if I liked it. Luckily the train stopped then, an' I changed carriages. I'd a' killed 'im if it 'ad gone on much longer. That's put me off potery ever since."

Digitized by Google

We all laughed, some of us with pity in our eyes, and perhaps a little contempt, but these things he did not see.

Correspondence.

"My Life's Record."

SIR,—While thanking you for your notice of my book (My Life's Record), will you kindly allow me to say:

(1) That the book would never have been published at all had I not ascertained, beyond all shadow of doubt, that a secret campaign was being carried on against me, founded, for the most part, on an incident in my early life which it was assumed I should not have the courage to face.

(2) That in such an attempt, as my book represents, a plain statement of fact was obviously most appropriate, without any regard to that "literary touch," the absence of which you seem to regret.

(3) That the point with which I am most concerned is the assertion of the moral and legal right of every man or woman to live down any error or misfortune. The moral right is, I believe, conceded by all reasonable people. The legal right has been established by deliberate judicial decisions which are quoted in my pages.—I am, etc.,

F. REGINALD STATHAM.

10, Warwick Gardens, Kensington, W.

The New "Hazlitt."

SIR,—In connection with the forthcoming edition of Hazlitt's Collected Works, I shall be very glad to hear from any one who may possess the fourth volume (in MS.) of the Memoirs of Thomas Holcroft. Three volumes of these memoirs, written partly by Holcroft and partly by Hazlitt, were published in 1816.—I am, etc.,

A. R. WALLER.

Santon Lodge, Reigate Hill, Surrey.

"The Anonymity Business."

SIR,—The article you print in the ACADEMY of August 24, under the heading, "The Anonymity Business," and credit to the New York Saturday Review, is a home-product. It appeared originally in the Glasgow Evening News.—I am, etc.,

A. B.

[We are obliged to A. B. for the information.]

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 102 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best prose eulogy of the tomato. We award the prize to Miss Madeline E. Jennings, Stortford Cottage, Chorley Wood, Herts, for the following:

The eating of ripe tomatoes is a pleasure so refined and subtle that it seems to be almost a virtue in itself. To like them is a liberal education. For in this fruit's flaming heart there is a taste elusive and delicious, at once vivid and austere. It suggests the brightness of a scarlet flower, and the pungent freshness of a marsh upon a mountain side. To the imagination it confounds the elements, and is fire and earth and water all in one. I have had far more respect for Eve since I divined that the "pomme d'amour" of Paradise was a tomato.

Other replies are as follows:

Many grave disputes have you caused among the learned in vegetable and fruit growing. For a long time it was difficult to assign you a place on the vegetable or fruit list of our country. Much controversy has ended in a compromise. At the fashionable garden party in Park-lane, when served between delicate slips of bread and butter, you are a fruit; when tossed into the rude frying-pan of the navvy, beside a piece of fat bacon, your are a vegetable. And now you fascinate the palate in sauce, and form an eatable cover to the succulent sardine. The City clerk, as he swarms into Leadenhall-street and Gracechurch-street pounces upon you with as much satisfaction as he did the pear and apple a few years ago. A few fussy people tear off your cardinal skin before you meet their lips. They forget that, like the cucumber, you are more digestible with your jacket on. But whilst you satisfy many appetites, do not think that you have no enemies. You have been arraigned before the bar of public opinion, and solemnly accused as being the cause of the increase in consumption. The charge has failed. You have as many medicinal properties as the onion. Yes, you are a choice fruit; a satisfying vegetable. You are also named the love apple: but was not that after you upset the happiness of Mr. Pickwick and widow Bardell?

[E. T. H., Cambridge.]

I love the tomato. I like to look at it as it grows, the fruit hanging heavy among the green leaves. I like to handle it, to touch its smooth soft skin, and feel its coolness against my palm. But best of all do I enjoy eating it. To break away from the parent stem a quite ripe fruit, to remove tenderly the thin clinging skin, to divide in four the now slippery pulp, to be alternately spendthrift and miser as I pour over oil from Lucca and vinegar from Spain—that is pleasure, the dish is ready, the gods are served. For my voice is not that of the artist, for all the beauty of the round ripe fruit; nor of the gardener, though Lycopersicum esculentum is prolific and grateful for a very little tending; nor of the cook proud of talents devoted to tomatoes, farcis, and macaroni à l'Italienne. But a lover of the love apple, a daughter of Eve, sings in praise of the coolest, freshest-flavoured, least cloying fruit that grows. Call it vegetable if you will; reflect on its connections—the deadly nightshade, the mandragora, black henbane are all its brothers, digitalis is its cousin. It comes of a family of poisoners. All the more honour, then, say I, to our tomato, who started off on new lines, and has grown so wholesome and so good. I have only to add a caution to all who would enjoy to the full this prince of vegetables—beware of mixing with the delicate apple of love "the rank and guilty garlic." Alone and unadorned by any of its kin let it be dressed, and then will eye and palate rejoice, for both will be abundantly satisfied.

[M. E. D Grantown-on-Spey.]

Perhaps the greatest charm of the tomato lies in this, that it keeps at a respectful distance those who, for one reason or another, are not worthy of receiving its favours. By nature it is particularly exclusive. It is not eager for new friendships, and often proves distasteful to those who rashly seek intimacy at a first meeting. Only solicitous and humble efforts to win favour are rewarded, and I have known worthy people whom it constantly rejected in spite of their perfect willingness to find it sweet and attractive. It stands apart, beautiful on the outside, but containing within much unpleasantness for those who have not learned to appreciate its peculiarly delicate and subtle flavour. Peeping from behind its covering of green leaves it invites a closer intimacy than that which the eyes can give; but if the inexperienced stranger be not careful of his manner of approach, it will refuse to give up its heart to him. It attracts admiration, but is anxious to keep it unexpressed. It reserves itself only for those whom it deems fit for its especial favours.

For these reasons, and because the tomato has from the first treated me as a desirable acquaintance, I love it, and give it a place in my affections higher than those occupied by the peach or strawberry. My early admiration and respect have been rewarded by complete friendship, which no smile from the apricot or pear has been able to destroy.

[C. F. K., Eccles.]

Digitized by Google

A little bundle of salmon-coloured jelly and yellow pips, neatly done up in a tough skin of glossy vermilion and fastened at the top with a little knot of green. Such is the tomato, the fruit-vegetable of England. It is Nature's own ice-cream, luscious as the grape, refreshing as champagne. The traveller, trudging along the hot roads of rural England, is wise if he have one in his poke; he will find it sweeter, more inspiriting, than the belauded "humming ale." And it is a delight to the eye as well as the palate. Have you ever noticed it, reader, when it reposes in the salad bowl, amid the white circles of onion and egg and the green luxuriance of lettuce? Then, most of all, is it a delight to the artistic eye; it completes a pre-Raphaelite picture—in a pleasantly practical form. It is like the grape laughing in green attire, and it inspires enthusiasm. And what is enthusiasm but an ethereal kind of hunger? Tomatoes for ever, say I!

[H. A. M., London.]

Far beyond the mere fact that it is the Lycopersicum esculentum, or, as others would have it, the Solanum lycopersicum; more beautiful even than the truth that it is "much esteemed in England as an esculent, either raw or cooked" (as the Encyclopædia Britannica correctly remarks) is the romantic and spiritual side of the tomato.

Is it not called the Love Apple?

And whence that name, if it be not the very fruit that Paris handed to the victorious Goddess of Beauty?

Whence, also, that brilliant, everlasting blush, if not traceable to the same occasion?

Did Paris give Venus an ordinary apple?

Impossible! He gave her a tomato!

But the title Love Apple may well have even an earlier origin. Perhaps the first lovers named it such, as it dangled seductively from the Tree of Knowledge. If that were so, how great the temptation of Eve—how easy the task of the Snake!

Mark Twain has ventured to call the golden dragon-guarded apples of Hesperides oranges! No! Would Hercules have shouldered his club, and rested among maidens, and swindled the giant Atlas, for a whole barrelful of oranges—wrapped up in tissue paper even? No, sir! I wish to assert that those "golden apples" were tomatoes.

In short, the tomato is an ancient, excellent, and romantic fruit. Which think of next time you eat them fried.

[H. W. G., London.]

I would sing of thee, O Tomato, in jingling rhyme, but that I am forbidden: therefore I must curb my pen and strive to do thee justice in prose. Art thou vegetable or fruit? Who cares?—thou art unique. What fruit eclipses thee in colour, what vegetable in flavour? And yet thy colour, thy dainty, rounded shape, was not enough—Nature, in a bounteous mood, must needs give thee a polish. Most shining, fascinating ball, how thou glowest amidst the breakfast bacon! O incomparable Tomato, by thy beauty and flavour thou makest the common necessary mutton-chop a dish for the gods. Reposing blushingly on cool green lettuce-leaves, mine eyes would fain feast on thee for ever, and to eat thee seems a sacrilege. 'Tis said—I can scarce believe it—that some do not like thee; they eye thee coldly and murmur that thou requirest an acquired taste. But surely, coquettish Tomato, is not this one of thy greatest charms? Thou dost not court favour, but, conscious of thy worth, repulsest all half-hearted investigators. Alas! when I see thy mutilated remains in labelled bottles, I sigh for what thou hast gone through to get there, and mourn for thy departed glory. Where is now thy fiery crimson? Where is now thy fresh and pungent odour? Yet, notwithstanding, with watering mouth and eager hand I pour thee out.

[K. M. P., Bangor, North Wales.]

Replies also received from E. H. H., Streatham; F. G. A., Lee; R. W., Sutton; Miss P., Norwich; F. A. S., Highgate; W. F., Dunoon; E. T., Bexhill-on-Sea; A. D. B., Helsby; A. H., Southport; W. R., Clapham; T. F. S., Manchester; G. H., Rhoscolyn; C. H. B., Gateshead; A. S. H., Dalkeith; H. V. S., Shepherd's Bush; H. J., Hadley Wood.

Competition No. 103 (New Series).

We offer a prize of One Guinea for the best prose satire on any social convention. Not to exceed 250 words.

Rules.

Answers, addressed, "Literary Competition, The Academy, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, September 11. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

New Books Received.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

Moule (H. C. G.), Thoughts for the Sundays of the Year. (Religious Tract Society) 3/6
Maclaren (Shaw), "Follow Thou Me": being Letters written on Joining the Church of Scotland (Melven) 1 0

POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES.

Pater (Walter), Essays from The Guardian(Macmillan) net 8/6

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

Cowan (Samuel), Mary Queen of Scots, and Who Wrote the Casket Letters? 2 vols.....(Low) net 28 0
Vivian (Olive) and Vivian (Herbert), The Romance of Religion ..(Pearson) 6 0
Carr (Kent), Bijou Biographies. Miss Marie Corelli (Urane) 1 0

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

Hallett (Cecil), The Cathedral Church of Ripon(Bell)
Harper (Henry A.), An Artist's Walks in Bible Lands. (Religious Tract Society) net 6/0

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

Pike (Oliver G.), Woodland, Field, and Shore...(Religious Tract Society) net 5/0

MISCELLANEOUS.

"R.," Dress in a Nutshell(Greening) 0/6
Skirving (R. Scot), Our Army in South Africa (Angus)
Cruickshank (J. W. and A. M.), "Grant Allen's Historical Guides": The Umbrian Towns(Richards) net 3/6
Bright (A. D.), Three Christmas Gifts, and other Tales. (Simpkin, Marshall) net 3 0

EDUCATIONAL.

Smith (D. Nichol), edited by, Hazlitt: Essays on Poetry(Blackwood) 2 6
Sontar (George), Pope: Rape of the Lock, and other Poems...(Blackwood) 2/6
Wilson (Agnes), Lamb: Select Essays(Blackwood) 2/6
Innes (A. D.), Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Keats Selections ...(Blackwood) 2/6
Wyatt (Alfred J.), edited by, An Elementary Old English Reader. (Cambridge University Press) 4/6
Willson (St. J. Basil Wynne), Virgil: Æneid. Books V., VI. (Blackwood) 1/6
Pontet (C. A. A. Du), Cæsar: Gallic War(Blackwood) 1/6
Lee (Elizabeth), edited by, The George Eliot Reader.....(Blackwood) 2 0
Godley A. D.), The Fables of Orbilius. Part I.(Arnold) 0/9
Bidder (Marion Greenwood) and Baddeley (Florence), Domestic Economy in Theory and Practice(Cambridge University Press) 4/6
Ottley (R. L.), A Short History of the Hebrews to the Roman Period. (Cambridge University Press) 5/0
Hamilton (J. G.) and Kettle (F.), A First Geometry Book(Arnold) 1/0
Hamilton (J. G.) and Kettle (F.), A First Geometry: Answers and Hints to Teachers(Arnold) 0/6
Thimm (C. A.) and Marshall (J.), Russian Self-Taught (Marlborough) 2,0: cloth, 2 6
Finnemore (John), Boys and Girls of Other Days.....(Black) 1 1
"Sir Walter Scott" Readers for Young People: The Pirate(Black) net 0/6
Speight (E. E.), selected and arranged by, Poems of Shelley ...(Black) net 0 6
Neville (K. P. R.), The Case-Construction after the Comparative in Latin. (Cornell University)

NEW EDITIONS.

Austin (Alfred), Alfred the Great, England's Darling(Macmillan) net 2/6
Eliot (George), Scenes of Clerical Life(Blackwood) net 2 0
Eliot (George), Silas Marner(Blackwood) net 2 0
Cervantes (Miguel de), Don Quixote. Vol. II. (Gowans & Gray) net 1/0
Thompson (Robert), The Gardener's Assistant. Divisional.—Vol. IV. (Gresham Publishing Co.) 8 0
MacColl Rev. Malcolm), The Reformation Settlement ... (Longmans) net 3/6

PERIODICALS.

Blackwood's, Contemporary Review, Universal and Ludgate, Argosy, Humanitarian, Genealogical Magazine, Antiquary, Alpine Journal, Scribner's, Thrush, Architectural Review, Ainslee's, Geographical Journal, Public School Magazine, World's Work.

 New Novels are acknowledged elsewhere.

Mr. Heinemann has in preparation a series of handy volumes on "The Great Peoples," somewhat after the plan of John Richard Green's celebrated Short History of the English People. The series is under the editorship of Prof. F. York Powell, and the first volume, on The Spanish People: Their Origin, Growth, and Influence, by Martin A. S. Hume, will be followed by The French People, by Arthur Hassall, M.A., and The Russian People, by J. Fitzmaurice Kelly.

On September 11 Mr. Grant Richards will publish The Soverane Herbe: a History of Tobacco, by W. A. Penn. The book is the first attempt since 1859 to chronicle adequately the development of smoking. The manufacture of tobacco, cigars, cigarettes, pipes, the literature of tobacco, tobacco and genius, the hygiene of tobacco, and many other matters are dealt with.

Digitized by Google

"The Thrush."

Edited by MULLETT ELLIS.

"The Thrush," a Periodical for original Poetry, is intended to bring thoughts of beauty and the consolation of exalted ideas into the hearts of the people.

Since its origin, on the first day of the new Century, "The Thrush" has published many beautiful Poems by the following writers:—

Dr. Richard Garnett, W. E. Henley, F. Prevost Battersby, Keble Howard, Harold Begbie, A. P. Graves, Nora Hopper, L. Alma-Tadema, Norman Gale, C. W. Wynne, Dr. Gilbert Murray, John Hutchinson, Hon. Albinia Brodrick, Arthur Symons, N. Carruthers Gould, Clifton Bingham, Lady Margaret Sackville, Hamilton Aïdé, Edgar Fawcett, Lady Gilbert, Lady Florence Douglas, Rev. W. J. Dawson, Rev. F. Bentley Greeves, Victor Plarr, Sir Wyke Bayliss, P.R.I., the 1st Lord Lytton, and Mullett Ellis.

In future numbers we are promised the work of many of the leading Poets of our day, including the Right Rev. Lord Bishop of Derry and Raphoe, Dean of Armagh, the Rev. Canon H. D. Rawnsley, Herbert Morrah, Israel Gollancz, M.A., Wm. Canton, Edwin Hamilton, M.A., Justin Huntly McCarthy, Dollie Radford, Louise Chandler Moulton, Sir Lewis Morris, M.A., Frankfort Moore, and Thomas Hardy.

"The Thrush" for September contains the Ode of Welcome to the Trades Union Congress by Sir Lewis Morris.

The Rules for a Prize Poem Competition, open to Subscribers to "The Thrush," are contained in the August Number.

THE FIRST PRIZE IS £10 STERLING.

See "THE THRUSH."

By order at all Booksellers'.

NOW READY.

Was Alfred King of England?

By A SAXON.

Demy 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

A brief review of one of our latest text-books, showing the true relations of Prince Alfred both to the Saxon people in England and to her Roman invaders.

Harrison & Sons, Publishers, 59, Pall Mall, S.W.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED).

ENLARGED AND CLASSIFIED CATALOGUE

(Over 500 pages, 8vo, bound in green cloth).

All the Principal Works in Circulation at the Library

ARRANGED under SUBJECTS.

Forming a Comprehensive Guide to Notable Publications in most Branches of Literature.

Books of Permanent Interest on Political and Social Topics, the Army, Navy, Arts, Science, Philosophy, Sport, Theology, History, Biography, and Fiction. Price 1s. 6d.

Also a FOREIGN CATALOGUE, containing Books in French, German, Italian, Russian, and Spanish.

Price 1s. 6d.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY,

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET;
241, Brompton Road; and
48, Queen Victoria Street, London.

ADVERTISEMENTS (Select Trade) for the COVER PAGES of the ACADEMY should be sent not later than Noon on Thursday to 43, Chancery Lane. Terms, &c., on Application.

THE OLDEST AND BEST (1901 EDITION).

DEBRETT'S PEERAGE. DEBRETT'S BARONETAGE. DEBRETT'S KNIGHTAGE. DEBRETT'S COMPANIONAGE.

(Illustrated and increased to 1,950 pp.)

Including all recent Honours and an Appendix of Royal Warrant Holders.

Royal Edition, complete work, 31s. 6d., cloth gilt; or Library Edition, 2 vols., 16s. 6d. each.

ALSO

DEBRETT'S HOUSE OF COMMONS AND THE JUDICIAL BENCH.

(Illustrated. 450 pp.)

Gives particulars of results at last two General Elections and at all Bye-Elections, Biographies of M.P.'s, Judges of High Courts, County Courts and Colonies, Recorders, &c., &c. Cloth gilt, 7s. 6d.

DEAN & SON, Limited, 160A, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

SELECTIONS FROM

ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD'S PUBLICATIONS.

WORKS BY DR. MACLAREN.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 5s. each, post free.

THE GOD of the AMEN, and other Sermons.

"The several sermons contained in this volume are replete with a keen spiritual insight, combined with an aptness of illustration and beauty of diction which cannot fail to both impress and charm the reader."
Methodist Times.

THE BEATITUDES, and other Sermons.

"An excellent exposition of the Beatitudes.....full of thought and knowledge and power."
British Weekly.

THE UNCHANGING CHRIST, and other Sermons.

"Distinguished by the finest scholarship and most exquisite literary finish."—Christian Leader.

CHRIST'S "MUSTS," and other Sermons.

"Felicitous exposition, rugged, intense eloquence, and beautiful illustration."—Word and Work.

PAUL'S PRAYERS, and other Sermons.

"They are plain enough to be understood by the unlearned, and yet have sufficient richness and cogency to attract the most cultivated."
New York Observer.

London: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, Limited, 21 and 22, Furnival Street, Holborn, W.C.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS
2% on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2%

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS
2½% on Deposits, repayable on demand. 2½%

STOCKS AND SHARES.
Stocks and Shares Purchased and Sold for Customers.
The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.
Telephone, No. 5, Holborn.
Telegraphic Address, "Birkbeck London."

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S LIST.

NEW SIX-SHILLING BOOKS.

1. A JILT'S JOURNAL. By "Rita," Author of "Vanity." "The Confessions of a Court Modiste."
"I feel it is the best book I have ever written."
Extract from a letter from the Author.
2. A DOUBLE CHOICE. By James BAKER, Author of "The Cardinal's Page," &c.
3. UNPROFESSIONAL TALES. By "NORMYX."
4. SOULS of PASSAGE. By Amelia E. BARR.
5. BY ROCK and POOL. By Louis BECKE.
6. WHY NOT, SWEETHEART? By JULIA W. HENSHAW (Julian Durham).
7. NINE UNLIKELY TALES for CHILDREN. Told by E. NESBIT, Author of "The Treasure Seekers." Pictured by H. R. MILLAR.

TWO FIVE-SHILLING BOOKS for the YOUNG

TWO BUSYBODIES: a Chronicle of the Adventures of Hilary and John Chippendale Craven. By Mrs. S. G. ARNOLD.

MARGARET HETHERTON. By E. L. KIESOW. With Frontispiece.

FASCINATING STORIES OF GARRISON LIFE IN INDIA.

THE ROMANCE of a HILL STATION, and other Stories. By Mrs. H. S. LAVERTON (Valette). Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.
"The garrison stations of India are proverbially centres of romance, and these stories present, in a light and interesting way, a picture of life and love there. Sometimes the results are happy; often they are tragic."
"The author, who has for some years resided at Lucknow and Ranikhet, has had many opportunities of studying the varied phases of garrison life there, with the result that these stories are eminently true to life."

DE OMNIBUS. By the Conductor (Barry PAIN). Cloth, 2s.; paper, 1s.

THE LOVE LETTERS OF AN EMPEROR.

JOSEPHINE, EMPRESS of the FRENCH. By FREDERICK A. OBER. Fully Illustrated. Cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

AN IMPORTANT BOOK OF TRAVEL.

IN TIBET and CHINESE TURKESTAN. By Captain DEASY. Fully Illustrated. Cheap Edition, cloth, 6s.

London: T. Fisher Unwin, Paternoster Square, E.C.

'Twixt Plate and Lip;

OR,

The Common Sense of Eating.

A Health Hand-book for Every Day,
With Special Advice as to Diet and Regimen in Health and Sickness,
A Popular Summary of the Symptoms of Dyspepsia and Indigestion,
And a Note on the Scientific and Rational Treatment of those Ailments.

12th EDITION.

 This little book may be recommended to the general reader as a sound and safe guide to the common sense management of the stomach. The Publishers, at 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, will be pleased to send a free copy to any reader of the Academy. Early application necessary.

LONDON:
46, HOLBORN VIADUCT, E.C.

Digitized by Google

CASSELL & COMPANY'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

THE FINEST ART PUBLICATION OF THE CENTURY.

In Fortnightly Parts, price 7d. net.

THE NATION'S PICTURES.

A Selection from the Finest Modern Paintings in the Public Galleries of Great Britain.

Each Part will contain Four Pictures beautifully reproduced in Colours, with descriptive text printed on separate tissues.

Part I., ready Oct. 9th; Part II., Oct. 30th; and fortnightly thereafter.

 A Full Prospectus will be sent on application to the publishers.

CASSELL'S UNRIVALLED DICTIONARIES.

CASSELL'S FRENCH DICTIONARY. (French-English and English-French.) 595th Thousand. 1,150 pages. Cloth, 3s. 6d.; half-morocco, 5s.

CASSELL'S GERMAN DICTIONARY. (German-English and English-German.) 277th Thousand. 1,120 pages. Demy 8vo, Cheap Edition, cloth, 3s. 6d.; half-morocco, 5s.

CASSELL'S LATIN DICTIONARY. (Latin-English and English-Latin.) 132nd Thousand. Cheap Edition, 3s. 6d.; half-morocco, 5s.

ENGLISH.

Thirty-first Thousand.

A FIRST SKETCH of ENGLISH LITERATURE. By Prof. HENRY MORLEY. 7s. 6d.

THE STORY of ENGLISH LITERATURE. By ANNA BUCKLAND. Cheap Edition. Cloth boards, 3s. 6d.

FRENCH.

An Entirely New and Revised Edition.

CASSELL'S LESSONS in FRENCH. By JAMES BOIELLE, B.A. Parts I. and II., each 2s.; complete in 1 vol., 3s. 6d.—KEY, 1s. 6d.

LATIN.

THE NEW LATIN PRIMER. By Prof. POSTGATE, with the co-operation of C. A. VINCE, M.A. 2s. 6d.

THE FIRST LATIN PRIMER. By Prof. POSTGATE. 1s.

LATIN PROSE for LOWER FORMS. By M. A. BAYFIELD, M.A. Being a Series of Exercises adapted to the New and First Latin Primers. Fourth Thousand. Price 2s. 6d.

HISTORY.

A HISTORY of ENGLAND. By H. O. ARNOLD-FORSTER, M.A., M.P. Fully Illustrated. 5s.; or handsomely bound, cloth gilt, 6s. 6d.

"When we consider the book, and the price asked for it, we can only marvel that so excellent a work can be offered for so small a sum."—The Schoolmaster.

PAINTING.

LANDSCAPE PAINTING in WATER-COLOUR. By J. MacWHIRTER, R.A. With 23 Coloured Plates. 5s.

CASSELL'S EDUCATIONAL CATALOGUE will be sent post free on application.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C.

JARROLD & SONS' NEW BOOKS.

NOW READY.

WAGNER BAYREUTH, and the FESTIVAL PLAYS.

WITH SPECIAL PHOTOGRAVURE PORTRAIT OF WAGNER.

By FRANCES GERARD. Illustrated. 3s. 6d.

Author of "The Romance of King Ludwig II. of Bavaria," &c.

"Miss Gerard has done her work thoroughly well with a sympathetic insight into the value of Wagner's work."—Daily News.

JUST PUBLISHED.

A Story of "Life in New England."

MEMORY STREET.

By MARTHA BAKER DUNN. 6s.

Author of "Sleeping Beauty," "Lia's Wife," &c.

"A story delineating New England character, full of the local atmosphere at its best. A charming story. The novel is bright and alert."—Boston Times.

NOW READY.

GOD'S REBEL.

By HULBERT FULLER. 6s.

Author of "Vivian of Virginia," &c.

A POWERFUL STORY OF SOCIOLOGICAL QUESTIONS.

The scene is laid in Chicago, the hero being a Professor in "Rockland University, who protests against the unequal distribution of wealth and the wretched condition of workmen. His after career as a leader of labourers who are fighting to obtain their rights, is described with great earnestness."

READY SHORTLY.

HALIL THE PEDLAR

(THE WHITE ROSE).

By MAURUS JOKAI. 6s.

Translated by R. NISBET BAIN.

With a special Photogravure Portrait of JÓKAI.

The theatre of the story is Stambul in the eighteenth century, and every phase of life in the great metropolis is described with singular fidelity.

From the Swedish of Zacharias Topelius.

THE KING'S RING. 6s.

Translated by SOPHIE OHRWALL and HERBERT ARNOLD.

With a Photogravure Portrait of the Author.

Being an Account of the Great Thirty Years' War.

London: JARROLD & SONS, 10 and 11, Warwick Lane, E.C.

F. V. WHITE & CO.'S LIST.

NEW & POPULAR NOVELS.

Price 6s. each.

JOHN STRANGE WINTER'S NEW NOVEL, THE MAN I LOVED.

THE JOSS:

A Reversion.

By RICHARD MARSH.

QUEEN SWEETHEART.

By Mrs. C. N. WILLIAMSON.

THE MAJOR-GENERAL:

A Story of Modern Florence.

By MONTGOMERY CARMICHAEL.

THE KING'S SECRET.

By RICHARD HENRY SAVAGE.

DOL. SHACKFIELD.

By HEBER K. DANIELS.

F. V. WHITE & CO., LTD., 14, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

HURST & BLACKETT'S NEW BOOKS.

TO THE SOUTH POLAR REGIONS.

Expedition of 1898-1900.

By LOUIS BERNACCHI, F.R.G.S.

In 1 vol., demy 8vo, with numerous Illustrations from Photographs by the Author, and 3 Charts of the Antarctic Regions.

Price 12s. net.

[Ready September 16th.

TO THE MOUNTAINS OF THE MOON.

Being an Account of the Modern Aspect of Central Africa and some little-known Regions Traversed by the Tanganyika Expedition in 1899 and 1900.

By J. E. S. MOORE, F.R.G.S.

1 vol., crown 4to, with numerous Illustrations and Maps.

Price 21s. net.

THE HEARTS OF MEN.

By H. FIELDING,

Author of "The Soul of a People," &c.

1 vol., demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

[Ready September 16th.

NEW AND POPULAR NOVELS.

STRAWS IN THE WIND.

By CARLTON DAWE,

Author of "The Yellow Man," "The Mandarin," &c.

1 vol., crown 8vo, 6s.

THE CALL of the FUTURE

By Mrs. BERTRAM TANQUERAY,

Author of "Hoya Corney," &c.

1 vol., crown 8vo, 6s.

THE LITTLE TIN GODS.

By JESSIE E. LIVESAY.

1 vol., crown 8vo, 6s.

"The inquiring reader must turn to Miss Livesay's book, which he will undoubtedly find most entertaining and fresh."—Scotsman.

BLOOM OR BLIGHT.

By DOROTHEA CONYERS,

Author of "The Thorn Bit," &c.

1 vol., crown 8vo, 6s.

"The author gives some capital descriptions of hunting and racing scenes, and there is altogether an attractive 'out of doors' element about the book which gives it an atmosphere of its own."—World.

POOR ELISABETH.

By M. HAMILTON,

Author of "A Self-Denying Ordinance," &c.

1 vol., crown 8vo, 6s.

"M. Hamilton is a practised writer, and her last story is admirably constructed."

Manchester Guardian.

"People should read 'Poor Elisabeth.'"

St. James's Gazette.

BEQUEATHED.

By BEATRICE WHITBY,

Author of "The Awakening of Mary Fenwick," &c.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

1 vol., crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

HURST & BLACKETT, LIMITED, 13, Great Marlborough Street, W.

Digitized by Google

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1532. Established 1869. 14 September, 1901. Price Threepence.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

THERE is every prospect of a generous publishing season. We shall publish our usual Special Number containing the classified lists next month. In the lists we have already received we note the following interesting volumes :

The Life of Pasteur. By Rene Vallery-Radot.
The Life of R. L. Stevenson. By Graham Balfour.
An Illustrated History of English Literature. By Richard Garnett and Edmund Gosse. Four vols.
Some Women I Have Known. By Maarten Maartens.
Poems. By Arthur Symons.
Hypolympia; or, The Gods in the Island. By Edmund Gosse.
Sermons. By T. E Brown.
Poems. By Alice Meynell.
Robespierre. By Hillaire Belloc.
New Canterbury Tales. By Maurice Hewlett.
Sons of the Sword. By Margaret L. Woods.
The Garden of Olives. By Kassandra Vivaria.

CHRISTMAS books, too, have begun to shape themselves along our shelves—a dozen of them. One of the most attractive is Fables and Folk Tales from an Eastern Forest, collected and translated by Mr. Walter Skeat. These were taken down from the lips of the Malay peasantry, in the twilight of their own tropical jungle, during the progress of the Cambridge Expedition of 1899 through the remoter States of the Malay Peninsula. The illustrations by Mr. F. H. Townsend are delightful.

LORD KITCHENER has something else to do than cultivate a style when he is inditing despatches. Still, his use of the word "bag" the other day to describe the week's sum of killed, wounded, captured, and surrendered Boers was regretted by many. No doubt it is difficult to find a word at once accurate and comprehensive. Why not, instead of "the total bag," have written "our total advantage"?

M. HUYSMANS, the author of La Bas and En Route, is as unfortunate as his heroes. We hoped that he had found rest at last with the Benedictine friars in the Abbey of Ligugé. But it was not to be. Owing to the Associations Bills, the Benedictines are to migrate to Belgium. And Joris Karl Huysmans must leave the cell he built alongside the abbey, where "I have spent three peaceful and comforting years; where I wrote the story of the Saint of Schiedam; where, also, I have prepared my next novel, L'Oblat." "Next month," he said to a correspondent, "I return to Paris. I hate the hum of the automobile, and will get into the remotest corner on the right bank of the Seine. Paris is preferable to Ligugé once the monks have gone. I can always take refuge in Saint Severin or Notre Dame, and the chants will make me forget the motor-cars."

WE take the following from an advertisement on the front page of an American paper, suppressing merely the title of the book : "—— is unquestionably the greatest work of the author of —— and ——. It is a brilliant character study, a story of tremendous dramatic power, a love-story, and a tale of curious psychological interest."

WE have received from Paris, under the imprint "Editions de la Revue Blanche," a volume bearing this title-page :

NOUVELLES CONVERSATIONS DE
GŒTHE
AVEC ECKERMANN
1897-1900

The volume is modelled on Eckermann's monumental work. Browning, Kipling, Daudet, Anatole France, Ibsen, Maeterlinck, Sardou, Zola come in for a share in the talk.

WE understand that Mr. Fisher Unwin, who has recently purchased the English Illustrated Magazine from the proprietors of the Illustrated London News, proposes to transform it into a monthly literary magazine.

THE edition of Shakespeare which Mr. Henley is preparing for Mr. Grant Richards will present a noble appearance. The comely page will be folio size. It will be printed by Messrs. Constable on "sunny-white" hand-made paper. The issue will be in forty parts, or ten volumes, and limited to 640 copies for this country.

MRS. MEYNELL, who sailed in the St. Paul last Saturday for New York en route for California and Mexico, will deliver one lecture, of an hour's length, in San Francisco and in certain colleges of the United States. The subject is "The Transition Period in Poetry from the Seventeenth to the Eighteenth Century." American life and scenery seen through the eyes of the author of The Rythm of Life will have a particular interest. Articles on this subject will appear in the Pall Mall Gazette, in the columns of which for many years Mrs. Meynell wrote a weekly "Autolycus."

MR. JOHN DAVIDSON'S second "Testament" will be issued on September 18. It is entitled The Testament of a Man Forbid. The third, due in December, will be The Testament of an Empire-Builder.

MRS. G. W. STEEVENS, widow of the war correspondent, has a volume ready entitled A Motley Crew : Reminiscences, Observations, and Attempts at Play-Writing. The section, "The Opinions of an Old Lady," is based on the writer's recollection of Mrs. Oliphant.

MESSRS. CONSTABLE send us the second volume of Mr. Birrell's edition of Boswell's Life of Johnson, which we confess we had supposed was new. As there is nothing whatever to indicate that it is a reprint, and as editions of Boswell are many, we pardon ourselves for the mistake, and the Daily Chronicle, which has also treated the edition as a new one, will doubtless feel as blameless as we do. What is new in the edition is the body of excellent illustrations chosen by Mr. Ernest Radford. They are accompanied by the "Preface," to which we took exception last week on the ground that it is more of the nature of an appendix than a preface. Mr. Radford seems to think that we complained that his preface is not long enough. Nothing was further from our mind. But it is not a "Preface."

Digitized by Google

It is believed that Dr. Ibsen's illness is fatal. A stronger word than "believed" is used by some, by Dr. Georg Brandes, for instance, who has written a very interesting letter to a friend in New York dated June 24 of this year. Dr. Ibsen is writing his apologia, writing it against time, and writing it in the secrecy of his room and of his own counsels. "Even his attendants," we read, "must retire to the opposite end of the room while he is working." Dr. Brandes' letter is quoted as follows in the excellent "Lounger" columns of the New York Critic. The letter is dated from Christiania:

> Literary affairs here are in a state of suspended animation. Ever since the illness of Henrik Ibsen has been pronounced as incurable (i.e., for over three months) a pall seems to have fallen upon all authors. People here still refuse to believe that the vigorous old man whom they used to see daily sitting at his window or on the balcony of his café sipping his cognac is doomed; that his life is to last but a few months only at the best. Nothing in the past could be compared with the intense interest everybody takes in Ibsen's condition. Bulletins are posted three times a day, and an eager crowd is reading them silently and sadly.
>
> Three physicians, the most eminent medical men of the city, are attending him, the State bearing all expenses. Flowers, fruit, rare old wines, and delicacies continue to arrive at his house. Hundreds of personal inquirers come daily. Of all these attentions Ibsen is told, and he appreciates them very greatly. Nearly all day he rests in bed or on a lounge, being unable to move his legs. It is pitiful to see how helpless the old man is. He has become irritable beyond conception. He is quarrelsome, and finds fault with everything and everybody. But his mind is not affected. It is just as clear and sharp as it used to be, and he works almost daily for two hours. He is writing the ἀπολογία of his life (ἀπολογία, not apology).
>
> Whether this will be a drama or an essay no one knows and he himself will not tell. With characteristic stubbornness he refuses the aid of an amanuensis and writes every word himself. No man has yet been allowed to read it. Even his attendants must retire to the opposite end of the room while he is working. . . . In one of his fits of anger he recently began to destroy the MS. of his autobiography, and it took the combined efforts of all his friends to save his notes and the greatest part of the MS. Björnsterne Björnson is a daily visitor in Ibsen's sick room; the feud between them has ended, and their relations with each other are of the most cordial nature. No man congratulated Björnson more heartily and more sincerely at the success of "Laboremus" than did Ibsen. . . .

King Alfred Millenary numbers will doubtless be the order of the day when the forthcoming celebration at Winchester is over. One of the first papers to announce such a number is the Friend, the organ of the Society of Friends, to whose peace-loving members the memory of Alfred necessarily makes a strong appeal. The number will be published on October 4, and will be illustrated.

Except for its first and final chapters Mr. E. A. Bennett's book of critical essays, just issued by Mr. Grant Richards under the title Fame and Fiction: an Enquiry into Certain Popularities, has in its substance appeared in the Academy as a series of critical "Enquiries." The first paper, entitled "The 'Average Reader' and the Recipe for Popularity," which is now printed for the first time, sets forth the defects of the average reader of fiction under several heads:

> The first and worst is that he has no sense of beauty—that is, the beauty of form. He ignores it, not only in imaginative literature, but in every art, and in life. The most atrocious ugliness does not annoy him, and he has a blind spot in his eye for beauty. Perhaps the utter collapse of architecture, the most influential of all the arts, has something to do with this condition of things; perhaps it is only an effect. But whatever the cause, the result is desolating for fiction. . . .
>
> Another limitation, scarcely less serious, is the inability to retire from an art-work and perceive it as a whole. Our reader's attention is always diverted from the main contour by trivial accessories. If the accessories amuse or impress him, then all his well; if the accessories are not striking, that is to say, if he is not titillated with reasonable frequency, then nothing is well. Make him laugh or cry, or shudder or think, sufficiently often, and you need trouble about nothing else. Omit to attend to these matters, and you may have written the Antigone, but it will not be read.
>
> Further, the average reader has some of the instincts of the untutored savage. To employ the terminology of other arts, he likes glaring tints; he prefers the chromograph to the oil painting. Drums and trumpets will please his ear better than any orchestra of strings. He wants crudity, and he does not want fine shades. Unless he is knocked down, or blinded, or deafened, he does not consider that he has been impressed. And in particular he desires and will have crudity of sentiment. For him sentiment cannot be too gross, too cloying in its sweetness, too sickly in its pathos. All popular writers are highly sentimental, even those who most industriously pretend to be otherwise. Nothing has contributed more surely to the vogue of Mr. Rudyard Kipling among the majority than his constant abuse and falsification of sentiment.
>
> Lastly, the average reader does not care to have the basic ideas of his existence disturbed. . . . He is capable of a personal animus against the novelist who with too much suddenness invites him to readjust his scheme of things. A book of revolutionary ideas sometimes succeeds enormously, but it is a success of scandal. If you wish to tell the average reader that the earth is round, you must begin by hinting that it has occurred to you that perhaps there is the slightest conceivable curvature in the flatness of it; but no violence, no haste, no directness! On the other hand, though he resents a shock, he does not resent dulness. I am convinced that the average reader is seldom bored except by what is beyond his comprehension. In order to be bored, one must be sufficiently alert to know when one is bored; but the average reader is too somnolent to be self-analytic. From the relatively exciting portions of a book he acquires a momentum of interest which will carry him without fatigue through illimitable expanses of dulness. This strange phenomenon explains why some of the most prodigiously dull novels ever penned have achieved a firm and honourable popularity.

These remarks are certainly shrewd, and well grounded on what we believe to be the experience of close observers. Mr. Bennett's other new paper is an appreciation of the novels of Mr. George Moore.

"The Essay on Mood and Form" is the subject of an article by Mr. Richard Burton in the Forum. Mr. Burton has not much that is new to say. He has a healthy conviction that Lamb is inimitable and alone, and he is right in distinguishing between the true discursive essay and the thought-laden organised compositions of Carlyle or Matthew Arnold. He is right in thinking that Franklin had in him the makings of a true essayist. There are things in Franklin's books which are simply surprising. "Deflected by utility or emoluments" is a good phrase by which to describe the divergence from the true essay of many of the writings of Mr. Dobson, Mr. Lang, Mr. Gosse, Mr. Barry Pain, and Mr. Le Gallienne. Among later Victorian writers Mr. Burton thinks that the essay in his special sense—that is, the button-holing essay—is found in the books of shy men like Alexander Smith and Richard Jefferies rather than in such as are "more noisily famed." We are therefore rather surprised by Mr. Burton's concluding injunction: "When a real essayist arrives, let him be received with due acclaim, and thanks special." In any case, why not special thanks?

Professor Oscar Lovell Triggs, of Chicago University, has been in hot water in consequence of some remarks on literature and great writers which he addressed to his pupils, but which speedily wandered to the ears of editors. He is reported as saying that Mr. Rockefeller is greater than Shakespeare; that the hymns of evangelical churches are all doggerel; and that Longfellow wrote "drivel." These remarks sound sufficiently rash, but the one about Shakespeare and Rockefeller carries in its very extravagance an assurance that it was made in some paradoxical sense. And, indeed, Prof. Triggs has hastened to explain it in a letter to the New York Saturday Review. His reply, which strikes us as at once sound and unsound, is this:

Digitized by Google

> I really cannot understand why the juxtaposition of the two names mentioned should arouse controversy. It may be that in the public mind a poet is supposed to be a maker of verses, a manipulator of rhymes, a juggler with fine phrases, and therefore something essentially different from a secular business agent, a manipulator of immense physical properties. But I am accustomed to use the term poet—the "maker," that is—to describe not only one who moulds the forms of language, but also the painter, the sculptor, and the musician; and again not the artist alone, but also the inventor, legislator, or religious prophet. The word poet is properly a generic name for all who create. The limitation of its use to writers of verse is both unfortunate and unwise, since such limitation tends to exalt the versifier — often a contemptible fellow enough—too far above his associates and further to obscure the essential relations existing between all persons who exhibit the creative spirit. At the time of making the comparison reported I was referring to Shelley's Defence of Poetry, which is generally acknowledged to be the finest essay in English treating of poetry and the poet. "Poetry," Shelley observes, "is the expression of the imagination and is connate with the origin of man." And all who display imagination, the higher creative sense as distinguished from the logical reason, Shelley declares are poets. He describes philosophers, like Plato and Lord Bacon, as poets, and in one place institutes a comparison between Cæsar and Homer, asserting that the true poetry of Rome lived not in Horace, Catullus, or Ovid, but in its institutions.
>
> Where, now, are the "makers," the originators, the poets in American history? Poe and Whitman perhaps in the field of literature; Washington and Lincoln, let us say, in respect to politics; Story and Marshall in the courts of law; Mrs. Eddy in the realm of religion. Plainly the creative spirit does not manifest itself greatly in these fields. We are inheritors of literature, laws, politics, and religion. We brought with us, for instance, the distinction between Catholicism and Protestantism, and inherited all the disputes of the Protestant sect. We have created nothing new in religion unless it may be "Christian Science." It seems to me that in one respect only have we been inventors and "makers." What we are creating on this continent is an industrial democracy. The real "poets" are working in the field of industry, and upon the structure of the ideal commonwealth. A thousand others besides Mr. Rockefeller might be mentioned as showing the direction of the social energy. Some day the same social energy may issue in literature, and a greater than Shakespeare may arise in the Western world. But meanwhile the best explanation I can offer my classes of the absence of a Shakespeare in America is that the Shakespeare energy is to-day absorbed in other than literary activities. Is America in the twentieth century to be considered less in the total of its energy than England in the sixteenth century?

This as applied to literature is rather poor stuff; but as applied to America it is rather good stuff.

THE Professor's reply about Longfellow will strike different people differently. It seems that he only said: "Longfellow's poetry is of a minor order," a proposition with which we entirely agree. He adds:

> The criticism in force to-day is largely derivative from New England. Not content with writing the greater volume of our verse, the Eastern men have imposed their critical judgment upon the people at large. Recently there have been signs of a shifting of emphasis. Longfellow is losing importance, and writers like Riley are gaining. In Longfellow's sense of poetry Riley has not written poetry so much as a new and more democratic sense he has depicted life. In some way life has got into a book, with its own rhythms and accents; and the book does not read like a book, but is known like a person. The humanisation of poetry may count for more in the twentieth century than does Longfellow's poetisation of humanity.

THE September number of East London Antiquities is of more than ordinary interest. An article by T. Forster, on "East London and the Forest of Epping," shows that at one period this ancient woodland, then known as the Forest of Essex, came right up to the borders of East London. It is difficult to imagine the neighbourhood of Bow as a sylvan retreat, but it is on record that the stag was once hunted in that parish. Mr. Forster traces the gradual dwindling of the Forest, and gives some curious information about old landmarks. A valuable contribution is that by Mr. Thomas Downs, who has been termed "the historian of Stepney." He discourses on Maritime Stepney, and tells the story of the great navigators who have been connected with Stepney in the days of old. Among other articles may be mentioned those on Old East Ham, by T. Forster; Nicholas Culpeper, the Spitalfields herbalist and astrologer; and "Brick Lane, Whitechapel," by "Rex" and C. P. Hale. The magazine is published at 6d., by Mr. W. A. Locks, East London Advertiser Office.

To the Westminster Gazette Mr. Alfred J. Church has imparted, after forty years of literary work, some interesting particulars of his profits. These might be pondered with advantage by any young man who thinks of living by his pen. As a matter of fact, Mr. Church has made the greater part of his income by other occupations, but he is convinced that if he had given his whole time to the making of books his earnings would have been only a little, and certainly not proportionately, larger. As Mr. Church has produced, singly or in collaboration, sixty-odd volumes—of which his Stories from Homer, Stories from Virgil, &c., are the best known—we can well believe this. It was as a compiler of school-books that Mr. Church began literary work forty years ago. He produced eight school-books of which a quarter of a million copies have been sold, and his total profits were £670. Turning to more popular work, Mr. Church has been a most industrious producer of "books for the young," among them the two books we have named, and many adaptations of classics, stories of Greek and Roman personages, &c. He reports:

> For these I have received between four and five thousand pounds. The most lucrative has been the first published, Stories from Homer, the total for which is, up to the present date, £741 12s. I may remark that the royalties on these books are necessarily small, the cost of production being largely increased by the illustrations. I receive for a book published at five shillings sevenpence farthing, and for one published at three shillings and sixpence fourpence three-farthings. The amount of copies sold I cannot give accurately, two of the books having been sold outright; but I may say that of the most popular about 25,000 have been sold. I will not weary my readers with further details about my books, but will give at once the total figures. The volumes which I have written alone, or in collaboration, amount to sixty-two (of which about 800,000 have been sold), and the whole amount received for them may be stated approximately at £6,650. Dividing this sum by forty—the years during which I have been at work—I arrive at an average of £166. This is not an imposing figure—it has seemed incredibly small to more than one collector of taxes, but then these gentlemen take optimistic views about the incomes of other people. It certainly goes to prove the truth of the remark that literature by itself is but a poor occupation. If I had given my whole time to it, the pecuniary results would have been somewhat, but not proportionately, larger. An author must limit his output. As it is, my sixty-odd volumes may seem to some—and they sometimes seem to myself—preposterously numerous. It is only fair to say that I make no complaint against publishers. I have had dealings with several houses. I have commonly met with fair, and sometimes with generous, treatment.

Digitized by Google

Contrast these figures with those which are frequently furnished concerning the profits of successful novelists! One of Mr. Church's statements concerning school-books is interesting. He says that his most profitable school-book was the one which cost him least labour. It was, in fact, merely a book of elementary exercises. But "the more elementary the book the greater the return."

MEMDOUH BEY, a celebrated Turkish poet now in London, has been talking about the decline of poetry in the Sultan's dominions. The Daily Mail reports his remarks as follows. It will be seen that they give Mr. William Watson another opportunity for a startling sonnet:

> The decadence dates from the accession to the throne of the present Sultan. Until that time there existed in Turkey not only a classic literature, but a school of artists and musicians; but so baleful has been the influence of the Sultan's rule that all have been practically destroyed, as als› have chemical, astronomical, and even geographical researches.
>
> No one dares to publish a book of any literary value. Every writer is suspected of political motives and is immediately subject to persecution should he attempt to write anything but commonplaces. The result is that nothing appears except worthless pamphlets eulogising the Sultan and his system.
>
> It is in vain for thinkers to protest that the views to which they desire to give expression are those already propagated by Ruskin, by Voltaire, by Racine, and other great writers; the only result of such protests is to secure the prohibition of all the works of these authors in Turkey.
>
> In consequence of this all the chief literary men of Turkish nationality have either suffered persecution or been obliged to become exiles in foreign lands. The Sultan is particularly hostile to poets, notwithstanding (perhaps because of) the fact that his imprisoned brother, Murad Effendi, is a poet of no mean ability. He is also a clever musician.
>
> There was formerly a good supply of typical Turkish music, but it is now a thing of the past. There are writers and poets and artists of great potentiality, but they are at present held fast bound by the existing system.

It is understood that Memdouh Bey is about to publish a Turkish political newspaper in London, in which some of his own poetry will appear. We can well believe that "the great difficulty which Memdouh Bey is experiencing is to find a compositor capable of setting-up Turkish type."

Bibliographical.

MR. ANDREW LANG has just been telling us in Longman's that he "doesn't know what G. P. R. James did write." Such confessions of ignorance are good for the literary man's soul. As for the circulation secured originally by James's romances, that, I should say, would be difficult to discover at this time of day. Meanwhile, these facts may be noted: that, in 1881, Messrs. Routledge thought it worth while to reissue eight of James's tales at two shillings each; that in 1887-8 they reissued four at sixpence each; that in the same year Messrs. Warne reissued six of James's stories; that in 1888 Messrs. Dicks reprinted his Richelieu at sixpence; and that his Convict was reprinted in 1890, his Agincourt, Rose d'Albret, and The Forgery in 1891, and his Woodman in 1892. No competent critic could claim for James a high place in the hierarchy of fiction; but that is a very different thing from the disparagement which is based on non-acquaintance with his work. A good deal of contemporary criticism, unhappily, is founded upon a similar lack of knowledge.

It is rather tiresome to find the London daily papers, one after the other, talking of Mr. T. B. Aldrich's "Mercedes" as "a new play." To begin with, it is not, properly speaking, a play at all; it is little more than a dramatic episode in two scenes, the first of which is a duologue. As for its novelty, it was published in volume form at Boston, U.S.A., in 1883. It is also to be found in the volume by Mr. Aldrich published in England by the Macmillans in 1891, and entitled The Sister's Tragedy, and Other Poems. "Mercedes," by the way, was to have been played in London a month or two ago under the auspices of Mr. J. T. Grein, but the arrangement fell through.

The old story of the nervous young barrister, who began his address to the bench with the reiterated phrase, "My unfortunate client, my lord—my unfortunate client," and t whom the judge promptly observed, "So far, sir, the Court is with you," has turned up again in the newspapers, the judge being identified with a legal dignitary of our day. As a matter of fact, the tale was told originally of Lord Ellenborough, and its authenticity may be said to be vouched for by Sydney Smith's comment on the judge's sarcasm (see the Life by Lady Holland). "This was, perhaps, irresistible; but yet, how wicked! how cruel! It deserves a thousand years' punishment, at least!"

Dr. Sebastian Evans must have a very keen liking for that delectable comedy, "Le Monde où l'On s'Ennuie." Some years ago, in collaboration with his son, he produced an English version of the work, to which he gave the name, not very appetising, of "Culture," and which was duly represented (or, rather, misrepresented) one afternoon at a London theatre. Now, I see, he announces another version, made by himself and a new collaborator, to which he has given a new and better title. Whether it is intended for the stage or not we are not told.

Talking of the stage, I note, with some surprise, that in the discussion, of late, about Mr. Phillips's "Paolo and Francesca," and Signor D'Annunzio's "Francesco da Rimini," no allusion was made to the tragedy on the subject by the American writer, G. H. Boker. I have not read Boker's work, and can scarcely believe that it had poetry in it; but his attempt, at least, deserves some recognition. It seems to have been well received by his compatriots.

"George Paston" has done good service in drawing attention anew to N. P. Willis's Pencillings by the Way, which dates as far back as 1835. Willis was an inveterate gossiper—vide his People I Have Met, which came out in 1850. (Famous People I Have Met was, you will remember, the title of a book of small talk produced by Mrs. George Augustus Sala in 1892.) "George Paston" should now make a readable article out of Mrs. Beecher Stowe's Sunny Memories of Foreign Lands. She has struck a literary vein which should yield a large measure of very tolerable ore.

A slight measure of bibliographical interest attaches to the new edition of Mr. Seaman's Horace at Cambridge. Apart from the general revision to which the edition of 1895 has been subjected, there is the fact that Mr. Seaman has, in the new volume, omitted one of the original nineteen "Horace" pieces, and introduced a "poem" (as he calls it), entitled "Quis pro Domina?" published in 1897. The omitted piece is "Of the Travail of a Maker of Iambics."

The article in last week's ACADEMY on Horace Smith's Tin Trumpet reminds me that so recently as 1890 Messrs. Routledge had the good sense to bring out a new edition of that readable little book. It would be interesting to know if copies are still obtainable.

THE BOOKWORM.

Digitized by Google

Reviews.

The Lady of Riddles.

Mary, Queen of Scots. By Samuel Cowan. 2 vols (Sampson Low. Net 28s.)

THE extraordinary fascination exercised by Mary, Queen of Scots, is inexhaustible. Regardless of the enormous number that exist already, a new biography of her can never be superfluous, because, to say the last word either upon her career or her personality is practically impossible. The murder of Darnley is an unsolved problem: her marriage with Bothwell is one of the most impenetrable mysteries of history; while the character of the woman herself is as unexplained as anything in the dramatic disorder of her existence.

To penetrate its intricate dilemmas and remain unmoved would be extremely difficult. Investigation of the truth concerning her rouses instant excitement, for, as a matter of fact, the fascination of the woman did not die with her, and her biographers, like her contemporaries, unable to feel indifference, are inclined either to hate or to love her. In the majority of cases they do the latter, for Mary's charm is enormous, the more so that, like her beauty, it is a thing more felt than seen, a thing curiously indefinable, and, therefore, insidious, haunting, like a fever in the blood, the brain is unable to reach or to cope with.

Was she guilty, cruel, secretive, a wonderful combination of passion, cunning, lies, and deception? On the other hand, was she a tortured, tender, sinless creature, fighting single-handed against a very sea of hate, intrigue, and treachery? Or was she a little of both—a little passionate, a little rusée (she had been brought up in a Court where cunning was a fine art), a little cruel, and at the same time more innocent than guilty, more deceived than deceiving, more driven by fate than desire into horrible and inextricable situations—a woman, in fact, for whom pity cannot be too profound or unqualified? The question has never been finally answered, and she still draws interest with the undying fascination of the unexplained, enticing always a half-rasped curiosity and a burning inclination either to love wholeheartedly or to hate unreservedly; her character, quite as much as her guilt or her innocence, having been torn piecemeal by speculation and controversy.

Mr. Cowan's two new volumes, moreover, have not minimised in the slightest degree the old uncertainty. Though they deal essentially with the supreme secrets of the Casket letters and the Bothwell marriage, we are no further in the matter than we were before. Mr. Cowan, it is true, does not believe that Mary either wrote the letters or was other than a piteous victim in the Bothwell abduction. But neither does Hosack, Strickland, Tytler, and many others, while Skelton only credits her with a part—and that a non-incriminating part—of the famous correspondence. Except, therefore, a deepened sense of the universal lying and baseness of the period, and of the mass of spurious documents and invented statements everywhere mixed up with the truth—in fact, an intensified conviction of the extraordinary difficulties of arriving at an opinion at all—Mr. Cowan's book must be held to give us little fresh upon the subject, while certainly it throws no new light upon the wonderful, pathetic creature herself.

His manner of writing also has a slight excess of confidence for a subject so beset by contention. Mr. Cowan's brevity seems scarcely thoughtful enough to employ in a study where no opinion can be accepted lightly; where every opinion, in fact, must be laboriously explained and justified. In this new work upon Mary there is a tendency to forget that no statement can be presented as if contradiction were out of the question. For every statement has been contradicted, every opinion weakened by an opposite, every document even practically given the lie to by another with a different story.

Later on, as the subject grows in dramatic intensity, the writer's style acquires more weight of manner. Nevertheless, taken as a whole, and in spite of the inclusion both of the Riccio bond, with its incriminating signatories, and the gracious letter, presumably the last ever written by the maltreated Queen, its literature seems to us one more volume ardently expressing belief in Mary's innocence, and little more. What Mr. Cowan has done, however, that is of new and valuable service, is to procure an admirable collection of photographs of Mary herself, though it is strange, that having got them together he remained dead to the opportunity they afforded of an entirely original study of this singular historical episode. For lives of Mary based upon ancient documents are many and voluminous. And the end of them all is virtually a confession that the mystery of her career is beyond solution by research. Nothing reported can be relied upon, so widespread was the treachery bred by the times, her position, and the bitter friction between herself and Elizabeth. One may believe her innocent, one may believe her guilty, according to the documents selected to rely upon—certainty is out of the question.

But a Life of Mary, Queen of Scots, written by the light of her temperament, has yet to be written, and her temperament a collection of her portraits puts well within the reach of understanding; for, though a good many of them undeniably differ, the large majority are absolutely alike, both as to the essential characteristics and as to the general impression conveyed. And the face and the life have an amazing congruity, while it must be remembered no existence can wriggle outside of the moulding grip of character. Its results must be produced undeviatingly within the limits of the nature dealing with it. Ambiguity is impossible in the consequences of a limpid, simple disposition, while interminable confusion issues invariably where motives are fluctuating, dubious and complicated.

Mary's face is in all her portraits, above all, the face of a woman capable of retaining many secrets. It is rather a cruel face, and that of a creature who would never be wholly what she seemed. At the same time it is intellectual, artistic, and of an astounding subtlety—a subtlety so extreme, indeed, that it is doubtful whether even she ever quite understood her own character or its consequences.

The oval of her face is delicately voluptuous. There is no firm outline of jaw to give strength or decision. Her nose is too long and too pointed, with a downward tendency at the end, expressive of a certain grim insentiveness. Her chin is slightly over-small, her forehead slightly too high and too large. Coolness, self-possession, and a rather exceptional mental capacity, might be expected from the upper part of the countenance, but the little chin—it is said to have been slightly dimpled—reveals, more than anything, a desire to be loved much and often, to be loved sub rosa sooner than not at all.

As for the eyes, it is impossible conscientiously to regard them as either spiritual or candid. For that matter they are not even beautiful, though they are incontestably attractive. Dangerously so even, because there is no fathomable end to their expression. But in nearly all the portraits they are small and sly, with a certain pitiless tranquillity, and an undesirable habit of looking sideways. Her mouth is small, fascinating, with a full under-lip; supremely, again, the mouth of a woman with a liking for kisses, though the manner in which the upper lip closes over the lower discloses also an immense capacity for self-suppression. The eyebrows are refined and delicate, the hair exquisite and full of a delightful emotionability. Taken as a whole, however, and in spite of its abounding possibilities, Mary's appearance emphatically denies the saint theory, though at the same time it suggests strongly that should a new biographer investigate her life with careful reference to her character, some, at any rate, of its present incomprehensibilities might become comprehensible, and certainly its love affairs, its disasters, its interminable complications.

Digitized by Google

What we should like to see would be a life of Mary taking the tendencies of her disposition for guide wherever records are confusing, a life daring to believe it as at least possible that she was not entirely ignorant of the scheme to do away with the detestable Darnley; a life deliberately putting the Casket letters on one side as documents impossible to form a reliable judgment upon, and then having the courage to write of her with tenderness and sympathy. For, granted even that she was very guilty, judged by the standards of guilt as they are to-day, the life of Mary that should be written would never attempt to estimate her by these standards at all. Murder, to begin with, is a totally different affair now to what it was in Mary's time, when torture of every sort was a common practice. From early childhood the girl's nerves had been toughened to violent deaths, to burnings, and to every kind of atrocity. Human life was held of so little account that men, women, and children were exterminated upon every conceivable pretext. Executions were common, whippings, and the use of the rack commoner still, while the savageness of the age seemed to create a positive lust for bloodshed. To Mary the signing of death warrants was part of the day's business, and occurred too frequently even to stir imagination. At an early stage of her reign she had sent to their deaths Chastelard and Sir John Gordon, and, viewed from present standpoints, they were both unspeakably cruel actions. Certainly, few women would have the stomach to behead a man—young, poetical, and good looking—merely for the sin of having loved them too inordinately.

Besides recognition of the enormous difference in civilisation, there is one other essential fact to remember as regards Mary—that is, Scotland's own unutterable culpability in the business of her life. Nothing, indeed, is sadder or more piteous than the accounts of Mary's existence when she first came, full of the ignorant confidence of youth, into her dreary kingdom. Bitterness and treachery confronted her almost at the landing-stage. From the beginning sour-looking faces condemned the radiant vitality of her girlhood. Knox actually denounced her to her face from the pulpit, thundering against "the Queen's dancing, and little exercise of herself in virtue and godliness," while the whole Court—harsh, austere, and suspicious—must from the very earliest days have chilled to the marrow her irrepressible young life.

In remembering her conduct it should be remembered how pitiably at bay she stood in that cheerless country—she, who had just come from a Court where love-making, flattery, and a joyous lightness, had enveloped her like a perfume—surely she had more excuse than most people, not only in plucking sweetness from whatever roots she could, considering how rare it was, but in taking also a certain natural zest in defying for her part, also, these contemptuous bigots, who had lowered lids at her with not one whit less derision, when she had first come, as a blameless juvenile, into their depressing society.

But more, perhaps, than any, the Bothwell incident would gain by being rewritten with due regard to her temperament and to the appalling circumstances of her life at the time of its occurrence. During the period of her seclusion in a room draped with crêpe, after the Darnley murder, the very doors of the churches were rendered pictorial with coarsely coloured caricatures of her, while the question as to the degree of fascination a nature such as Bothwell's might have temporarily exercised over her can only be realised when the amazing complexity of her character has been definitely acknowledged. That the man possessed enormous force of personality is undeniable, and the lower part of Mary's face suggests a woman likely to surrender to the relentless power of it. Bothwell was a brute: and there is a certain type of woman to whom indomitable brutality is irresistible. When everything has been said, also as to his terrifying her into consenting to the marriage, one important fact is forgotten—the fact that this queer, ambiguous lady possessed a magnificent and unflinching courage. Her superb fearlessness, in fact, is the one thing about her uncontested; the one quality nobody has denied, either during her lifetime or afterwards. Never in all the various dangerous vicissitudes of her existence was she ever known to be cowered and intimidated. Her death was exquisite, so tranquil and undisturbed that its courage is more prominent than its ghastliness.

Could so intrepid a woman have been coerced by terror? The question is not asked with a view of being answered, because in all the accumulated mass of statements there is nothing to render a reliable answer possible. The Bothwell marriage, like all the rest, remains a mystery, surrounded, it is true, by suspicions, but not actually condemnatory circumstances. For from these same circumstances her partisans draw one set of conclusions, with admirably plausible reasons for maintaining them, and her adversaries another, also with extremely plausible reasons for conviction. But certainly a passionate nature—and Mary's face is that of a passionate woman—might, under certain circumstances, become a prey to the horrible fascination of a Bothwell. In any case, she was a supremely interesting woman, but it is at least questionable whether, if only a certain faultiness could be accepted sympathetically, the fine achievement of her spiritual development during the agonised years of her captivity would not make her more deeply piteous than she ever could be as the colourless saint of so many advocates.

Personally, we think that Mary, judged with allowances for the peculiar environment of her times, could hold her own unwhitewashed, were it only as a woman possessing superlative fascination, superlative patience and dignity, and an inimitable lovableness towards all those who constituted her friends and adherents.

The American Epic.

John Gildart. By M. E. Henry Ruffin. (New York: W. H. Young & Co.; London: R. & T. Washbourne. 6s.)

THE publishers think well of this work. That is really understating the case. For when we caught sight of its preliminary announcement we knew it was on the cards, as it were, that we were on the very threshold of a new literary epoch. It is not every century that sees the birth of a national epic, and as this journal, though of respectable and discreet age, was too late to greet the advent of the Iliad or even of Paradise Lost, it was a joyous moment when we went in search of the "Great American Epic" in the hope—neither sure nor certain—of finding it at the nearest booksellers. "The Great American Epic," so the announcement runs. "There had been only four epics written—viz., the Greek, the Latin, the Italian, and the English." It is rather unkind to leave out the Epic of Hades. For thus proceeds the announcement: "John Gildart is the world's fifth epic. It is the only American epic, and the only one ever written by a woman." An accompanying note, too, comes from the author, in which occurs this passage: "Quite an interesting question has been raised by the literary people on this side as to whether John Gildart is the American epic, which so far has not been written." Now here is a bolt to come from the serene blue of the dull season. If the American epic has been written, even Mr. Hall Caine must take—temporarily—a second place; for this is the moment of a thousand years.

Digitized by Google

What is an epic? When we had procured John Gildart, and had spent a quarter of an hour in his company, we began to suspect that neither publisher nor author knew, or that if they knew, they were skilful in concealing their knowledge. Without venturing on a final definition, it will be enough to say that Homer, Virgil, Dante, and Milton have set the fashion in epics, and have worn them full and long. They have taken each a big subject, the clash of nationalities, the birth of Imperial races, the relations of earth to heaven, and have risen to the height of that great argument, as Milton's phrase runs. Moreover, they have gone to considerable length. One might emphasise other points about epic poems, but these will suffice. Now the American epic, which you would expect to be the biggest thing in epics ever put upon the market, turns out to be a very small affair, being little longer than one of the four and twenty books of the Iliad. It is true there are hints of a big subject in Mrs. Henry Ruffin's poem, for the American Civil War was big enough, bigger than the seige of Troy, and when it has finally "won its way to myth" it will form the subject of the great American epic, should that epic ever be written. But here we have a mere sentimental story, accidently connected with the Civil War. John Gildart marries Ruth, and takes her to his mountain home, and presently come rumours of the opening struggle to the peaceful cottage.

> Through the night,
> Upon the silver silence of the hills,
> The little cottage flashed out like a gem.

Many such pretty little lines occur. John Gildart determines to enlist. After many months' hard fighting he hears that his wife is in trouble. So John, determined to visit her, goes for permission to his commanding officer. The general was asleep; and John reflects thus:

> "What matters his permission?" thought poor John,
> "He would not grudge me one short visit home
> After my year of fighting; and he would
> Not—no—he could not—bid me stay, when Ruth,
> My wife, so needs me; and—I cannot wait.
> I came unsought, willing and glad to come.
> But now—O God! my wife!—my Ruth! how can I stay?"

Unfortunately for simple hearts like John's, commanding officers grudge short visits home to men on the eve of important engagements. And John, when he returned, found himself shot as a deserter. Nor can we simulate much regret for a young man so stupid that a year's soldiering had not taught him the elements of discipline, which require personal emotion to be subordinate to the general good. But we may sympathise with Ruth, who comes to find her husband dead, and takes him home to his mountain cottage. It makes a pretty short story; and a conscientious search of the American magazines would discover that short story many times told. Such a short story might conceivably be told in verse, though we can suggest no reason why it should, even with such interspersed lyrics as these, which have but to be seen to be avoided:

> As we pause to leave the day at eve,
> And watch it lovingly out of sight,
> A deeper day may steal away,
> And life drift down to a deeper night.
>
> As we bid good-bye to each sunset sky,
> In our sigh unconscious tears may dwell;
> All the crimson and gold that life can hold,
> May be fading away their own farewell.

"In our sigh unconscious tears may dwell." For all the confusion of literary landmarks there remains a distinction between magazine verse and the world's epics, and such lines as that would make a magazine editor hesitate. It is the word "epic" which irritates one. And one would rather criticise the publisher than the writer, whose question whether John Gildart is the American epic is more pathetic than comic. "There is no teacher," writes the publisher, "who would object to having such poetry written by a former pupil. No minister would object to having such literature emanate from his parish. No parent would be ashamed of the child who produced it." Every word of that is absolutely true. Teachers, parents, and the clerical editors of parish magazines, will find no word in John Gildart that deserves erasure. That does not imply that anyone else will find a word worth reading.

Poor Louise.

An Episode on a Desert Island. By the Author of Miss Molly. (John Murray. 2s. 6d. net.)

> I am writing to you to-night because, for many months now, after any episode, or crisis of thought or emotion, I have grown accustomed to turn to you for its comprehension or its translation, and it is difficult to abandon the habit; but the letters, if these scattered thoughts grow into letters, will remain unposted, and if either of us read them it will be I myself in some far-off, undefined future.

Thus the beginning; and as all the book is in the form of letters, with soft flaps to the cover, and a green water-silk book-marker dangling between the leaves, and as it is published by Mr. John Murray, it is not difficult to place An Episode on a Desert Island. It is a love-letter book. The young woman who writes them is well-to-do and well-bred. One Theodore Bassett has aroused a passion in her not very young heart, a passion which Mr. Bassett was apparently unable to reciprocate. He behaved quite nicely, and went away without fuss. Louise was left leaning over the window "like the Blessed Damozel" thinking of him, and the "so much" that he stood for in her life. For the rest of the book she is annoyed by the attentions of Mr. John Elton, a bounder, but capable and popular. He wears a blue suit and puts the proper kind of questions to engineers and such people. Louise's family wish her to marry him, but Louise is faithful to Mr. Bassett. At this juncture she joins a pleasure party on the yacht Miranda, bound for San Francisco, and is much annoyed to find that John Elton is one of the guests. The yacht is run down by a steamer, and Louise, Mr. Elton, and a sailor are cast ashore on a desert island. The bounder behaves very well, so well that Louise allows him to kiss her, and by the time they are rescued by a liner she is engaged to him. But the fine qualities that Elton showed as a castaway disappear on board the liner. Louise breaks off the engagement, and as their intimacy has become a nine days' wonder, she, to right herself in the eyes of the absent Mr. Bassett, tells the whole story in these letters, and seals them in a packet, to be opened after her death. But Mr. Bassett returns to England, and on the last page we gather that Louise posted them to him. The packet will place Mr. Bassett in rather an awkward predicament. We wonder what he will do.

The story told in the letters is not in the least poignant. Indeed, it is mainly amusing. The characterisation is neat, and Louise is more humorous than she thinks. None, not even a heroine with a blighted heart, should write such a sentence as, "My voice is a rich, unhappy contralto." The volume is described as being by the author of Miss Molly, which does not help us. But we take the author of Miss Molly to be a woman. Only a woman could make a man say to another man, in the smoking-room of an ocean steamer: "She doesn't like his goings on. And I'll back C. to win. She's a pertinacious chit, I know. I believe that he's given her the chuck, and that's why she's so offish." The characterisation of the book, as we have said, is good, but the handling of the wreck and the desert island episodes are as mild as a chapter in the Girl's Own Paper.

Digitized by Google

Decadante.

Elizabeth, Empress of Austria and Queen of Hungary. By Clara Tschudi. Translated by E. M. Cope. (Swan Sonnenschein. 7s. 6d.)

THE popular biographer of royalty exists apart in a workshop of his own. The mere panegyrist falls short, the mere truthsome person or calumniator fails to attain the mark of the biographer's calling. The ideal popular biographer tells the best with unction, and never omits to contradict the worst. The biographer, to be successful, must appeal at once to the tears that gush from the surface of our emotions and to the reptile that struggles a little deeper for his provender.

These remarks bubble up in this place with no immediate reference to the work in hand, except so far as that Miss Tschudi has made a special place for herself in the exposition of regal ladies. Marie Antoinette, Eugénie, and the spouse of the first German Emperor, have been passed by her in review, and she has won praise for her presentment of each. But, like the exceptional host, she has kept the best vintage till the last. In the presence of Elizabeth, who in Hungary has, they say, already superseded in the Magyar affections her namesake of the Middle Ages, these other valiant women by comparison are merged in the grey.

This brilliant woman of ideals and superabounding activities was first cousin to Ludwig II. of Bavaria, the mad patron of Wagner, the hero and victim of a thousand follies and scandals. The hereditary malady of her family would seem almost from the beginning to have tainted her troubled life. She was beset by the dread of the fate which she refused to believe had fallen upon him, with whom, long after he had become for the rest of mankind a hermit, she maintained a personal relation of innocent romance. In a life of easy obscurity she might have been a happy woman; but the jar of a punctilious court, wherein as a child bride she was received with scantily veiled hostility, was fatal to the equipoise of so delicate a temperament. Even the solace she might have found in the care of her little children was denied her by the harshness of madame mère. She fell back upon literature and horsemanship, pursuing them with a feverish energy that frustrated their natural good effects. In the eyes of the world she became ridiculous; and her familiarity with the men and women of the circus gave abundant matter for vile comment. On the one hand, she loved incognita to visit and relieve the afflicted; on the other, she must fly from town to town, from village to village; must build herself villas and castles against the intrusion of natural curiosity, and ride her headlong horse-races against the demon of insomnia behind the shelter of a fan.

Passionless in the common sense, and innocent of every shadow of coquetry, she prized her rare beauty; but she dressed plainly, and wore thick boots. She grew up, by her own confession, the most ignorant princess in Europe; she died a woman of learning. She loathed the business of politics, and did more than any soul of her contemporaries to knit the bonds of the dual monarchy. Her husband made her Empress of Austria, she made herself a shrine in the hearts of the Magyar peoples as Queen of Hungary. The fear of madness, of old age, of painful and lingering death, clouded her last years; the merciful dagger of a nameless imbecile ended her fears while yet she was the Elizabeth of a people's heart.

Fiction.

The Octopus. By Frank Norris. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

THIS is one of the most exciting novels that we have read for a long time. If you demand thrilling incident, here it is, in plenty. Even the description of the ploughing of the Californian wheat ranch—thirty-five ploughs, five shares and ten horses to a plough, the whole accomplishing seven hundred miles of furrow per day—even this mere description has the quality of a sensational episode. As for the holding-up of the vestibule-flyer by a single robber, the sudden apparition of the mad broncho-buster at Annixter's big barn-dance, the pursuit and capture of Dykes the murderer by a sheriff's posse, the interview between the angry Ranchers' League and their representative who had ratted to the Railroad—such things are done with a large, free, tumultuous movement which would make the fortune of a feuilleton. We mention the book's baser merits first; we wish to have it clear that Mr. Norris is never within miles of dulness, that he is always telling a story. This fact being established, we proceed to state that Mr. Norris has produced on a vast scale a really remarkable study of national manners. One of the principal characters in this Californian novel is a young poet named Presley, whose ideas were probably not dissimilar from Mr. Norris's.

> Something (to his idea not much) had been done to catch at that life in passing, but its poet had not yet arisen. The few sporadic attempts, thus he told himself, had only touched the key-note. He strove for the diapason, the great song that should embrace in itself a whole epoch, a complete area, the voice of an entire people, wherein all people should be included—they and their legends, their folk lore, their fightings, their loves and their lusts, their blunt, grim humour, their stoicism under stress, their adventures, their treasures found in a day and gambled in a night, their direct, crude speech, their generosity and cruelty, their heroism and bestiality, their religion and profanity, their self-sacrifice and obscenity—a true and fearless setting forth of a passing phase of history, uncompromising, sincere; each group in its proper environment; the valley, the plain, and the mountain; the ranche, the range, and the mine—all this, all the traits and types of every community from the Dacotas to the Mexicos, from Winnipeg to Guadalupe, gathered together, swept together, welded and riven together in one single, mighty song, the Song of the West. That was what he dreamed, while things without names—thoughts for which no man had yet invented words, terrible formless shapes, vague figures, colossal, monstrous, distorted—whirled at a gallop through his imagination.

Here is something of the Whitmanesque spirit which has animated Mr. Norris. He evidently sought for a vast natural subject, and he was fortunate enough to find it, in wheat. The Octopus is the first of a trilogy of novels. The second novel, The Pit, will deal with the distribution of wheat from the "wheat-pits" of Chicago; the third, The Wolf, will deal with the relief of a famine in an Old World community. The whole is the "Epic of the Wheat." It would be difficult, after all, to discover a more elemental theme than that of food. The Octopus portrays the growing of wheat on ranches of incredible acres, and the long fight between the growers and the railroad about freight-rates. This feud, and nothing else, is the main topic of the novel. If you wish to know whether freight-rates can be made interesting, read the book. There are love-stories in it, too, and very fine ones, but these are quite subsidiary. The railroad (the "octopus") by dint of corruption and relentless chicane, wins everywhere: one is made to see how an unscrupulous railroad can stifle the industries of a State. The final result is a whole congeries of tragedies. And yet, when Presley, full of dark wrath, goes to Shelgrim, the mighty "boss" of the railroad, in order to give him a piece of his mind, Shelgrim silences him in a few words:

Digitized by Google

> "Try to believe this—to begin with—that railroads build themselves. Where there is a demand, sooner or later there will be a supply. Mr. Derrick, does he grow his wheat? The Wheat grows itself. What does he count for? Does he supply the force? What do I count for? Do I build the Railroad? You are dealing with forces, young man, when you speak of Wheat and the Railroads, not with men. There is the Wheat, the supply. It must be carried to feed the People. There is the demand. The Wheat is one force, the Railroad another, and there is the law that governs them—supply and demand. Men have only little to do in the whole business. Complications may arise, conditions that bear hard on the individual—crush him, maybe—but the Wheat will be carried to feed the people as inevitably as it will grow."

Mr. Norris, through six hundred pages, hints often at the greatness of Shelgrim, and, at last, when Shelgrim is introduced for a few minutes, he actually makes him seem great—a rare feat. The moral conceptions of the reader are thenceforward enlarged, and the frightful scenes which he has witnessed take their proper place as mere trifles in the great life of that organism which is the United States. "Men were naught, death was naught, life was naught; FORCE only existed—FORCE that brought men into the world, FORCE that crowded them out of it to make way for the succeeding generation, FORCE that made the wheat grow, FORCE that garnered it from the soil to give place to the succeeding crop." That seems to be Mr. Norris's watch-word, Force. There is much more force than beauty in this extremely powerful novel, and yet not a little beauty also. The author has clearly been influenced by the earlier work of Zola. If Zola had written The Octopus the literary world would have rung with its Titanic excellence. As it is, Mr. Norris will probably have to wait for his due of appreciation. He can afford to wait. The Octopus is not faultless; it is somewhat too loquacious, it lacks restraint, and the poetically-just death of the railroad representative at the end is a sad blot on it; but it is a brave thing, and a decisive victory over all sentimentalism. It is alive. You cannot do what you like with it; you have got to read it. For ourselves, we await The Pit with eagerness.

Ever Mohun. By Fred T. Jane.
(Macqueen. 6s.)

THE expert in titles would guess from this title that the Mohuns (Mō-hoons) had been either famous or notorious in ages past, and that Mr. Jane had written a novel about a modern Mohun in whom the family characteristics strikingly survived. The expert would be wrong in his reasoning, but correct in his conclusion. The Mohuns of the story are ever Mohun, but "Ever" is the highly singular name of the sweet girl-heroine. Mr. Jane is a thorough-going sentimentalist, and he writes about a lad and a lass in a Devon orchard with primeval and ungrammatical gusto. He writes:

> And, thinking of these things my mind goes back to the orchard, to the sunshine on the blossom, and the air full of its sweet smell. Primroses thick on every hedgerow, passing now, and looking big and sad as ever they do at their dying; little green sprouts on all the bushes, and the blossom of the orchard falling in pink showers at every little wind-puff. And in this orchard I see like a picture, as I saw them on the day in my mind's eye now, a lad growing tall and big, and a little maiden nigh lost in her great sun-bonnet. Brown eyes and light-brown hair, not a mixture often to be seen, but to they two a token of their birth and name. For the lad was Roger and the maiden Ever Mohun.

Having created the "old-world" atmosphere, he at once tries to render it modern by means of the bicycle and other wonders of recent applied science; and then, when the mood of adventure is exhausted, he returns to "the orchard once more." And he writes:

> "It cannot be, Tom," she said sadly. "But always I will love thee, dear."
> "Don't talk nonsense. It can be, and it will be, Ever. Why d'you say it cannot?"
> "I be no lady, Tom," she said. "Would thee have to wife a maiden of whom thee wast ashamed?"
> He laughed. "What? Ashamed of the loveliest and prettiest and sweetest little darling in all the whole world? And she the Lady Ever Mohun!"
> Ever shook her head. "I be but a village maid," she said, "and thee the squire."
> He kissed her with a cry of "Nonsense!"
> And she let him kiss her, and there was love in her eyes as he kissed her under the apple trees.

We boldly state that we would rather con Mr. Jane's annual catalogue of all the world's fighting ships than hear his variations upon that instrument which Mr. Meredith has called a penny whistle. Mr. Jane's talent does not seem to us to be at all in the direction of fiction. He holds the sailor's and soldier's view of the English maid as something daintily compact of innocence and lilies pouting half-blown under boskage. Though, in fact, dead as Ariadne, the pretty, milky creature survives for him, and her apparition will ruin every novel he writes.

The Luck of the Vails. By E. F. Benson.
(Heinemann. 6s.)

THIS is what we roughly classify as an "uncle" book. From time immemorial the wicked uncle has helped out the story-teller, as the mother-in-law has aided the jester. Mr. Benson, in his latest story, stands in the following of the Babes in the Wood and Uncle Silas, so far as motif is concerned, while in manner his lightness of touch—let us stick to our uncles—is of the school of Mr. Wells's Select Conversations with an Uncle, and is quite refreshing after the lumbering melodrama of even more popular writers. For this is melodrama without a doubt. The "Luck" of the Vails is a mysterious goblet, encrusted with precious stones, which in the life of the Vail family is alternately lost and found. Upon the goblet is this inscription:

> When the Luck is found again,
> Fear both fire and frost and rain.

Young Lord Vail finds the Luck by accident, but does not at first worry himself with the threat—or the grammar—of the legend. But at the same time Uncle Francis, the next heir, comes upon the scene, an old gentleman of benevolent appearance and engaging, though somewhat exaggerated, manners. He takes up his abode with his affectionate nephew, who is forthwith assailed by the most amazing series of disasters from "both fire and frost and rain." Meanwhile, Uncle Francis is most solicitous for his nephew's welfare, rejoices in his hairbreadth escapes, and is devoted to his flute. Uncle Francis has a grim habit of tootling gaily upon his flute at the crisis of his most diabolical plans, and the melodramatic touch is most effective. There is an old house, too, with secret passages, in which the plot is worked out, and at the end a most exciting scene of the midnight hide-and-seek order. But, after all, we are not sure that we do not like Mr. Benson best when he remembers that he once wrote Dodo, takes us away from wicked uncles, honeycombed houses, and mysterious goblets, to London, and Lady Oxted and Evie Aylwin (in love with Lord Vail), and permits us to prattle in the best society.

Digitized by Google

Notes on Novels.

These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE HISTORY OF SIR RICHARD CALMADY. BY LUCAS MALET.

The first long and elaborate book by Lucas Malet since The Wages of Sin. The scene, which is laid in the moorland country of the northern part of Hampshire, in London, and in Naples, opens in the year 1842. The action covers a period of about three-and-thirty years, and relates the experiences and adventures of an English country gentleman of an essentially normal type of character, subjected—owing to somewhat distressing antecedent circumstances—to very abnormal conditions of life. An early chapter describes Sir Richard's birth, and the agony of his mother and her relations at the sight of his affliction. The story is long, leisurely, and minute. (Methuen. 6s.)

A UNION OF HEARTS. BY KATHARINE TYNAN.

Mrs. Hinkson can be depended on for poetic and humorous delineation of Irish life, and one tastes her qualities at once in sentences like these: "The double doors of Festus O'Moore's house at Raheenbeg stood hospitably open. A swallow flew in and out in low, rapturous flight. . . . A couple of logs from the log-box held the doors hospitably open. There were a good many people coming to ask for the O'Moore in these days. If the visitors were ceremonious, 'twas easier for them, having rung the bell, to step out of the sun and wait while Tim O'Rahilly, the butler, got into his shabby livery." (Nisbet. 6s.)

LOVE IDYLLS. BY S. R. CROCKETT.

Mr. Crockett in a sentimental mood ("the tricksy maid clapped her hands and laughed merrily"). The volume is beautifully printed, enclosed in parchment covers, and before beginning to read you must untie the green silk ribbands. One of the "idylls" is over a hundred pages in length, one about fifty, the others are short, and at the foot of each are neat little numerals stating the date when it was written. (Murray. 5s.)

FORTUNE'S DARLING. BY WALTER RAYMOND.

Mr. Raymond sticks to his own people. This story takes us to Somersetshire again, and deals with the tribulations and joys of Margaret Lane, who was locally known as "Fortune's Darling." Says the cobler's wife of her, "She do wear her soles to a hole right in the very middle. And that's a sure sign o' luck and her even disposition." And with the repetition of these words the book closes. A quaint and charming story. (Methuen. 6s.)

CARDIGAN. BY R. W. CHAMBERS.

An American historical novel of over five hundred closely-printed pages, by the author of The King in Yellow. It begins: "On the 1st of May, 1774, the anchor-ice, which for so many months had silver-plated the river's bed with frosted crusts, was ripped off and dashed into a million gushing flakes by the amber outrush of the springtide flood." Indians stalk through the pages—Mohawks, Cayugas, Senecas, Onondagas, and Tuscaroras." (Constable. 6s.)

RICKERBY'S FOLLY. BY TOM GALLON.

"London, on a wild and gusty night in early spring. A night on which shutters were blown down, and ——." This new novel by the author of Tatterley presents a series of pictures of the career of a man who, "coming to England on a merely quixotic mission, is plunged in a moment into the most extraordinary tragedy—and this, too, in the heart of a quiet suburb of London." (Methuen. 6s.)

A JILT'S JOURNAL. BY RITA.

The title fits the book, which is by the author of The Confessions of a Court Modiste. There were three girl friends—Claire de Creux, Lesley Heath, and "I, Paula Trent." Just as they were leaving school for good Paula, at the instigation of the others, decided to keep a journal. "You are a born scribbler," said Claire, "and you will be able to make even commonplace things picturesque." The journal is in three parts: "The Desire of Knowledge," "The Fruit of Knowledge," and "A Little Laughter, and a Little Love." (Unwin. 6s.)

BLUE BONNETS UP. BY THOMAS PINKERTON.

One more romance of Prince Charlie, with passages of humour. "It's an awfu' thing," said Hamish, "the deceitfu'ness o' reeches . . . it's no sae much the deceitfu'ness i' thersels: I never saw a saxpence change intil a deid leaf; it'll just change intil bawbees that'll buy as much; but it's what reeches bring aboot that's sae wearifu'. If people hae reeches ye hae to be poleet tae them; and they're seldom the maist interesting folk about ye; and they're always the maist exactin'." (Long. 6s.)

ROYAL GEORGIE. BY S. BARING-GOULD.

Mr. Baring-Gould's ———th story is full of squires and parsons of the days of George IV., and the lovers are called "suitors." The very names act like a signal to the investigating nose: Parson Thirkleby, Sir Thomas Tyrwhitt, Squire Hullett, Mrs. Hornblower. A Dartmoor love-story, a parson, a missing will, and the backgrounds loved of Mr. Dendy Sadler. (Methuen. 6s.)

THE WESTERNERS. BY STEWART E. WHITE.

Indians, half-breeds, miners, six-shooters, gulches, claims, and dedicated to Mr. Robert Barr.

"Where are you from?" he asked bluntly.

"Ontario."

"Woods?"

"Yes."

"I thought you wasn't no tenderfoot. Ever hit the trail?"

"Not on these plains. In the woods many times." (Constable. 6s.)

THE TEMPTRESS. BY WILLIAM LE QUEUX.

Mr. Le Queux packs his stories so full of gas-flare incident that it is difficult at a glance to discover the main thread. This one opens with a convict's wedding in New Caledonia, but it wanders to many parts of the world, including Soho. Adventure, incident, intrigue, and crime pulse through the book, and we suppose that our eye alights on one of its minor incidents when we read: "A local sensation was produced in the district between Denmark Hill and Camberwell Gate, and the devout parishioners prayed for the preservation and well-being of their popular but absent curate." (Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.)

MARGARET HETHERTON. BY E. L. KIESON.

This is one of those stories which begin with steady rain, some financial embarrassment, and a governess's ambitions. The result, however, is pleasant. As a bright and wholesome love-story, Margaret Hetherton will do. (Unwin. 6s.)

BAGSBY'S DAUGHTER. BY B. AND M. VAN VORST.

An amusing novel—an American importation, we fancy—for which we will say this much "right here": it contains the suddenest proposal of marriage that we ever met with in fiction or in life. It goes off like a spring-gun, and we do not wonder that Bagsby's daughter, Miss Viole Bagsby, "was too startled to start." (Grant Richards. 6s.)

Digitized by Google

Educational Supplement.

From Mr. Murray's Educational List.

MR. MURRAY'S NEW SERIES OF

SECONDARY EDUCATION TEXT-BOOKS.

Edited by LAURIE MAGNUS, M.A., Magdalen College, Oxford.

I.—COMMERCIAL FRENCH COURSE. In Two Parts.
By W. MANSFIELD POOLE, M.A., Magdalen College, Oxford, Assistant Master at Merchant Taylors' Schools, and MICHAEL BECKER, Professor at the Ecole Alsacienne, Paris, Author of "L'Allemand Commercial," and "Lectures Pratiques d'Allemand Moderne." With a Map.

Part I.—Consisting of Simple Sentences and Passages in French, with occasional Business Letters, arranged in a manner suited for Practical Teaching, and containing in an Appendix a clear System of French Grammar, with special reference to the Verb. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

Part II., comprising an Advanced Commercial Reader, will be duly announced.

II.—BRITAIN over the SEA. A Reader for Schools.
Compiled and Edited by ELIZABETH LEE, Author of "A School History of English Literature," &c.; Editor of "Cowper's Task and Minor Poems," &c. With 4 Maps of the British Empire at different periods. Price 2s. 6d.

IN PREPARATION.

III.—COMMERCIAL KNOWLEDGE. A Manual of Business Methods and Transactions. By ALGERNON WARREN.

IV.—AN INTRODUCTION to the STUDY of POETRY.
By LAURIE MAGNUS.

V.—THE SOIL. By A. D. Hall, M.A., Principal of the South-Eastern Agricultural College.

WORKS BY PROFESSOR T. D. HALL.

 A SCHOOL MANUAL of ENGLISH GRAMMAR.
With Historical Introduction, Copious Exercises, and Appendices. Carefully Revised Edition. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

 A PRIMARY ENGLISH GRAMMAR for ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS. With numerous Exercises and carefully graduated Parsing Lessons. A New Edition. Crown 8vo, 1s.

A MANUAL of ENGLISH COMPOSITION. With Illustrations and Practical Exercises. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.
New Edition ready immediately.

A CHILD'S FIRST LATIN BOOK. Comprising a full
Practice of Nouns, Pronouns, and Adjectives, with the Verbs. 2s.

 TRANSLATION at SIGHT; or, Aids to Facility in the Translation of Latin. Passages of Graduated Difficulty, carefully selected from Latin Authors, with Explanations, Notes, &c. 2s.

GREEK TESTAMENT READER. For Use in Schools.
Comprising consecutive Extracts from the Synoptic Gospels and Passages from the Epistles of St. Paul. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

The Eton College Series of School Books.

THE ETON LATIN GRAMMAR. For Use in the Higher Forms. By FRANCIS RAWLINS, M.A., Fellow of King's College, Cambridge, and Assistant Master at Eton College, and Rev. W. R. INGE, M.A., Fellow of Hertford College, Oxford. Revised Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE ETON ELEMENTARY LATIN GRAMMAR. For Use in Lower Schools. Compiled, with the sanction of the Head Master, by A. C. AINGER, M.A., Trinity College, Cambridge, and the late H. G. WINTLE, M.A., Assistant Masters at Eton College. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

THE PREPARATORY ETON GRAMMAR. Abridged from the above Work. Crown 8vo, 2s.

 A FIRST LATIN EXERCISE BOOK. Adapted to the Latin Grammar. By A. C. AINGER, M.A., and H. G. WINTLE, M.A. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

OVID LESSONS: being Easy Passages selected from the Elegiac Poems of Ovid, with Explanatory Notes by A. C. AINGER, M.A., and H. F. W. TATHAM, M.A., of Trinity College, Cambridge, Assistant Masters at Eton College. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

THE ETON HORACE. The Odes, Epodes, and Carmen Saeculare. With Notes. By F. W. CORNISH, M.A. In Two Parts. With Maps. Crown 8vo, 6s.
A sit is considered desirable that the notes should be used only in the preparation of the lesson and not in the class, they are bound up separate from the text.

 ETON EXERCISES in ALGEBRA. By E. P. Rouse
and A. COCKSHOTT, Assistant Masters at Eton College. Crown 8vo, 3s.

 ETON EXERCISES in ARITHMETIC. By Rev. T.
DALTON, M.A., Assistant Master at Eton College. Crown 8vo, 3s.
* KEY may be obtained by Authenticated Teachers on application.

JUST OUT.

AN HISTORICAL REVIEW OF THE DEVELOPMENT OF GREATER BRITAIN.

THE GROWTH of the EMPIRE. By A. W. Jose.
With over 20 Coloured and other Maps. Large crown 8vo, 6s.

JUST OUT.

The STUDENT'S MANUAL of ENGLISH LITERATURE.
A History of English Literature and of the Chief English Writers. Founded upon the Manual of THOMAS B. SHAW. A New Edition, thoroughly Revised. By A. HAMILTON THOMPSON, B.A., late Minor Scholar of St. John's College, Cambridge, and University Extension Lecturer in English Literature. With Notes, &c., &c. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

"Mr. Hamilton Thompson has performed a difficult task with success. The characteristics of thought and style in the Shaw Manual are retained, and the labour of revision has been done with evident care and thoroughness."—Standard.

"We have not detected a single case in which anything of importance has been passed over. In point of criticism, it is as sound as it is trustworthy with regard to facts, and so far, at least, as a necessarily cursory examination enables us to judge, the student may accept its literary judgments with perfect confidence.... Nor, though primarily intended for students, is it to them alone that the work appeals. No lover of English literature can fail to find it interesting; and his knowledge of the subject must be encyclopædic indeed if he does not find it instructive as well."—Glasgow Herald.

Little Arthur's Histories.

HISTORY of ENGLAND. By Lady Callcott. Revised
Edition. Continued down to 1878. With 36 Woodcuts. 16mo, 1s. 6d.

HISTORY of FRANCE. From the Earliest Times to the Fall of the Second Empire. With Map and Illustrations. 16mo, 2s. 6d.

HISTORY of GREECE. By A. S. Walpole, M.A.
With Maps, Plans, and Illustrations. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. [Just out.

Mrs. Markham's Histories.

HISTORY of ENGLAND. From the First Invasion by the Romans to 1878. With Conversations at the end of each Chapter. 100 Woodcuts. 3s. 6d.

HISTORY of FRANCE. From the Conquest of Gaul by Julius Cæsar to 1878. Conversations at the end of each Chapter. 70 Woodcuts. 3s. 6d.

HISTORY of GERMANY. From its Invasion by Marius to 1880. 50 Woodcuts. 3s. 6d.

Sir Wm. Smith's Smaller Manuals.

SMALLER HISTORY of ENGLAND. From the Earliest Times to the Year 1887. Revised and Enlarged. By RICHARD LODGE, M.A. With Coloured Maps and 68 Woodcuts. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

SMALLER HISTORY of ENGLISH LITERATURE.
Giving a Sketch of the Lives of our Chief Writers. By JAMES ROWLEY. Small crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

SHORT SPECIMENS of ENGLISH LITERATURE.
Selected from the Chief Authors and arranged Chronologically. By JAMES ROWLEY. With Notes. Small crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

SMALLER HISTORY of ROME. From the Earliest
Times to the Establishment of the Empire. Thoroughly Revised by A. H. J. GREENIDGE, M.A., Fellow of Hertford College, Oxford. With a Supplementary Chapter on the Empire to 117 A.D. by G. MIDDLETON, M.A., under the direction of Prof. W. M. RAMSAY, M.A., D.C.L. With Coloured Map, Plans, and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

SMALLER HISTORY of GREECE. From the Earliest
Times to the Roman Conquest. By Sir WM. SMITH. With Coloured Maps, Plans, and Illustrations. Thoroughly Revised by G. E. MARINDIN, M.A. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

SMALLER ANCIENT HISTORY of the EAST. From the Earliest Times to the Conquest of Alexander the Great. By PHILIP SMITH, B.A. With 70 Woodcuts. Small crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

SMALLER MANUAL of ANCIENT GEOGRAPHY.
By Canon BEVAN, M.A. With Woodcuts. Small crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

SMALLER CLASSICAL MYTHOLOGY. With Translations from the Ancient Poets, and Questions on the Work. By H. R. LOCKWOOD. With 90 Woodcuts. Small crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

SMALLER SCRIPTURE HISTORY of the OLD and the NEW TESTAMENT. In Three Divisions:—I. Old Testament History. II. Connection of Old and New Testaments. III. New Testament History to A.D. 70. Edited by Sir WM. SMITH. With Coloured Maps and 40 Illustrations. Small crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

 Mr. Murray's complete Illustrated Educational List will be sent post free on application.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

Digitized by Google

MACMILLAN & CO.'S

Text-Books for the Oxford and Cambridge Local Exams., The Oxford and Cambridge School Exams., London University, and College of Preceptors Exams.

LATIN.

Macmillan's Shorter Latin Course. First Part. By A. M. Cook, M.A. 1s. 6d.—KEY, for Teachers only, 4s. 6d. net. SECOND PART. By A. M. Cook, M.A., and W. E. P. Pantin, M.A. 2s.—KEY, for Teachers only, 4s. 6d. net.

Macmillan's Latin Course. By A. M. Cook, M.A., and W. E. P. Pantin, M.A. FIRST PART, 3s. 6d. SECOND PART, 4s. 6d. THIRD PART, 3s. 6d.—KEY, 4s. 6d. net.

Exercises in Unseen Translation in Latin. By W. Welch, M.A., and C. G. Duffield, M.A. 1s. 6d.

Macmillan's Elementary Latin-English Dictionary. By Rev. G. H. Nall, M.A. 3s. 6d.

Cæsar.—The Gallic War. Edited by Rev. John Bond, M.A., and Rev. A. S. Walpole, M.A. 4s. 6d.

—— The Gallic War. With Notes and Vocabulary. Book I. By Rev. A. S. Walpole, M.A. 1s. 6d. Books II. and III. By Rev. W. G. Rutherford, LL.D. 1s. 6d.

—— The Gallic War. Books II. and III. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. W. G. Rutherford, M.A. 1s. 6d.

—— The Gallic War. Book VII. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. J. Bond, M.A., and Rev. A. S. Walpole, M.A. 1s. 6d.

Cicero.—Catiline Orations. Edited by A. S. Wilkins, Litt.D. 2s. 6d.

—— De Senectute. With Notes and Vocabulary. By E. S. Shuckburgh, M.A. 1s. 6d.

Eutropius. Books I. and II. With Notes and Vocabulary. By W. Welch, M.A., and C. G. Duffield, M.A. 1s. 6d.

Horace.—Odes. Books I., II., and III. With Notes and Vocabulary. By T. E. Page, M.A. (Elementary Classics) 1s. 6d. each; (Classical Series) 2s. each.

Juvenal.—Thirteen Satires. Edited by E. G. Hardy, M.A. 5s.

Livy. Book I. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. H. M. Stephenson, M.A. 1s. 6d.

—— Book V. With Notes and Vocabulary. By M. Alford. 1s. 6d.

Phædrus.—Fables. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. G. H. Nall, M.A. 1s. 6d.

—— Select Fables. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. A. S. Walpole, M.A. 1s. 6d.

Sallust.—Catiline. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. G. H. Nall, M.A. 1s. 6d.

—— Catilina. Edited by C. Merivale, D.D. 2s.

Tacitus.—Histories. Books III.—IV. Edited by A. D. Godley, M.A. 3s. 6d.

Virgil.—Æneid. Book V. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. A. Calvert, M.A. 1s. 6d.

—— Æneid. Book IX. With Notes and Vocabulary. By H. M. Stephenson, M.A. 1s. 6d.

—— Bucolics and Georgics. Edited by T. E. Page, M.A. 5s.

—— Georgics. With Notes and Vocabulary. Book I. By T. E. Page, M.A. 1s. 6d.—Book II. By Rev. J. H. Skrine, M.A. 1s. 6d.

GREEK.

Macmillan's Greek Course. Edited by the Rev. W. G. Rutherford, LL.D. FIRST GREEK GRAMMAR. By the Rev. W. G. Rutherford, M.A. 3s. 6d. Or, Part I., Accidence, 2s.; Part II., Syntax, 2s.—EASY EXERCISES in GREEK ACCIDENCE. By H. G. Underhill, M.A. 2s.—SECOND GREEK EXERCISE BOOK. By Rev. W. A. Heard, M.A. 2s. 6d.—EXERCISES on the GREEK SYNTAX. By the Rev. G. H. Nall, M.A. 2s. 6d.

Macmillan's Greek Reader. With Notes, Vocabulary, and Exercises. By F. H. Colson, M.A. 3s.

An Introduction to Greek Prose Composition. By H. Pitman, M.A. 2s. 6d.—KEY, 5s. net.

Passages for Greek Translation for Lower Forms. By G. H. Peacock, M.A., and E. W. W. Bell, M.A. 1s. 6d.

The Acts of the Apostles. Authorised Version with Notes. By T. E. Page, M.A., and Rev. A. S. Walpole, M.A. 2s. 6d.

—— The Greek Text. With Notes. By T. E. Page, M.A. 3s. 6d.

Aristophanes.—Birds. Translated by B. H. Kennedy. 6s.

Euripides.—Alcestis. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. M. A. Bayfield, M.A. 1s. 6d. Edited by M. L. Earle, Ph.D. 3s. 6d.

—— Medea. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. M. A. Bayfield, M.A. 1s. 6d. Edited by A. W. Verrall, Litt.D. 2s. 6d.

—— Hecuba. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. J. Bond, M.A., and Rev. A. S. Walpole, M.A. 1s. 6d.

Herodotus. Book VII. Edited by Mrs. Montagu Butler. 3s. 6d.

Plato.—Republic. Books I.—V. Edited by T. H. Warren, M.A. 5s.

—— Crito and Phædo. Edited by C. H. Keene, M.A. 2s. 6d.

—— Euthyphro and Menexenus. With Introduction and Notes. By C. E. Graves, M.A. 1s. 6d.

—— Euthyphro, Apology, Crito, and Phædo. Translated by F. J. Church. 2s. 6d. net.

Nepos.—Greek Lives. Containing Lives of Aristides, Cimon, Miltiades, Pausanias, Themistocles. With Notes and Vocabulary. By H. Wilkinson, M.A. 1s. 6d.

Sophocles.—Elektra. Edited by Rev. M. A. Bayfield, M.A. 2s. 6d.

Thucydides. Book VI. Edited by E. C. Marchant, M.A. 3s. 6d.

—— Books VI. and VII. Edited by Rev. P. Frost, M.A. 3s. 6d.

—— Book VII. Edited by E. C. Marchant, M.A. 3s. 6d.

Xenophon.—Anabasis. With Notes and Vocabulary. Book III. By Rev. G. H. Nall, M.A. 1s. 6d.—Book IV. By Rev. E. D. Stone, M.A. 1s. 6d.—Book VI. By Rev. G. H. Nall, M.A. 1s. 6d.

SCIENCE.

Elementary General Science. By A. T. Simmons, B.Sc., and L. M. Jones, B.Sc. 3s. 6d. (Adapted to the London Matriculation Course.)

ENGLISH.

The Parts of Speech and their Uses. By H. W. Household, M.A. 1s. 6d.

Outline of English Grammar. By J. C. Nesfield, M.A. 1s. 6d.

Manual of English Grammar and Composition. By J. C. Nesfield, M.A. 2s. 6d.—KEY, 2s. 6d. net.

English Grammar Past and Present By J. C. Nesfield, M.A. 4s. 6d.—KEY, 2s. 6d. net.

Oral Exercises in English Composition. By J. C. Nesfield, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Shortly.

Junior Course of English Composition. By J. C. Nesfield, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Shortly.

ENGLISH—(continued).

Word-Building and Composition. By R. S. Wood. Book VII. 1s.

A First Book in Writing English. By E. H. Lewis, Ph.D. 3s. 6d.

A First Manual of Composition. By Prof. E. H. Lewis. 3s. 6d.

Second Manual of Composition. By Prof. E. H. Lewis. 4s. 6d.

A History of English Literature. By E. J. Mathew, M.A. 4s. 6d.

A Short History of English Literature. By Prof. G. Saintsbury. 8s. 6d.

Bacon.—Essays. With Introduction and Notes. By F. G. Selby, M.A. 3s.

Chaucer.—The Prologue. Edited by M. H. Liddell. 3s. 6d.

—— The Squire's Tale. With Introduction and Notes. By A. W. Pollard, M.A. 1s. 6d.

Defoe.—Robinson Crusoe. Edited by H. Kingsley. 2s. 6d.

Keary.—Heroes of Asgard. 2s. 6d.

Lamb.—Essays of Elia. First Series. With Introduction and Notes. By N. L. Hallward, M.A., and S. C. Hill, B.A. 3s.; sewed, 2s. 6d.

Macaulay.—Lays of Ancient Rome. With Introduction and Notes. By W. T. Webb, M.A. 1s. 9d. (Contains "Horatius" and "Lake Regillus."

—— Horatius. With Introduction and Notes. By W. T. Webb, M.A. Sewed, 6d.

Scott.—Ivanhoe. Border Edition. 3s. 6d.

—— The Lay of the Last Minstrel. With Introduction and Notes. By G. H. Stuart, M.A., and E. H. Elliot, B.A. 2s.

—— Marmion. With Introduction and Notes. By M. Macmillan, B.A. 3s.; sewed, 2s. 6d

—— Quentin Durward. Border Edition. 3s. 6d.

Shakespeare.—King Lear. With Introduction and Notes. By K. Deighton. 1s. 9d.

—— Henry V. With Introduction and Notes. By K. Deighton, 1s. 9d.

—— Julius Cæsar. With Introduction and Notes. By K. Deighton, 1s. 9d.

Spenser.—The Faerie Queene. Book I. With Introduction and Notes. By H. M. Percival. 3s.; sewed, 2s. 6d.

Tennyson.—In Memoriam. People's Edition. 1s. net; 8vo, sewed, 6d.

FRENCH AND GERMAN.

Macmillan's Progressive French Course. By G. E. Fasnacht. First Year, 1s. SUPPLEMENTARY EXERCISES, 1s. Second Year, 2s. Third Year, 2s. 6d.—KEYS, for Teachers only, 4s. 6d. net each Year.

French Course. By A. C. Poiré, First Year, 1s.

Macmillan's Progressive French Readers. By G. E. Fasnacht. First Year, 2s. 6d. Second Year, 2s. 6d.

Macmillan's French Composition. By G. E. Fasnacht. Part I., Elementary, 2s. 6d.—KEY, 4s. 6d. net. Part II., Advanced, 5s.—KEY, 3s. net.

Abridged French Grammar. By G. E. Fasnacht. 2s. 6d.

A French Grammar for Schools. By G. E. Fasnacht. 3s. 6d.

A Compendious Dictionary of the French Language. By G. Masson. 3s. 6d.

La Fontaine.—Select Fables. Edited by L. M. Moriarty, B.A. 2s. 6d.

Molière.—Les Precieuses Ridicules. Edited by G. E. Fasnacht. 1s.

A Public School German Primer. By Otto Siepmann. 3s. 6d.—KEY, 3s. 6d. net.

Macmillan's Progressive German Course. By G. E. Fasnacht. First Year, 1s. 6d. Second Year, 3s. 6d.—KEYS, 4s. 6d. net each Year.

Macmillan's Progressive German Reader. By G. E. Fasnacht. First Year, 2s. 6d.

Macmillan's German Composition. By G. E. Fasnacht. First Year, 2s. 6d.—KEY, 4s. 6d. net.

A Compendious German Grammar. By Prof. W. D. Whitney. 4s. 6d.

A Compendious German and English Dictionary. By Prof. W. D. Whitney and E. D. Edgren. 5s.

Commercial German. By F. C. Smith, M.A. 3s. 6d.

Hauff.—Die Karavane. Edited by H. Hager, Ph.D. 3s.

Goethe.—Iphigenie auf Tauris. Edited by H. B. Cotterill, M.A. 3s.

—— Iphigenie auf Tauris. Edited by C. A. Eggert. 3s. 6d.

Hauff.—Das Wirtshaus im Spessart. Edited by G. E. Fasnacht. 3s.

Lessing.—Minna von Barnhelm. Edited by Rev. C. Merk. 2s. 6d.

—— Minna von Barnhelm. Edited by S. W. Cutting. 3s. 6d.

Schiller.—Wallenstein. Edited by M. Winkler. 5s.

HISTORY AND GEOGRAPHY.

A First Sketch of English History. By E. J. Mathew, M.A. Part I., 449–1307. Part II., 1307–1689. Part III., 1689–1895. 2s. each. Complete, 3s. 6d.

A Primer of English History. By A. B. Buckley. 1s.

A History of England. By A. B. Buckley. 3s.

History of England. By Edith Thompson. 2s. 6d.

Analysis of English History. By Prof. T. F. Tout. 1s.

A Short History of the English People. By J. R. Green, LL.D. 8s. 6d. Also in Four Parts. With Analysis. 3s. each. Part I., 607–1265. Part II., 1265–1540. Part III., 1540–1689. Part IV., 1689–1873.

A History of Rome for Beginners. By E. S. Shuckburgh, M.A. 3s. 6d.

A History of Rome. By E. S. Shuckburgh, M.A. 8s. 6d.

The History of Rome. By T. Mommsen. Abridged for Schools by C. Bryans and F. J. R. Hendy. 7s. 6d.

A Primer of the History of Rome. By Bishop Creighton, D.D. 1s.

History of Rome. By G. W. Botsford. 6s. 6d.

A Primer of the History of Greece. By C. A. Fyffe, M.A. 1s.

History of Greece to the Death of Alexander the Great. By J. B. Bury, M.A. 8s. 6d.

History of Greece. By Prof. A. Holm. Authorised Translation, revised by F. Clarke, M.A. 4 vols. Vols. I.—III., 8s. net each. Vol. IV., 7s. 6d. net.

History of Greece. By G. W. Botsford. 6s. 6d. net.

Commercial Geography. By E. C. K. Gonner, M.A. 3s.

Geography of the British Isles. By Sir A. Geikie. 1s.

The Elementary School Atlas. By J. Bartholomew. 1s.

Class-Book of Geography. By C. B. Clarke. 2s. 6d; sewed, 2s. Without Maps, 1s. 6d.

Class-Book of General Geography. By H. R. Mill. 3s. 6d.

Geography of Europe. By J. Sime, M.A. 2s.

Elementary Geography of the British Colonies. By George M. Dawson, LL.D., and A. Sutherland, M.A. 2s.

MACMILLAN & CO., Limited, St. Martin's Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Educational Supplement.

SATURDAY: 14 SEPTEMBER, 1901.

The New Education.

Some American Ideals.

AMERICA is in travail giving birth to a monster who will make great changes in political and intellectual life. Germany and England are looking on, keenly interested in the struggle. No one would judge from the Press that anything unusual was taking place. The Press, which painfully reaches the intellectual level of a hundred years ago, reports, it is true, the proceedings at prize-gatherings, when the thoughts of men are narrowed with the progress of the Chairman's address and an ex-Cabinet Minister's call to Classics, when a new Hellas and a new Rome float into the vision of rapt extensionists. But these authorities are not thinking of education—they are thinking of learning, of our commercial supremacy; of anything, in fact, but the real thing.

Seriously, what is the significance of the New Teaching? We cannot tell, but its aim is to divert men of the most subtle and original intellects to the training of youth, so that the potential directive power in the school children shall be completely actualised.

The idea is that an educated person is necessarily always changing and influencing the society in which and by which he lives. Now society can only live and grow by the conservation of those vital forces which make for its own preservation, and since free institutions are always evolving from simple to more complex states, it follows that those individuals will be best fitted to add to the communal good of such a State the more complex, resourceful, creative, subtle, and energetic their powers are. It is sometimes thought that individual development will lead to despotism; but a despotism only occurs where you have either a non-progressive society as in Egypt, or a society where class hatred leads to legislation in favour of the dominant class, as in Florence and Athens. There can, however, be no class conflict when each individual is a class to himself, or if conflict there be, it will be emulative rather than destructive.

"A great individuality," says Mr. Nettleship—quoted on page 177 in H. T. Mark's book on Individuality and Moral Aim in American Education (Longmans)—"is a person in whom the universal humanity has reached a very high degree of development or differentiation; one who concentrates in himself a great deal of human nature; a person, therefore, of many sides, who is very 'representative' and touches others at innumerable points." As we have only referred so far to intellectual development, it may be objected that the above definition does not apply, since only a moral as well as an intellectual individual could fulfil the above conditions. This is an old objection, and the American educators are not to be frightened into acquiescence of the theory that the moral and intellectual sides of character are independent. Their contention is, in effect, that you cannot teach morals in vacuo, and that if free play is given to a child's faculties, and its environment continually provokes the exercise of these faculties, its moral nature may be left to look after itself.

It may be interesting to quote, in this connection, Mr. S. T. Dutton's remarks (quoted by Mr. Mark, page 185): "Much that is unsubstantial and valueless has been written upon the subject of moral instruction in the school, as though morals could be taught like spelling and geography, and were not rather to be lived and practised. The new and, as I believe, better conception is that the individual, however circumspect he may be when considered apart from his fellows, only proves his real moral worth when he shows his ability to combine with others and do well his part in any community."

In Mr. Mark's report very little reference is made to the specific purpose and utility of the various subjects included in the curriculum, or to the characteristic differences in their presentation to the pupil. Speaking generally, we may say that the new education works through induction and experiment rather than through deduction in the teaching of what may be called demonstrable subjects—mathematics, logic, science; but it is not so unphilosophical as to consider that there can ever be a complete separation of à priori and à posteriori reasoning. The child finds out for himself pleasurably what, by the old method, he had crammed into him distressfully. The American teachers and parents—conferences of the two classes are a feature of American life—are resolved that their children shall learn about things at first hand, and they believe that it is not the knowledge acquired which is the end of education, but the process of its acquisition. Consequently their immediate aim is to perfect this process, and to secure that every school shall be both like and unlike every other school.

Perhaps the most characteristic feature of American education is that 93 per cent. of its teachers for the whole of the cities of the United States are women. In Washington, out of 900 teachers only 100 are men. In one city the whole of the fifty-nine elementary schools do not contain a single male teacher. This fact may account both for the extraordinary enthusiasm in education and for the national faith in kindergarten and in psychology; possibly also it may point to what may become a conspicuous defect, the separation of practice from idea and the too great reliance on Froebel and Pestalozzi. In England we know how very inefficient as a body kindergarten teachers are, and yet their enthusiasms, their ideals, are irreproachable. No doubt the kindergarten of to-day compares very favourably with the infant schools of the last generation, but there cannot be much intelligence behind a system which makes a fetish of Froebel's "gifts," and is as word-bound as any of the systems which Froebel laboured to dethrone.

With all the benefits that flow from a freer and pleasanter school life, one cannot help noticing a tendency, amongst the advocates of the new education, to superficiality and insincerity, a too great readiness to accept formula, and to reject in theory principles which unconsciously or insincerely they carry out rigidly in practice. Is this danger threatening America?

When an Englishman speaks of the utility of education he is generally thinking of the price which a knowledge of certain subjects fetches in the open market. If he refuses a place for classics in the school curriculum his rejection is not based on considerations of the superiority or inferiority of Latin and Greek as educational subjects, but simply that classical learning is monetarily indeterminate. The subjective value of studies, their use as instruments in stimulating thought and developing initiative in the learner, has no significance for him. But although this sense of utility is terribly current in England, yet here and in America there are a few who are striving with all their powers to give prevalence to the idea that education must always be considered in relation to the economic evolution and supremacy of the State; or, to give a paradoxical turn to the idea, we might say that when the monetary equivalence of education is zero to the individual his value to the State is incalculable. Perhaps Horace's line, "rich in the common thing, poor in the private," expresses best what is meant by educational utility.

In answering the question, "What do American educators accept as the true view of individuality, and how do they endeavour to relate it to the moral and social aim which is fundamental in education?" Mr. Mark very admirably says: "The type of individuality at which American school discipline in the long run aims is one which shall prepare the child for community life." It is for the future to show how this inspiration will work itself out in reality.

Digitized by Google

Reviews.

Roman Public Life.

Roman Public Life. By A. H. J. Greenidge. (Macmillan. 10s. 6d.)

CLASSICAL students in this country during the last half-century have, as a rule, been Hellenists rather than Latinists. It is noticeable that, of a hundred and twenty-four authorities on Roman constitutional history tabulated by Mr. Greenidge in his "Select Biography," all but sixteen are foreign. It would seem, however that at this moment no little is being done to remove the reproach on English scholarship. All other writers on the subject are, of course, but as pigmies beside that colossus, Mommsen; but, even if Prof. Pelham's magnum opus hangs fire, Mr. Warde Fowler's Roman Festivals and the school history of Messrs. How and Leigh, both written in Oxford during the last few years, are works which no historian can afford to despise. The same may be said of the volume before us, which, like Mr. Fowler's book, and an earlier essay on Greek constitutional history of Mr. Greenidge's own, forms part of the useful series of "Handbooks of Archæology and Antiquities." Under the title of Roman Public Life, Mr. Greenidge endeavours > to touch, however briefly, on all the important aspects of public life—central, municipal, and provincial; and thus to exhibit the political genius of the Roman in connection with all the chief problems of administration which it attempted to solve.

Two opening chapters trace the growth of the Roman constitution in its regal and republican stages. The developed product is then surveyed and analysed from various points of view. The status and functions of the various magistrates, of the populus and the senate, receive consideration in due turn, together with the external relations of Rome to the rest of Italy and to the extra-Italian provinces. The transition from republic to empire is next dealt with, and Mr. Greenidge discusses at great length the ingenious methods by which Octavius and his advisers engrafted upon the old constitution the amazing substantial novelty of the principate with the least possible disturbance of traditional forms. A study of the reaction of the principate upon Italy and the provinces closes the book. Originally, Mr. Greenidge proposed to make his scope sufficiently extensive to include the organisation of the Latin Empire by Diocletian and his successors. Considerations of space led him to abandon his design, but it is to be hoped that he will see his way to resume it in a separate treatise. The accession of Diocletian is, no doubt, a convenient point for a break, but the Roman constitution did not really cease to evolve itself when the principate was merged in the monarchy. Even as it stands, Mr. Greenidge's book is of the highest value. It rests upon a base of real erudition, and displays in a marked degree those qualities of logical ordering, lucidity, and clear-headedness which so definite a subject as Roman history emphatically requires. It will serve not only as an admirable handbook for the schools, but also as a comprehensive and authoritative work of general reference. We know of nothing in English which quite covers the same ground, although in German one might point to corresponding sections in the even more wide-reaching Handbuch edited by Iwan von Müller, and the monumental treatise, translated into French but not into English, of Marquardt and Mommsen.

Rome and the Greeks.

A History of Rome up to A.D. 500, with Essays, Maps, and Aids to Memory, arranged for use in the Higher Forms of Schools, at the Universities, and for the Civil Service Examinations. By Eustace H. Miles, M.A. (Grant Richards. 8s. 6d.)

A History of Rome for High Schools and Academies. By George Willis Botsford, Ph.D. (Macmillan. 6s. 6d.)

A Short History of the Greeks from the Earliest Times to B.C. 146. By E. S. Shuckburgh, M.A. (Cambridge: University Press. 4s. 6d)

Little Arthur's History of Greece. By A. S. Walpole. (John Murray. 2s. 6d.)

THE difficulty of breaking up history into portions that the average mind has time and power to assimilate is one that is ever baffling the pedagogue. With more or less success it is attempted in this direction and that, and constantly it is discounted by the protest of the person who looks "with wide eyes, calm, upon the whole of things," with the reminder that history is one, and that to dissever its parts is to shatter a diamond. Nevertheless, the human intellect and time and opportunity being limited, in practice it must be done.

It is this desire for a historical whole that makes the history of the Roman Empire and the history of the Greek States matter of such perennial value. There, if anywhere, we may find a portion of history that is complete in itself—having beginning, middle, and end. Documents are ample but not voluminous. The blessed restraint enforced by the absence of the printing-press, scarcity of writing material, and a clumsy system of penmanship, has acted as an efficacious extinguisher of the ineffectual. The documents extend practically over the periods of complete evolution and deliquescence. The process by which the state grows, the natural stages of transition from one form of government to another, the recurrence of economic and social problems that vex our own day, may be watched in these mirrors.

It is in such a spirit that Mr. Miles, Lecturer in Ancient History to the Cambridge Board of Civil Service Studies, approaches his subject. His book is arranged upon a plan that at first view is rather baffling. The consecutive historical narrative is a mere pebble in the midst of a vast snowball. The bulk of the book consists of Introduction and Supplement, comprising over a hundred essays on questions of never-failing interest to examiners. What bonds of union held the Romans together? What influences had Rome's geography upon her success and failure? What effects had Roman Religion upon Rome History?—such are the questions which the author rightly holds to lie in the heart's heart of history. His papers in response are the work of a man who knows his subject, as he is called upon to know it, through and through. "Full marks" is the verdict that one naturally brings in if asked to assess his little hard-boiled essays. Nothing probably could be contrived more effectually to fulfil their laudable purpose. There is only just this to murmur against—Mr. Miles seems rather too generously to accommodate his style to that which obtains among the pupils whom it is his mission to form. For instance, on the "Lessons which Roman History Teaches Us" we read: "Our workhouse system has, perhaps, as many disadvantages as the Rome Corn-distribution, and it is worse in one way, in that it often allows to the poor so large a quantity of luxuries and stimulants: this is very unscientific." Given the fact, it may be; but what does the sixth-form boy know about the economic question involved? And anyway, why "very"? But the book is a monument of whole-souled industry, for which, whatever its faults of style—and they are plentiful—the world of educationists may be thankful.

From across the Atlantic—namely, from Cambridge, Mass.—comes Dr. Botsford's History "for high schools and academies." This is good, plain-sailing narrative, remarkable at first view for the careful distinction between myth and history; this the author draws at every point. "Myth asserts" is a favourite opening of his. In plan the book resembles the History of Greece, by the same author, and the rather closely condensed narration extends to the time of Charlemagne. For educational purposes the running fire of questions which, under the title "Studies," at the end of the volume searches the several chapters will be of service; and there is a bibliography suggesting libraries appropriate to divers purses and inclinations, which should serve, at least, to keep humble such students as, having read such a volume as this to which it is appended, might be apt to rush away with the impression that they know something of the subject. The book is very freely illustrated.

Mr. Shuckburgh's Short History of the Greeks has a place in the "Cambridge Series for Schools and Training Colleges," which is intended in the first place for the use of pupil teachers and candidates for certificates. At the same time consideration has been shown for the needs of Secondary and Public Schools, and from the point of view of these latter there is no reason why the present volume should not be warmly welcomed. The narrative is scholarly and clear, and the text, about which you find your way by means of convenient finger posts set in every paragraph, is relieved with maps, photographs, and line engravings. What a wonderful little land it was in which a dozen histories unfurled themselves in miniature; wherein intrigue and treachery and cruelty and all noblest and basest passions strive like animalcules in the water-drop, as if the bearing up of the firmament depended upon the predominance of this or that mere township. Only of what units were they composed! Every craftsman an artist, Shakspere (say) at Drury Lane, Milton recited at the street corner, Pheidias at the command of the County Council, Demosthenes holding forth at the Marble Arch. Nothing wanting but a little kindness, a little mercy, a tinge of humility, a little forbearance—just so much as should temper the ravening of nature and the fierceness of the struggle for the extinction of the unfit. And because of that defect of a defect they have passed away, been thrown again into the melting-pot, to be shaped anew by the untiring artificer. Let us not forget to add that Mr. Shuckburgh's work is worthy of his reputation.

Digitized by Google

We like very much the History upon which Little Arthur (who must be getting a big boy now; to our knowledge he was deeply interested in King Alfred and the cakes thirty years ago) is invited to concentrate himself.

Stonyhurst.

Stonyhurst, its Past History and Life in the Present. By George Gruggen, S.J., and Joseph Keating, S.J. (Kegan Paul. 7s. 6d.)

THE history of the great Jesuit college has recently been told on the occasion of its centenary celebration of its migration to English soil, in the monumental Centenary Record of which Father John Gerard is the author. From the day of its foundation by Father Robert Persons, of hotly disputed fame, in 1563, to the day of its final migration to Shereburn manor house, the property of the Weld family, the life of the institution was a series of struggles against suspicion, persecution, and poverty, such as nothing less than an heroic constancy could have overcome. From Eu the little company transferred itself to St. Omar in Artois. Thence it was compelled to decamp secretly, the boys going cheerfully forward in batches by waggon to Bruges. There, in 1773, during the temporary dissolution of the society, the authorities vainly endeavoured to force upon these young Englishmen alien masters—tried at the point of the bayonet, and must finally send for the Rector and Prefect of Studies out of prison to protect the soldiery. At Liége, under the wing of the Prince-Bishop, the college found a home till the French Revolution made the frying-pan hotter than the fire. Its members brought back with them to their native land customs of study and of sport that epitomised its history. The classics were studied in the loose, voracious manner of the sixteenth century. It was not till 1860, such is the conservative spirit of the Boy, that "London" cricket superseded the game that Shakspere played. The forms were named—indeed, are still named—Syntax, Poetry, Rhetoric, and the like. But the lapse of a hundred years has brought the curriculum for practical purposes into harmony with that of the public schools and the universities. The changes and development of the course of studies is carefully traced in pages which should be of value to the specialist. The most singular feature of the existing discipline is the manner in which, in the case of the "philosophers," the liberty of university freshmen is wisely tempered with a discipline that ensures at least eight hours of solid work in the day. The wheel has gone full circle, and already have been gathered in the firstfruits of the policy which permits, in more tolerant times, Catholics to enter gates of Oxford and Cambridge from which Persons and his fellow intransigeants came out. Fathers Gruggen and Keating have produced a book which should interest all who are students of English character and the history of polite letters.

Health in the School.

School Hygiene. By Hope and Browne. (Cambridge: University Press. 3s 6d.)

ALONG with the demand for the expert in modern life there is a concurrent demand that the expert shall constantly practise trespassing on his brother expert's domain. Besides the differentiation of functions always going on in complex societies, there is continually associated with it their partial integration. The schoolmaster tends more and more to slough his "clerical" responsibilities—a few committees still see in three letters warrant for virtue and scholarship—and to take on the duties of the family doctor. Especially is this the case with the country schoolmaster, who should know thoroughly the principles of sanitation, how a "trap" acts, for instance, in preventing the escape of noxious gases, and that "dry and impermeable rocks, slates, chalk, gravel, permeable sandstones are usually healthy and dry," and make good foundations for school buildings. He should be competent to give first-aid to the injured, to bandage a limb skilfully, and to know what to do in cases of fainting, bleeding, burns, and bruises. He should have a knowledge, too, of children's complaints—their infectiousness and symptoms; and should understand the physiology of the eye, to minimise strain and to detect defect in vision. For the urban schoolmaster this kind of knowledge is less essential, a doctor being usually within call.

But all schoolmasters, urban and rural alike, should be psychologists—that is, they should be trained observers, always alert for signs which betray listnessness, brain fatigue, over-strain, and nervousness. And if to these qualifications the teacher is by nature something of an artist himself, the children under his care will learn to comprehend good literature intellectually and to feel it emotionally; they will learn, also, often sub-consciously, the beauty of natural forms in clouds, leaves, flowers, hills, waves, and to appreciate the beauty and inventiveness in imitative and symbolic forms in a piece of sculpture, line engraving, a yacht, and a Gothic moulding.

Naturally Messrs. Hope and Browne do not deal in a manual on hygiene with æsthetic culture or sub-conscious influence; but they are none the less alive to the fact that no book and no routine and reliance on system will ever take the place of careful observation and study of child-life. If the doctor is allowed access to the schoolroom, it is not that he may oust the teacher from it, but that he may help the teacher to interpret in physiological language much that the teacher is familiar with psychically. Indeed, it is not too much to say that the schoolmaster has done no little in educating the medical expert. It is not so usual now for the medical man to withdraw a child slightly indisposed from the companionship of his schoolmates, and to commit him to the loneliness of home life; nor does he talk with the irresponsibility born of purely anatomical studies of over-pressure and the necessity for complete rest. Similarly, the parent who confesses to the schoolmaster that her boy "loafs" when at home, and that, therefore, he ought to have home work piled on so that the interval until bed-time may be filled up, is happily becoming extinct, and the modern parent is beginning to learn that "loafing" is produced by repression, by an unnatural restraint which keeps a child at tasks which do not exercise his mind or body, and consequently when he is liberated he cannot make good use of his leisure. Never having learnt the fascination of doing what he likes, his leisure is ill-spent.

Much of the present volume naturally has to do with what we may call the "mechanics" of hygiene, but the concluding chapters on overpressure will be found suggestive to many familiar with the literature of hygiene. We have space for two short passages only:

> The working of the higher intellect is an inscrutable mystery, and cannot be measured except in a rough and very inaccurate manner. It might be supposed that a child's capacity to learn lessons would afford a safe guide to the condition of its brain. But no—as well attempt to measure the healthiness of its digestion by its capacity to swallow food.
>
> Over-pressure is not a positive condition, but a failure to reach the potentiality of the bodily and mental strength in any given child, and due not to one cause but to the action of a number of small influences which should in the course of nature be allowed to make for perfect development.

The book should be read by all young teachers.

En Masse.

Our Public Schools. By J. G. Cotton Minchin. 6s.

"FEW things," says Mr. Minchin in his preface, "in the perusal of biographies have struck me more than the manner in which the influence of the school and its surroundings on the subject of the biography, who spent his boyhood there, has been ignored." The object of the author is to trace that influence, but we cannot say that he has done it with any conspicuous success. That it exists is universally admitted, but to demonstrate it in individuals is a different matter. Mr. Minchin is an industrious compiler of facts, and his book forms a useful reference volume, consisting as it does of compact historical sketches of all our principal public schools. But with public school histories already thick upon our shelves, and at least two good series in course of publication, the book is recommended only by its rather painful comprehensiveness.

Digitized by Google

Text Books, School Books, &c.

English.

Lamb: Select Essays. Edited by Agnes Wilson. (Blackwood. 2s. 6d.)

Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Keats: Selections. Edited by A. D. Innes, M.A. (Blackwood. 2s. 6d.)

Pope: Select Poems. Edited by George Soutar, M.A., Litt.D. (Blackwood. 2s. 6d.)

Hazlitt: Essays on Poetry. Edited by D. Nichol Smith, M.A. (Blackwood. 2s. 6d.)

THESE are four volumes in the recently started series known as "Blackwood's English Classics." All four are carefully edited by competent scholars; but they will not all be of equal use to practical teachers. Pope, for instance—who, at the best, is second-rate stuff for educational purposes—has already been edited ad nauseam; and Dr. Soutar, like his predecessors, seems to have found it difficult to avoid overloading his text with annotations, many of which deal with topics of minimal importance. The volumes of Lamb and Hazlitt—especially the latter—break somewhat new ground for text-books. But here, again, the tradition of the commentator is rather at war with common sense. To set students to read Lamb and Hazlitt, as largely and as intelligently as possible, is excellent; to set them to get up the trivial contemporary allusions in either writer is lamentable. We notice, with some amusement, that both editors are called upon, or think themselves called upon, to write a note on the "Speaker" of Dr. William Enfield. Mr. Nichol Smith devotes forty-seven words to the point, Miss Wilson eight. We fancy it really deserves—none. For Mr. Innes's volume on Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Keats we have nothing but praise. The selection is admirably made; the notes show strenuous restraint, but give all that is necessary. Perhaps the introduction is a little difficult for students of the class likely to make use of this series.

Woodstock. Edited by H. Corstorphine. (Black. 1s. 6d.)

Kenilworth. Edited by E. S. Davies, M.A. (Black. 1s. 6d.)

Old Mortality: a Continuous Reader. (Black. 1s. net.)

"Sir Walter Scott" Readers for Young People. 11 vols. (Black. 1s. 6d. each.)

HERE we have Scott in three distinct forms, adapted to readers of three grades. We have already commended the earlier numbers of Messrs. Black's "School Edition," to which Woodstock and Kenilworth belong, and we are glad to see further progress made in it. No better holiday text-books for fourth-form boys are in the market. For the Continuous Reader there is also a good deal to be said. It is Scott, with the longueurs cut out—a process which, if we remember right, Robert Elsmere found effective with a class of village lads in Surrey. The Readers for Young People, on the other hand, are not Scott at all. They are Scott's stories rewritten in simple modern English. Here, we think, the success of Charles Lamb with Shakespeare has been a pitfall to lesser folk. Charles Lamb was a genius. And, without the "Tales," boys would have to wait a great deal longer for Shakespeare than they need do for Scott.

In Memoriam. Edited by Arthur W. Robinson, B.D. (Pitt Press. 2s. 6d.)

A GOOD deal has been written from time to time about In Memoriam, but the student will hardly find a more intelligent and sympathetic guide than Mr. Robinson's modest little edition. All the difficulties are fully explained out of a wide acquaintance with the literature of the subject, and the parallel passages quoted to illustrate Tennyson's thought from contemporary thinkers, such as George Eliot, Dr. Martineau, Ruskin, and others, are particularly interesting. Just a few of Mr. Robinson's notes seem a little superfluous. Does any reader of

> Now burgeons every maze of quick
> About the flowering squares, and thick
> By ashen roots the violets blow, really need to be told that "quick" means "quick-set hedge," that "squares" are "fields," and "ashen roots" are "roots of ash trees"? We do not quite agree with Mr. Robinson that it was "no part of my business as a commentator to venture upon any judgment as to the permanent worth of what Tennyson has written"; but his caution to the student to make "sparing use" of the notes "until at all events he has grappled for himself with the thought of the poet," might with advantage be reproduced by many editors.

Chaucer: The Prologue, The Knightes Tale, The Nonnes Prestes Tale. Edited by Mark H. Liddell. (Macmillan. 3s. 6d.)

PROF. LIDDELL is of opinion that no class-room text of Chaucer "containing the most recent results of scholarship in this field, and written in English for English speaking students," is at present accessible. Whether this be so or not, he is doubtless himself well qualified, as one of the editors of the "Globe" Chaucer, to supply such a want. He writes for advanced students, and, though he does not wholly disregard the literary qualities of Chaucer, his treatment is mainly philological. He has critical footnotes; explanatory terminal notes, which are not quite so full or discursive as Prof. Skeat's; a good glossary; and a very elaborate introduction on Middle English phraseology, inflection, syntax, and versification. It is a very thorough piece of work; but what we really want to see is a good school edition, which will give the minimum of philology necessary to enable a fairly intelligent boy to read the text without stumbling, and for the rest will approach Chaucer as literature rather than as Middle English. Mr. Pollard's little edition of "The Squire's Tale" perhaps comes nearer to the ideal than others we have seen.

An Elementary Old English Reader. Edited by Alfred J. Wyatt. (Pitt Press. 4s. 6d.)

THIS book is intended to be, with the same writer's Old English Grammar, an introduction to Anglo-Saxon. It draws upon prose literature only, and the prose literature of Wessex. The extracts are taken from the translations of Orosius and of Gregory's Cura Pastoralis ascribed to King Alfred, and from the earlier part of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, which belongs to the same school. Mr. Wyatt is a safe guide; he has graded the difficulties of the book by the use of greater or less fulness in the notes, and with the help of Miss Amy L. Lake has bestowed great pains upon the glossary.

The George Eliot Reader. By Elizabeth Lee. (Blackwood. 2s.)

QUITE a fascinating little volume. Miss Lee has mainly confined her selection to George Eliot's rural bits, and has arranged them under the headings of "England—1800-1830," "Boys and Girls," "Country Scenes," "Portraits," "Sketches of Character," "Lovers." The return to the soil is becoming rather a watchword of modern education, and we cannot imagine anyone having the good fortune to be introduced to literature through this Reader without loving country scenes and country folk the more for it ever after.

The Picture Shakespeare: Julius Cæsar. (Blackie. 1s.)

THIS is practically a re-issue of the corresponding volume in Messrs. Blackie's "Junior School Shakespeare." It has been "revised by practical teachers" (an excellent plan), and furnished with some of Mr. Gordon Browne's illustrations from the "Henry Irving Shakespeare." No doubt all school books—at least, for junior classes—should be illustrated.

An Introduction to the Industrial and Social History of England By Edward P. Cheyney. (Macmillan. 6s.)

A VALUABLE handbook, serving as a useful summary of a great deal of research into social and economic history which has been done in England and America during recent years, and in which Prof. Cheyney has taken his own share. It is clear and well-informed throughout, but the chapters on the mediæval period are, perhaps, the best part of it. These deal with such interesting and difficult subjects as the manorial system, the rise and decay of guild-merchants and craft-guilds, and the economic changes of the fourteenth and sixteenth centuries. On all these points, Prof. Cheyney's treatment, which is upon broad, general lines, should be of great service to the student. A variety of interesting illustrations are provided, and good bibliographies.

An Outline History of the British Empire: from 1500 to 1870. By William Harrison Woodward. (Pitt Press. 1s. 6d. net.)

THIS is an abridged edition of a larger work on the same subject by the same writer. In spite of the title-page the narrative does not stop at 1870. Several events, such as the annexation of New Guinea and the assumption by the late Queen of the title of Empress of India, carry it beyond that

Digitized by Google

MESSRS. WM. BLACKWOOD & SONS' NEW EDUCATIONAL WORKS.

Catalogues forwarded post free on application.

BLACKWOODS' ILLUSTRATED CLASSICAL TEXTS.

General Editor—H. W. AUDEN, M.A., Assistant Master at Fettes College.

CÆSAR.—GALLIC WAR. I.-III. By J. M. HARDWICH, M.A., Rugby. 1s. 6d.

CÆSAR.—GALLIC WAR. IV., V. By ST. J. B. WYNNE-WILLSON, L.M.A., Rugby. With or without Vocab., 1s. 6d. Vocab. separately, 3d.

CÆSAR.—GALLIC WAR. VI., VII. By C. A. A. DU PONTET, M.A., Harrow. 1s. 6d.

VIRGIL.—GEORGIC. I. By J. SARGEAUNT, M.A., Westminster. 1s. 6d.

VIRGIL.—GEORGIC. IV. By J. SARGEAUNT, M.A. 1s. 6d.

VIRGIL.—ÆNEID. V., VI. By ST. J. B. WYNNE-WILLSON, M.A. 1s. 6d.

HORACE.—ODES. I., II. By J. SARGEAUNT, M.A. 1s. 6d.

CICERO.—IN CATILINAM. I.-IV. By H. W. AUDEN, M.A. 1s. 6d.

OVID.—METAMORPHOSES (Selections). By J. H. VINCE, M.A., Bradfield. 1s. 6d.

DEMOSTHENES.—OLYNTHIACS. I.-III. By H. SHARPLEY, M.A., Hereford. 1s. 6d.

HOMER.—ODYSSEY. VI. By E. E. SIKES, M.A., St. John's College, Cambridge. 1s. 6d.

XENOPHON.—ANABASIS. I., II. By A. JAGGER, B.A., Hymers College, Hull. 1s. 6d.

IN THE PRESS.

LIVY. XXVIII. By G. MIDDLETON, M.A., and A. SOUTAR, M.A.

SALLUST.—JUGURTHA. By J. F. SMEDLEY, M.A., Westminster.

BLACKWOODS' ENGLISH CLASSICS.

General Editor—J. H. LOBBAN, M.A., formerly Examiner in English in the University of Aberdeen.

MACAULAY.—LIFE OF JOHNSON. By D. NICHOL SMITH, M.A. 1s. 6d.

GOLDSMITH.—TRAVELLER, DESERTED VILLAGE, AND OTHER POEMS. By J. H. LOBBAN, M.A. 1s. 6d.

SCOTT.—LADY OF THE LAKE. By W. E. W. COLLINS, M.A. 1s. 6d.

MILTON.—PARADISE LOST. Books I.-IV. By J. LOGIE ROBERTSON, M.A. 2s. 6d.

COWPER.—THE TASK, AND MINOR POEMS. By ELIZABETH LEE. 2s. 6d.

JOHNSON.—LIVES OF MILTON AND ADDISON. By Professor J. W. DUFF, M.A. 2s. 6d.

CARLYLE.—ESSAY ON BURNS. By JOHN DOWNIE, M.A. 2s. 6d.

POPE.—ESSAY ON CRITICISM, RAPE OF THE LOCK, AND OTHER POEMS. By G. SOUTAR, M.A., Litt.D. 2s. 6d.

HAZLITT.—ESSAYS ON POETRY. By D. NICHOL SMITH, M.A. 2s. 6d.

WORDSWORTH, COLERIDGE, AND KEATS. By A. D. INNES, M.A. 2s. 6d.

LAMB.—SELECT ESSAYS. By AGNES WILSON. 2s. 6d.

SCOTT.—MARMION. By ALEXANDER MACKIE, M.A. 1s 6d. [Shortly.

 Other Volumes to follow.

BLACKWOODS' SIMPLEX CIVIL SERVICE COPY BOOKS.

By JOHN T. PEARCE, B.A., Leith Academy. Price 2d. each.

ADOPTED BY THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD.

No. 1.—Elements, Short Letters, Words; No. 2—Long Letters, Easy Words; No. 3—Capitals, Half-Line Words; No. 4—Text, Double Ruling Sentences; No. 5—Half-Text, Sentences, Figures; No. 6—Intermediate, Transcription, &c.; No. 7—Small Hand, Double Ruling; No. 8—Small Hand, Single Ruling.

THE UNIVERSAL WRITING BOOKS.

To accompany the above Series. No. 1 is adapted for Lower Classes. No. 2 for Higher Classes. Price 2d. each.

THE TEACHER'S GUIDE TO WRITING. By JOHN T. PEARCE, B.A., Leith Academy. Price 6d.

ADOPTED BY THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD.

BLACKWOODS' LITERATURE READERS.

Edited by JOHN ADAMS, M.A., B.Sc., F.C.P., Rector, U.F. Church Training College, Glasgow.

Bk. I., 1s.; Bk. II., 1s. 4d.; Bk. III., 1s. 6d.; Bk. IV., 1s. 6d.

BLACKWOODS' SCHOOL SHAKESPEARE.

Edited by R. BRIMLEY JOHNSON.

Each Play complete, with Introduction, Notes, and Glossary. In crown 8vo volumes, stiff paper covers, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d.

The Merchant of Venice.	Ready.	The Tempest.	Ready.
Richard II.	Ready.	As You Like It.	Ready.
Julius Cæsar.	Ready.	Henry V.	Ready.
Macbeth.	Immediately.

 Others in preparation.

ENGLISH LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE.

History of English Literature. By J. LOGIE ROBERTSON, M.A. 3s.

Outlines of English Literature. By the SAME AUTHOR. 1s. 6d.

English Verse for Junior Classes. By the SAME AUTHOR. Part I., Chaucer to Coleridge. Part II., 19th Century Poets. 1s. 6d. net each.

English Prose for Junior and Senior Classes. By the SAME AUTHOR. Part I., Malory to Johnson. Part II., 19th Century Writers. 2s. 6d. each.

English Drama. By the SAME AUTHOR. 2s. 6d.

The George Eliot Reader. By ELIZABETH LEE. With Introduction and Portrait. 2s.

Stormonth's Dictionary. College Edition, 7s. 6d.; School Edition, 1s.

100 Stories for Composition. In Alternative Versions. 1s. 3d.

Elementary Grammar and Composition. 1s.

Things of Every Day. A Popular Science Reader. Illustrated. 2s.

LATIN AND GREEK.

Higher Latin Unseens. By H. W. AUDEN, M.A. 2s. 6d.

Higher Latin Prose. By H. W. AUDEN, M.A. 2s. 6d.  Key, 5s. net.

Lower Latin Prose. By K. P. WILSON, M.A. 2s. 6d.  Key, 5s. net.

Lower Latin Unseens. By W. LOBBAN, M.A. 2s.

First Latin Sentences and Prose. By K. P. WILSON, M.A. 2s. 6d.

Tales of Ancient Thessaly. By J. W. E. PEARCE, M.A. 1s.

Higher Greek Unseens. By H. W. AUDEN, M.A. 2s. 6d.

Higher Greek Prose. By H. W. AUDEN, M.A. 2s. 6d.  Key, 5s. net.

Greek Prose Phrase Book. By H. W. AUDEN, M.A. Interleaved. 3s. 6d.

Greek Test Papers. By JAMES MOIR, Litt.D., LL.D. 2s. 6d.  Key, 5s. net.

Lower Greek Prose. By K. P. WILSON, M.A. 2s. 6d.  Key, 5s. net.

MODERN LANGUAGES.

Historical Reader of Early French By Prof. H. A. STRONG, and L. D. BARNETT, M.A., Litt.D. 3s.

All French Verbs in Twelve Hours (except Defective Verbs). By A. J. WYATT. 1s. [Immediately.

French Test Papers. For Civil Service and University Students. By EMILE B. LE FRANÇOIS. [Immediately.

The Tutorial Handbook of French Composition. By ALFRED MERCIER, L. ès L. 3s. 6d.

The Children's Guide to the French Language. By ANNIE G. FERRIER. 1s.

Progressive German Composition. With Copious Notes and Idioms, and FIRST INTRODUCTION to GERMAN PHILOLOGY. By L. LUBOVIUS, Ph.D. 3s. 6d. Also in Two Parts: COMPOSITION, 2s. 6d.; PHILOLOGY, 1s. 6d.  Key to Composition, 5s. net.

Lower Grade German. By the SAME AUTHOR. 2s. 6d.

A Compendious German Reader. By G. B. BEAK, M.A. 2s. 6d.

A History of German Literature. By J. G. ROBERTSON, Ph.D. [Immediately.

A Spanish Grammar. With Copious Exercises in Translation and Composition; easy Reading Lessons and Extracts from Spanish Authors; a List of Idioms; a Glossary of Commercial Terms (English-Spanish), and a Copious General Vocabulary (Spanish-English). By WILLIAM A. KESSEN. 3s. 6d.

Arithmetic. With Numerous Examples, Revision Tests, and Examination Papers. By A. V. LOTHIAN, M.A., B.Sc. With Answers, 3s. 6d.

Modern Geometry of the Point, Straight Line, and Circle. An Elementary Treatise. By J. A. THIRD, M.A. 3s.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, 45, George Street, Edinburgh; and 37, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

date, and, as a matter of fact, it only concludes with the proclamation of British rule in the Transvaal and the Orange Free State in 1900. (Technically, we believe, Mr. Woodward is incorrect in describing this proceeding as an annexation.) The book is, therefore, more up-to-date than it professes to be. Mr. Woodward writes clearly and with knowledge, but his method is too dry and succinct to appeal very forcibly to the youthful imagination. And, from an educational point of view, we strongly doubt the expediency of picking out, at an early stage of training, one particular aspect of English history for study apart from the rest. Why should the attention of a class be focussed for a whole term upon the progress of colonial enterprise to the complete neglect of other and more important sides of national life? Surely the first thing is to get a comprehensive notion of the whole development. Monographs on special aspects may be valuable to the advanced student, but the want of perspective which they entail can only do harm at an early period.

Analysis of English History. By W. C. Pearse and Dr. S. Hague, LL.B. Revised by W. F. Baugust. (Murby. 1s. 6d.)

AN undisguised "cram-book," a sort of pemmican of dates and facts designed with the aid of "the judicious employment of a variety of prominent type" to facilitate an unintelligent preparation for examinations. We can only recommend a perusal of it to examining boards with a view to the discovery of means to checkmate it. As it appears to be in a ninety-seventh and revised edition, this problem does not seem to have yet been faced. It is rather amusing to find "Crichton, surnamed the 'Admirable,' on account of his varied accomplishments," included in a list of the thirteen greatest Elizabethan authors, and to learn that "Austen, A.," is "the present laureat," and "Austin, Jane," the author of Pride and Prejudice.

"FAMOUS ENGLISHMEN."—Book I. Alfred to Elizabeth. By John Finnemore. (Black. 1s. 4d.)

THIS is a "Reader" on a new principle, for the class in elementary schools corresponding with what used to be known as the "Fourth Standard." The idea, and a good one, is to teach history through the biographies of great men. Anglo-Saxon times yield Alfred the Great, Dunstan, Harold, and Hereward the Wake; from the Middle Ages proper Mr. Finnemore takes Becket, Langton, Simon de Montfort, the First and Third Edwards, Wycliffe and Chaucer; from the fifteenth century, Henry the Fifth, Warwick the King-maker, and Caxton; from the sixteenth, Wolsey, More, Drake, Raleigh and Shakespeare. A very fine selection, though we miss Sir Philip Sidney! There are some suitable portraits and other illustrations, among which it is rather surprising to find a photograph of Auguste Rodin's "Men of Calais."

Readings in Welsh History. By Ernest Rhys. (Longmans. 1s. 8d.)

THIS is doubtless an essay at bringing Pan-Celticism into the schools of Wales. It is compiled with great care, and, though simply written enough, has more literary quality than is usual in a reader. Practically the narrative ends with the rebellions of Owen Glendower, or Owain Glyndwr, whose wars "brought such desolation that green grass grew in the Market Place at Llanrwst, and the deers fed in the churchyard."

French.

Morceaux Choisis. Edited by R. L. A. du Pontet. (Arnold. 1s. 6d.)

SINCE there are 104 selections in 122 pp. it is obvious that the average length of each morceau is little more than a page, and that therefore the editor pits the excitement of reading snippet quickly after snippet against the quiet enjoyment in longer—and possibly less attractive—selections. But as the book is intended for pupils who are competent to read French with fair ease, it is regrettable that the editor did not choose pieces which should give the effect of a "whole," and that, instead of rushing the reader through specimens from fifty-six writers, why was he not content to leave on his mind an impression of a few typical styles? Educationally, then, this book is low; and excellent as the introduction on Style is, we fail to see how the pupils are to acquire a taste for literature or to observe how les grands écrivains fit "manner to matter," since the effect of a rapid succession of impressions is to leave no single one definite, but a blur of all.

School Grammar of Modern French. By C. H. Clarke and C. J. Murray. (Dent. 3s. 6d. net)

IN a sense this grammar is a deflection from the rational principles enunciated more than once by Mr. Rippmann, the general editor of Dent's "Modern Language" series. The idea that a new language should be taught in that language is so strictly adhered to in the French and German text-books that even the notes and vocabularies are in the language of the text. There was warrant for our inference, therefore, that if a grammar were included in this series it would certainly differ from other grammars in this, at least, that the rule and the illustrations would be in the same language. In this volume we have the rule stated in English and the illustrations of it in French; but, as the French is not translated, and as it is more difficult to read the French examples than it would have been to read the rule stated in French, the duplex system is both illogical and unnecessary. Again, if a grammar is to be interesting to read, the rule should come after the examples, so that the reader could occasionally amuse himself by generalising from the material supplied. If it is retorted that the reader is not debarred from this exercise because he need not read the rule at all, we reply that this is no answer, as the principle on which a book is constructed will be the one the reader will follow. The good points of the book are its thoroughness, its careful attention to the language of Molière and his contemporaries, and its non-separation of accidence from syntax. The grammar in the new method is still unwritten, and since Mr. Rippmann has made the great renunciation, who will volunteer?

Au Pôle en Ballon. Par V. Patrice. Adapted and Edited by P. S. Jeffrey. (Macmillan. 2s.)

THIS series is so well known that it is not necessary to say more here than that the notes and vocabulary are very full; and the appendices of words and phrases, of sentences for viva voce practice, and of passages for re-translation must tend to simplify the teacher's work, and to rationalise his methods.

The Age of Louis XI. By F. W. B. Smart. (A & C. Black. 2s.)

"THE object of this book," the compiler states, "is to set before the student a continuous period of French history as recorded by contemporaries and eye-witnesses, or by some of the most eminent of modern French historians." Some of the writers drawn upon are Commynes, Barante, Michelet, Sismondi, Hugo, and Zola.

Commercial French. By Messrs. W. M. Poole and M. Becker. (Murray. 2s. 6d.)

THE authors are quite right in saying that this text-book in commercial French is the first in which the direct method of teaching language has been followed. Consequently the whole of the first part—selections, questions, exercises—is in French. The enemy is propitiated in the vocabulary, which is French-English, and in the grammar, the rules of which are expressed in English. This compromise, however, proves the strength of the new method, and we have every faith that in the next edition, instead of destroying the reader's natural love for definition by giving him a bald equivalent—saucepan for casserole, &c.—we shall read: Casserole—Ustensile de cuisine en métal, à queue, à fond plat et à parois droites et cylindriques. The pieces selected are not very interesting. Now we have got the new method of teaching we are apt to forget that the old method is preferable, with all its irrationalities, to the most logical and consistent of new methods if the pupil cannot get up an interest in the subject-matter. It seems sometimes as if rationalism in method was in inverse ratio to its attractiveness. For instance, Dent's Language series are perfect in idea, but the pictures which the children are to look at during the lesson are execrable, and entirely without educational value.

Historical Reader of Early French. By H. Strong and L. D. Barnett. (Blackwood. 3s.)

WITHOUT quite knowing for whom this book is intended, and confident that the material here supplied is much too slight to enable the student to follow the development of Latin into modern French, we can heartily recommend it to any reader interested in historical French, as it forms a very good introduction to Toynbee's Specimens of Old French, the only other book of the kind published in England. The illustrative passages from writers from the eleventh to the sixteenth centuries are interesting in themselves, and the plan of giving translations where necessary in parallel columns and notes at the foot of the page adds greatly to the attractiveness of the volume. Considering the price—there are 200 pp.—the intelligence of its method, and the selections, we hope that its sale will encourage the compilers to follow it up with another and larger volume.

Digitized by Google

A Primer of French Literature. By E. Weekley. (Blackie. 2s. 6d.)

LITERATURE primers are usually fearsome things; experience has taught us that they are unreadable, uncritical, and unutterably depressing, even when their utility is unquestionable. Here, however, is a primer which is not crowded with names, which is full of discriminating, and sometimes subtle, reflections; and the greatest proof of its interest is that what is read is remembered. We select a few critical remarks at random. "The esprit gaulois is the satirical spirit of disrespect. It runs on through those works which are most essentially French in character. . . . In its highest form it appears in the polite irony of Pascal and the broadly human satire of Molière. In its lowest form it is seen in the mocking, callous songs and satires with which private misfortunes or national catastrophes are alike greeted in France." "France has no national poet in the sense that Shakespeare, Burns, and Schiller are national poets." "It [French poetry] seldom rises to that meeting-ground of poetry and music attained by Shelley and Keats, Swinburne and Tennyson." "Before the nineteenth century, France produced no great poet, with the possible exception of the vagabond Villon." It is a triumph of condensation, and those who read it once will read it again. The fault of primers—and this shares it with the rest—is that the literature is detached so completely from the history that one almost comes to think of literature and history as different sides of the same shield, whereas they are different aspects of the same side; but as in review of a primer, so in the primer, "space forbids" detailed criticism.

Contes and Mélanges. Par Voltaire. (A. & C. Black. 2s.)

THE feature of this book is the oral exercises based on the text which have been very intelligently put together.

Concise French Dictionary. By Gasc. (Bell. 2s. 6d.)

THIS dictionary is printed in very clear type, and both its size and price will commend it to many.

German.

Schiller's Wallenstein. By M. Winkler. (The Macmillan Co. 3s. 6d.)

A VERY admirable text-book in print, paper, notes, introduction, and illustrations.

"SELF-EDUCATOR" SERIES.—German. Edited by J. Adams. (Hodder & Stoughton. 2s. 6d.)

THIS series has been written for those who wish to learn to read, rather than to speak, German. If a student is industrious he will succeed, if he perseveres long enough, by the study of this or a hundred other similarly constructed books, in learning German.

German Unseens. By W. G. Etheridge. (Blackie. 2s.)

ONE hundred and thirteen "Unseens," collected for the purpose of giving boys practice in the translation of modern German prose. It is well that boys should read modern prose; it is not well that they should learn to do so in this way.

Latin.

Livy. Book II. By R. S. Conway. (Cambridge: University Press. 2s. 6d.)

THIS series is well known, and this particular volume, as the editor observes, differs little from the others in its general plan. It is not necessary to do more than commend it to the notice of readers of Livy.

Macmillan's Latin Course. Third Part. By W. E. P. Pantin. (Macmillan. 3s. 6d.)

A VERY clear enunciation of the differences between Latin and English idiom, to which are added ninety-one exercises for practice in writing continuous Latin prose.

The Fables of Orbilius. By A. D. Godley. Part I. (Arnold. 9d.)

MR. GODLEY has constructed this little book so that beginners may learn Latin without tears. It is full of amusing illustrations, accompanied by quietly humorous stories. The first sentence gives the key to the book: "Thomas cupit esse nauta. Cur hoc facit? Quia nautae sunt liberi et non debent Latinam linguam discere." These are good times when laughter forms part of the Latin lesson.

The Aeneid of Virgil. Book VI. By H. B. Cotterill. (Blackie. 2s.)

WE have had occasion more than once to call attention to the high general excellence of this series of classical text-books. The present edition of the sixth book is one of the best we have ever seen; it not only contains introduction and notes—the former especially are on a higher plane of critical insight than is usual—but it is well illustrated, and in short appendices there are interesting little discussions on subjects arising out of the text, such as the rivers of hell, Virgil's doctrine of the universal mind and spirit, and summaries of Homer's and Dante's visions of the world of the dead, &c. On p. 104 the author writes, "The Acheron, over which Dante is ferried by Charon"; and, on p. 117, "Charon refuses to ferry the poets across." As a matter of fact, it is not known how Dante got to the other side of Acheron.

The Georgics of Virgil. Book II. By S. E. Winbolt. (Blackie. 1s. 6d.)

THE special feature of this volume is a very careful analysis of the metre—pp. xx.-xxx.—and a short account of the "Georgics" in literary history. The drawings of field instruments make many difficult passages easy.

Livy. Book I. By J. Brown. (Blackie. 2s. 6d.)

IN many respects a very satisfactory text-book. It is well illustrated, and there are short passages in English for re-translation.

The Gallic War. Book V. By J. Brown. (Blackie. 2s.)

SIMILAR in plan to above.

Cæsar: Gallic War. Books VI and VII. By C. du Pontet. (Blackwood. 1s. 6d.)

"IN preparing this edition I have endeavoured to avoid, as far as possible, turning the book, as it has so often been turned, into a manual of grammar, and making Cæsar's narrative a peg on which to hang rules of syntax or a quarry to dig examples and exceptions." Mr. du Pontet has succeeded by coloured plans, map, diagrams, and careful elucidation of difficulties, in making Cæsar interesting—no light task.

Virgil: Aeneid V., VI. By St. J. B Wynne Willson. (Blackwood. 1s. 6d.)

THIS excellent series of classical texts we have so often commended that to save our praise from monotony we are compelled to look only and pass on.

A First Latin Reader. By R. Beresford. (Blackie. 1s 6d.)

THE type and the spacing of this reader are admirable for a child's text-book, and must produce a minimum strain on the eyes The author's part has been done equally well. The pieces selected are interesting and not difficult. To teachers in need of an easy reader this book can be recommended.

The Latin Pronouns—is, hic, iste, ipse. By C. L. Meaden. (The Macmillan Co. $1.40c. or 7s. 6d.)

A VERY erudite study, of over 200 pages, on the evolution in meaning of the above particles.

The Rise of Hellas. By E. G. Wilkinson. (Black. 2s. 6d.)

THE story of the rise of Hellas, and her struggle with Persia for supremacy, is told in selections from Greek writers. No effort is spared to make the matter intelligible by introduction, illustrations, and historical parallels.

Juvenal. By H. P. Wright. (Gin & Co. 6s. 6d.)

THE whole of Juvenal's satires, with the exception of the second, sixth, and ninth, are included in this edition. The notes are at the foot of each page—an excellent plan; and Juvenal's Syntax receives adequate, if concise, treatment in the introduction, to which constant reference is made in the annotations.

Digitized by Google

Greek.

Electra of Sophokles. By M. A. Bayfield. (Macmillan. 2s. 6d.)

After Sir R. Jebb's "incomparable editions of the poet's works" it is difficult to be original; and even where Mr. Bayfield differs in interpretation from the master, he modestly admits that he has done so by the use of a judgment which the latter has done much to form. The metrical analysis of the lyric portions of the play are given in full, and the notes are not too learned for the private student. The three plates—one from a Greek amphora, and the other two from red-figured Attic vases—will be especially welcomed by the younger pupils, as no art is more delightful to children than the combination of symbol and nature in archaic Greek art. It is interesting, as the author notes, that Sophokles' version of the story is much more recent than that of the Vases. We wish that editors of Greek plays would make a point of giving the story as recorded in picturesque and sculpturesque forms.

The Meno of Plato. By E. S. Thompson. (Macmillan. 5s.)

Of the early dialogues the "Meno" is not the least interesting, perhaps for the effort Socrates is making towards inductive reasoning, and also for his treatment of the ever modern ethical problem, Can virtue be taught? Besides very exhaustive notes—on an average, if we consider type, about ten pages to each page of text—the excursus on Plato's use of δόξα and ἐπιστήμη is particularly pertinent to the present dialogue.

Demosthenes: The Olynthiacs and Philippics. Translated by O. Holland. (Methuen. 2s. 6d.)

The translator has endeavoured to reproduce in his version both the rhythm and to retain "with the rarest deviations" the order of the original. It will be fairest to the author to transcribe a sentence from the opening of the second Olynthiac:

> In a great deal as anyone could perceive, gentlemen of Athens, I think, signs of the gift of God's favour being made very manifest to this city, not least would he do so in her present situation; for that those who will be fighting with Philip should have been both a century on his borders, and of power considerable possessed, and, weightiest of all, as regarding the war, their opinions in such sort holding, as even any with him reconciliation, to begin with as suspicions, then of their country to regard as the ruin, of a heavensent and divine sort quite has the look of benefaction.

It is a plucky attempt, and, after Browning's "Agamemnon," should receive from scholars serious attention. We fear it will receive no criticism from those who know, and will be laughed at by those who don't.

Demosthenes: De Corona. By W. W. Goodwin. (Cambridge University Press. 12s. 6d.)

This edition, which, if we mistake not, will be for some time to come the authoritative edition, contains a very full historical sketch from the accession of Philip to the battle of Chæronea, and among other essays we might mention a very relevant one on indictment for proposing illegal measures.

Theocritus. By R. J. Cholmeley. (Bell. 7s. 6d.)

The editor explains in the preface that he has "tried to bring together the result of recent investigations into the literary history of the Alexandrian writers, so far as concerns Theocritus," and that the notes are of necessity somewhat full, because the Greek of the Idylls, "naturally difficult, is rendered harder by his position at the beginning of a new epoch."

Mathematical and Material Sciences.

A Short Account of the History of Mathematics. By W. W Rouse Ball. (Macmillan. 10s.)

Euclid's Elements of Geometry. Books I.-IV., VI., and XI. By Charles Smith and Sophie Bryant. (Macmillan. 4s. 6d.)

A Treatise on Physics. By Prof. Andrew Gray. Vol. I Dynamics and Properties of Matter. (Churchill. 15s)

An Introduction to the Study of Physics. Vol. I. Genera Physical Measurements. By A. F. Walden and J. J. Manley (A. & C. Black. 3s. 6d.)

The Self-Educator in Chemistry. By James Knight. (Hodder & Stoughton. 2s. 6d.)

Few teachers of mathematics make any attempt to vivify the subject or to create interest in the history of the subject; their aim is to work steadily through their text-books and get as many examples done as possible, the result being that their pupils regard all who have helped to make mathematical history as objectionable persons whose works ought to have been suppressed. Many a boy bewails the day that ever Euclid was born and was permitted to construct the system of mental torture which bears his name. The thought that there are many others who have added to this load of mathematical sorrow is almost too much to bear, and he prefers not to be reminded of it. Yet a good teacher can make a lesson in mathematics really inspiring if he is familiar with the history of the subject; and if he has not this historical knowledge, he should obtain Mr. Ball's book as soon as possible. A short account of the origin of geometry makes a far better introduction to the subject than the dictation of a number of incomprehensible definitions. The name signifies that the subject originated in land-surveying, but though land must have been measured in very early times, the beginnings of the science were in Egypt. In laying down the lines for the construction of the temples a plumb-line and a set-square were used, and angles were measured with sufficient accuracy to ensure that the light of the sun or a star shone straight down the aisle to the Holy of Holies at a certain time of the year. The Greek geometricians first derived their knowledge of the subject from the Egyptians, but they dealt with the science as an abstract science instead of an applied one. This fact affords an excellent example of the different characteristics of the two peoples. We have only mentioned one instance to illustrate how the interminable propositions and examples of the mathematical lesson might be varied by references to historical matters, and teachers will find that Mr. Ball's book provides them with a fund of interesting information upon any branch of their subject. No one ought to be teaching mathematics who is indifferent to the use of so much excellent material.

The movement in favour of the improvement of geometrical teaching has led to the production of several improved editions of Euclid's Elements. In the edition by Mr. Smith and Mrs. Bryant the vexatious phraseology of Simson's translation—which is the one usually followed—has been superseded by more concise and less pedantic expressions. In our school days we should have doubted the accuracy of a revised version of Euclid as much as old-fashioned people do the revised version of the Bible, but we now know that revision is a sign of progress. Euclid's order is retained in the edition under notice, but many of the proofs have been modified or supplemented with alternative proofs. Personally, we should prefer Euclid's geometry to be used as little in schools here as it is in France and Germany, but, as this time is not yet, we are thankful that such a reasonable edition as the one by Mr. Smith and Mrs. Bryant is now available.

Lord Kelvin's successor at the University of Glasgow has produced a treatise on physics which, though not of the same elaborate and profound character as the renowned work of "Thomson and Tait," yet belongs to the same class. The work is not of the old-fashioned natural philosophy type, with numerous pretty pictures of experiments and phenomena, but a precise statement of the foundations and implications of physical science. Phenomena are not merely described; they are subjected to mathematical analysis, and are thus shown to be united by the bond of physical theory. This is the modern point of view of physics, and it is the only one from which lines of progress can be predicted. Serious students of the science of matter and motion will find Prof. Gray's book a valuable means of training, and the young mechanical or electrical engineer who makes himself familiar with the dynamical principles described will have an excellent equipment for his career.

Of a very different character is the book by Messrs. Walden and Manley. This is a manual for the use of beginners of the study of physics, and, so far as we can see, it has few original characteristics. The encouragement now given to simple measurements of physical quantities in elementary and secondary schools has led to the production of many books containing suitable courses of work. We are confident that teachers of physics generally will not approve of the style of the present manual—an examination of the first chapter, which lays down laboriously the nature and scope of the subject, would be sufficient for them. Moreover, the authors succeed in conveying a wrong impression, in spite of their attempt to put the student in a right frame of mind. They state that natural science is the study of all things in nature, whereas the term is only used to comprise what is known as natural history. It is more important that the student should know this than that he should be informed at length that the Greek signification of the word physics is not accepted as defining the scope of the subject.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Knight's book is an unsatisfactory production—of little use to students of chemistry and much beyond the capacity of the general reader. We have, fortunately, passed the day when such descriptive books as this were regarded as suitable vehicles of popular education in science. As with Greek, science should be studied more with the idea of creating a particular frame of mind than to gather information. People who merely read about scientific results have no real conception of the philosophic spirit, and they might employ their spare time better if they have not sufficient interest in nature to investigate matters for themselves. True, suggestions for experiments are given by Mr. Knight, but not in a way likely to lead to their being acted upon. The style is dull and often difficult, and the figures are rough line-blocks, mostly unworthy of reproduction.

Botany.

Disease in Plants. By Prof. H. Marshall Ward. (Macmillan.)

Grasses. A Handbook for Use in the Field and Laboratory. By Prof. H. Marshall Ward. (Cambridge: University Press. 6s.)

Plant and Floral Studies for Designers, Art Students, and Craftsmen. By W. G. Paulson Townsend. (Truslove, Hanson, & Comba.)

THE science of phytopathology, which comprises all that is known of the diseases that threaten the lives of plants, finds but a limited number of readers, yet it is an important and interesting branch of knowledge, to the extension of which more investigators every year devote their attention. Prof. Ward deals with the subject in the latest addition to the "Nature" series of Messrs. Macmillan, and his book is characterised by the clearness of exposition and the grace of expression that one has become used to associating with this writer on biological topics. The book is intended more especially for agriculturists and gardeners, and an examination of the volume shows that technical terms have been reduced to a minimum and that great care has been given to provide these

FROM DUCKWORTH & CO.'S LIST

IMPORTANT BOTANICAL WORKS.—See Special Prospectus.

AGRICULTURAL BOTANY: Theoretical and Practical. By JOHN PERCIVAL, M.A., F.L.S. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
"Has met a distinct want. Very clearly treated, with the help of numerous and excellent illustrations."—Standard.

A GLOSSARY of BOTANIC TERMS. By BENJAMIN DAYDON JACKSON, Secretary of the Linnean Society. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.
"An exhaustive and highly meritorious performance."—Notes and Queries.

A TEXT-BOOK of PLANT DISEASES. By George MASSEE, F.L.S., Principal Assistant, Royal Herbarium, Kew. With 92 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.
"The book deserves to become the leading English text-book on the subject."
Literature.

PROBLEMS of EVOLUTION. By F. W. Headley, Assistant Master at Haileybury College. With 14 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 8s. net.
"A remarkable book. Most valuable and suggestive."—Guardian.

THE POEMS of CATULLUS. Edited by H. MACNAGHTEN and A. B. RAMSAY, Assistant Masters at Eton College. Small crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.
"They understand their author, and they know where to give help."
Spectator.

THE STORY of CATULLUS. With Translations of several of the Poems by H. MACNAGHTEN, formerly Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. Small crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

INTRODUCTION to the STUDY of HISTORY. By CH. V. LANGLOIS and CH. SEIGNOBOS. Authorised Translation by G. G. BERRY. Preface by Prof. YORK POWELL. Large cr. 8vo, 7s. 6d.
"The very book for the serious student of history."—Educational Times.

WITTE'S ESSAYS on DANTE. Translated by C. MABEL LAURENCE, B.A. Edited by PHILIP H. WICKSTEED, M.A. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.
"Admirably done. Most useful book."—Athenæum.

SPINOZA: his Life and Philosophy. By Sir FREDERICK POLLOCK, Bart. New and Cheaper Edition. Demy 8vo, 8s. net.

MR. LESLIE STEPHEN'S NEW BOOK.

THE ENGLISH UTILITARIANS. Demy 8vo, 3 vols., 30s. net.

Ask your Bookseller for special Prospectus.

3, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

HORACE MARSHALL & SON'S EDUCATIONAL LIST.

READERS.

I.—THE TEMPLE READER.

A Reading Book in Literature. Edited by E. E. SPEIGHT, B.A. With an Introduction by Prof. EDWARD DOWDEN, Litt.D., LL.D. Illustrated from the Works of Michael Angelo, Pinturicchio, Guido Reni, A. Van der Neer, Sir Joshua Reynolds, J. M. W. Turner, and others. 1s. 6d. net.

SOME OPINIONS.

Prof. F. YORK POWELL, M.A., says: "It is excellent and the best that I have ever seen."

Prof. JOSEPH WRIGHT, D.C.L., Ph.D., says: "This new edition far surpasses any Reader I have ever seen in any language."

Good Words says: "'The Temple Reader' is the most charming and at the same time the most judicious selection from English literature with which I am acquainted."

II.—THE JUNIOR TEMPLE READER.

Edited by CLARA L. THOMSON, Examiner in Literature to the Central Welsh Board, late of Somerville College, and E. E. SPEIGHT, B.A. Large crown 8vo, 400 pages, with over 50 Full-Page Illustrations by many artists. 1s. 6d. net.

The late Bishop CREIGHTON wrote: "I think it is admirably adapted to interest children, and wish it every success."

The School World says: "This volume carries on the deservedly high reputation which 'The Temple Reader' secured for the New English Series. In compiling it, the same evident care and wide catholicity of taste is demonstrated, and the ability of its Editors is absolutely beyond question.....It deserves a great and wide success."

III.—THE MIDDLE TEMPLE READER.

Edited by E. E. SPEIGHT, B.A. With many Illustrations. 1s. 6d. net.

The Middle Temple Reader, as its name implies, provides reading matter for such children as are too old for the simple folk-tales in the "Junior Temple Reader," and too young to value the more difficult literature of the "Temple Reader." It has been prepared with a view especially to interesting those boys and girls who desire stories of life and movement, and it will be found to be full of stirring prose and poems. Most of the matter will be quite new to school children, and much of it will be of use to the teachers of history.
[Ready immediately.

IV.—THE VILLAGE SCHOOL READER.

Edited by CHARLES SAVILE ROUNDELL. Strongly bound in Illustrated Cover, with many Illustrations. Suitable for Town School and Village School alike. 1s. 6d. net.

The Journal of Education says: "We congratulate Mr. Roundell on his new essay. He has provided for small scholars a feast of good things, and we hope their pastors and masters will take advantage of it."

The Manchester Guardian says: "Altogether the selection is excellent."

The Bradford Observer says: "Every extract is a literary gem, and therein lies its value as a school reader. It is suitable for the village school if the scholars can be got to read it with the seeing eye, and it is also eminently suitable for the town school in that it is bound to arouse interest in country life and scenes."

A USEFUL HISTORY.

A FIRST HISTORY OF ENGLAND TO 1066 A.D.

Written especially for Younger Children. With Maps, Plans, and many Illustrations of Contemporary Subjects. Edited by CLARA L. THOMSON. In handsome cover, 1s. 6d. [Now ready.

HISTORY IN POETRY.

CARMINA BRITANNIÆ.

A Selection of Poems and Ballads Illustrative of English History. Arranged by CLARA L. THOMSON, Examiner in English Literature to the Central Welsh Board. Large 8vo, 250 pages, 2s. net.

This book forms the completest collection of historical English poems which has been published in cheap form. It contains over one hundred selections, many of which are of contemporary date with the events described.

THE NEW ENGLISH SERIES.

1. THE JUNIOR TEMPLE READER. 1s. 6d. net.
2. THE MIDDLE TEMPLE READER. 1s. 6d. net.
3. THE TEMPLE READER. 1s. 6d. net.
4. SELECTIONS from WORDSWORTH. 6d. net.
5. CHARLES LAMB'S ADVENTURES of ULYSSES. 1s. net.
6. THE ADVENTURES of BEOWULF 9d. net.
7. STORIES from the NORTHERN SAGAS. 1s. net.
8. SELECTIONS from TENNYSON. 1s. net.
9. THE NEW ENGLISH POETRY BOOK. 1s. net.

N.B.—The above Works are in requisition in the chief schools of all grades of Great Britain and the Colonies, and THE TEMPLE READER has, moreover, been adopted for teaching in such educational centres as the Universities of Oxford, Brussels, Munich, Heidelberg, Groningen, Helsingfors, Czernowitz, and Breslau.

London: HORACE MARSHALL & SON, Temple House, E.C

Digitized by Google

practical men with the best treatment for the sick and languishing among their crops. But, in order that the remedies may be intelligently applied, sufficient explanation of the causes and nature of vegetable disease is placed before the reader. Each chapter is provided with a set of notes to explain where the student, anxious to go more deeply into the questions discussed, can go for fuller, trustworthy information, and the author more than once insists that there is no royal road to science; for though it may be possible to make use of "tips" provided by the man of science, yet it is only the practitioner who has studied vegetable morphology and physiology who can properly diagnose the diseases with which he comes in contact, and so apply suitable palliatives.

Prof. Ward's little book, in the series known as the Cambridge Natural Science Manuals, is of quite a different character. A single glance through it will be enough to warn a general reader that it is not for him. A student taking up the important branch of economic botany with which the book is concerned will find here a concise, well-arranged account of the common native British grasses. The descriptions are short, clear, well-illustrated, but severely technical. As a handbook for use in the field and laboratory it is excellent.

To leave an audience with the author of the last two books for Mr. Townsend's company is to breathe suddenly a new atmosphere. It is a case of passing from the laboratory to the studio. In this volume plants are regarded as things of beauty chiefly fit to serve as constructive units for the designer. A hundred and fourteen black-and-white drawings of familiar plants are to be found here, accompanied by a comparatively small amount of letterpress. It is a little difficult to understand what use these descriptions will be to designers or craftsmen; they contain a little botany, a little folk-lore, a little etymology, but scarcely enough of any single subject to be of real assistance or interest. Nor are the descriptions the best possible, if the author's object was to make it easy for the art student to find the plants for himself. They may serve the purpose, however, of making the reader want to know more; if so, they will be justified. The drawings are clear and correct, and should prove very useful for the purpose for which they were prepared.

Technical Training.

Practical Draughtsmen's Work. Edited by Paul N. Hasluck. (Cassell. 2s.)

The Preceptor's Book-keeping. By T. C. Jackson. (Clive. 1s. 6d.)

Educational Foundations of Trade and Industry. By Fabian Ware. (Harper. 5s. 6d.)

MR. HASLUCK gives a serviceable digest of very useful information contributed by various writers to the pages of Work and the Building World. The volume is one of a practical series valued by amateurs and intelligent artisans.

A boy who has been trained in the principles of arithmetic does not need to study book-keeping, for if he enters any office he is able to understand any system of keeping books in a week or two. There are, however, a few ideas which it is desirable for a youth preparing to enter a commercial career to know, and he could learn something about them from Mr. Jackson's book as well as from any other.

Playing at business by drawing up imaginary balance-sheets and working at scholastic ledgers will not do much to educate the younger generation of to-day in the principles of future commercial progress. Mr. Fabian Ware shows in his book how our foremost rivals in the markets of the world have built up national and rational systems of education, in which the claims of industry and commerce are fully recognised, but not by the system of early specialisation in such subjects as book-keeping. Our schoolmen and examiners have yet to learn that the aim of education should be the development of the faculties of insight and common sense rather than the accumulation of scraps of information. There is less special education in Germany than in the schools of any other country; and the sooner it is recognised that our educational efforts should proceed on the same principle, the better it will be for our national prosperity. Mr. Ware reviews the educational systems of France and the United States, as well as that of Germany, and describes our own invertebrate organisation, controlled by politicians and other public men who know nothing of the science of education, and are without the extensive sympathy essential in dealing with the subject. We hope that the book will do something to educate the Government and local authorities to a sense of their responsibilities.

LITERATURE says:—"It is really delightful to see and handle school-books as nice as Messrs. Blackie's 'Illustrated Latin Series.'"

BLACKIE'S
ILLUSTRATED LATIN SERIES
General Editor—Prof. R. Y. TYRRELL, Litt.D.

The Volumes are published with or without Vocabularies.

CAESAR—GALLIC WAR. Edited by Professor JOHN BROWN, M.A. Books I., II., IV., 1s. 6d. each; Book V., 2s.

CICERO—THE FIRST CATILINE ORATION. Edited by Professor C. H. KEENE, M.A. 1s. 6d.

CICERO—THE CATILINE ORATIONS. (Complete.) Edited by Professor KEENE. 2s. 6d.

EUTROPIUS—BOOKS I. and II. Edited by W. CECIL LAMING, M.A. 1s. 6d.

LIVY—BOOK I. Edited by Professor JOHN BROWN, M.A. 2s. 6d.

LIVY—BOOKS V. and VI. Edited by W. CECIL LAMING, M.A. 2s. 6d. each.

LIVY—BOOK XXI. Edited by G. G. LOANE, M.A. 2s. 6d.

HORACE—THE ODES—BOOKS I., II., III., and IV. Edited by STEPHEN GWYNN, B.A. 1s. 6d. each.

OVID—METAMORPHOSES I. Edited by ERNEST ENSOR, B.A. 1s. 6d.

SALLUST—THE CATILINE CONSPIRACY. Edited by the Rev. W. A. STONE, M.A. 1s. 6d.

TACITUS—AGRICOLA. Edited by W. C. FLAMSTEAD WALTERS, M.A. 1s. 6d.

VIRGIL—AENEID VI. Edited by H. B. COTTERILL, M.A. 2s.

VIRGIL—AENEID II. and III. Edited by Professor SANDFORD, M.A. Book II., 2s.; Book III., 1s. 6d.

VIRGIL—GEORGICS I. and II. Edited by S. E. WINBOLT, M.A. 1s. 6d. each.

BLACKIE'S
ILLUSTRATED GREEK SERIES
General Editor—Prof. R. Y. TYRRELL, Litt.D.

Messrs. Blackie & Son have the pleasure to announce a New Greek Series under the above Title, edited by Prof. Tyrrell, on the same general lines as their "Illustrated Latin Series," which has attained so much popularity. The first Volumes are:—

AESCHYLUS—EUMENIDES. Edited by LIONEL D. BARNETT, M.A., Litt.D., formerly Scholar of Trinity College, Cambridge. 3s. 6d.

HOMER—ODYSSEY—BOOK I. Edited by the Rev. E. C. EVERARD OWEN, M.A., Assistant Master at Harrow.

XENOPHON—ANABASIS II. Edited by the Rev. G. H. NALL, M.A., Assistant Master at Westminster School.

A FIRST LATIN READER
By R. R. A. BERESFORD, M.A.

Of this book, recently published, a Second Edition has been already called for. It consists of Three Parts, the first containing more than forty small illustrations, each having a short Latin descriptive sentence below it. The Second Part consists of short and simple anecdotes, with illustrations. The Third Part contains longer pieces, with many full-page illustrations. With Vocabularies.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d.

BLACKIE'S
LITTLE FRENCH CLASSICS

Each Book consists of from thirty-two to forty pages, and contains, in addition to the French Text, a brief Introduction and short Notes. The first Books are as follows:—

RABELAIS—SELECTIONS. Edited by E. C. GOLDBERG, M.A., of Tonbridge School. 4d.

MOLIÈRE—SCENES FROM LE MÉDECIN MALGRÉ LUI. Edited by W. J. CLARK, M.A., Ph.D. 4d.

LE SAGE—SELECTIONS FROM GIL BLAS. Edited by H. W. ATKINSON, M.A., of Rossall School. 4d.

London: BLACKIE & SON, Ltd., 50, Old Bailey, E.C.

Digitized by Google

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage, One Halfpenny, Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscription, prepaid (including postage) 17/6
" Quarterly 5/0
" Price for one issue /5

Literature and Tobacco.

EXPERIENCE has taught us to expect little from a book on tobacco. As Mr. W. A. Penn remarks in his extremely interesting book, The Soverane Herbe (Grant Richards), the literature of Tobacco is wofully scrappy, unsustaining, and inferior. But we perceive that Mr. Penn has turned the tide. To say that one wants to keep his book is to pay him an unprecedented compliment. Nor are we displeased to find that Mr. Penn is aware, as a good workman must be, that he has done well. He really seems to have written, as he hopes, "the most complete history of tobacco yet published."

To say that literature is closely associated with tobacco is a feeble and unworthy periphrasis. Shall we not rather acclaim their identity, since their association is too intimate and subtle ever to be recounted. Tobacco is the rolling cloud, literature the emerging lightning. Is there a novelist among us who does not smoke? A journalist? And, saving Mr. Swinburne, a poet? But it will be said that literature was produced during thousands of years by non-smokers like Homer, Virgil, Dante, and Chaucer. There is no gainsaying it. Even Mr. Penn admits that certain people figured on an ancient Egyptian tombstone were not smoking, but only blowing glass. He concedes that no tobacco pipe ever found, not even one which was plucked from the jaws of an ancient Milesian in a tumulus at Kildare, can boast a greater antiquity than Elizabeth. Yet the Greeks are known to have inhaled the smoke of dried coltsfoot to cure chest troubles, and the Thracians and Scythians are reported to have enjoyed the smoke of certain fragrant plants and of hemp-seed. They had no tobacco, but they may have had what we have lost? What of that rare

> Nepenthes which the wife of Thone
> In Egypt gave to Jove-born Helena?

The ages give and take away. Horace knew not tea, the author of Beowulf was a stranger to bananas; and we, also, are born too early for delights yet unimagined by the epicure.

Is not literature itself a great narcotic? A few days ago three bookmen were discussing the question whether books really influence men in their lives and conduct. Two maintained that the moral influence of literature is a mere delusion. The third indignantly met their denial; and the wrangle was only settled on the basis that literature is at least a great narcotic, that it soothes and liberates the native energies of the mind. What are those companions of our waiting and agitated hours; what are those precious fragments of verse and prose which we bring forth at odd moments, chanting them to the wind or to the rumble of a train, amid the racket and suspense of business; what are these but the instinctively selected narcotic grains of literature; and what is our sensuous enjoyment of them if it is not comparable to the paradaisical calm and aloofness of the smoker? Is it for any other result that one murmurs a passage like this from "Hyperion":

> His palace bright
> Bastion'd with pyramids of glowing gold,
> And touch'd with shade of bronzèd obelisks,
> Glar'd a blood-red through all its thousand courts,
> Arches, and domes, and fiery galleries;
> And all its curtains of Aurorian clouds
> Flush'd angerly: while sometimes eagle's wings
> Unseen before by gods or wondering men,
> Darken'd the place; and neighing steeds were heard,
> Not heard before by gods or wondering men?

Or wherein, but in its simple power to empty the mind of worry and fill it with vast spaces and cadences, dwells the magic of Milton's

> Where the great vision of the guarded mount
> Looks towards Namancos and Bayona's hold?

By long use and habit these unattached peacemakers and anæsthetists present themselves silently, swiftly, when the care of little things and the unhappy frustrations of the hour become too much for us. In all fine poetry and prose there is secreted a narcotic principle that never dies, that pervades its very fragments. In a few disconnected words, whose context is forgotten, whose meaning when taken alone is nothing, this blessed influence will survive. There is a passage in one of Mr. Francis Thompson's poems which begins:

> On Ararat there grew a vine. . . .

Often and often above the clamour of the street, and the never-so-wise charming of our industrious singers, we have enjoyed the vastness and cadence of those dissevered words: "On Ararat there grew a vine."

It was the narcotic in that blessed word Mesopotamia that drugged the old lady into peace of mind for so many years. We once heard a bishop preach a sing-song sermon on the text "In the valley of Achor, by the way of the sea." And still, after infinite removal and lapse of time, we see the light fading out of the great eastern window of that northern cathedral church, and recall the warmth and the seclusion and the morocco scent of the hymn-books, as the voice repeats, again and again, in soft nasal undulations—"In the valley of Achor, by the way of the sea." Not to have touched the mind to some such issues of vague and persistent consolation is to have missed one of the achievements of literature. Even Byron won to it when he wrote the stanza:

> A king sate upon the rocky brow
> Which looks o'er sea-born Salamis,
> And ships by thousands lay below,
> And men in nations. All were his;
> He counted them at break of day,
> But when the sun was set, where were they?

Lamb, writing under the spell of tobacco, communicated a subtler spell to many a sentence in his essays. For example, to these:

> A pulse assuredly was felt along the line of the Elysian shades when the near arrival of G. D. was announced by no equivocal indications. From their seats of Asphodel arose the gentler and the graver ghosts—poet and historian—of Grecian or of Roman lore—to crown with unfading chaplets the half-finished love-labours of their unwearied scholiast. Him Markland expected, him Tyrrwhit hoped to encounter, him the sweet lyrist of Peterhouse, whom he had barely seen upon earth, with newest airs prepared to greet. And—patron of the gentle Christ's boy—who should have been his patron for life, the mild Askew, with longing aspirations leaned foremost from his venerable Æsculapian chair, and prepared to welcome into that happy company the matured virtues of the man whose tender scions in the boy he had himself, while on earth, so prophetically fed and watered.

Without a doubt words lull us by their very ripple over the shingles of the mind. But the words which do this, not merely in our easily-satisfied youth, but throughout life, are written only by the greatest. Give a man the ultimate word or cadence of words for his feeling, and the pleasure of that feeling is heightened or its pain mitigated. It is no longer crude and little, but is lifted and enlarged and touched with at least the luxury of woe. Horace's Eheu, fugaces, Postoume, Postoume, has for centuries been a charm to reconcile men to their little span. Unfailing, unrivalled, come those cheerily mournful words down the populous centuries. Shakespeare, who does not mention tobacco, has thrown into one immortal speech the suggestion that life without some narcotic, be it physical or mental, or some veil and alleviation to which you may give any finer name you please, is unbearable. For when Iago has set his infamous snare, and already sees Othello's life withered beyond cure, what words does he place in the lips of this triumphant despoiler of a life: "Look," says Iago, "where he comes." And as his victim enters the room he mutters:

Digitized by Google

> Not poppy, nor mandragora
> Nor all the drowsy syrups of the world,
> Shall ever medicine thee to that sweet sleep
> Which thou ow'dst yesterday.

It is one of the regrets of Biography that Dr. Johnson did not smoke. His case was peculiar. He approved, but refrained. In this he seems to have been influenced by the general reaction against tobacco which, as Mr. Penn points out in his interesting chapter on the "Social Progress of Tobacco," set in with the eighteenth century. Snuff alone was sanctioned by the elect. "In France," says Mr. Penn, "snuff had always been preferred to smoking, and Georgian England, repudiating smoking for its popularity, began to snuff. In Pall Mall, the fashionable lounge, smoking was forbidden. Beau Nash enacted similar laws at Bath. Forgetting that they had ever enjoyed a pipe, the higher classes speedily came to regard smoking with that odium which only the last generation has removed. It was tabooed by good society and snuff-taking substituted for it as an accomplishment essential to all who would be considered fine ladies and gentlemen." Dr. Johnson rebelled against this law, yet kept it. He said: "Smoking has gone out. To be sure, it is a shocking thing, blowing smoke out of our mouths into other people's mouths, eyes, and noses, and having the same thing done to us. Yet I cannot account why a thing which requires so little exertion, and yet preserves the mind from total vacuity, should have gone out. Every man has something by which he calms himself: beating with his feet or so." Here Johnson spoke as a restive social atom. One wishes he had enjoyed a discreet pipe at the Mitre, and blessed tobacco with some thunderous sanction, like that which must forever fortify the lover of the game of draughts. Writing a dedication to Payne's book on that game, he thus addressed the Earl of Rochford: "Triflers may find or make anything a trifle; but since it is the great characteristic of a wise man to see events in their causes, to obviate consequences, and ascertain contingencies, your lordship will think nothing a trifle by which the mind is inured to caution, foresight, and circumspection." It was not social convention that kept Professor Huxley from smoking for forty years. For that period, he told a sectional meeting of the British Association, tobacco had been a deadly poison to him. "As a medical student I tried to smoke, but at every attempt tobacco stretched me upon the floor. On entering the Navy I again tried to smoke, and again met with defeat. I hated tobacco. I could have almost lent my support to any institution that had for its object the execution of smokers. A few years ago I was in Brittany with some friends. It was a miserable, drenching day, and they looked so happy and comfortable with their pipes that I thought I would try a cigar. I did so. I smoked that cigar; it was delicious. From that moment I was a changed man, and now I feel that smoking in moderation is a comforting and laudable practice, and productive of good. There is no more harm in a pipe than there is in a cup of tea." A grain of nicotine, we have been told by our severer counsellers, kills a cat. "A grain of theine," says Mr. Penn, with happy adaptation, "kills a frog instantly." In his chapter on "Tobacco and Genius," he has collected many of the most illustrious personal traditions of the "Soverane Herbe," but we leave these, and much more, to the reader. Mr. Penn's advocacy is discreet, and founded on knowledge and research. In his chapters on Tobacco Manufacture, Pipes, Cigars, and the Hygiene of Tobacco, he has wise words for the most practised smoker. His facts, too, are abundant and curiously interesting. To conclude, we will give one of his stories and tell him another. When Pope Pius IX. received a certain Englishman of high rank in private audience, he offered him a cigar. "You will find this very good," he said. "Thank you, your Holiness, but I am not addicted to this vice." "It isn't a vice," cuttingly replied the Holy Father, himself a smoker, "or probably you would be." George Fox, the founder of Quakerism, was not a Pope, and he did not smoke. Yet once, when pressed to try a pipe, he placed it between his lips, drew one whiff, and returned it to his companion—to show, as he weightily remarked, that he had "unity with the Creation."

Things Seen.

By the Way.

He was tall and lean, with a shaggy beard, and unkempt grey hair, a workman's bag was slung across one shoulder, and his feet were swathed in rags.

He pointed to the bicycles leaning against the hedge. "I mind the very fust o' they things as I ever set sight on. In Abyssinia that were, when my colonel rode on to the parade-ground, you should have seen the native fellers run, yellin' with fear as he come nigh 'em!" He mimicked the gait and gestures of a scared native to the life.

"Ay seen a bit o' fightin', I reckon, in my time! Abyssinia, China, India—walked into Cawnpore after the massacre"—he ran into details. "Ay, I've seen men fight like animals"—he leaned upon his stick—"I've seen many breeds fight. I'd fight a-many yet myself, but the War Office say 'Too old'"—he doubled a big gnarled fist in derision. "I wrote to the old colonel an' he called me a bloodthirsty feller; but there's fightin' left if they'd take me, there's fightin' left."

He looked down the smiling valley where the river ran noisily, and the woods stretched from the skyline to the water's edge.

The flow of reminiscence ran on, he talked well, vividly, whether truth or lie I could not tell. I recognised facts, dates, soldiers' names, I saw the pictures as he drew them with deft words. The man was a born narrator.

When I rode on there was something incongruous between the happy English valley and those echoing, fierce old war-tales in our ears; and yet I somehow wished that he had not been so readily contented with a shilling.

The Pursuit.

"Look!" said the actress. I remembered that Burke had attributed Garrick's eminence as an actor to his keenness in watching men. We were outside the Magasin du Louvre. On the opposite side of the square were two people, the woman noticeable in the busy crowd, the man unremarkable for anything but being with her. She was of the working-classes, fair, tall, a girl grown early old. Her blouse was damp, and clung about her in folds which recalled the Nike's vest that we had just seen in the Louvre. She was common—and magnificent. I had done with her, I thought, and was looking away when the actress pressed my arm. The man, with extraordinary "slimness," had left the woman's side and jumped into a cab. The cab was being driven rapidly across the square in the direction of the Rue de Rivoli, and after it, head down, in a magnificent swinging stride, rushed the woman. She was blind to the vehicles in the way, deaf to the shouts of warning. . . . It is with precisely such a motion that Duse goes after Turiddu in Cavalleria. She must be killed. No! She has caught up the fiacre, and, catching hold of it between the two wheels, is dragged along, her feet now on the ground, now off it—a sickening, rhythmical progress. Her death seems so near that the man is forced to stop the fiacre. She, apparently unhurt, gets in and drives off—a bare-headed Victory in a working blouse, by the side of a respectable, top-hatted gentleman.

Digitized by Google

"Oh, men!" said the actress. The tears were in her eyes. They were still there when we sat down to luncheon.

Correspondence.

Twentieth Century Taste.

SIR,—Mr. Lang, I see, is as troubled as the Quarterly reviewer about twentieth-century tolerance of second-rate literature. I gather that his distress is due chiefly to the approbation of deans and the recommendation of preachers. I should not have thought that clerical recognition was a sound test of a community's literary taste; in the present instance it is an unfair one. There is a fashion in these matters as in all things; pulpit references are allowed, nay, encouraged, now, which would have horrified the religious public of fifty years ago. Moreover, the great writers of the mid-Victorian era lend themselves far more to uses of edification than do their successors. In any case we may remember that the generation which read Dickens, Thackeray, George Eliot, and Kingsley, also read Tupper in preference to Robert Browning or Matthew Arnold. The Proverbial Philosophy was guyed by the critics as are the masterpieces of ——— or ——— nowadays. The guying never hindered the popularity or saleability of the book, nor, let us reflect, have the popularity and sales averted complete oblivion.

Like Mr. Lang (see last week's Pilot), I have been shut up in an inn, and have had to fall back upon old books. Luckier than he, Moore's Byron fell to my share. It is amusing to find that Byron, backed up by Moore, was greatly disturbed by the inevitable bad effect of Review reading upon public taste; in fact, the Quarterly and Edinburgh were scolded by him in much the same way as the Strand or Windsor are by our modern censors. It is amusing also to read, under date of 1807, that "Taste is over with us; and another century will sweep our Empire, our literature, and our name from all but a place in the annals of mankind." Most amusing to find that in 1813 Byron, apparently with his biographer's full concurrence, assigns the second rank among the poets of the day to—Rogers! whom he places far above Wordsworth and Coleridge. If I am not mistaken, the Quarterly of the day would have approved this judgment.

Upon the whole, I venture to think that so far from the taste of the present day being worse or feebler than that of former times, there never was a period in which the good judges were so prompt and so unanimous in recognising new talent, or in which the public at large followed with more docility the opinions of good judges.—I am, &c.,

ALFRED NUTT.

Grand Hôtel des Bains, Bex-les-Bains, Suisse.

"Insanity in Literature."

SIR,—If it is not too late, I should much like to express my entire sympathy with the views set forth by Miss Hannah Lynch under the above title in your issue of the 17th ult. The holidays must excuse my tardiness. Miss Lynch is perfectly able to take care of herself, and her reply to Mr. Percy L. Babington was conclusive enough; but the subject is of more than momentary importance, and perhaps, therefore, you will allow me a few lines. Mr. Babington, in the letter which you printed on the 24th ult., takes vigorous exception to Miss Lynch's vigour in stating her opinions, and he would evidently like to defend Pierre Louys. For my part, I enjoyed her vigour. It was needed, and especially in England, where there has been a disposition, even in the most respectable and discreet literary quarters, to take Pierre Louys seriously. One cannot too strongly insist that Pierre Louys is negligible. His appeal is merely pornographic. He writes well, very well (but so do scores of Frenchmen); he has considerable inventive skill, and a truly admirable sense of form; but his imagination has no emotional intensity, no lyric force. If any of his stuff survives, it will be as facetiæ, in the same category as La Popelinière's Tableaux des Mœurs du Temps, which for about a hundred years enjoyed the reputation of being the beastliest book in French, and which Charles Monselet was so ill-advised as to reprint in 1867. Pierre Louys is a finished craftsman, who has made up in impudence what he lacked in emotion. I should not care to assert that the grossest indecency cannot co-exist with art of a very high order; Balzac's La Fille aux Yeux d'Or is a proof that it can. But the hard, cold brazenness of books like Louys' Aphrodite is far distant from the emotional quality which pervades all true art. The whole school of the "Société du Mercure de France" is contemptible, and it is typical of nearly all modern French fiction. Look at the weekly lists of French novels, and you will invariably find the words amour and vice imbedded in the titles. French fiction is, in truth, under a cloud of impudicity and dulness. With the possible exception of Zola, there are only two great writers left—Bourget and Anatole France. Miss Lynch does well to refer to the decadence of certain living novelists, and particularly Jules Lemaitre and Maurice Barrès. In regard to the latter, it is difficult to believe that the author of the exquisite Jardin de Bérenice wrote Les Déracinés. Miss Lynch might have added Emile Zola to her list.

Some people may ask, What about the position of Marcel Prévost, the brothers Margueritte, and the brothers Rosny? As to the first, I agree with Miss Lynch. He has written one good book, Léa, two fairly good books, Frédérique and Le Jardin Secret (whose success he vainly tried to repeat in Heureux Ménage), and a lot of fifth-rate concoctions. To put Marcel Prévost in his proper position it is only necessary to compare the descriptions of London in Frédérique with the descriptions of Paris in Mr. George Moore's A Modern Lover. We have a dozen men in England who could write Marcel Prévost into the Bay of Biscay. As for the two pairs of brothers, one cheerfully admits that they are serious and honourable artists of a certain distinction, and I, personally, can never forget a vision of Walworth manners in a short story by those earnest students of London, the Rosnys. But these two suffer from the universal blight of tediousness, which is equivalent to saying that they lack force. Can anyone positively swear, hand on heart, that he has not found Le Désastre tedious? It is as tedious as a novel by Paul Adam or Léon Cladel.

The fact is, French fiction has fallen on evil days.

I differ from Miss Lynch's view that the Louys school succeeds by virtue of foreign markets. About a hundred thousand copies of Aphrodite have been sold, and no foreign markets could digest that mass, or a tenth of it. The Louys school fabricates for home consumption. Only a month or two ago Le Journal, a paper conducted with conspicuous journalistic ability, made as much preliminary fuss over the publication of a short feuilleton by Pierre Louys (which proved to be quite as blue as it was painted) as though it had been a new novel by Bourget himself.

Digitized by Google

Le Journal would not have put itself to this trouble if it had thought that Louys appealed only or chiefly to the foreigner.—I am, &c., E. A. BENNETT.

Hockliffe, Beds.

A Wessex Pilgrimage.

SIR,—I have been greatly amused at the paragraph of American origin regarding the above, but I can well understand Mr. Thomas Hardy not seeing the humour of it, and being a little hurt and indignant; the whole thing is so characteristic of our cousins. They come as guests. They are grateful and appreciative, but their standard for natural beauty does not favour the purely pastoral. They are all for associations, either with persons or with places. The country through which they drove for seventeen miles will compare not unfavourably with the best of what is typical of English landscapes, but there were no fences, no plank side-walks, and they might as well have been in either Kent or Surrey for all that was new to their uninstructed eye and endeared to them by associations. Let them be excused, but they might have remembered the trouble taken by the organisers of a pleasant function more as a tribute to a great author than a day's jaunt, and should not have forgotten their kindly reception by him and his strong love of his native county as expressed to them.—I am, &c., E. A. S.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 103 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best denunciation of some social convention. We award the prize to Mr. Henry A. Moore, care of Messrs. Nathan & Somers, 10, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden, W.C., for the following:

HAND-SHAKING.

I WAS born and bred in the tangled forests of ——, and came over to your mighty London for the first time a week ago. The buildings, the streets, and the traffic are peculiar enough—heaven knows!—but there is a custom among your people which astonishes me more than ever. I noticed it directly I got into the station. A man went up to another man and seized his hand savagely, gripping and shaking it about for some time. I was surprised that he was not angry, but rather appeared to like it. Another man went up to a woman, seized her hand with both of his and pressed it in a malicious manner. It must have caused her great pain because she was crying. Had I my club with me I would have brained him on the spot! In another place, called Piccadilly, I saw them doing it above their heads; this struck me as being rather silly, for they could not possibly hurt each other that way. When I told X. so, he laughed and said I was an uncivilised barbarian.

Other replies are as follows:

COMPULSORY CONVERSATION.

I have a bête noir that crawls at my heels through many a social function. It appeared to me first when as a pensive, rather than a loquacious, child of eight the cruelty of imposed sociability to previously "unexplored" human-being was thrust upon me. "Tony," my mother said, pouncing upon me one fiery August afternoon, when I was digging for worms in my garden; "Tony, there are friends on the lawn, and you must help amuse them. Talk to them when I leave you alone—talk, mind! Or else, if you are a stupid boy, I shall come to you at bed-time. (A visit from my mother at bed-time meant chastisement, minus my little serge suit.) On the lawn my mother left me. I didn't mind the noise the people made much; we kept a grammaphone, and I had visited "Savage South Africa" at Earl's Court, but I instinctively feared the muslin and lace, silk hat and frock-coat part that kept it going. No one spoke to me. I stood stolid and silent. Then from afar I caught my mother's eye fixed upon me. . . A girl and a man were seated tête-à-tête, in the shade of a crooked plum-tree. Young, ignorant, and in mortal fear of maternal wrath, I stalked boldly into their solitude. "I—I say, isn't it a c—cold day?" I stammered. The girl was a bright-eyed American. "I guess it just is, little boy—Nova Zembla way," she answered cruelly. "You trot off brisk and see!"

[Miss Z. Mc., Whitby.]

THE TOIL OF AMUSEMENT.

"Amuse us—or we die! Build more theatres—(No room? Pull down the churches!)—pay actors as ambassadors—pet them—worship them—title them—anything to keep them good-tempered and amuse us!" It is done. In addition, actors are gathered from France, America, Germany, Belgium, Japan—from everywhere—to amuse us. America, with a just contempt for our intelligence, sends us plays of amazing silliness—to amuse us. Englishmen give us plays with a Gallic flavour, heard without a blush, having long ceased to honour or reverence women (did they not themselves teach us not to do so?); and, as we laugh at whatever rubbish is given us for our amusement, do we ever think—say, of Africa—and contrast the comedy we are laughing at with the tragedy there, and the sons, brothers, lovers, husbands, fathers playing it? Thousands of our dear ones have been killed or maimed—and it is all going on now! Surely we should limit the indulgence of this childish passion for pleasure, and think of the gravities of life—of its duties as well as its poor pleasures. "Ye little birds, how can ye sing, and I so full of woe?" The little birds do not know, but we do. Hard times are on us—worse are coming. It is not a time for amusement, but for sacrifice, foresight, and wise action. We have enemies all round us, and in our midst. Let the laugh wait till there is something to laugh at.

[W. J. B., London.]

INTRODUCTIONS.

Once, at a fine play, I was so powerfully impressed by the performance, and my companion remained so stolidly indifferent, that, meeting the eyes of my neighbour, and seeing sympathy written there, I spoke to him. Only a few words passed between us, but we watched the play together, and our pleasure was doubled. But afterwards I found that I had committed a dreadful crime! "Who was he? How could I?" gasped my companion. I am sure I didn't know—or care. Did it matter? . . . Matter! Good gracious!! I had not been introduced!!! No one had said, "Mr. Jones—Miss Smith." How horrible!

Until someone will take the responsibility of having commenced the acquaintance we must stand aloof—we must have someone to blame if things go wrong; we cannot choose for ourselves. Casual friendships are sweet—unorthodox!—forbidden fruit! Has no one intuition? Must everyone be guarded, and guarded against? What sort of persons are the guardians? and who chose them? One who knows our several moods, passions, necessities? He should know these who chooses our friends.

Do introductions keep lambs from wolves—a girl from insult, a lad from bad company—used as it is, tactlessly, thoughtlessly? It is no barrier against craft and gold—rather a too frail fence behind which we lose independence and judgment. It might be a science—it has possibilities; it seems now but a scheme to separate many who should be happy in a harmony of brotherly sympathy.

[G. M. W., Hull.]

THE AFTERNOON CALL.

There is a Fetish enshrined in every heart, numerous are its commands; women especially are addicted to blind adherence to its mandates. This Fetish is Custom, who, enthroned, blindfolded with flimsy gauze, crowned with the latest "creation" of the moment, holding in one hand her book of rules and in the other her rod of ridicule, issues—unalterable as the laws of the Medes and Persians—her stern decree: one of which is, that every woman with any pretensions to fashion should spend the better part of her day in paying calls upon people whom she cares not a jot about, or in receiving the same from people to whom she is but a name on their visiting list. Daily, with smiling faces but with rebellious hearts, they pour forth libations of tea mingled with milk, yclept cream, and cakes not a few. Fain would they cast off the weary and profitless yoke, but that they lack the courage. The noontide hours are devoted to this deity; then one may see its votaries arrayed for sacrifice, hurrying from house to house, at each house are the irksome rights performed, most often accompanied by hymns in praise or otherwise of the weather, or topics as thrilling, and after mutual endeavours to stifle their boredom, and to appear delighted with each other and everything, they part—Victims seeking other Victims. [K. M. P., North Wales.]

Competition No. 104 (New Series).

We offer a prize of One Guinea for the most interesting account of an incident seen during a holiday this summer. Not to exeeed 250 words.

RULES.

Answers, addressed, "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, September 18. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

Digitized by Google

NOW READY.

Was Alfred King of England?

By A SAXON.

Demy 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

A brief review of one of our latest text-books, showing the true relations of Prince Alfred both to the Saxon people in England and to her Roman invaders.

HARRISON & SONS, Publishers, 59, Pall Mall, S.W.

"The Thrush."

Edited by MULLETT ELLIS.

"THE THRUSH," a Periodical for original Poetry, is intended to bring thoughts of beauty and the consolation of exalted ideas into the hearts of the people.

Since its origin, on the first day of the new Century, "THE THRUSH" has published many beautiful Poems by the following writers:—

Dr. Richard Garnett, W. E. Henley, F. Prevost Battersby, Keble Howard, Harold Begbie, A. P. Graves, Nora Hopper, L. Alma-Tadema, Norman Gale, C. W. Wynne, Dr. Gilbert Murray, John Hutchinson, Hon. Albania Brodrick, Arthur Symons, N. Carruthers Gould, Clifton Bingham, Lady Margaret Sackville, Hamilton Aidé, Edgar Fawcett, Lady Gilbert, Lady Florence Douglas, Rev. W. J. Dawson, Rev. F. Bentley Greeves, Victor Plarr, Sir Wyke Bayliss, P.R.I., the 1st Lord Lytton, and Mullett Ellis.

In future numbers we are promised the work of many of the leading Poets of our day, including the Right Rev. Lord Bishop of Derry and Raphoe, Dean of Armagh, the Rev. Canon H. D. Rawnsley, Herbert Morrah, Israel Gollancz, M.A., Wm. Canton, Edwin Hamilton, M.A., Justin Huntly McCarthy, Dollie Radford, Louise Chandler Moulton, Sir Lewis Morris, M.A., Frankfort Moore, and Thomas Hardy.

"THE THRUSH" for September contains the Ode of Welcome to the Trades Union Congress by Sir LEWIS MORRIS.

The Rules for a Prize Poem Competition, open to Subscribers to "THE THRUSH," are contained in the August Number.

THE FIRST PRIZE IS £10 STERLING.

See "THE THRUSH."

By order at all Booksellers'.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED).

SUBSCRIPTIONS for 3 Months, 6 Months, and 12 Months

CAN BE ENTERED AT ANY DATE.

THE BEST and MOST POPULAR BOOKS of the SEASON ARE NOW in CIRCULATION.

Prospectuses of Terms free on application.

BOOK SALE DEPARTMENT.

Many Thousand Surplus Copies of Books always ON SALE (Second Hand). Also a large Selection of

BOOKS IN LEATHER BINDINGS

SUITABLE FOR

BIRTHDAY AND WEDDING PRESENTS.

30 to 34, NEW OXFORD STREET;

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C., LONDON;

And at 10-12, Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

Now Ready, Second Edition, crown 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d., post free.

THE CHARTER of the CHURCH.

Lectures on the Principle of Nonconformity. By P. T. FORSYTH, M.A., D.D.

"Explains the position of religious dissent with great force and eloquence."—Manchester Guardian.

London: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, LTD., 21 and 22, Furnival Street, E.C.

DIGBY, LONG & CO.'S New Novels

CLOTH, SIX SHILLINGS EACH.

"One of the most striking books of the day."

LOVE, THE ATONEMENT.

By FRANCES CAMPBELL,

Author of "For Three Moons," &c. Cloth, 6s.

Spectator.—"There is a great deal of very charming reading in 'Love, the Atonement,' and a touch of poetry about Deelish, the fantastic little heroine, and her dreams."

Vanity Fair.—"A charming story, with a rare blend of poetry and humour."

Tatler.—"One of the most striking books of the day."

Morning Post.—"The story is mainly concerned with the life of Deelish (otherwise Lady Una) and her beautiful husband, Colonel 'Teddy.' The characterisation is much above the average, and the Irish scenes, especially those wherein the racy dialect of old Dennis and the charming nature of Father Terence are illustrated, are as full of life as those wherein the lights and shades of Australian society are painted. 'Love, the Atonement' has a distinct and very agreeable character of its own."

Glasgow Herald.—"A prettily-written book....the children, Johnnie and Baba, are delightful....the author has a delicate and dainty touch."

Daily News.—"A pretty and pleasing story....Deelish is a pathetic and charmful heroine, and there are two really amusing children in the book. The story is fresh and decidedly readable."

World.—"The story is distinctly out of the common, for its mixture of poetry, humour, and at times dramatic fervour is not to be met with every day."

Queen.—"Mrs. Campbell has written a book with plenty of story in it, wholesome in its sympathies, with at least two admirable sets of descriptions of remote country life in Ireland, and Government House life in Queensland. Mrs. Campbell Praed's great public should buy this book."

Morning Leader.—"The story is a good one, and not without genuine pathos and humour."

A BLACK VINTAGE. MORICE GERARD.
THE MAIDEN'S CREED. ALAN ST. AUBYN.
THE CRIME of the CRYSTAL. FERGUS HUME.
HIS LAWFUL WIFE. JEAN MIDDLEMASS.
A DEAL with the KING. J. T. FINDLAY.
A STOLEN WOOING. SEYTON HEATH.
A SEA of FORTUNE. Mrs ROBERT JOCELYN.
WHOSE was the HAND? J. E. MUDDOCK.

London: DIGBY, LONG & CO., 18, Bouverie St., E.C.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

6s., claret roan, gilt, Illustrated.

LONDON IN THE TIME OF THE DIAMOND JUBILEE

London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING, A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.
THE NORFOLK BROADS.
BRECON and its BEACONS.
ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.
THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.
THE ISLE OF WIGHT.
THE WYE VALLEY.
THE SEVERN VALLEY.
BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.
BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.
LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR, LLANFAIRFECHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON.
ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.
CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, & FESTINIOG.
BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and PWLLHELI.
MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, & CHELTENHAM.
LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.
NORWICH, LOWESTOFT, YARMOUTH, and the NORFOLK BROADS.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.
"It very emphatically tops them all."—Daily Graphic.
"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 5s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT, & Co. Ltd., The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers. Paris and New York: BRETANO'S.

'Twixt Plate and Lip;

OR,

The Common Sense of Eating.

A HEALTH HAND-BOOK FOR EVERY DAY, WITH SPECIAL ADVICE AS TO DIET AND REGIMEN IN HEALTH AND SICKNESS, A POPULAR SUMMARY OF THE SYMPTOMS OF DYSPEPSIA AND INDIGESTION, AND A NOTE ON THE SCIENTIFIC AND RATIONAL TREATMENT OF THOSE AILMENTS.

12th EDITION.

 This little book may be recommended to the general reader as a sound and safe guide to the common sense management of the stomach. The Publishers, at 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, will be pleased to send a free copy to any reader of the Academy. Early application necessary.

LONDON:
46, HOLBORN VIADUCT, E.C.

Digitized by Google

MACMILLAN & CO.'S LIST.

NOW READY.

ROSA N. CAREY'S NEW NOVEL,

HERB OF GRACE

Crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s.

JAMES LANE ALLEN—HUGH THOMSON.

A KENTUCKY CARDINAL, AND AFTERMATH.

By JAMES LANE ALLEN.

With Illustrations by HUGH THOMSON.

Cloth elegant, gilt edges, crown 8vo, 6s.

[THE CRANFORD SERIES.

Also an EDITION DE LUXE, limited to 250 Copies, super royal 8vo, 30s. net.

By WALTER PATER.

ESSAYS FROM "THE GUARDIAN."

Demy 8vo, bound uniform with the Edition de Luxe, 8s. 6d. net.

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"Though these essays are slighter in bulk and intention than the rest of Pater's acknowledged work, they are as carefully composed, and they have as full a measure of his exclusive charm, together with not a little naïveté and playfulness."

Extra crown 8vo, 6s.

HIGHWAYS AND BYWAYS IN THE LAKE DISTRICT.

By A. G. BRADLEY.

With Illustrations by JOSEPH PENNELL.

DAILY MAIL.—"The book is comprehensive, thorough, and, so far as one can judge, absolutely accurate and reliable.....The little excursions, historical, humoursome, and personal, are alike delightful.....Mr. Pennell's drawings are something more than clever."

ALFRED THE GREAT.

By THOMAS HUGHES.

CHEAPER IMPRESSION.—Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

THE ROMAN THEOCRACY and the REPUBLIC,

846—1849. By R. M. JOHNSTON.

8vo, 10s. net.

THE EVERSLEY SERIES,

Globe 8vo, red cloth, 5s. per Volume,

CONTAINS

J. R. GREEN'S WORKS.

14 Vols.

CHARLES KINGSLEY'S NOVELS and POEMS.

13 Vols.

POEMS of THOMAS HOOD

2 Vols.

 Send for New Complete List.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., London.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

A SOWER OF WHEAT. By HAROLD BINDLOSS, Author of "Ainslie's Ju-ju."

"We heartily recommend the book to all who want a good story."—Daily Mail.

"A really fine book..... It is really an epic of life in the Great North-West."—Morning Leader.

THE TRIUMPH OF HILARY BLACHLAND. By BERTRAM MITFORD, Author of "The Gun-runner."

DESPAIR'S LAST JOURNEY. By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY, Author of "The Church of Humanity."

THE PURPLE CLOUD. By M. P. SHIEL, Author of "The Yellow Danger." [Sept. 26.

NEW THREE-AND-SIXPENNY EDITIONS.

ANDROMEDA. By ROBERT BUCHANAN.

TERENCE: an Irish Romance. By B. M. CROKER.

THE INIMITABLE MRS. MASSINGHAM. By HERBERT COMPTON.

PHILIP WINWOOD. By R. NEILSON STEPHENS.

HATHEROURT RECTORY. By MRS. MOLESWORTH.

THE FAMILY SCAPEGRACE. By JAMES PAYN.

PAUL FERROLL. By MRS. ARCHER CLIVE.

WHY PAUL FERROLL KILLED HIS WIFE. By Mrs. ARCHER CLIVE.

SOUTH LONDON. By Sir WALTER BESANT. With an Etching by F. S. WALKER, and 110 Illustrations. CHEAPER EDITION. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d.

THE LADY of LYNN. By Sir WALTER BESANT, Author of "The Orange Girl," &c. With 12 Illustrations by G. DEMAIN-HAMMOND. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

HER ROYAL HIGHNESS WOMAN. By MAX O'RELL, Author of "John Bull and his Island," &c. FOURTH EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE CANKERWORM: being Episodes of a Woman's Life. By GEORGE MANVILLE FENN, Author of "The New Mistress," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s. [Oct. 3.

A FIGHT to a FINISH. By Florence WARDEN, Author of "Joan, the Curate," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s. [Oct. 3.

A BLIND MARRIAGE, &c. By GEORGE R. SIMS. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. [Oct. 3.

THE LOVER'S PROGRESS. Told by HIMSELF, and "Dedicated to all who Love." Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s. [Oct. 10.

THE HOUSE on the SCAR: a Tale of South Devon. By BERTHA THOMAS, Author of "In a Cathedral City," &c. SECOND EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s. [Oct. 17.

MAX THORNTON. By Ernest GLANVILLE. With 8 Illustrations by J. S. CROMPTON, R.I. A NEW EDITION. Large crown 8vo, cloth, gilt edges, 5s. [Oct. 17.

THE JOY of LIFE. By Emile Zola. Edited, with an Introduction, by ERNEST A. VIZETELLY. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. [Oct. 17.

IN MEMORIAM: Memorial Verses for Every Day in the Year. Selected and Arranged by LUCY RIDLEY. Small 8vo, cloth, red edges, 2s. 6d. net; leather, burnished edges, 3s. 6d. net. [Sept. 30.

THE COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS of ROBERT BUCHANAN. 2 vols., crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, with Portrait in each volume, 12s. [Shortly.

THE GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE.

ONE SHILLING Monthly.—Contents for OCTOBER.

SOME EXPERIMENTS with JANE. By M. A. CURTOIS.—MOUND-MAKING BIRDS. By A. H. JAPP, LL.D.—THE AMATEUR PEDIGREE-MONGER. By P. EVANS LEWIS.—JEKYLLIANA. By EMILY J. CLEMENSON.—ITALIAN CRADLE SONGS. By E. C. VASSITTART.—IRONY and some SYNONYMS. By H. W. FOWLER.—REGICIDE in the NINETEENTH CENTURY. By S. BEACH CHESTER.—SOME BYGONE HAPPENINGS in a PEAKLAND TOWNSHIP. By JOHN HYDE.—THE LYRIC POETRY of VICTOR HUGO. By C. E. MEETKERKE.—THE RIVAL PHYSICIANS. By N. P. MURPHY.—"EVERYMAN." By SYLVANUS URBAN.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

J. NISBET & CO.'S LIST.

Treason and Plot:

Struggles for Catholic Supremacy in the Last Years of Queen Elizabeth.

By MARTIN HUME. Demy 8vo, 16s.

"To write the story of those years a better man than Major Hume could hardly have been chosen."
Athenæum.

Italy To-day:

A Study of her Politics, her Position, her Society, and her Letters.

By BOLTON KING,

Author of "A History of Italian Unity"; and

THOMAS OKEY.

With Maps. Demy 8vo, 12s. net.

"Will undoubtedly become one of the most widely read and highly valued volumes on Italian life and prospects."—World.

The Social Problem:

Work and Life. By J. A. HOBSON,

Author of "John Ruskin, Social Reformer," &c.

Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

A Woman's Memories of the War.

By VIOLET BROOKE-HUNT. 5s.

"The most interesting account of the war yet published."—St. James's Gazette.

The Childhood of Queen Victoria.

By Mrs. GERALD GURNEY.

Daintily bound, and Illustrated with several Portraits.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

This volume contains some remarkable letters and papers bearing directly on the education and upbringing of the Queen, and now for the first time given to the public by permission of His Majesty the King.

A NEW NOVEL.

A Union of Hearts.

By KATHARINE TYNAN.

Extra crown 8vo, 6s.

The Journal of a Jealous Woman:

A NOVEL. By PERCY WHITE. 6s.

"One of the cleverest works of fiction of recent years."—Yorkshire Post.

Messrs. NISBET & CO. will publish on October 4 "THE DOLLY DIALOGUES," by ANTHONY HOPE, containing Four New Dialogues, and Illustrated by Howard Chandler Christy. Price 6s.

Also a Special Presentation Edition. Price 10s. 6d.

J. NISBET & CO., LTD., 21, Berners Street

Digitized by Google

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1533. Established 1869. 21 September, 1901. Price Threepence.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

MR. ROOSEVELT, the New President of the United States, has managed to crowd a good deal of writing into an active life. He has published no less than fifteen volumes, including Hunting Trips of a Ranchman, The Wilderness Hunter, American Ideals, and The Rough Riders.

HERE are a few more interesting volumes we note amongst publishers' autumn announcements :

Anticipations: an Experiment in Prophecy. By H. G Wells.
Poets of the Younger Generation. By William Archer.
The Wessex of Thomas Hardy. By Prof. Bertram Windle.
The Defendant: a Volume of Essays. By Gilbert Chesterton.
'Twixt Dog and Wolf. By C. F. Keary.
Nonsense Rhymes. By the late Cosmo Monkhouse Illustrated by Gilbert Chesterton.
New Poems. By Theodore Watts-Dunton.
Letters on Life. By Claudius Clear.
Biographia Presbyteriana. By Patrick Walker. Edited by Dr. Hay Fleming, with an Introduction by S. R. Crockett. Two Vols.
Hawthorn and Lavender, a Lyric Sequence; and Other Poems. By W. E. Henley.

FROM the autumn list of books to be published by Mr. Thomas B. Mosher, of Portland, Maine, we take the following announcement :

> A Year's Letters. By Algernon Charles Swinburne. A novel in thirty chapters (the story being related in the form of letters), together with a prologue of five chapters, by "Mrs. Horace Manners." Originally contributed to the Tatler in 1877, it has never been reprinted, and is undoubtedly one of the rarest of Swinburniana. The copy of the Tatler from which our edition is made belonged to the late Frederick Locker-Lampson.

MESSRS. CHAMBERS'S new edition of their Cyclopædia of English Literature is to contain many new articles, including the following :

Anglo-Saxon. By Rev. Stopford Brooke.
Spenser and Elizabethan Authors. By Edmund Gosse.
Early English Writers. By A. W. Pollard.
Ballads. By Andrew Lang.
Dryden. By Prof. Saintsbury.
Shakespeare. By Sidney Lee.
Knox and Buchanan. By Dr. Hume Brown.
Restoration Literature. By A. H. Bullen.

The first volume is to appear early in November.

THE new book by the author (or editor) of An Englishwoman's Love Letters, entitled A Modern Antæus, describes a child of nature who became a prodigy. The scene is laid in England, but the atmosphere is Italian. The volume is to have a cover design by Mr. Laurence Housman.

THE bibliographer of Tolstoi will be hard put to it to complete his work. We are continually receiving extracts and snippets from Tolstoi's writings in all manner of forms. This week four little green-backed booklets have reached us from the "Free Age Press," consisting of a first and second series of Popular Stories and Legends, The Only Means, and the Relations of the Sexes. A prophet nowadays is, perhaps, too much acknowledged by his disciples.

THE increasing interest in Tolstoi is marked this week by the publication of the first two volumes of Mr. Heinemann's new Library Edition of his works, containing Anna Karenina. They are tall, handsome volumes, bound in dark-green canvas, each having a portrait of the author. The first shows Tolstoi at the age of twenty, in which we see the broad nose and wide, determined mouth, as yet rather unformed, which are so familiar in later portraits. This edition claims to be the first complete translation direct from the Russian, and has been made by Mrs. Garnett, who, it will be remembered, was crowned by the ACADEMY for her admirable translation of Turgenev. The spelling of Russian proper names has always presented difficulties to the translator. In a note to the first volume Mrs. Garnett says :

> I have not adopted the form "Anna Karenina," but "Anna Karenin," since such a preservation of the feminine form of the surname is unparalleled in English. We do not speak of Marie Bashkirtseva or Sonia Kovalevskaia, of Madame Blavatskaia or the Countess Tolstaia, and it is not the Russian habit to retain these feminine terminations when speaking English.

It will be noticed that Mrs. Garnett spells Tolstoi with a "y" and not an "i."

THE popularity of Maxime Gorki is rapidly becoming cosmopolitan. His stories, studies in that particular form of sympathetic realism which distinguishes so many Russian writers, are already widely read in France, and now Messrs. Scribner have started an issue of his works in America with the publication of Foma Gordyeff. In Russia appreciation of Gorki takes the embarrassing form of cheering him when he enters a theatre. On one such occasion he protested by shouting : "I'm not a ballet dancer or a Venus of Milo. What are you staring at me for ? Keep your eyes on the stage."

THE New York Times Saturday Review states that Dr. Conan Doyle is thought to have a Boer story in his mind because he advertises in the London Times for the loan of officers' letters relating to various battles in South Africa. This may be so, but we should have imagined that Dr. Doyle required the letters for the History of the War o which he is engaged.

IN a recent article on "A Grammar of Shelley" Mr. G. K. Chesterton said :

> It is a strange truth that no force has been so disruptive and iconoclastic, has torn up so many ancient roots, and pulled down so many holy places, as contentment with the world.

At the request of a correspondent of the Daily News, who desired an amplification of this passage, Mr. Chesterton replied as follows :

Digitized by Google

> What I meant by the passage, however, in case it was obscure, is roughly this: The force which has driven men to improve the world has, I think, scarcely in any case been the sense that the world was vitally bad. It has rather been an immense love of the world, and a consequent belief that its possibilities for good were almost endless. Gloomy philosophers may have had every logical reason for improving the world, but they simply had not got the only valid reason—a burning desire to do so. Has it ever occurred to many persons, I wonder, that one of the great basic morals of existence can be found in the story of "Beauty and the Beast"—the moral that it is only by loving a thing that we can make it beautiful? In one sense, and at the beginning of things it might be said with all politeness, that existence was a Beast. It has been made more beautiful, and almost entirely by optimists. All the revolutionists, even those who have been maddened with starvation and insults, have been optimists about our elemental nature—Burns, Rousseau, the Socialist working men. I may notice, in conclusion, that this universal paradox of the union between a seraphic contentment and a desire for drastic change was nowhere more exemplified than in Christianity. The same creed which told men that they were the happy children of an utterly hospitable father doomed them to the most strenuous agonies of repentance and self-improvement. It has been the law of all progress, essentially illogical, like the universe, that improvement comes only from hope, and hope comes only from satisfaction.

The North American Review prints a hitherto unpublished essay by Victor Hugo on Shakespeare. Originally written for the three-hundredth anniversary of Shakespeare's birth, the essay was not included in the volume entitled Shakespeare, as it was not suitable for a critical volume. It is, indeed, a eulogium in the fervid Hugo manner. Here is a characteristic passage :

> Shakespeare the drunken savage! Savage, yes, but the inhabitant of the virgin forest; drunken indeed, but with the ideal. He is a giant, beneath the boughs of enormous trees, who holds a great golden cup, and the light which he drinks is reflected in his eyes. Shakespeare, like Æschylus, like Job, like Isaiah, is one of the sovereigns of thought and of poesy, who, sufficient for the All Mysterious, have the depth of creation itself, and who like creation itself translate and illustrate this depth by a profusion of forms and images, springing from the darkness, in flowers, in leaves and in living streams.

Apropos of Messrs. Macmillan's recent issue of Mr. Walter Pater's Essays from "The Guardian," Mr. Stephen Gwynn has an article in the Daily News on that writer's style. Mr. Gwynn calls it an "unmistakably embarrassed style," and he proves his point pretty conclusively by quotations from Mr. Pater's work. Says Mr. Gwynn :

> Mr. Pater feels upon himself the weight of a cumulative culture: two centuries have passed since the days of Steele and Addison, and the world, he thinks, has too many intellectual side-currents to admit of a simple utterance.

It may be surprising to some readers to have it pointed out that Mr. Pater's grammar was by no means above reproach ; yet his involved manner made it almost impossible that he should escape the snares of the English pronoun. Even Marius—which Mr. Gwynn frankly confesses is a work which he cannot re-read—is not free from such errors. Mr. Gwynn concludes as follows :

> There are also, of course, many minor instances where the stylist departs of malice prepense from the natural English idiom, as when he speaks of Richard III. "who has retained a so unflattering possession of the stage"; but it would be tedious to multiply examples. On the whole, there is no contesting the fact that the man who wrote the passage about Lionardo's "La Gioconda" (if it be Lionardo's) beginning: "The presence that rose so strangely by the waters," was a remarkable writer. But the proposition that his style was one to be imitated, or even in itself an admirable style, is one that I should be slow to accept. Its "delicate blandness," to borrow a phrase from Marius, is the product of a stuffy atmosphere: I should like to hear it characterised by Dr. Johnson. There are china-shops—and this is one—where a bull would be a blessed apparition.

In the history of publishing the name of Tauchnitz has an honoured place. In the Pall Mall Magazine Mr. Tighe Hopkins re-tells the story of how the first Baron Tauchnitz conceived the idea of publishing foreign authors in their own languages, and paying them, before there was any international copyright. In the original prospectus issued to English authors Baron Tauchnitz said :

> Allow me to remark that I, as well as any other publisher in Germany, have at present the right to embark in such undertakings without any permission from the authors; and that my propositions arise solely from a wish thereby to make the first step towards a literary relationship between England and Germany, and towards an extension of the rights of copyright, and to publish my editions in accordance with those rights.

From this generous dealing grew up the great firm which to-day has an unrivalled position on the Continent. Lord Lytton and Dickens were the first English authors to be approached by Tauchnitz.

In the same magazine Mr. Henley has a somewhat discursive article dealing with Mr. Elliot Stock's recent reprint of The Germ in facsimile. Mr. Henley, we think, does Dante Gabriel Rossetti scant justice; to call him "an amateur in two arts" is too lofty a way of dismissing the author of Jenny, nor do we find any particular truth in the statement that he was a poet "whose whole work is an impeachment of simplicity." To say that his verse constituted "musky, strenuous, high-piled achievements in words" is nearer the mark.

The current numbers both of the North American Review and the Pall Mall Magazine contain poems by Mr. W. E. Henley. The six sets of verses in the former complete the collection of lyrics which have appeared under the title of "Hawthorn and Lavender: Songs and Madrigals." We quote the following :

> Silence, loneliness, darkness
> These and of these my fill
> While God in the rush of Maytide
> Without is working His will.
>
> Without are the wind and the wall-flowers,
> The leaves and the nests and the rain,
> And in all of them God is making
> His beautiful purpose plain.
>
> But I wait in a horror of strangeness—
> A tool on His workshop floor,
> Worn to the butt, and banished
> His hand for evermore.

Equally characteristic of Mr. Henley in another mood are the verses in the Pall Mall Magazine, entitled "Praeludium," which are to be included in his forthcoming volume of poems. Here are the concluding lines :

> But on the spirit of man
> And on the heart of the world there falls
> A strange, half-desperate peace:
> A war-worn, militant, grey jubilance
> In the unkind, implacable tyranny
> Of Winter, the obscene,
> Old, crapulous Regent, who in his loins—
> O, who but feels he carries in his loins
> The wild, sweet-blooded, wonderful wanton, Spring?

Digitized by Google

'C. K. S.," in the Sphere, announces that Mr. T. W. H. Crosland, of the Outlook, is writing a book to be entitled The Unspeakable Scot, in which he is to deal with "the Scot in Journalism," "the Scot in his cups," and so forth. Mr. Crosland is well known as a fableist, a parodist, and as the writer of odes to all sorts of people, but in this he is essaying rather a different task. Still, we wish him well.

WE have received from Mr. Brimley Johnson the first part of a series, to be completed in six quarterly parts, of Some Poems by Edgar Allan Poe, with illustrations by Mr. James J. Guthrie. The present number contains an introduction by Mr. J. C. Wright, two illustrations, and only three poems. The first drawing, called "The Genius of Poe," does not impress us in the least; we can only say that the effort is misguided.

IN the course of a review of Mr. John Stuart's Pictures of War, the Morning Post, in whose columns most of the articles appeared, has the following:

> If you can imagine a very clever schoolboy, endowed with knowledge of the world and with philosophy, afflicted with an intolerable sense of wrong, who yet retains the schoolboy's delight in life, and in the opportunities it affords of displaying a cheerful contempt for his natural enemies, you will have an excellent idea of the way in which the book is written.

It is rather hard on Mr. Stuart to be so labelled, in spite of the fact that the reviewer has just before stated that Mr. Stuart, on the spur of the moment, is able to quote from the Bible, Mr. Meredith, Mr. Henley, and Wordsworth. Besides, our imagination cannot conceive a schoolboy with knowledge of the world who remains a schoolboy.

AN anonymous writer in the World's Work has a very poor opinion of publishers' "readers," and apparently not without reason. He produced a book, which he says > was slowly written during a period of five years, was revised seven times, and several hundred dollars were spent for drawings from an artist in Europe. Eight duplicates of the manuscript were simultaneously placed in the hands of eight publishing houses for preliminary approval or rejection, a mutually satisfactory contract to be hoped for later. Thirty-two publishers "examined" the manuscript in two years. All refused to publish it. Six rejected the story because it had failed of approval by each of four readers. Four rejected it "because its writer would not furnish them money to cover cost of publication, and then give them nearly all money receipts from sales of the book!" Two of these four seemed hurt that what they called a "reasonable" suggestion was rejected by the "unknown writer." Four rejected the story because the writer refused to buy enough copies of the book when printed to cover their statement of cost of publication and seven rejected the story for the reason explicitly stated that its author was unknown, so the book would be "an uncertain commercial venture, in spite of any merit it might have."

One publisher, whom he calls "prominent," told him that as not one manuscript in a hundred was accepted he could not afford to pay a competent reader to wade through everything, so he turned his typewriter girls on to the work as "first judges," paying them fifty cents. or a dollar for their opinion. Finally, this unfortunate author got the favourable opinions of two writers of "national reputation," armed with which he invaded the offices of another "prominent" publisher, whose reader had previously rejected his book. "The book," we are told, "is now on sale." But these readers and publishers were American.

THE Bath Beacon has been trying to prove that Shakespeare visited that city. "It is natural to suppose," says Mr. J. F. Meehan, who writes the article in question, "that Shakespeare was here in 1593 with 'my Lord Chamberlain's servants.'" In support of this contention he quotes sonnets Nos. 153 and 154, which refer to a "fountain" in a "valley" which has "a dateless lively heat, still to endure." We think it quite likely that Shakespeare did visit Bath, and we congratulate both Bath and its Beacon on that visit.

WE do not think that very striking results are likely to be achieved by collecting "Wit and Wisdom from New Books." Such compilation is, however, quite in the spirit of modern editorial enthusiasm for the thing of the moment, and an American paper regularly essays the task. Here is part of its last haul:

> What a fellow wants in a book is to know where he is. There are not many novels, or ancient works, for that matter, that put you down anywhere.—The Crisis.
>
> For the woman it is always the God, whether crowned with thorns or roses—the bleeding feet of Christ or the burning pinions of Eros. God or Demigod, he is embraced; the sacrifice is to his altar, the incense to his nostril.—The Column.
>
> The best thing that can happen to a man is to be ruled by his wife; but she should rule him so discreetly, so diplomatically, that he could almost boast that it is he who rules her.—Her Royal Highness Woman.
>
> When a woman ceases to care how she looks, or a gentleman loses restraint in the presence of his servants, the end is not far off.—Arrows of the Almighty.
>
> Sitting still is a noble art that is going out of fashion.—Quality Corner.
>
> The importance of plain talk can't be overestimated. Any thought, however abstruse, can be put in speech that a boy or a negro can grasp.—The Crisis.

THE following announcement appears in the September number of the Argosy: "The editor of the Argosy regrets that he is no longer able to give consideration to MSS. sent to him, but those which reach the office will be carefully returned." This, as it turns out, was a forecast of the death of the Argosy. That such an old-established magazine—it was started by Mrs. Henry Wood some thirty-five years ago—should have to cease publication for lack of support is an ominous circumstance which does not augur well for the future of certain venerable publications whose names, at least, are well known to the reading public. We hear, indeed, of two other old magazines which are likely to be thrown on the market on account of a decreasing circulation, and yet these magazines have never been edited with greater spirit than they are now.

HARDLY an American magazine which we take up but has articles dealing with the historical novel, which has become quite a business in America—and a paying one. The Independent has three, one of which is by Miss Jeannette L. Gilder, who gives biographical particulars of Mr. Charles Major, Mr. Winston Churchill, Miss Mary Johnston, Mr. Maurice Thompson, and many others. We extract four paragraphs from the article. We cannot help thinking that they are the pith of it, and that Miss Gilder wrote gaily up to them. Here they are:

> Mr. Major has made so much money out of the book [When Knighthood was in Flower] and out of the play, so delightfully interpreted by Miss Julia Marlowe, that he has given up the practice of law and will devote himself hereafter to, well—if not literature, at least to writing. . . .
>
> After the success of Richard Carvel, Mr. Churchill bought land and built him a home at Cornish, N.H., on the border line of Vermont, so that his post-office address is not the same as his house address. . . .
>
> Mr. Paul Leicester Ford has recently bought land and built a fine house on one of the Seventieth streets in New York. The house, he says, he bought with the earnings of Janice Meredith, the book, and he furnished it with the earnings of "Janice Meredith," the play. . . .
>
> Miss Bertha Runkle is by way of making a fortune out of this one story [The Helmet of Navarre], counting serial, book and play rights. The play is to be produced in New York in December, and probably in London at the same time. . . .

Digitized by Google

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "Can any of your readers inform me of the name, author, and publisher of a novel in which the hero, exploring Central Asia, comes upon the original Garden of Eden? The novel has appeared within the last twenty years."

THE ETERNAL PITY, OR FELO-DE-SE.

BEHOLD how time has justified the fable
Of him who caught us with his "Who killed Cain?"
For Caine has proved that he himself is Abel
To do what critics tried to do in vain.

G. S. L.

Bibliographical.

TO-DAY (Friday) witnesses the publication of Mr. Arthur Symons's English version of D'Annunzio's Gioconda, the play in which Signora Duse made so deep an impression in London some little time ago. D'Annunzio is a comparatively recent "star," and it is only within the past three or four years that his work has been put before us in an English dress. In 1898 we had The Triumph of Death, translated by Georgina Harding, and The Child of Pleasure, also by Miss Harding, with verse translation by Mr. Symons. In the same year a version of The Intruder, by A. Hornblow, was published in New York. In the following year came The Virgins of the Rocks, translated by A. Hughes, and, in 1900, The Dead City and The Flame of Life, translated respectively by Mr. Symons and by Miss Kassandra Vivaria. D'Annunzio, therefore, cannot complain that he has been neglected in England.

I said the other day that Messrs. Hurst & Blackett were Miss Edna Lyall's first publishers. That was not quite accurate. As a valued correspondent kindly reminds me, Miss Lyall's first story, Won by Waiting, was published in 1879 by Messrs. Whittingham & Co., of Gracechurch-street. "To Mr. W. B. Whittingham, of that firm, belongs the credit of 'discovering' this since popular author." Messrs. Hurst & Blackett did indeed publish, in 1886 (and still publish), the revised edition of Won by Waiting, and they also issued (and still issue) Miss Lyall's second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh novel. It is assuredly with them that Miss Lyall's name and work has been most closely associated up to now.

We are told to expect a collected edition of Mr. Mackenzie Bell's verse. "Selected," probably, would be the better word. Mr. Bell's Spring's Immortality came out originally in 1893 (with new editions in 1895 and 1896), his Pictures of Travel in 1898. But Mr. Bell seems to have begun to publish verse so long ago as 1879, when The Keeping of the Vow, and Other Verses, came out. Next came Verses of Varied Life in 1883, and, in 1886, Old Year Leaves: Old Verses Revived. Perhaps these early books (already drawn upon, I believe) may yield something to the gleaner. Selections from Mr. Bell's rhythmic work have already been made and published by Mr. J. J. Nesbitt and Mr. Albert Broadbent.

The death of Lord Morris has led to the resuscitation of at least one venerable anecdote with which the deceased had no association whatever. It is the story of the extremely décolletée lady, of whose appearance (it was at a ball) some one said to a judge, "Did you ever see anything like it?" To which the judge replied, "Not since I was weaned." Well, this tale was told of Chief Justice Doherty in W. H. Harrison's "Reminiscences," and a variant on it has place in the Diary of J. C. Young. Why does not somebody write a book on The History of Jests?

The recently deceased Mr. Samuel Neil deserves remembrance—not so much as a writer on rhetoric, elocution, debating, and the like, or as an editor of separate Shakespeare plays for Messrs. Collins's "School and College Classics"—as the author of a "critical biography" of Shakespeare, brought out in 1861. Ten years later he produced a work on The House of Shakespeare, for which Mr. F. W. Fairholt supplied the pictorial illustrations. There can be no question that for "the Bard" Mr. Neil had a genuine enthusiasm.

In none of the notices of the late Mr. Evelyn Abbott have I seen any reference to the fact that he was the general editor of the series of volumes called "Heroes of the Nations"—a series to which he himself contributed a book on Pericles. Mr. Abbott's Hellenica, first published in 1880, was reissued so recently as 1898. His History of Greece is now twelve or thirteen years old. In the way of original work he did not do much.

We may take for granted, I think, that Mr. Watts-Dunton's new volume of poems will include the contents of the little pamphlet of verse which he published through Mr. Lane in 1897—Jubilee Greeting at Spithead to the Men of Greater Britain. This "greeting" was especially notable for the credit it gave to Queen Victoria for her active and persistent faith in Colonial expansion. Appended to it were four sonnets, in one of which the writer foreshadowed the remarkable spectacle of Colonial loyalty to the Mother-land exhibited last year and since. To the German taunt that England "stands alone," came the reply, penned four years ago:

> "Europe," saith England, "hath forgot my boys!—
> Forgot how tall in yonder golden zone,
> 'Neath Austral skies, my youngest born have grown
> (Bearers of bayonets now and swords for toys)—
> Forgot 'mid boltless thunder—harmless noise—
> The sons with whom old England 'stands alone'!"

The Jane Austen cult may be said to have taken its rise in 1870, when Mr. Austen Leigh published the first full biography of his aunt. Then came, in 1884, the issue of the Letters under Lord Brabourne's editorship. These no doubt stimulated the memoirs contributed respectively by Mrs. Charles Maldon and Mr. Goldwin Smith to the "Eminent Women" (1889) and "Great Writers" (1890) series. The volume on Jane Austen: Her Homes and Her Friends, promised us by Miss Constance Hill and her sister, is to contain, it seems, new matter, without which, indeed, it would scarcely have much reason for existing.

Though some of us feel as if we had been surfeited with garden books, it will not be denied that Canon Ellacombe (who announces My Vicarage Garden) has a right to be heard upon the subject when he chooses to lift up his voice thereon. We all remember his Plant Lore and Garden Craft of Shakespeare, a delightful work, of which a new edition appeared five years ago. Some of us, too, have come across his In a Gloucestershire Garden (1895). He can properly claim a hearing, but it may be gently hinted to the publishing fraternity that it is possible to overdo the "garden" books.

One is glad to note that Miss Margaret Benson's pen has been at work again. She is to bring out a book called The Soul of a Cat, which, one assumes, will range appropriately with Miss Benson's Subject to Vanity, which appeared in 1895. This lady's literary début appears to have been made in 1891, with a little volume of "plain papers" on Capital Labour, Trade, &c., published by the S.P.C.K. Two and a-half years ago she was co-author with Miss Janet Gourlay of a learned work on The Temple of Mut in Asher, illustrating the history and religious notions of the Egyptians.

Mr. G. W. Smalley's Reminiscences, when they come, will be read, we may be sure, with pleasure, and perhaps with profit. Few men can have a larger store of interesting recollections. He has already given us a taste of his literary quality. One has pleasant memories of his London Letters, and Others (1890), and since then we have had from him some Studies of Men (1895). His Reminiscences should rank with the best.

THE BOOKWORM.

Digitized by Google

Reviews.

The Serpent in Literature.

The Life-History of British Serpents. By Gerald R. Leighton, M.D. (Edinburgh and London: Blackwood & Sons. 5s. net.)

THE rose, it has been often remarked, is a universal theme of poetry all over the world. No greater a contrast could be imagined than that between the rose and the serpent. Yet the serpent, in its peculiar way, has no less been a theme of poetry and literary interest from time immemorial. But its interest has been not merely literary. It has been religious, mythical, symbolical, mysterious. The tradition of Christianity displays it as somehow connected with the dim origin of the whole problem which man presents to himself. Other religions equally point to it as an object of superstitious fear, or a reverence which is rooted in fear. Connected with the tree, it confronts us on the threshold of the Bible. Connected with the tree, it forms one of the oldest objects of heathen worship. The Christian dreads and shuns it. The pagan—in many lands—dreads and bows down to it. But both agree in regarding it with a fear in excess of its purely physical terrors, striking though these be—a fear which they do not accord to the tiger, the lion, or other creatures which refuse the general awe of man's inferiors for man. Alone among man's enemies it is a gliding death, which strikes once and needs to strike no more; from whose evil jaw there is no escape, as there is from the tooth of the lion, or even the bullet of man: it does not fight fair, it deals in poison—and from the poisoner man recoils, whether it be a Brinvilliers with her Aqua Tofana, or an African with his woorali dart. It is insidious, treacherous, soundless—but so is the tiger. It has a whispered repute of strange powers—not without evidence: powers of mysterious fascination, paralysing the limbs that would escape. And here we approach the secret of its peculiar abhorrentness. It is the feeling of some unnatural potency, some peculiar and uncomprehended power, inimical to the warm springs of life, incarnated in those death-cold coils of sinister beauty, which instinctively freezes the blood of man, and strikes through him a loathing beyond terror at sight of the living evil we call a serpent. The contrast between this strange, instinctive perception and the beauty of the object which inspires it, adds to the unnatural mystery of the reptile. If death could become incarnate, this is incarnate death.

As such it has glided into literature. And it seems as if its life were the life of death rather than life indeed. It is corpse-cold—so cold that it seeks continually for heat. Its heart is so imperfect that there is no effective partition between the pure and impure (or venous) blood, as there is in mammals. Its breath is so deathly-slow that the respirations can scarce be counted, for one lung is shrivelled. Its organs in general are one-sided in their development—even the female organs of reproduction. It has no activities save the activities of destruction. Its one pleasure is to swelter in the heat denied its body, recruiting from the sun its fierceness and venom: so that vitality itself in it becomes malign, and when it is full of life it is full of death.

One cannot wonder that literature is as full of the snake as of its opposite, the rose. Ruskin has given one of his most perfectly phrased and suggestive passages to its beauty and repulsion. Milton has imagined its primeval splendour in the Garden of Eden. Virgil has described its passage of the sea towards the fated Laocoon. Spenser has expended upon it his luxuriant description: and Keats has woven a whole poem about the serpent-woman, Lamia:

> She was a Gordian shape, of dazzling hue,
> Vermilion-spotted, golden, green, and blue;
> Striped like a zebra, freckled like a pard,
> Eyed like a peacock, and all crimson-barred;
> And full of silver moons, that as she breathed
> Dissolved, or brighter shone, or inter-wreathed
> Their lustres with the gloomier tapestries.
>
> Upon her crest she bore a wannish fire
> Sprinkled with stars, like Ariadne's tiar;
> Her head was serpent, but—ah, bitter-sweet!—
> She had a woman's mouth with all its pearls complete;
> And for her eyes, what could such eyes do there,
> But weep and weep that they were born so fair,
> As Proserpine still weeps for her Sicilian air?

To the serpent Coleridge went in describing his Geraldine:

> A snake's dull eye blinks small and shy,
> And the lady's eyes they shrunk in her head,
> Each shrunk up to a serpent's eye,
> And with somewhat of malice, and more of dread,
> At Christabel she looked askance.

To the sloughing of the snake Shakespeare alludes in his famous line:

> When we have shuffled off this mortal coil.

It is not mentioned by the ordinary commentator, but is too obvious an allusion to have escaped notice. Take Mr. Packard's description, in the book which has suggested to us these remarks:

> This moulting of the skin is effected by its being pushed off by the upward growth of fine, temporary cuticular hairs. On certain parts of the body, as on the under side of the capsular skin and scales of the eyes, these hairs do not develope. After the skin is loosened it dries and is readily shuffled off.

The snake, in fact, rubs off the skin against branches, stones, or any other hard substance at hand: as Shakespeare doubtless had often witnessed it in the woods of his Warwickshire Arden.

With those mild, or comparatively mild, snakes of our own isles, Dr. Leighton's very interesting and careful book deals. Here we have abundance of that charm which invests the snake, and but little of its darker side. The one fault we have to find in a book which has given us most pleasant and instructive reading, is the method of illustration. Photography is ill fitted for the scientific figuring of a curved and convoluted object like a snake, where but a small portion of the body can be accurately in focus. The high refraction from the convex surface completes the mischief, and gives us (in the portrait of the ring snake, for example) a mere coil of strongly contrasted black and white, with a few dark flecks on the near portion which is both in light and focus. Another portrait of the same snake shows a shadowed mass of scales, without markings at all. From neither can you learn anything but the shape of the reptile. It is a pity, because the photographs have obviously been obtained with great pains and industry, nor could they be better. The error lay in choosing photography at all. The strongly marked male viper alone comes out well.

But the text is not only satisfactory and valuable to the professed student of the ophidians, it is bright and stored with interest for the general reader. There are but three species of snake in the British Isles, two harmless. Of the latter the common grass snake is well known, even to Londoners, by its exhibition in glass jars as a pet for sale. The smooth snake, which superficially resembles the adder, is unfamiliar and scarce. It is the adder or viper, the one poisonous kind, to which Dr. Leighton is specially devoted, and which occupies the bulk of his volume. He carefully notes its structure, discusses its habits and food (the latter a point he has closely investigated, as it needed investigating), and minutely describes its variations of colour and its distribution among the English, Welsh, and Scottish counties. To this latter matter he devotes several chapters. He has also a very interesting discussion of a curious point—its alleged habit of swallowing its young when it is alarmed. He gives good reason for thinking that if the process takes place, the young are not really taken into the stomach, but only into the gullet, as a temporary refuge from enemies.

Digitized by Google

Apropos of this, we may quote a curious letter from Mr. R. J. Horton to the author:

> I had a small ring snake (grass snake) . . . kept in the same case as a very large specimen, and one day I put a full-grown frog in the case, intending it for the large snake. The smaller one, however, immediately seized the frog, and after some difficulty swallowed it. I distinctly heard the frog croak in the snake several minutes after it had been swallowed. In a quarter of an hour or so the frog was disgorged all but the head, which was retained in the snake's mouth. The frog was still alive, and did its best to free itself from its unpleasant predicament, but without success, and the snake began to swallow it again. This process took about half an hour to accomplish, and in another half hour (after the frog had been swallowed for the second time) I could still hear it give a faint croak.

This looks like a case of complicated indigestion. But Dr. Leighton, from his own observations, gives sound reason for supposing that the frog was not really in the stomach, but in the gullet; and that the adder frequently keeps its prey in the gullet till the stomach is ready for it—perhaps because the stomach has already a tenant undergoing digestion. There is no reason, therefore, why the gullet could not become a refuge for the young—a purpose for which it is large enough. Moreover, the young are described as wriggling or jumping into the mother's mouth—as they certainly would not if they were wanted for a meal. It is a disputable subject, on which the author refuses a decision. But he gives a mass of testimony which—if it fall short of scientific proof—will, we think, leave little doubt in any candid mind that the thing is probably true. The more so, because it has been shown that the curious process certainly takes place in the rattlesnake. With regard to the viper, Mr. Jacob of Eythorne writes to the author:

> Three or four different persons . . . have been unanimous in saying that the old one raised her head slightly . . , and the young ones jumped or sprang down the throat. They tell me that the young did not glide down on the level of the ground.

On the other hand, Mr. Prothero, a gamekeeper, writes:

> A few years ago I disturbed an adder in a field near Dineterwood, Ewyas Harold (Herefordshire). She gave a repeated hissing noise, so I knew there were young ones about, as they never hiss more than once unless they have young ones with them. The repeated hissing is to call the young. She then put her lower jaw on the ground, and I saw a number of young ones swallowed. I killed the adder, which measured 22 inches in length, and found eleven young ones, about 2½ inches long, inside her.

Another observer also affirms that the adder put her lower jaw on the ground. But except as to this one moot point—whether the viper lifts her head or lays it on the ground when she opens her mouth, and whether, consequently, the young jump or glide down the throat—observer after observer tells the same tale, without variation of detail.

The bite of the viper is seldom actually fatal to an adult; but a very few cases are on record. As regards children, one pretty recent case in Wales is recorded minutely by Dr. Leighton, from the testimony of the two doctors who attended the unfortunate boy. In most cases great swelling, inflammation, and fever accompany the wound, and it is some time before the injured limb is well. It is a common superstition that oil extracted from adders will cure their bite. Here is a lady's account of the famous snake-catcher, "Brusher Mills," whom she met on a walk:

> He was carrying his pouches full of writhing snakes . . . We strolled to a likely spot, "Brusher" found the adder, and quickly whipping out his tongs, seized it near the head. "Now, marm," said he, "would you like to see its teeth?" "Oh, yes," said I; and with the help of other tweezers he made the poor creature open its mouth wide, and I had a fine view. I said that I had heard that he made oil from adders that would cure their bite, whereupon he pulled out a bottle of clear oil from his pocket, and showed me the dreadful bites on his own hands he had cured with the oil. I asked him how he got the oil, and with a grin he said that he baked the adders in an oven in a large jar. "Please, marm," said he, "would you like to see this one have a run and me catch it again?" But this was more than I had nerve for, and leaving the old man a small present, I made off as fast as I could.

"Brusher Mills," with his grin expanding beautifully over his whole face, is photographed on the page accompanying the anecdote. The curious and captivating details on the subject of adders, which Dr. Leighton gives, would fill pages of quotation. But we refer the reader to the book, which will repay reading. It has clearly been a labour of love, and the author's enthusiasm is infectious.

A Prescription for the Twentieth Century.

History of Intellectual Development By John Beattie Crozier. Vol. III. (Longmans. 10s. 6d.)

DR. CROZIER has already made himself known to all who care for high thinking, not only by the first volume of this work (Vol. II. has not yet been published), but by My Inner Life—that candid record of a soul's adventures in pursuit of truth. Had we nothing whereby to judge him but this third volume, we should discern a mind eminently comprehensive and individual, at once broad and subtle to a rare degree. But even more than these qualities we are struck by his courage—a courage which is the outcome of a determined sincerity, a resolve to be content with nothing short of thoroughness. To relate the history of intellectual development in its length and breadth is a great task, yet perhaps even more courageous is the task he sets himself in the present volume. It is nothing less than to apply the principles drawn from his previous survey of the history of civilisation to the politics of the present day. Nor is he content with generalisations. He boldly endeavours to lay down the practical measures by which those principles may be made fruitful in actual politics. And he does so with a largeness of outlook, a resolve to embrace all factors, and select from the various schools of thought whatever he finds valuable in each, and capable (so to speak) of entering into chemical combination with each other, which no previous attempt has paralleled. It may be worth our while to lay before the reader, so far as can be done in limited space, the main lines and back-bone (as it were) of this contribution to political philosophy. For Dr. Crozier is a physician. After exhaustively considering his predecessors' treatment, and acquainting himself with the diathesis and hereditary antecedents of his still infant patient, he has compiled this prescription for the twentieth century. The guardians of that young gentleman are confirmed disbelievers in doctors. Will they let him swallow it?

Dr. Crozier starts with the view that the statesman of to-day, if he is to cope with the subtleties of social condition induced by the modern industrial era, can no longer proceed by the rule of thumb (so to speak) which had a rough efficiency in former ages. He needs to have before him a chart of the progress of civilisation, and to guide himself thereby. "Ancient history" is distrusted by English politicians and the English public as a guide to practical politics; and it may be admitted that it is small use to quote history to a democratic House of Commons or a democratic electorate. Yet it is needful for the statesman himself to know "ancient history." It has fallen into distrust through the defects of historians. They have drawn from history the most opposite conclusions, misleading to all who rely on them as practical guides, because they survey history with too narrow a regard—by nations or periods: whereas the true process of civilisation can only be discerned by taking history in its totality, so that the individual variations of nations or periods fall into their just perspective position. Under the shadow of the Himalayas a Hindu peasant will hardly be persuaded that the earth is spherical. Surveyed from the moon the Himalayas would assume their veritable perspective as mere crumples in the general curve of the globe. The fly crawling over the sinuosities of a Malay kreese might stoutly deny that its total line lay straight from hilt to point. In this demand for an inclusive historical perspective on the part of those who would discern the trend of civilisation, Dr. Crozier strikes a right and important note.

Digitized by Google

Without such a chart of the history of civilisation as he proposes to them (he goes on to say), statesmen are open to numerous illusions. With regard to the present, they are liable to imagine that the particular state of society into which they are born, with all its concomitants, is a natural and permanent state; instead of being an artificial product of evolution from the past, tending constantly to decay and relapse into the wild state (so to speak), unless fostered and safeguarded by the most anxious supervision. The trend and developmental aspect of present ideals and institutions is only to be known by a knowledge of their origins. Destroy (as men are ignorantly ready to do) the force behind them, and they decline. Dr. Crozier instances (among other examples) the gradual relaxation of the once sacred institution of marriage, since the religion which informed it has fallen into desuetude. Another illusion, from his point of view, is the regarding of ideals as ends, instead of means. He cites, in England, the doctrines of freedom of contract, Laissez-faire, Universal Suffrage, the Socialist Utopia, with its theory of general payment by labour-time alone. In so far as these ideals have any life in them, it is as means to an end—namely, the elevation of men en masse, and the procuring for them fresh instalments of justice. But they have been regarded as ends in themselves, with the result that they have admittedly proved fallacious wherever they have been given a logical trial from that standpoint. All ideals, he considers, are similarly means, not ends; and the statesmen should treat them as means only.

The course of Civilisation, as revealed by history at large, lies between opposing ideals. It zig-zags between their contending attractions as does a planet between centrifugal and centripetal force, but more roughly; inclining now to one, now to another. These contending attractions may be summarised as the influence of the Ideal in general on the one hand, and of Physical Force on the other. But, in the course which Civilisation roughly keeps between them, there is, in our own time, a preponderance of the Ideal, which must increase, but cannot eliminate, a necessary balance of Force. True statesmanship would endeavour to minimise the loss of power from this zig-zag course by co-ordinating the opposing ideals regarded as means only: and to this it would be helped by the Chart of Civilisation in the past.

Dr. Crozier then proceeds to sketch this process of Civilisation, as developed in his previous volumes. Suffice it here to say that the moral of it all, over and above the continuity of evolution, is this process between opposed ideals and the refusal of Providence to pursue any single ideal further than it continues to serve its end. "God in many ways fulfils Himself, Lest one good custom should corrupt the world." Here, as often, the poet has preceded the philosopher. It is a corollary of this that the scientific statesman must push forward no single reform till all collateral reforms have come into line and can be brought forward together. England has hitherto succeeded largely through her natural advantages. But, in the present pressure of competition, the scientific statesmanship which Dr. Crozier advocates has become a necessity.

In approaching the application of this historical philosophy to the present day, he postulates that facts must be stripped of all theories based on experience less wide than the entire course of civilisation and universal human nature; sweeping aside all the single panaceas of any school or party. There must be no partial remedy, but such as takes into account all the relations of the body politic. Each nation must follow its own genius in its contribution to the general advance of civilisation. The government of the inferior races by the superior is a necessity of this advance, as shown by the whole course of history. There must be neither mercantile exploitation of these inferior races nor a false cosmopolitanism. And the statesman must remember (what he is little likely to forget) that a residuum of things must always be left to Providence.

The author approaches the politics of the twentieth century with the preconception that Democracy, for all its drawbacks as an engine of government, until the proletariat attains its emancipation, is necessary as a moral instrument for its elevation. But it must be a practical Democracy, not the ideal Democracy of Rousseau; and hence the motto of statesmen must be Evolution, not Revolution. There must be no violent breach with the past. He lays down four rules. First, the preservation of the national type. A nation must assimilate its neighbour's qualities only in so far as this can be done without injury to the national character. Secondly, there must be no abstract ideals, but evolution from an existing type. Thirdly, the gaps between social grades must be closed up, so that there may be free circulation for talent from lowest to highest, and the whole people may move as one organism. Fourthly, reform must look towards the material and social conditions of states, not towards the character of their inhabitants. It follows that the chief aim of statesmen in the twentieth century must be the removal of barriers between grades of the existing hierarchy, without destruction of that hierarchy.

With unshrinking valiance, Dr. Crozier attempts to apply these principles successively to England, France, and America; but it will be enough if we can here give some view of his dealings with England. Following his principle that reform should approach the material and social conditions of a people, he considers the barriers between class and class in England. And he finds the fault (originally enough) largely in the English contempt for mere intellect. Birth, wealth, or exceptional genius can alone pierce the guarded gates of society. There is no Napoleonic career opened to talent. If England wants intellect, she buys or imports it, paying the lowest prices to inventors and other men of pure intellect whom she happens to need. Intellect is not honoured socially, is not an ideal. This threatens to become a national danger in the present age of international competition. Yet England's great strength is her respect for character, apart from intellect. The necessity, then, is to superadd the one without destroying the other. The social hierarchy must be goaded so that there may be a free rise by means of intellect, not birth or money. Intellect will thus become a national ideal. So he arrives at his practical proposals.

With regard to the land, he would have a far wider distribution of ownership, but not on the French plan of petty holdings. He would have the new holdings graduated, from a not excessive maximum for the great landowners down to a competent minimum for the peasantry, considering value besides extent of acres. But how this redistributed hierarchy is to be compassed he gives no hint. Let us pass, then, to his ideas for the commercial, manufacturing, and city classes.

He would graduate these also, starting from an income proportioned by the talent and energy spent in obtaining it, down to a point compatible with a decent livelihood. To effect this he takes a leaf from the Socialist book, and suggests that all routine public functions should be handed over to municipalities or the State; while monopolies created mainly by public demand (such as his pet aversion, the wealthy brewer), ground values, and unearned increments, should be taxed. Thus possessions would, by a natural and gradual process, come to bear some relation to the intellect exerted in acquiring them, and intellect itself would be valued.

Digitized by Google

Further to lessen the gap between Labour and Capital, he would have the Trades Unions improve their organisation till they should succeed in getting the principle of the "living wage" permanently recognised (a large "till"). Then the steps between Capital and Labour should be graduated to bridge over the gap, as will (he thinks) naturally happen when unearned increment, monopolies, &c., are abolished, and talent is a passport to fortune. Further, he would break up the land for the purchase of plots in town and country, erect cheap dwellings, establish profit-sharing in production, no less than wholesale and retail trade; would establish schools for the training of workmen in technique, &c, and secure protection for their inventions—that by all these means the proletariat may still further be broken up as a separate class.

Arts, sciences, professions, and so forth he would also graduate and throw open to intellect. Moreover, he would have the old titles of nobility extended to all (in preference to creating fresh titles), and bestowed for intellect alone. Yet, he adds, those chosen must be men of all-round culture, or they will lack respect, and the national homage for character will decay.

Dr. Crozier sees that to make permanent such extensive changes their principles must be embodied in the education of the new generation; and he goes on to make proposals for educational reform accordingly. But we have followed him far enough to show the main ideas of his book. It is, at any rate, a carefully thought out and widely considered attempt to apply an historical philosophy to actual politics. Whether, setting apart the difficulties of legislation, changes so radical would actually result from such measures as he indicates, may readily be disputed. He has at least done his best to be eclectic in his combination of ideas and remedies from many thinkers, and has produced a volume which must set others to think—which can be said of few such attempts. Looking at his book as a whole, one is inclined to ask whether the race of philosophic statesmen which it supposes would, if desirable, be possible? The school of active politics does not breed the large and dispassionate view, the calm and patient reflection, the wide combination, which legislation and government on such principles must require. Those who possess such qualities are usually found in the study, and seldom have the push, readiness, and active energy which could bring them to the head of nations, or the stern will which could keep them there. Again, it is an old truth that ideals must be co-ordinated if they are not to be mischievous. But does not Dr. Crozier confound ideals which are permanently true in themselves with such as contain but part truths, and are, indeed, incapable of being ends? Yet politically he is doubtless right, though we should hesitate to endorse his principle in its entirety. We might remark, too, that his defence of intellect is itself based on sufficiently material grounds, omitting its immense influence on character when it is combined therewith, and arguing solely from its effect on national prosperity. Another and much wider observation is one that affects all modern speculators on the future. It never for a moment occurs to him to doubt that present European civilisation is on the road to anything but indefinite progress and expansion, and that this advance must be along the indefinitely widened lines of nineteenth century progress. That century was democratic—the future must be more democratic; it was scientific—the future must be more scientific; it was industrial—the future must be more industrial. That the new century may be destined to bring to the surface currents which have flowed beneath the loud superficial current of the last century, no writer dreams of entertaining. Still less that Western civilisation may have reached or passed the point of indefinite expansion, as has happened to those before it. But, of course, the assumption was a necessary one for Dr. Crozier's purpose. If he regarded the winds, he could not sow. It is not the assumption, but the unhesitating confidence, which strikes us so strongly in modern thinkers. But the twentieth century might do worse than try Dr. Crozier's prescription, or so much of it as he can manage. Unless, before he can take it, he should expire in the hands of his solicitous physicians.

Alfrediana.

Was Alfred King of England? By a Saxon. (Harrison & Sons. 2s. 6d.)

The Story of King Alfred. By Sir Walter Besant. (Newnes. 1s.)

The Story of Alfred the Great. By Walter Hawkins and E. Thornton Smith. (Marshall. 2s. 6d.)

"It is meat and drink to me to see a clown," saith the parti-coloured one; and the lucubrations of "A Saxon" upon King Alfred were a full meal for Touchstone. "A Saxon" endeavours to re-write cosmic history upon the basis of material derived from the book of Genesis, Sharon Turner's History of the Anglo-Saxons, Mr. Henry Bradley's Story of the Goths, the works of Sir Edward Creasy, and a misunderstanding of Prof. Huxley. From him you learn > that not only had Alfred no claims whatever to the title of "the Great," but that he was merely a Roman pretender, and never succeeded to the English throne. And we may assure ourselves that the entire story has been built up, little by little during the last thousand years, with the view of furthering the aims and ambitions of the Papal power.

"A Saxon's" cosmic formula is the secular conflict between three white races, whom he calls, in Biblical language, Semitic, Hamitic, and Japhetic. It is all delightfully simple. Thus the siege of Troy "represents a struggle for supremacy between the Semitic Israelites and the Hamitic Hebrews." The Romans, who came with Æneas from Troy, were naturally also Hamitic, and the Roman Empire in Europe really represents an Asiatic dominion over the native Japhetic peoples.

> As we learn that the Romans were governed by Consuls, we may more than conjecture that these Consuls were appointed by the Asiatic Great King, and that Rome had not yet secured her independence.

Julius Cæsar was a revolted Consul, for "common sense forces us to conclude that the so-called Pompey—that is, 'the pompous one'—was none other than Arsaces XIV., the Orodes, the Asiatic Great King of Kings." Pompey is succeeded by Antony (Arsaces XV.), whose generals, Brutus and Cassius, put down the revolt of Cæsar, and Octavius is made Consul. The decline and fall of the Roman Empire really means the self-assertion of the Japhetic or European Teutons against the Hamitic invaders. All the Teutons worshipped a great God-King Hermann or Arminius. Incidentally it is observed that the Egyptians also had their God-King, "the Amen."

> The divine title, as handed down to us on the monuments, has been read backwards, and the Great Amen, which still clings to our liturgy, appears as Mr. Mena.

Coming now to the events of English history during the ninth century, we find in the tradition of Alfred nothing but an episode, singularly distorted in the relating, of the Japhetic-Hamitic contest for Europe. The chief representative of the Hamitic power was now known, not as the Consul of Rome, but as the Pope of Rome. Alfred, the close ally of Rome, and anointed with holy oil by Pope Leo IV.,

Digitized by Google

must also have been Hamitic, and is, therefore, falsely represented as an English patriot. Really he was "tied body and soul to the Papal power," and the true patriots were the Japhetic Danes and Saxons, who persistently made head against him. Their leader was Guthrum, and Guthrum, not Alfred, was the true "King of England."

> Alfred was, no doubt, like Prince Charlie, a Roman pretender to the throne, but he was never King of England.

The falsification of history in this respect is due to the fact that the chronicles were written after the Norman Conquest and from an Anglo-Roman or Hamitic standpoint. On this point our author quotes Hardouin the Jesuit, who believed all the works of the Fathers and the records of the Councils to be mediæval forgeries; and also Cardinal Newman, who > tells us "that all knowledge of the Latin classics comes to us from the mediæval copies of them, and they who transcribed them had the opportunity of forging or garbling them. We are simply at their mercy. . . . The numerous religious bodies then existing over the face of Europe had leisure enough in the course of a century to compose not only all the classics but all the Fathers, too."

After the breathless speculations of "A Saxon," the ordinary sober accounts of King Alfred naturally lack savour. Were it otherwise we could highly recommend the posthumous Story of King Alfred from the pen of the late Sir Walter Besant. With the exception of the volume of specialist essays edited by Mr. Alfred Bowker, upon which it largely draws, it is probably the best of all the swarm of works on the subject which we owe to the millenary celebrations. Most popularisers of history popularise, we suppose, with their tongues more or less in their cheeks. But Sir Walter Besant really believed in his task. He was convinced that, in literary matters, the democracy counted.

> I should like, if it were possible, to see before me, in imagination, tier beyond tier, stretching far away in the distance, circle beyond circle, millions of white faces intent upon the story of the English King. If they will listen, my voice will reach to the farthest circle; if they are interested, they will listen. Let me see their faces light up as if touched by sunshine when the interest of the subject fills them; let me see the changes as of passing rain and sunshine on an April day on the faces of this vast audience. . . . I would rather write a book for the people than anything else that the world can offer. He who reaches the heart of the people becomes and continues an abiding force.

Whatever one may think about the accessibility of the heart of the people to literature, there is no doubt as to the ring of sincerity in this aspiration. Nor do we see any reason why Sir Walter Besant's little volume should not appeal to a wide circle of readers. It is so admirably done as to make the wish inevitable that he had been able to devote more of his time and talents to this sort of writing. Without pedantry, it betrays a minute knowledge both of the original authorities and of the erudite literature which has gathered round the subject. Without affectation, it is eloquent in the nervous lucidity of its English and in the spirit of whole-hearted admiration for Alfred and his people which pervades it. And if the expression of this admiration occasionally appears, to a critical ear, to reach the point of excess, that is a fault to which the heart of the people, in its present temper at least, is likely to be lenient.

The other little "Story of Alfred" before us, that by Messrs. Walter Hawkins and Edward Thornton Smith, is carefully compiled for the benefit of "the general reader who has no time for research, and the youthful reader who has no interest in it." But it is so slight as compared with Sir Walter Besant's, and so much less full of individuality and power of literary presentment, as to be, we fear, superfluous. Unfortunately, the multiplication of such second-rate books tends to make it very difficult for the first-rate one, when it comes, to secure its proper audience.

Merejkowski's "Tremendous Task."

The Death of the Gods. By Dmitri Merejkowski. Translated by Herbert Trench. (Constable. 6s.)

THIS is the first of that trilogy of romances in which Merejkowski has set himself the tremendous task of presenting and interpreting "the everlasting contest between the idea of a God-Man and the idea of a Man-God; that is to say, between the conception of a God incarnate for a while (as in Christ) and the conception of Man as himself God—gradually evolving higher types of splendid and ruling character which draw after them the generations." The book under review deals with the life and times of Julian the Apostate; the second of the trilogy, The Resurrection of the Gods, has Leonardo da Vinci for hero; and the last, Anti-Christ, centres about the lurid and savage character of Peter the Great.

The "everlasting contest" is depicted in The Death of the Gods with a wealth of movement and of passion which at times has something of the dazzling effect produced on beholders by the enchantments of Maximus of Ephesus We are carried out of ourselves, as it were, to see in ourselves the ancient and inevitable tendencies which have been from the beginning, and Julian becomes a type of the eternal conflict between will and faith.

Merejkowski's general method is the method which has particularly distinguished modern Russian novelists from Gogol to Turgeniev and Tolstoy. He rejoices in lavish accumulation of detail, in the vividness of minor touches which serve to render the final impression living and complete. This is possible only to the highest art; to a lower the method has been, and always must be, disastrous. Merejkowski not only gives us the fact, which is a simple matter, but he also gives us the life behind the fact. He sees behind the ancient worship the meanings which alone made it beautiful and worthy; the divine limbs of Apollo and Diana represent an idea lovely and austere. To him everything is significant; he moves in a world of symbols; he has in him much both of the poet and the priest. It is this mastery of the significance of things which renders the Death of the Gods so vital and appealing a book. Merejkowski makes a remote epoch live by reason of the human appeal which, in essence, never changes from age to age. The cry of Christ or anti-Christ is alive to-day as it was when Julian flung off the faith of the Galileans, though to-day it may not be the worship of the Olympians which draws men from the younger faith.

The action of the story extends from the period when the boy Julian was a prisoner in the palace of Macellum to the time when the Emperor Julian was killed in the retreat from Ctesiphon. Merejkowski follows faithfully the main outlines of history. We see Julian learning doctrinal theology from an instructor selected by the Arian Eusebius; we see him reading the day's lessons in the basilica of St. Maurice, overcome by the sight of adoring cripples and the mystery and terror of the Cross; we see him restored to the favour of Constantine and witness of the destruction of the Temple of Diana at Ephesus; we see him invested with the imperial purple and marching from victory to victory in Gaul. His gradual falling away from the Christian faith is most skilfully suggested, until at last, on the day which crowns him Augustus Julian, he is initiated into the mysteries of Apollo. "From this day," cries Maximus, "I will cleanse you from this Galilean corruption—slay the shadow of Golgotha in the radiance of Mithra—warm afresh your body, frozen at baptism, in the hot blood of the sun-god!" Then follows an impressive scene, in which Julian, before his assembled army, renounces the faith of Christ:

> "Comrades, our work is finished. Now we will go to Constantinople! Give thanks to the Olympians who have given us the victory!"

Digitized by Google

These words were only heard by the first ranks, but there were numerous Christians among them. These were roused by the last startling expression. . . . But the more distant ranks, who had not heard Julian's words, cried:

"Glory to Augustus Julian! Glory! Glory!" and louder and louder yet, from outskirts of the hill, as far as they were covered by the legions, arose a cry repeated by thousands of voices—"Glory! . . . Glory! . . ."

"Look, look," murmured the dismayed Christians, "the Labarum is being lowered!" And, in fact the holy banner was being vailed before the Emperor. A military blacksmith came down from the wood with a brazier and red-hot pincers.

Julian, whose face, in spite of the ruddy gleams of the purple and the sun, was dark with strong emotion, wrenched the golden cross, with its monogram of precious stones, from the staff of the Labarum. Pearls, emeralds and rubies were scattered on the ground, and the glittering cross buried in the earth stamped under the sandal of the Roman Cæsar.

From a casket Maximus immediately drew forth a little silver statue of the Sun-god, Mithra-Helios; and the smith in a few instants soldered it to the staff of the Labarum. . . . Julian knelt before the standard, and, stretching out his arms to the little silver image, exclaimed:

"Glory to the invincible Sun, king of all gods! . . . Augustus worships the eternal Helios, god of light, god of reason, god of the gladness and joy upon Olympus!"

The last rays of sunset lighted the bold beauty of the god of Delphi, and rayed his head. The legionaries stood in silence, save that in the wood the dry leaves could be heard falling. The conflagration of the sunset, the purple of the sacrificial king, the withered woods, all these breathed a magnificence as of sumptuous obsequies. One of the men in the front rank muttered a single word so distinctly that it reached Julian's ear, and thrilled him—"Anti-Christ!"

From this point the Apostate sets his energy to accomplish the restoration of the old worship; he organises Bacchic processions in Constantinople, and finds them to be composed of dancers, actors, and courtesans; when he turns from the altar and cries, "Men, the God Dionysus is the beginning of your soul's liberty," he sees nothing but scorn and weariness in the upturned faces. "Where," he asks later, "are the immortal old men, the austere heroes, the proud lads, the pure women in their white and floating robes? . . . Galileans! Galileans! What have you done with these things?" He sees himself struggling against a faith too strong for overthrow, too vital to fear martyrdom; yet he labours on until, at last, in the fatal expedition against the Persians, he renounces even his own gods:

> "I swear by the eternal joy, locked here in my heart, I renounce You, as you have renounced me! I abandon you as you have abandoned me, impotent deities! Single-handed against you, phantom Olympians, I am like unto you, but not your equal, because I am a man and you are only gods! . . ."

The character of Julian is drawn throughout with perfect consistency and firmness. We are presented with the study of a great soul endeavouring to revive belief in a faith degraded and dead, in passionate conflict with a faith emerging triumphantly from much that had gathered round to obscure its splendid dawn. There can be no age to which such a character can fail of its appeal.

The translation appears to have been well and carefully done. There are occasional awkwardnesses of expression, but the difficulties of a translator who endeavours to do real justice to his author are so many that such slight lapses may well be excused.

Other New Books.

THE TESTAMENT OF A MAN FORBID. BY JOHN DAVIDSON.

This second in Mr. John Davidson's series of "Testaments" has perhaps no single passage so fine as the conclusion of the Testament of a Vivisector; but, on the whole, it is, we think, more level work. The "Man Forbid" is one who would cut off the whole past of man based on notions of the supernatural, and start afresh from the actual present (or what he conceives to be the actual), all delusions of religion and art eliminated. He is stoned forth by his fellows, of course, and lives with nature in surety of final victory. This melodramatic martyr of revolt, from Shelley and Byron downwards, is getting rather a bore in poetry; and we wish Mr. Davidson could have developed the man's personality without introducing this touch. Really, no one stones Mr. Davidson, whose views have much in common with those here set forth. But the poem has all Mr. Davidson's sinew and undeniable poetic individuality, if somewhat of his occasional rant. The close is on a note of sheer beauty:

> With the Spring
> The west-wind thunders through the budding hedge
> That stems the furrowed steep—a sound of drums,
> Of gongs and muted cymbals; . . .
> The sombre furze, all suddenly attired
> In rich brocade, . . . overrides
> The rolling land and girds the bosomed plain
> That strips her green robe to a saffron shore
> And steps into the surf where threads and scales
> And arabesques of blue and emerald wave
> Begin to damascene the iron sea.

In fine, the poem has strong work, if not wholly Mr. Davidson's best. (Grant Richards. 6d. net.)

THE ETHIC OF FREETHOUGHT, AND OTHER ADDRESSES AND ESSAYS. BY KARL PEARSON.

The author has been led to revise and reissue this book (he tells us) by the reaction towards spiritual ideals manifest in Theosophy, "Christian Science," and the like "superstitions." Although he trusts the reaction to be but temporary, he feels it time for Freethinkers to organise, like the Positivists and Unitarians before them, and be up and doing. Certainly the battle is not to materialism just now; and its innings has been so long that we doubt it may, in its turn, have to "field out" longer than he thinks. The opening paper is an attempt to erect a social and moral system on the basis of Freethought, after examining various philosophical systems, Eastern and Western. It is also a determined protest against "natural theology" and all other attempts to push science into the domain of the "unknown." Of the other articles, we may point specially to those which are historical, such as the review of Humanism in Germany. It is not only able and knowledgable; it is also strikingly and unusually fair in its estimate of the contestants in the great battle of the Reformation period. It rescues, for example, Johann Eck, the Catholic, from the torrent of more than Miltonic vituperation poured upon him by Luther and other opposing champions, even to the mild Melancthon; and does justice to his powers of research and his studied moderation of language. Another study is that of the mystic Eckhart, which strikes a note of originality by showing his derivation from Averrhoes. Altogether, it is an able volume, to be studied by all who would know the modern apologetics of Freethought. (A. & C. Black. 7s. 6d. net.)

WOODLAND, FIELD, AND SHORE: WILD NATURE DEPICTED WITH PEN AND CAMERA. BY O. G. PIKE.

This is a most attractive, even fascinating book. It deals chiefly with birds, observed mostly in the southern counties; but occasionally and incidentally with animals, insects, or even flowers. The conquering camera has been carried into English slums and foreign countries, helping the eye and pen intimately to record the habits and daily life of men remote from our own experience. Mr. Pike has done for birds what others have done for men: he has lived among them, so far as man can be admitted to the life of these shiest of Nature's children—more exclusive than ant or bee in their separate and aloof existence. And he has brought among them, under the most difficult conditions, with unswerving patience, the vigilant eye of the camera, which sees and records what the human eye sees not. His text is full of sympathetic and observant detail, dear to every lover of nature; and it is illuminated (rather than illustrated) by over a hundred careful photographs, the fruit of many a sedulous hour. Take this experience of the Ringed Plover on the Norfolk coast:

Digitized by Google

> While we were setting up our camera, one of the parent birds was seen to be running towards us, and then pretended to be badly wounded, in hope of attracting us further away from the nest. As we did not appear to take much notice, she ran a little nearer, and then laid herself on the ground with one wing hanging apparently useless, as if broken. Next she got up and ran round us in an excited state, all the time uttering a little plaintiff cry, pu-li. Her mate arrived from somewhere, and joined her in these determined endeavours to attract us from their home.

Is this instinct? Or how did instinct foresee gunshot-wounds, and provide their mimicry? Did the plover of the Saxon shore imitate this broken wing? Or is it reasoning from experience? Full of such attractive observation is this excellent book, which deserves a wide sale. (The Religious Tract Society. 5s. net.)

WE know of no illustrated paper which makes up into a volume so well as Country Life. The ninth volume of this justly-admired journal is now before us, and if we say little of its contents it is because they are too various for description. Moreover, those who know Country Life in its weekly form do not need it, and those who do not should see the part before the whole. The admirable series of illustrated articles on "Country Homes and Gardens Old and New," is continued, and it serves again to convince one that the English country house is one of the triumphs of our old civilisation. Every form of country industry, sport, and lore seems to receive attention in these pages, which also reflect to some extent the literary and artistic doings of town.

Divisional Vol. IV. of Thompson's Gardeners' Assistant, now being reissued in a thoroughly revised form by the Gresham Publishing Company, is concerned with the culture of fruit in the kitchen garden and the orchard. The scale of this work permits exhaustive treatment of every branch of horticultural work, and we imagine that few gardening experts will complain of any inadequacy in the space here allotted to the formation of orchards, the surgical treatment of trees, and the cultivation, in all their best market varieties, of apples, pears, plums, peaches, nectarines, &c. The work is thoroughly scientific, yet we have found many pages of much charm, and the photographs of gardens, southern walls, and hot-houses lend great attraction to the volume.

We find more publishing than profit in Mr. Joseph Shaylor's compilation Some Favourite Books and their Authors. The white and gold cover, the ruled pages, the photogravure of Meissonier's "Student," and the little leaf colophons scattered through the book, give great daintiness to the volume. Mr. Shaylor's aim is to state "a few interesting facts and details relating to fifty well-known books, together with some account of their authorship. The result is a supper jelly. It seems a pity to break it, the eating of it yields infinitesimal nourishment, but—it is harmless.

The Library binds late, but it binds well. Such is our reflection on receiving from Messrs. Kegan Paul the very handsome first yearly volume of a new series dating from December, 1899, to September, 1900. The Library, it will be observed, is still in the last century. Other criticism we have none. Every subject which belongs to the guardianship of books from "The Open Access Question" to "Incunabula at Grenoble" is within the scope of this ably conducted quarterly.

Fiction.

Fortune's Darling. By Walter Raymond. (Methuen. 6s.)

THIS story falls considerably behind Mr. Raymond's later work; indeed, it gives us the impression that it must have been written long before Two Men o' Mendip and No Soul above Money. It has, of course, some of its author's good qualities; the country-folk are delightful, and it is never quite dull. Yet we are constrained to say that in parts it approaches dulness much too nearly, and the principal characters, who talk good English, are seldom really alive. To begin with, Mr. Raymond has chosen a plot which is one of the worst as well as one of the oldest known to novelists. We have the heir to an impoverished estate, who proposes to one girl because she is rich, whilst he loves her cousin, who is comparatively poor. One can get up no sympathy for that time-worn hero, the more particularly when, as in this case, he allows the lady to lend him money. John Rumblelow, after his first introduction, fails to interest us; he is a poor creature, in spite of all Mr. Raymond's efforts to make us sympathise with him. Margaret Lane is better, but even she leaves us almost unmoved; her sorrows are not tellingly presented. Old Squire Rumblelow, on the other hand, is good from beginning to end, and the great cock-fight between his black-red birds and Sir Peter Wilkins's ginger ones is as vigorous as may be. Also, as we have said, the country-folk are excellently done, and the feuds between the members of the Corporation of Bristlington are described with humour. But we are disappointed with the book. Mr. Raymond has done such admirable work that he cannot afford now to give us his second best.

Sir Hector: The Story of a Scots Gentleman. By Robert Machray. (Constable. 6s.)

MR. MACHRAY has selected a period for his latest story which is certainly full of romantic possibilities, the period just prior to the '45 rebellion. But there is little real romance in the book, in spite of much that, treated in the right manner, might have yielded romance enough and to spare. The whole story is unconvincing; event follows event in the manner too familiar in plot novels; what little character there is is of the most mechanical and primitive description. The dialogue, too, is painfully stilted, the opening chapter, unfortunately, being worse in that respect than its successors. One is already tired of the mother who on her death-bed, and in spite of the physical disabilities of nearing dissolution, explains at great length to her son that he is not what he supposes himself to be. And in this case the fact that Hector Maclean was really the son of the Marquis of Tullibardine, who was really the Duke of Atholl, does not seriously affect the story, for Hector, being a Whig, never had speech or dealings with that implacable Jacobite. We do not suggest that Sir Hector is without interest; the chapters dealing with proceedings on 'Change during the scares of the period are nimble and well-informed, and Hector's ride to the rebel camp at Derby is ingeniously and effectively contrived. But as for the true spirit of romance, the spirit which suggests magic in a phrase, or conjures up a scene in a pen-stroke, we look for it in vain.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Machray is careful, conscientious, neat; his facts are accurate, his local colour correct; yet we would gladly sacrifice these minor matters for a touch of vivifying power.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

STEPHEN CALINARI. BY JULIAN STURGIS.

Period 1877. Scene: Oxford, London, and the world generally. Mr. Sturgis has a light, graceful pen, and he knows the lives of the leisured rich. At Oxford, Stephen Calinari "was the most conceited person in the College." He leaves and arrives at his mother's house; "the 'best people' went to Madame Calinari." Later, he makes many journeys through the world—to the Shipka Pass at the time of the Turko-Russian War, for example. A clever novel. (Constable. 6s.)

THE GIANT'S GATE. BY MAX PEMBERTON.

Well may this be called the "Story of a Great Adventure." Also it is Mr. Pemberton's longest and (says his publisher) his "greatest" novel. It tells of a French soldier, a sort of brave Boulanger, whom the French people (oh! these novelists) wished to make Emperor. And there is much about a submarine boat which adventured to this country "past the defences of the Thames." Love, too! For Mr. Pemberton knows his readers. "And looking down thence to the twinkling lights, which shone as stars in the valley below, he stood a moment to say: 'Good-night, Kathleen—beloved!'" (Cassell. 6s.)

THE TRIUMPH OF HILARY BLACHLAND. BY BERTRAM MITFORD.

Mr. Mitford has written many stories of South African adventure. The chapter headings of this work suggest a story of the South African War. For example: "What happened at Bulawayo," "An Episode in Siever's Kloof," "The Retreat of the Patrol." But, turning the leaves, we come upon these passages:

"Lo Bengula sat within the esibayaneni—the sacred enclosure wherein none dare intrude—at his great kraal, Bulawayo. . . ."

"Lo Bengula sat alone. . . ."

"He looked around upon his sheep and goats. . . ."

A spirited story. (Chatto. 6s.)

YOUTH GOES A-MARKETING. BY J. H. PEARCE.

A Cornish tin and copper mine novel, sober and conscientious, by the author of Ezekiel's Sin. "When he had finished his supper, Ambrose put his night's provisions in his crib-bag, and having filled his water-flask with cold tea and water, he put on his hat and made a start for the door."

"'Off early, arn't 'ee?' said his mother, clicking the box vigorously.

'Got a bit of a job to do 'fore I go underground.'"

A powerful story, with strong characterisation. (Allen. 6s.)

HEARTS IN REVOLT. BY H. GILBERT.

Of the religion and love variety. Tells of the growth of a youth in revolt against the conventions of religion, and the suffering of his young woman, "torn as she is by her passion for him and the sense of her religious duty." It opens in Camberwell, and on the title-page is Browning's—

Only I discern—
Infinite passion and the pain
Of finite hearts that yearn.

(Allen. 6s.)

A DOUBLE CHOICE. BY JAMES BAKER.

"Geoffrey felt a thrill of intense pleasure as this man so talked to him. He looked at the card: 'Herbert Barker, Editor of The Year and Its Art.' How often had he dreamt of his work being noticed in London." This passage is from page 46, and is the beginning of the career of a journalist, whose experiences form the motive of the book. It includes also some episodes in the life of a "special"; and to make the picture complete, the late Sir Walter Besant is introduced among the characters, and the name of Sir Wemyss Reid figures in the dedication. (Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

THE WOOING OF GREY EYES. BY RICCARDO STEPHENS.

And other stories to the number of seven, filling nearly half the book. Grey Eyes is told in the first person. The style is not classical. It begins: "To-night, August the First, Anno Domini 1900, I, James Dalrymple, otherwise Jim, bachelor, aged twenty-seven, begin my diary, a job that I have never attempted before, and that I don't by any means promise myself to keep up long.

"Why do I have a shot at it?"

(Murray. 6s.)

HERB OF GRACE. BY ROSA N. CAREY.

This is the title of a magazine edited by Miss Alma-Tadema, to whom the author (nineteen novels stand to her name on the title-page) apologises. A story of modern life told simply and naturally, with quotations at the heads of the chapters from Maeterlinck, Emerson, Clough, Swedenborg, Jeremy Taylor, &c. The hero is Malcolm Herrick. "Nature intended me for an artist or a poet," Malcolm would say, "but circumstances made me a poet." He was also a "a devout disciple of Emerson"; and once when strolling through Kensington Gardens, he "electrified" Anna by quoting a favourite passage from the essay on Friendship. Malcolm was certainly a prig. (Macmillan. 6s.)

A STOLEN OPERA BY CLARICE DANVERS.

Founded on the American play, "Heartsease." Brandon Dale's opera was called "King Lear." In Chapter V., Part III., we are in the National Opera House; "Hildebrand," was being played. From a box B. Dale cried out: "'Hildebrand.' No, I tell you it's mine . . . mine! In the face of a thousand people I'll swear it's mine. A mother knows her own child. I know the children of my brain. It is not 'Hildebrand'—it's 'King Lear.'" (Pearson. 6s.)

UNPROFESSIONAL TALES. BY NORMYX.

Dedicated to Ouida, and containing sixteen tales, under such titles as "A Mystery," "The Sentence," "Belladonna." The tales vary, says the publisher's announcement, both as regards style and subject—"some of them being modelled after the pattern of Edgar Allan Poe, while others are constructed upon the lines of the modern French school." So! (Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

MEMORY STREET. BY MARTHA BAKER DUNN.

Miss Dunn is an American writer. Her story is of New England life and character, cast in the autobiographical form. Thus the valedictory paragraph: "It is a simple story that I have told, but it is a story of life. It has no plot, except as a plot may be lived from day to day. People come and go in it as they come and go in real life, and the stage of its action is the stage of the world. Much is missed out of it that could have been better written by a stronger hand, and its only meaning—if it has one—is the attempt to find out God's meaning." (Jarrold. 6s.)

We have also received Dauntless, by Ewan Martin (Pearson, 6s.); And Afterwards, by Mrs. Harold E. Gorst (Greening, 6s.); Where the Oranges Grow, by N. A. Leykin (Greening, 6s.); The Key to the Riddle, by Margaret S. Comrie (Nisbet, 6s.); The Crime of the Crystal, by Fergus Hume (Digby, Long, 6s.)

Digitized by Google

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage, One Halfpenny, Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscription, prepaid (including postage) 17/6
„ Quarterly 5/0
„ Price for one issue /5

The Glittering Style.

AMONG the first and last difficulties of literary art are these—to describe things as they are, to know what one feels, and to express that feeling plainly. Which means that the writer must possess the great gift of sincerity—rare in literature as in life. It is such writings only that live, making fresh appeal to generation after generation. The hymn "Nearer, my God, to Thee" has that quality, and so custom cannot stale it. It is the possession of George Eliot, Charlotte Brontë, the author of John Inglesant, the author of Mark Rutherford, to name but four. It was as much a part of Darwin as his ill-health, and shines out, a pure, clear flame, in that short autobiography of his, especially the fragment which deals with his speculations on religion. It cannot be counterfeited. Let a writer try to conceal his insincerity as he will, it will out like moisture.

One of the enemies of sincerity is the modern rage for glitter and cleverness in prose composition. We do not say that the glittering writer is necessarily insincere, but his anxiety to strike attitudes, to sparkle, to be saying continually to his reader: "Remark that admirable phrase, that arresting epithet, that bright conceit, that startling simile—am I not clever?" makes for insincerity. The cleverness of many modern books is colossal. Often, as we read, we do not say, "What clear, good thought," but, rather, "Why, on earth, does he say what he has to say so oddly?" Sometimes this cleverness is merely the failure to hide the marks of labour, a craze for polish, the niggling use of a score of brush-marks when one broad stroke should have produced the effect. Take an example from an able and scholarly modern collection of short stories: "He had the soft purring ways of a cat, the tact of a Jesuit, the penetration of a money-lender, the sensibility of a musical amateur, and the morals of a maid-of-honour." Is that good characterisation? No. Do you believe it? No. We are conscious of the writer's ingenuity—that is all. Here are a few passages from another book, a successful and highly praised modern novel. Do they spell sincerity? Hardly. But they certainly conjure up a picture of the author assiduously desirous to be at his best, to glitter, to show his cleverness. We can see him at work making the phrases: "She blinked sagely." . . . "He looked through her eyes into the East, and was aware of the stainless beginning of things—joy as yet unvocal, and sorrow with folded pinions." . . . "Her veins ran ichor; she was full of the unknown god, stamped and sealed the desired of heaven." In contrast let us take, almost at random, a passage from Adam Bede. Ten lines and there is Dinah. You know her. You believe in her. She is alive. It is Dinah who makes the picture—not the personality of the author:

> But Dinah walked as simply as if she were going to market, and seemed as unconscious of her outward appearance as a little boy; there was no blush, no tremulousness which said, "I know you think me a pretty woman, too young to preach," no casting up and down of the eyelids, no compression of the lips, no attitude of the arms that said, "But you must think of me as a saint." She held no book in her ungloved hands, but let them hang down lightly crossed before her, as she stood and turned her grey eyes on the people.

These are high matters. Let us now approach the volume that suggested these remarks. It is of American origin. The title is A Journey to Nature, the author Mr. J. M. Mowbray, the publishers Messrs. Constable & Co. We know nothing of Mr. Mowbray. This may be his first book, it may be his fiftieth; but one thing is certain—he is an extremely clever writer, scholarly, observant, with a distinct gift of characterisation, and he can construct a book with the best. In this volume he set out to do what Thoreau did, but, unlike Thoreau, he utterly fails to persuade us of his literary sincerity. His book has given us keen pleasure. We read it with interest, and were sorry when the last page was reached; closing it, not with the conviction that here is a fine piece of literature, but that Mr. Mowbray is a very clever man. Possibly that is what Mr. Mowbray desired. Then full merrily all is well.

If Mr. Mowbray wished to convince, his method is wrong from the beginning. We have never been inside the New York Stock Exchange, but it does not need that experience to tell us what a Wall Street stockbroker is like. Imprimis he would not scatter through his autobiography references to Brahma, Wagner, Martineau, Milton, Lucullus, Swedenborg, Darwin, Virgil, and Balzac. A Wall Street stockbroker, we suggest, would not write like this (nor should Mr. Mowbray):

> One hot day we lay flat on our stomachs under the shade of a beech, among the June grass and the daisies, peering down into a magic spectacle, and yet it was the planet's history in petto. The great loom of the universe was working there with miniature continents. It was a palæontological glimpse of the pre-world, as if Nature kept ceaseless memoranda in shorthand of all her monstrous cycles of change. There were the equatorial forests and the prehistoric monsters. All one had to do was to get the inverse scale adapted, and the gigantic fronds waved their plumes, and strangling creepers wound in tangles, and strange forms of life wandered through. Green leviathans crouched in corners; scurrying termites ran hither and thither. A slow-moving angleworm drew his ophidian length along the ancient geologic reaches, and an armoured pterodactyl, in the shape of a dragon-fly, came in flaming gorgeousness like Apollyon, and picked up an inhabitant or two. Here was the oldest Nibelungen Lied going on still, with real dragons amid the real elements in this demiurgic workshop. Somehow I fancy that Wagner, when he heard the eternal melodies, must have been lying on his stomach and looking at the eternal animate forces.

Neither would a Wall Street stockbroker indite in the solitude of his chamber the string of sentences that follows. Mr. Mowbray should have denied himself the luxury. Not since we perused the war prose of Mr. Hales have we drawn so near to the purple:

> He is a delightful megatherium of an extinct school, and his corrective bellowings, muffled by distance, afforded me much amusement in my solitude.
>
> We had caught the old orb unawares in a positive dithyramb, and as I watched the choric rythmus in the trees, flashing and leaping amid the gnarled branches that took on grotesque involutions, in one blessed instant I felt sure that there were satyrs and fauns, wet with the cool dew, cavorting in Attic exuberance under the trees.
>
> The white flesh of the mænad birches flashed, marble-like, behind the solid junipers.
>
> The air was like children's kisses, and as sweetly cogent as a mother's prayer is to an infant that does not understand one word of it.

These passages show the pit-falls that yawn for the writer who is not able to control his desire to glitter. The result is that the reader in his simmer of protest against the manner of the writing is apt to disregard the matter. And Mr. Mowbray's matter is good—very good. The scheme of the book is simple. He imagines a keen-witted, overstrained

Digitized by Google

New York stockbroker (we are unable to regard the conception of the book as anything else than a literary tour de force), who, in the opening chapter, suddenly discovers that the strain of living has become too much for him. His doctor, the "delightful megatherium" of the story, gives him six months of life, unless he will consent to retire into the wilderness and live there a year, divorced from every interest and detail of his past life. He consents (he is a widower), snatches his little boy from school, and migrates to a weather-beaten hut in the woods one hundred miles from Wall Street. There they live for a year. The narrative is never dull, and it is never quite real. Thoreau's name wanders through the pages, suggesting on each occasion the inevitable comparison between the work of the author of Walden and the work of the author of A Journey to Nature. Thoreau wrote from an irresistible desire to express his brooding thoughts and inmost feelings. Mr. Mowbray because—oh! there are twenty reasons why moderns write. The result is that the one book is literature, the other a brilliant piece of literary work. We will conclude by giving two examples. They are both character-sketches of men the authors met in their retreats. Here is Mr. Mowbray's picture of Gabe Hotchkiss:

> Gabe Hotchkiss was a forehanded veteran who had developed along "the cool sequestered vale of life" until it was hard to distinguish him from the materials he had worked with. He wore the aspect of a sinewy old trunk, grey and gnarled, whose roots in the ground have outspread the branches in the air. I was afraid his thrift was earthy. I could not quite make out if that stoop in his shoulders was humility or gravitation. His hair grew bushy and grey all over his head and down his jaws to a sort of mossy stalactite on his chin (I was getting bald at forty-four). He never was sick a day in his life after he teethed, barring three days that he was laid up that year of the Chicago fire by Squire Losee's bull that hooked him under the rib and threw him over a stone fence. He had risen and set regularly as the sun for sixty-five years, and there was no physical intimation that he would not continue to rise and set for sixty-five more. He was as punctual as the gas-collector, or the seven-year locust, and he could cut and pile a cord of wood without stopping to take heed or to take breath, and then walk to town for his supplies when he wanted to save his horses.

And here is Thoreau's picture of the "old brown-coated man" from A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers:

> I can just remember an old brown-coated man, who was the Walton of this stream, who had come over from Newcastle, England, with his son—the latter a stout and hearty man, who had lifted an anchor in his day. A straight old man he was, who took his way in silence through the meadows, having passed the period of communication with his fellows; his old experienced coat hanging long and straight and brown as the yellow-pine bark, glittering with so much smothered sunlight, if you stood near enough—no work of art, but naturalised at length. I often discovered him unexpectedly amid the pads, and the grey willows when he moved, fishing in some old country method—for youth and age then went a-fishing together—full of incommunicable thoughts, perchance about his own Tyne and Northumberland. He was always to be seen in serene afternoons haunting the river, and almost rustling with the sedge; so many sunny hours in an old man's life, entrapping silly fish, almost grown to be the sun's familiar; what need had he of hat or raiment any, having served out his time, and seen through such thin disguises? I have seen how his coeval fates rewarded him with the yellow perch, and yet I thought his luck was not in proportion to his years; and I have seen when, with slow steps and weighed down with aged thoughts, he disappeared with his fish under his low-roofed house on the skirts of the village. I think nobody else saw him; nobody else remembers him now, for he soon after died, and migrated to new-Tyne streams. His fishing was not a sport, not solely a means of subsistence, but a sort of solemn sacrament and withdrawal from the world, just as the aged read their Bibles.

You can choose between them.

Things Seen.

Ordinaire.

The woman sat with her back to the wall in the little French restaurant near Piccadilly, and the man faced her on the opposite side of the table. They were French: they were obviously man and wife; and they had the appearance of being modestly prosperous. Yet there must have been some need of small economies, for, with the meal that was just ended, they had divided between them a half bottle of ordinaire at sixpence. The woman's glass was empty, the man's half full: and so they sat, not ready to go yet, having no apparent reason for staying. They did not talk: they seemed to be considerably bored. The waiting at the little restaurant is as bad as the food is good: two men cannot do the work of five, however willing they may be. I was patiently expecting the arrival of my fish, and, for lack of a better occupation, I watched these two who interested one another so little. Chained to the leg of the table on the right of the man was a singularly naked black and tan toy terrier. It had been quiet to begin with, but at last it became querulous and attracted my attention. Looking at the woman again I observed a curious change in her expression; it appeared that she had somehow recovered her interest in life. She said something to the man, who promptly bent down and patted the dog, as if to quiet it. She instantly took his glass, emptied the contents into her own, and drank the wine at a gulp. When the man looked up again she was leaning back against the wall, listless, absent-minded, utterly bored.

The Rook.

He was marching, when I first noticed him on the lawn, in that sedate, grenadier-like sentry-go which is the gait of his species. In the satisfaction of his appetite, which appeared to be considerable, this rook came on one of those overgrown, half-bleached worms the recent rain had stirred. The rook pulled up a monstrous length of worm which was drawn taut from the ground as his own head went back in a series of short jerks. He laid it down—as much of it as he had pulled out of the earth—and put his foot on it to keep it safe while he considered what he would do. A worm that size could hardly be fit for food!

The rook examined his capture carefully, holding it in one foot, his head slanted, his whole attitude showing his keen interest. "Well, I'm ——," he said at length. "That's a worm and a half," he added, betraying his nationality by the idiom. Remember, I am not putting a single word into this bird's beak he did not actually say—say as plainly as a dumb man speaks to those who understand his medium.

At that moment a sheep, strolling aimlessly past, gave out sudden and sharp its sole exclamation. The rook sprang round, letting go the worm. Seeing nothing but the sheep he growled some uncomplimentary remarks on the animal itself, the particular breed to which it belonged, and sheep generally. Then he returned to his worm. It was gone. (It must have slipped back into its burrow.) He lifted one foot, then another, fearing he might have been standing on it inadvertently. He peered closely at the ground, turned irritably and took a few steps, stopped, muttered, "Well, of all the ——!" He renewed his search. It was useless.

A couple of starlings hard by jeered at him. There was the solution of the mystery. In a perfect fury he began his version of the old, old complaint: "Nice thing, I can't leave a worm out of my foot, not for one moment, but you rascals ——," and so on. He blamed everything and everyone but himself. The sheep had begun to graze, and did not care. The starlings just laughed. He might as well have saved his breath and better not have lost his temper. Whereby there seems to hang a moral. But that is neither here nor there.

Digitized by Google

The Novel—What Will it Become?

Among those who regarded music rather as a mathematical exercise than as an eternal art there used to be a favourite topic for discussion. It was asked whether it would ever be possible to exhaust all the combinations of notes which produce chords and melodies. I remember, some years ago, a pamphlet appeared claiming that already all the possible permutations and combinations had been utilised, and inferring from this somewhat disheartening fact that never more would a new piece of music be written. It was declared that however fertile the brain of the future composer might be, he could only string together phrases which already had done service. Interesting, indeed, and even charming might his themes be, but novelty and originality were for ever banished to the land of the unattainable.

The discussion may be referred to the realm of prose-fiction, tracing the development of the modern novel from the simplest origins—the folk-tales, for example, of the savage tribes, the metrical stories of Cædmon—down to the higher development under Boccaccio and Matteo Bandello. Ultimately we arrive at Richardson and Fielding—and what then? Must we declare that thereafter the process of development was checked, that for a hundred years prose fiction simply revolved round a stationary axis? Indeed, there is some ground for so rough an assumption, for believing that all the possible combinations of love and hatred, ambition and despair, loss and gain, triumph and conquest, good and ill, have all been exhausted. Not easy is it to discover a hero who has not already strutted across a worthier stage, or a heroine whose course of true love has not been unsmoothed by the same storms of stress and fate. The whole course of modern fiction-writing seems to be a process of refurbishing the material of the old masters. Even our ordinary canon of criticism bears testimony to the same suspicion. We at once refer the new romanticist to Sir Walter; to the disadvantage of the new-comer we point the comparison. We refer the ethical novelist, who possibly is the true novelist after all, to George Eliot, only to show him that his psychology is less penetrating, his analysis less severe, his ethics less subtly devised, his incidents less characteristically marshalled, his climax less convincing. We show the legion followers of Meredith that they halt as far behind their master as do the fewer disciples of Thackeray. We smile at the new Dickens, because so obviously he lacks Dickens's humour, and we sigh that the parlour-maid can find neither friend nor comforter to touch her heart as did Mrs. Henry Wood. The whole tendency of such criticism is towards the bland assertion that the writing of fiction has touched its zenith; there is naught left but the nadir of exhaustion, to which woful spot we are rapidly approaching.

So far as regards the material. But what of the form? Here, too, it would appear that under the sun of Art there is nothing new. The arbitrary division into chapters carries with it such an arrangement of plot-development and character-development that the expert reader, by glancing down chapter-heads, can discover the genius of the story with an unerring intuition. The very chapter-heads have become conventional. Thackeray and Meredith may enlarge them into epigrammatic sentences; the lady novelist may pepper-box her pages with four-line verse of an affecting type, sometimes, as in Miss Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler's case, writing her own; other novelists, as Mr. Kipling, may hide their original chapter-head light under the bushel of assumed quotation; but in all cases the variance from the type is but small. The tradition of method holds all in its thrall, and in chapter-heads, as in the treatment of scenery, character, humour and pathos there is an orthodoxy as rigid as all other orthodoxy.

The question assumes, therefore, a two-fold aspect. We may ask, Is there any new material which the novelist-genius of the immediate future will bring before us? just as we may almost despairingly ask, Is there a new form into which he will put his novel material? The questions give rise to interesting conjectures. What if something absolutely fresh came suddenly before us—something as bewilderingly new as was Sir Charles Grandison to his generation! It will not be in vain if I attempt to prophesy the direction in which the long-looked-for genius will set to work, not merely in respect to form, but in respect to matter.

Probably one of the characteristic features of the new novel will be the relegation of the element of sex love to a subsidiary place. It may be that current fiction has rather exaggerated the importance of the love of a man for a maid. It is open to doubt if, in most lives, love is the be-all and end-all of existence, just as we may doubt if in any considerable proportion of lives the baser sex problem, as fashioned by a certain class of novelists, has any influence at all. The instances where love is tragic in its incidence, where self-examination and introspection are called upon to decide subtle differences between true and false love, are probably very rare. Nor can it be said of the life we lead that mere marriage is the triumphal point of our work, the final stage of our life's interest. Possibly, therefore, the new genius will not ruin nations, scatter empires into dust, and cry havoc generally, merely to let loose the bridesmaids in the last chapter. As it stands now, love is the thread of interest upon which we string the beads of life, some dark, some glittering; surely the new genius will discover that life itself is the thread and love only one, though perhaps the most beautiful, of the beads.

Again, there is the arbitrary convention, borrowed from the stage, whereby mankind is boldly differentiated into good and bad, with goodness as ultimately the best policy. Fiction is steeped in cheap utilitarian ethics. What daring fictionist could ever devise a life of goodness ending in a crucifixion? Yet life has, doubtless, crucifixions without number, but the canon of convention yearns so for triumphant goodness that we dare not let the good be finally thwarted, as, alack! so often it seems to be. And even the greater novelists are beset by the fallacy that life is a Day of Judgment separating the sheep from the goats. How rarely do we find the psychology, so evident in humanity itself, which manifests the vein of faultiness running through the fine marble of nobility of character! Even more rarely do we see the analysis of mixed motives, good and ill, for deeds which, as deeds, demand our commendation. The public do not want such deep investigation, is the ordinary reply; to which it may be rejoined, that it is for the genius to teach the public what its wants should be.

I am not confusing the novel of plot and the novel of character when I urge that we are now suffering from the hunger for climax. Denouement is the demon which sits on the pinnacle of the art of fiction. The tendency has manifested itself that without a culminating climax a novel had better not be written. The parent of this bastard theory is the unhappy publishers' reader, with his formulæ and his two-foot rule. The genius will find life altogether interesting, and not merely centre his interest in one thunder-clap of a climax. Mr. Silas Hocking, in giving counsel to young novelists, advised them to keep the grand climax as far back as possible. It would be excellent advice to the genius—if he followed it logically and kept the conventional climax out of his work altogether. For he who lives knows well the myriad climaxes of his little days. The "one divine event" is the Now.

Charles Dickens eschewed the reading of fiction, for he felt so keenly the influence of other writers that he feared the loss of individuality. Hence the new genius may be said to be a man without a master. If it were possible, somewhat after the fashion of the famous Platner experiment, well-known to students of Hamilton's Metaphysics, to keep the genius apart from all knowledge of the workmanship of others, while giving him a full knowledge of the facts of life, what a masterpiece we might expect! Thus might we find a greater Charlotte Brontë and a Jane Eyre even more pulsing with fresh and vigorous life, aflame with the fire from the altar of knowledge. Unfortunately it is in the other direction that we have drifted, and even a school of fiction has been suggested with class-books and professors, as stultifying to real art as the serial itself.

Digitized by Google

There have been a few revolutionaries in the past. They have paid the price of their daring. Some have revolted against the form merely, the form which is in danger of becoming archaic. Sometimes the small revolt has brought a measure of success; even a volume of pseudo love-letters has attracted, because it has broken the chapter-head tradition, if for no intrinsic merit of its own. But the genius will not merely be a revolutionary. He will be a leader; the democracy of intellect will at length follow him, and the sentries at the gate of the public mind—the publishers' readers—will be passed in their sleep, for the sand of materialistic considerations lies already heavily upon their eyes. The genius may be wounded and heartsore when he arrives at the citadel—but he will arrive.

J. G. L.

Mr. "How To" Again.

EVEN with the help of the author's Preface, we do not clearly see for whom this addition to the "How To" series is written. We are told that "it is intended for the use of those who, by reason of defective educational advantages, or because they lack the sense of order and thought-sequence, feel an inability to cope with all that is implied in the writing of an essay." Why cope? Is essay-writing a kind of sacred duty, or badge of manhood, which the young Englishman should blush to neglect? We sometimes think it is regarded in that Spartan light. As a mere instrument of education essay-writing has its place and purpose, and an essay on an unforeseen subject in Government examinations is a powerful emetic by which to examine the contents of a candidate's mind. The Essay Society, too, cannot be condemned as a useless institution. These pages may help young men and maidens to shine in some winter evening firmament.

The fact remains that the average mind, "of defective educational advantages," or "lacking the sense of thought-sequence," is incapable for all time of producing an essay that is worth reading. There is, therefore, an amusing unreality about an attempt to aid it in this vaulting ambition. The author of How to Write an Essay (Grant Richards) betrays here and there his perfect cognisance of this fact. His patience is not more conspicuous than his lack of enthusiasm. How does one teach essay-writing? We suppose that to a practised writer any exposition of the art must seem absurdly overwrought. The advice tendered to the novice will appal the expert. Yet how teach save by analyses, formal divisions, rules, sections, and sub-sections? You must bid water divide as by a Red Sea miracle that the unchosen people may pursue the chosen. Mr. "How To" has done his best, and one can even congratulate him on his results in a rather forlorn business.

He begins with "The Psychology of an Essay." We suppose there is such a thing as the psychology of an essay, though it is rather terrible to be told so. The first thing to be noted under this heading is "The point of view."

> As a thorough grasp of this matter is of some importance, we will run the risk of unpleasing reiteration by taking two examples—
>
> 1. My Impressions at Napoleon's Tomb.
> 2. The Destiny of Canada in Relation to the United States.
>
> In the first case the course of procedure is perfectly obvious. I am not to write an essay on Napoleon's campaigns or his work in France, not even specifically on his character, but I am to look at the man and his history in the light of a common destiny—i.e., I begin with death, and go back in retrospect over the life. Moreover, the impressions are to be personal, for this is a personal essay. I am not debarred from quoting Heine or any other writer, but primarily the impressions must be my own, and the language should have every evidence of spontaneity and deep feeling.

This makes us wish to go for a walk. But, no, we will love instruction, and apply our hearts unto wisdom. There are three elements in an essay:

1. The Materials: Facts and Ideas.
2. The Process of Building: How to Make a Plan.
3. The Finished Work: Beauty and Strength.

It is necessary to have materials. "Let your theme be 'Design in Nature'; it is evident that you must obtain knowledge of facts from some source or other." It is, indeed; and it is a comfort in this emergency to know that "every public library has its collection of reference books." The present writer, however, would not consider a three years' subsidy and a bed-sitting-room in the British Museum an adequate preparation for writing a paper on "Design in Nature," especially as it is added: "See that you get all the facts."

Given the facts, what about "ideas"? Here (in Subsection 2 of Part II.) we strike on one of those sunken rocks of truth over which the novice may be trusted to sail his cockboat with easy unconsciousness. "The presence or absence of ideas depends, of course, on the nature and capacity of a man's brain." It is here that Mr. "How To" and his publisher exchange their first wink. Our impression is that it is the absence of ideas that gives young essayists their courage. Doubtless it is his knowledge of this that emboldens Mr. "How To" to offer them tasks which we hope he would never be so unfeeling as to offer to ourselves. Take the following:—"Optimism or Pessimism: Which has the Deeper Root in Human Nature?" From such inquiries may heaven preserve us. We should be plunged into life-long thought by the enquiry: "Pepper or Mustard: Which would you Miss Most?" But "if you are writing on Enthusiasm . . ." Now, fancy that. Is not such casualness the cream of flattery? You might be writing on Enthusiasm; you are probably not even feeling it, still you might be writing on Enthusiasm—in the intervals, say, of "writing down as many questions as you can about each of the following subjects":

1. The Prejudice of Historians.
4. Total Abstinence.
9. The Mystery of Sleep.
12. The Use of Keeping Pets.
13. Was Thackeray a Snob?
18. Spiritualism.
20. Pompeii.
23. Electrocution.

We pass by Mr. "How To's" intricate disquisitions on "The Introduction of Contrast," "The Laws of Association," "Plan-Formation," "Enforcement, or Application," "Introduction and Transition," &c.—they are rather too advanced for us. Moreover, his pleasing remark that the essays in the ACADEMY and other papers "may well make the youthful scribe wonder whether he will ever pen such productions himself," decides us to be ourselves. We feel that, however much we tried we should never produce those essays on "Religion and Architecture," "Impressions of Great Men derived from the Comic Papers," "The Advantage of Small Stature," "Cologne Cathedral," "Can We be Really Unprejudiced?" "Flying Machines," and "Original Sin," which must be child's-play to those who follow the instructions conveyed in these so ingenious pages.

Digitized by Google

Correspondence.

"Insanity in Literature."

SIR,—May the present writer, speaking, as you are aware, with some authority, support Mr. Bennett's assertion that the French pornographic writers work chiefly for the home market? French men of letters are undoubtedly privileged beyond those of any other nation in the possession of a far more extensive export sale; but still, in the main, writers and publishers rely upon and appeal to their countrymen.

I can heartily sympathise with Miss Lynch's feelings of disgust with and horror at the literature she attacks—a literature of which she has not cited the most abominable examples. At the same time I venture to think that the matter is far less important than she fancies. The naturalistic school was in the heyday of its expansion when, some twenty years ago, I was entering manhood. Then, as now, France was to me a second motherland, only less dear to me than my own. I can recall my feelings of disgusted dismay. It seemed to me at the time that with such a literature the whole country must needs be pitching head foremost into a slough of rottenness. I was full of the darkest forebodings for the land and the people I loved. Have they been realised? Not in the slightest. Has there been diminution in the intellectual or in the moral vigour of the French people? In every department of human activity they easily hold their own place in the first rank, and, as a matter of fact, the genius of France has within the last twenty years won distinction in fields from which, formerly at least, it seemed excluded by the temperament of the race. It is quite true that, as compared with certain periods of the past, the present is in France one of stagnation, of second-rate achievement. But this is the case everywhere, and to a far greater extent, it may fairly be argued, in England and in Germany than in France. The world at large is suffering from an absence of genius, as, indeed, was the case 120 years ago, when, save in Germany, mediocrity seemed to reign supreme. And yet that period of stagnation was to be followed by an outburst of genius as wonderful as any recorded in history. In any case, no unprejudiced and capable observer of France and the French race would assert that either is decadent.

The fact is, that I, when young, failed to remember, as Miss Lynch, being young, fails to remember, that the phenomenon which seemed to me then, as it seems to her now, of such sinister import, is no new thing. For the last 600 years, at least, French literature has shown the same characteristics. From the writers of the fabliaux and Jean de Meung, through Villon, and Rabelais, and Lafontaine, and Voltaire and Diderot, how many of France's greatest writers are stamped with the same mark! The last French story-teller of genius, Maupassant, exhibits the ancestral traits as clearly as any of his great predecessors. Let us recall, too, that, save Aretino, every "classic of the obscene" is French, and that the most famous, or infamous, examples of sexual psycho-pathology are French likewise, and we shall cease to attach too much importance to a phenomenon of such old standing.

But, it may be said, "The very facts you cite prove how pernicious is the tendency you make light of." I do not think so. A candid Frenchman, if told that France has produced more monsters than, say England, would admit the fact; she has also, he would rejoin, produced a far larger number of saints. The French genius, he might urge, is logical and thoroughgoing; in evil as in good it likes to reach the end of the tether, and it is little wonder that the race which has produced a Jeanne d'Arc, a Vincent de Paule, a De Brébœuf, a Palissy, or a Millet (to cite examples of most diverse energy, yet having this in common, that all pushed matters to an extreme), should likewise produce a Gilles de Rais or a joli Marquis.

I am aware that to some minds what I have said may appear an apology for immoral literature: it is simply a plea not to attack immoral literature upon a badly chosen ground. The assertion that license in literature entails national decadence is almost a commonplace, but it is a commonplace for which there is no justification in history. There is nothing so harmful in ethics as invalid sanctions; you think the barrier is of iron, and capable of resisting the strongest assault; it proves to be papier-mâché, and to yield at the first push.

I would thus urge that the prominence of pornography in French literature of the day is neither significant nor, in reality, disquieting, and that the most effectual remedy, so long as certain limits are not passed, is silence.—I am, &c.,

OUTSIDER.

Crabbe.

SIR,—The following from Crabbe's The Library (Hatchard, London, 1807,) may help to send modern readers to the recent editions of Crabbe's works:

> But what strange Art, what Magic can dispose
> The troubled Mind to change its native Woes?
> Or lead us willing from ourselves, to see
> Others more wretched, more undone than we?
> This, Books can do; . . . nor this alone; they give
> New Views to Life, and teach us how to live;
> They sooth the griev'd, the stubborn they chastise,
> Fools they admonish, and confirm the wise:
> Their Aid, they yield to all; they never shun
> The Man of Sorrow, nor the Wretch undone:
> Unlike the hard, the selfish, and the proud,
> They fly not sullen, from the suppliant Crowd;
> Nor tell to various People various Things,
> But shew to Subjects, what they shew to Kings.

—I am, &c.,

J. EDWARDS JONES.

"Wynton," Burrell-road, Ipswich.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 104 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the most interesting account of an incident seen during a holiday this summer. We award the prize to Miss Violet W. Flashman, Aloa Villa, Dunoon, N.B., for the following:

AT A FARMHOUSE.

While we were at tea a knock was heard at the door, and as his wife rose to open it, the farmer prepared himself for the visitor by drawing off the scarlet nightcap he wore and dropping it behind his chair.

"Jock," the shepherd from the "hull," was ushered in, protesting that he "wadna wait," and that "he had just ca'd in tae see hoo a' wis wi' us in the bygaun."

Nevertheless, he sat down to a large plate of boiled ham, talking with his host the while about sheep and "beasts," a conversation quite unintelligible to me.

As talk became thinner, the farmer leaning down, absently picked up his nightcap and replaced it on his head. Then he asked, "An' hoo's a' wi' Macneil, the shepherd's lad?"

"Man, he's a sair hertbreak tae his folks," answered "Jock." "Fine they want him tae stick by his books, but aye when the laddie hears the bleatin' o' the sheep, he's up an' awa' tae meet them. He's a born shepherd the lad, an' they'd best lat him bide whaur his hert is."

There was a silence, which the mistress broke, saying, "Tak' up a bit mair ham, Jock."

"Na thenk ye," he answered, rising, "I've dune oncommon"; and bidding us "Gude nicht," he departed.

Looking out at the bonnie Scotch hills, and the sunset, and still thinking of the shepherd laddie, I murmured,

> "Books! 'tis a dull, unendless strife!
> Come hear the woodland linnet," etc.

Other replies were:

THE DEAD GOAT.

We had gone for a picnic to a place called End der Welt (End of the World). More venturesome than the others, I attempted to scale the precipitous side of the mountain which formed the cul-de-sac, and gave so appropriate a name to the rocky basin at the head of the valley. Toiling over the loose stones on the lower slope I came suddenly upon an old man, sitting like a hermit in front of a narrow cave. At his feet lay a dead goat. He fixed his sad eyes upon me and pointed to the top of the cavern. Then I saw what had happened. The poor animal had missed its footing there, and met a terrible end before the opening. The old man questioned me in his Swiss patois: Where was I going? What was I doing? I explained as best I could. He shook his head, muttered something I could not understand, and pointed to the dead goat. He then relapsed into silence, brooding, maybe, over the animal's fate. I left him and continued my way, advancing now more warily. Half-an-hour afterwards I saw far below the figure of a man, with a strange burden on his back, hurrying over the stones. At that moment I slipped a little, but recovered my footing. Then only did I realise the meaning of the old man's gesture. With shaken nerves I slowly commenced the descent. [E. H. H., London.]

Digitized by Google

The Bull.

As we saw it from the top of the cliff it was a patch of dull red brown, round which shot white specks of sea-gulls that seemed afraid to settle. Below, in the little rock-bound bay, it was the corpse of a young bull, the flotsam and jetsam of a Transatlantic cattle ship. The salt water had kept it fresh enough to allow of approach from the windward, but the gasses of putrefaction had begun to bloat the body from within. The limbs were stiffened in the attitude of the last effort, and, with the protruding tongue, told of the last maniacal desire to live. It was curious how, as the beast washed up and down on the rubble, half covered with water, its legs seemed to stretch and bend, and its head to nod grotesquely, in a kind of mockery of the simpering of the June sea and the grave repose of the cliffs. A Hugo might have rhapsodised over it: a Sterne grown whimsical and sentimental: but a coastguardsman, mindful of Board of Trade regulations, buried it the same evening where it lay, in the tiny cove—hopeless in storm for crew, but yielding some chance of salvage—to which the Cornish wreckers once lured their quarry.

[F. F. M., London.]

The Eisteddfod.

It was the closing incident of the last day of the Eisteddfod. The Male Voice Party Competition was just over, and the vast audience relaxed from the tension at which they had listened and criticised. The singing had been very close, so close, indeed, that the winner scored by only one point, and the adjudicators were long in coming to an agreement. Signs of impatience began to show themselves, and cries of "Mabon" brought that energetic and good-humoured worthy to the front. In answer to the demands that rose from all sides, he broke into an old Welsh tune, and at the second line was joined by the audience. Gradually the melody swelled louder and louder as belated voices took up the strain, and before the second verse was ended it pealed from 20,000 throats.

It was a sight to thrill one. That vast assembly on its feet, losing sight of itself and of all things as it flung its soul into the songs of its own land, in its own language. Songs that were in its blood. Something sprang into my throat and choked me. The sea of intense faces were blurred into a vague mist; the next moment Mabon gave the signal for silence.

The adjudicators were ready, and as he yielded his place to them, he remarked, with a bland smile of self-complacency: "The adjudicators say that my choir is the best." Over the rapt, exalted faces a smile flashed. That deepened into a chuckle, and with a hearty roar the great Unity resolved itself once more into its 20,000 factors, and, stretching its multitudinous limbs, settled down comfortably to the important business of listening to and of criticising the adjudication.

[J. P., London.]

The Ferry Boat.

Standing on the outer pier of Scarborough harbour towards evening, when the reflection of a golden sunset lay caressingly upon ship and sail and sailor alike, I saw the old ferry-boat man embark fourteen passengers from the adjacent rude stone steps for the point of the pier opposite, seventy yards or so away. (At Scarborough they are superstitious, and the piers form almost a horse-shoe.) The sea was lumpy, and the old ferryman seemed to have some difficulty in controlling the boat. A stalwart girl near me, whose age might be anything from eighteen to four-and-twenty, and who was without hat and with bared, sunburnt arms, busily knitting a fisherman's guernsey, shouted to the old man: "Now, Grand'y, buck up!" He did not lift his eyes, apparently recognising the voice, but he answered, slowly and, to me, hardly audibly: "Nay, lass, me chest's bad." The girl quickly put her work into the big pocket of her blue apron, and scrambled fearlessly down the steps. Sternly bidding the old fellow take a seat among his passengers, she took the oars, and, pulling straight and strong, the boat and its fourteen-penny cargo were soon cunningly across at the spot desired. [C. C., London.]

The Blessing.

It was the eve of the fishers' departure, and the old men, the women, and the children, sole inhabitants of the village during the fishing season, were gathered in groups on the quay. The last farewells had been said, and the men had joined their boats. In the bow of a vessel at the head of the fleet stood a white-haired priest, with arms outstretched. The lambent rays of the sun fell in floods of mellow light about his head, and cast a long cruciform shadow towards the shore. All heads were bowed as the priest lifted up his voice in prayer: "O Thou who of old didst fill the fishers' nets, bless the work of our hands. . . . When the heavens are black with thunder, and the winds and waters rage against us, stretch forth Thy hand and soothe the troubled seas, and deliver Thy servants in the hour of their distress. . . ." There was a pause, the silence unbroken but for the sonorous voice of the sea with its untiring surge and roll.

Then sails were hoisted, anchors weighed, and, shaking themselves like birds before a flight, the vessels glided out of the harbour; and soon, very soon, the eyes of those left on shore were straining after a few black points marked off against the glittering band of light which divides the sea from the sky. And far away in the west the sun dropped beneath the waves, and the sea rippled on, heedlessly, rhythmically. [J. R., London.]

Aboard the State Express.

It happened across the herring-pond. The sun had just arisen, and the weary passengers aboard the famous State Express were lounging about in various stages of déshabille—some smoking and chatting, others trying in vain to woo that gentle sleep which is ever a rarity on a Trans-American railway-train.

Suddenly our speed slackened until our pace did not exceed six English miles per hour. I rose, yawned, stretched myself, and, walking across the corridor to the steps, looked out. Two farm horses had strayed on to the track, and the engine-driver, with the able assistance of some juvenile passengers, was vainly endeavouring to "chivvy" them from the line. In vain the passengers shouted, the syren hooted, and the small boys threw pebbles. Serenely, and apparently unconscious of the interest they evoked, the equine vagabonds trotted on, careful only to keep a few yards in front of the engine.

All this time many of the passengers were gathering flowers along the track, chasing butterflies and otherwise disporting themselves, pleased at the break in the monotony of that otherwise dreary journey. For eighteen miles we chased those wayward animals until at length a farm-steading appeared, and the frisky creatures neighed farewell and galloped up to the home pasture.

The train stopped, and for half an hour these enterprising, "lick-creation" Yankees on board the record-breaking State Express swore at, discussed, and argued with the owner of the farm. Yet when we mentioned it to them, they said: "Guess yew easy-going, slow-coach Britishers cyant lick the State Express, nohow."

[R. C., Alloa.]

The Guide.

Tramping about delightful Jersey, I found myself one day following two other travellers, who, constantly referring to a map, appeared to be in doubt about their road—as was I. Map-roads are so strikingly alike. My companion tramps were clearly on the look-out for guidance. Soon, a small, old countryman approached, carrying a bundle and a walking-staff. On meeting my fellow-travellers, one stepped forward, saying: "Will you kindly direct us to the Castle of Mount Orgeuil?" The old man stopped, hesitated, and said: "One moment, Sir." Composedly placing his bundle and staff upon the ground, he fumbled in a baggy pocket, and produced what looked like a short, thick telescope. With a sudden dexterous movement he lengthened it a foot, sedately applied the taper end to his ear, extended the wider end invitingly towards his questioner, and said: "Now, Sir." The unexpected preliminary to conversation, and the sudden manipulation of the ear-trumpet was irresistibly amusing, and it was with laughing embarrassment that the question was repeated into the instrument. The old man, at great length, and in Frenchified English, gave careful and exhaustive directions, which were gratefully acknowledged. He then complacently picked up his bundle and staff, and with a benignant salutation resumed his journey. We last saw him pointing with his staff, and bowing like a chamberlain; and we could not but admire the kindly, courteous, old-world manner of our aged mentor, which contrasted so markedly with that of his English bucolic compeers.

[E. H. H., Bristol.]

Other replies received from the following:—W. H. G., Catford; Sigma, Manchester; F. B. D., Torquay; C. C., London; D. T., London; E. M. Z. C., Port Glasgow; G. M. W., Hull; A. F. H., Dalkeith; E. L., Didsbury; P. C., Sydenham; T. S. W., Hanley; K. M. P., Bangor; S. W. P., Liverpool; E. M. S., London; R. W. R., Clapham.

Competition No. 105 (New Series).

We offer a prize of One Guinea for the best suggestion for the plot of a short magazine story. Replies must not exceed 200 words in length.

Rules.

Answers, addressed, "Literary Competition, The Academy, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, September 25. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

Digitized by Google

NOTICE.—TO DRAMATIC AUTHORS.

110, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

MR. STANHOPE SPRIGG (one time Editor of the Windsor Magazine, late of the Daily Mail and Daily Express Literary staffs) begs to announce that he has now opened a branch for Dramatic Authors at his GENERAL LITERARY AGENCY at the above address. For that purpose he has engaged the services of a well-known Dramatic Critic of one of the best London morning daily newspapers as Editor and Reader, and this expert will read and prepare written reports on all the plays submitted—which will be placed in due course before suitable managers in England and America. Communications invited from Dramatic Authors interested. The usual terms

YOUNG LADY, well educated, requires post as SECRETARY. Good shorthand and type-writing. French. Indexing—special system for indexing correspondence.—Address E. P., 22, Girdlers Road, West Kensington.

WILFRID M. VOYNICH.

FIFTH LIST OF BOOKS.

Royal 8vo, pp. 515-601, and Plates LXII.-LXXII.

Principal Contents: BIBLES, ITALIAN, FRENCH, SPANISH, ENGLISH and CLASSICAL LITERATURE, EARLY PRINTED BOOKS, &c.—Post free, 2s. 6d.

Catalogue No. I. out of print. Catalogues II., III., and IV., 2s. 6d., may be had, post free, on application at 1, SOHO SQUARE, W.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
Importers of Foreign Books,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden; and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.
CATALOGUES post free on application.

BAEDEKER'S & BADDELEY'S TOURISTS' GUIDE BOOKS.
New fully detailed CATALOGUE sent post free on application.
DULAU & Co., 37, Soho Square, London, W.

CATALOGUE, 1901-1902.
PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS, comprising Books in all departments of Literature, perfectly NEW IN CONDITION and greatly REDUCED IN PRICE.
WILLIAM GLAISHER,
Remainder and Discount Bookseller,
265, High Holborn, London.
We also issue a useful Catalogue of Popular Current Literature at Discount Prices, and a Catalogue of French Literature.

BOOKSELLERS in BIRMINGHAM.—"EDWARD BAKER, John Bright Street, is the best second-hand bookseller in that town."—Editor, Bazaar.

PRACTICAL JOURNALISM.—He buys and pays highest price obtainable for libraries and all sporting books and magazines, and any books with coloured plates by Alken, Cruickshank, Leech, Rowlandson, and others. Rare Books supplied. State wants.—BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP, Birmingham.

BOOKS.—10,000 WANTED. List free. 25s. each offered for Moore's "Alps," 1864; "Hawbuck Grange," 1847. Rare Books Supplied. Catalogues free.—HOLLAND'S Great Book Shop, Birmingham.

TYPE-WRITING.—Authors' MSS., neat, prompt, accurate, 10d. per 1,000 words. Duplicates, Translations, French Correspondence, and Literary or Technical Work.—Mrs. MICHEL, 31, Craven Street, Charing Cross

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references. Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss MESSER, 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

SWINEY LECTURES on GEOLOGY. Under the Direction of the Trustees of the British Museum.

A COURSE of TWELVE LECTURES on the "GEOLOGICAL EVIDENCES OF FORMER GEOGRAPHICAL CONDITIONS" will be delivered by JOHN S. FLETT, M.A., D.Sc., F.R.S.E., in the Lecture Theatre of the Victoria and Albert Museum, South Kensington (by permission of the Board of Education), on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, at 5 p.m., beginning Monday, October 7th, and ending Friday, November 1st. Each Lecture will be illustrated by means of Lantern Slides and Lime Light. Admission to the Course, Free.

By order of the Trustees,
E. RAY LANKESTER, Director.
British Museum (Natural History),
Cromwell Road, London, S.W.

FOR SALE.—An interesting collection of ANTIQUITIES from the estate of Bakony Sz. Laszloer, Archbishop Stefan Mihalydi. This collection occupies five large glass cases, amongst them two with objects of the Stone period; the others contain Roman and Hungarian Antiquities, amongst them the incomparable Roman Eternal lamp, made of bronze, Celtic sword, helmet, arms, numerous interesting Bibles, Roman glass and earthenware, &c., coins.—The collection can be seen until the end of this year, at the Manager of the Estate, ANTON FITTINGER, Bakony Szt. Laszlo, Hungary.

'Twixt Plate and Lip;
OR,
The Common Sense of Eating.
TWELFTH EDITION.

 This little book may be recommended to the general reader as a sound and safe guide to the common sense management of the stomach. The Publishers, at 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, will be pleased to send a free copy to any reader of the Academy. Early application necessary.

London: 46, HOLBORN VIADUCT, E.C.

LEEDS MUSICAL FESTIVAL,
October 9, 10, 11, and 12, 1901.
TICKETS STILL TO BE HAD.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.—New Cantata, "The Blind Girl" (Coleridge-Taylor), Pianoforte Concerto (Brahms), Overture, "Rosamunde" (Schubert).—Mdme. Albani, Mr. Black, Mr. Borwick.

THURSDAY EVENING.—Overture, "Leonora" No. 2 (Beethoven), Scena, "Marfa" (Joachim), Cantata, "A Song of Darkness and Light" (Parry), Prelude, "Romeo and Juliet" (German), Song and Chorus (Chas. Wood). Finale of Act II., "William Tell" (Rossini), Song from "Carmen" (Bizet), Overture, "Cheval de Bronze" (Auber).—Miss Nicholls, Miss Brema, Mr. Coates, Mr. Bispham, Mr. Greene.

FRIDAY EVENING.—Overture, "Les Deux Journées" (Cherubini), Cantata, "Rinaldo" (Brahms), Variations for Orchestra (Elgar), Cantata (Glazounow), Caprice, Piano and Orchestra (Saint-Saëns), Balcony Duet, "Romeo and Juliet" (Gounod), Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini" (Berlioz).—Miss Nicholls, Miss Crossley, Mr. Coates, Mr. Borwick.

SATURDAY EVENING.—Prelude, "Colomba" (Mackenzie), Scena, "Endymion" (Cowen), Banquet Scene (Bruch), Aria (Spontini), Concerto for Violin (Mozart), Overture, "Frieschütz" (Weber), "With Verdure Clad" (Hadyn), Motet (Hadyn), Vocal Duet (Goring Thomas), Choral Ballad (Pearsall), Overture, "Carnival" (Dvorák).—Mdme. Albani, Miss Nicolls, Miss Wood Miss Crossley, Mr. Davies, Mr. Black, Mr Greene, Dr. Joachim.

	s.	d.
First Seats (Evening), Ground Floor	15	0
Second Seats (A) Saturday Evening only	10	6
Second Seats (B) Saturday Evening only	8	0

All Seats are numbered and reserved.

NOTE.—ALL SERIAL AND MORNING TICKETS ARE SOLD.

Applications for Tickets must be accompanied by the amount required.

FRED. R. SPARK, Hon. Sec.
Festival Office: 38, GREAT GEORGE STREET.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!
6s., claret roan, gilt, Illustrated.
LONDON IN THE TIME OF THE DIAMOND JUBILEE
London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.
Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.
Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING, A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.
THE NORFOLK BROADS.
BRECON and its BEACONS.
ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.
THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.
THE ISLE OF WIGHT.
THE WYE VALLEY.
THE SEVERN VALLEY.
BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.
BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.
LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR, LLANFAIRFECHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON.
ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.
CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, & FESTINIOG.
BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and PWLLHELI.
MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, & CHELTENHAM.
LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.
NORWICH, LOWESTOFT, YARMOUTH, and the NORFOLK BROADS.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.
"It very emphatically tops them all."—Daily Graphic.
"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 5s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.
LONDON AND ENVIRONS
By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.
With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.
London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT, & Co. Ltd., The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers.
Paris and New York: BRENTANO'S.

Digitized by Google

The Religious Tract Society's List

NEW ANNUALS.

"AN IDEAL GIFT FOR A GIRL"

The GIRL'S OWN ANNUAL

832 Pages, copiously Illustrated with Tinted and other Pictures. Bound in a pretty cloth cover, price 8s.

The volume contains long stories by Ethel Turner, Leslie Keith Mrs. G. De Horne Vaizey, and Emma Richards, with 25 short stories by other popular writers. But the main feature of the Annual is the variety of Helpful Papers for Sensible Girls, thus making the volume a most acceptable gift-book.

"A MAGNIFICENT GIFT-BOOK."

The BOY'S OWN ANNUAL

Containing 832 Pages of Reading and Pictures, with 12 Coloured or Tinted Plates. The volume contains 62 stories by Dr. Gordon Stables, W. J. Marx, J. Macdonald Oxley, Louis Becke, G. Manville Fenn, David Ker, Paul Blake, and many other writers; and a host of racily-written papers of interest and use to boys. Price 8s., in hands me cloth, gilt.

"A VERITABLE LIBRARY OF GOOD READING."

The SUNDAY AT HOME ANNUAL.

This annual volume contains long stories by Amy Le Feuvre and David Lyall; short stories by Sarah Doudney, A. J. Wade, E. F. Black, Marion King, M. B. Manwell, Mary Angela Dickens, Lena Tyack, and others. The volume also contains a host of interesting items for the Sabbath enjoyment and profit of every member of the Christian household. 812 pages, imperial 8vo, profusely Illustrated with Coloured and other Pictures. 7s. 6d., in handsome cloth, gilt.

THE

LEISURE HOUR ANNUAL

forms a most acceptable gift-book. It contains 1,100 pages, with numerous Illustrations and Coloured Frontispiece. The volume contains the popular Illustrated Story in 40 Chapters by Silas K. Hocking, "The Awakening of Anthony Weir." Seventeen shorter tales by well-known writers are also included in the volume. It is a book to open at any leisure half-hour, with a certainty of finding "something to read." A portable library in itself. Price 7s. 6d., in handsome cloth, gilt.

"We can recommend no better present than this handsome volume."—Spectator.

NEW TALES.

READY THIS DAY.

THE AWAKENING of ANTHONY WEIR.

A New and Powerful Story.

By SILAS K. HOCKING, Author of "God's Outcast," "The Day of Recompense," "The Heart of Man," "In Spite of Fate," &c. With 7 Illustrations by Harold Copping. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

"There is not only the deft weaving of romance and the strong characterisation which we expect from so practised a craftsman, but there is an intense glow of religious purpose."—Christian World.

READY OCTOBER 1st.

HEATHER'S MISTRESS.

By AMY LE FEUVRE, Author of "Probable Sons," "Dwell Deep," "On the Edge of a Moor," &c. With 15 Illustrations by J. S. Compton. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

The GOLD that PERISHETH

By DAVID LYALL, Author of "The Land o' the Leal," &c. With 7 Illustrations by W. H. C. Groome. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

DEB CLAVEL.

By M. E. PALGRAVE, Author of "Driftwood," "How Dick Found his Sea Legs," "Between Two Opinions," &c. With 7 Illustrations by Frank Dadd. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

LADY DYE'S REPARATION

By SARAH DOUDNEY, Author of "Janet Darney's Story." With 4 Illustrations by Percy Tarrant. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

Published by the RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, London.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S LIST.

AN IMPORTANT NEW ART BOOK.

OLD DUTCH TOWNS and VILLAGES of the ZUIDERZEE. By W. J. TUIN and J. G. VELDHEER. Profusely Illustrated by J. G. VELDHEER and W. O. J. NIEUWENKAMP. With Decorated Initials and many Woodcuts. Cloth, 21s.

NEW SIX-SHILLING BOOKS.

1. A JILT'S JOURNAL. By "Rita," Author of "Vanity," "The Confessions of a Court Modiste," (Unwin's Green Cloth Library.)
"I feel it is the best book I have ever written."
Extract from a letter from the Author.
2. DEATH the SHOWMAN. By John FRASER.
3. A DOUBLE CHOICE. By James BAKER, Author of "The Cardinal's Page," &c.
4. SOULS of PASSAGE. By Amelia E. BARR.
5. BY ROCK and POOL. By Louis BECKE.
6. WHY NOT, SWEETHEART? By JULIA W. HENSHAW (JULIAN DURHAM).
7. NINE UNLIKELY TALES for CHILDREN. Told by E. NESBIT, Author of "The Treasure Seekers." Pictured by H. R. MILLAR.

BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.

THE BLUE BABY, and other Stories.
By Mrs. MOLESWORTH. Illustrated. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

TWO BUSYBODIES: a Chronicle of the Adventures of Hilary and John Chippendale Craven. By Mrs. S. G. ARNOLD. Cloth, 5s.

MARGARET HETHERTON. By E. L. KIESOW. With Frontispiece. Cloth, 5s.

AN IMPORTANT BOOK OF TRAVEL.

IN TIBET and CHINESE TURKESTAN.
By Captain DEASY. Fully Illustrated. Cheap Edition. Cloth, 6s.

London: T. FISHER UNWIN, Paternoster Square, E.C.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

No. 1032.—OCTOBER, 1901.—2s. 6d.

RECENT NAVAL PROGRESS. By "ACTIVE LIST."
THE WESTCOTES. By A. T. QUILLER-COUCH. Chaps. I.—III.
FINDING THE WAY TO THE POLE.
GAMES IN OLD AND MODERN FRANCE. By ANDREW LANG.
A CHINAMAN IN LONDON.
THE CONQUEST OF CHARLOTTE. Chaps. IX., X.
THE LITTLE SON. By MOIRA O'NEILL.
CHINA REVISITED. By ALEXANDER MICHIE.
Grand Fiasco—Ordeal of Terror and Temptation—Soldiers of all Nations—Ravages of Foreign Troops—Indian Contingent.
TELLING MRS. BAKER. By HENRY LAWSON.
MOSLEM CONFRATERNITIES OF N. AFRICA. By W. B. HARRIS.
MUSINGS WITHOUT METHOD:—America's Wise and Simple President—The Cant of "Political Crime"—How to Treat Anarchists—French and English.
THE TRUTH ABOUT THE LIBERAL PARTY.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, Edinburgh and London.

NOW READY.

Was Alfred King of England?

By A SAXON.

Demy 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

A brief review of one of our latest text-books, showing the true relations of Prince Alfred both to the Saxon people in England and to her Roman invaders.

HARRISON & SONS, Publishers, 59, Pall Mall, S.W.

EBENEZER PROUT'S THEORETICAL WORKS.

Bound, each 5s. net.

HARMONY: its Theory and Practice. Thirteenth Edition.
COUNTERPOINT: Strict and Free.
DOUBLE COUNTERPOINT and CANON.
FUGUE.
FUGAL ANALYSIS.
MUSICAL FORM.
APPLIED FORMS.
THE ORCHESTRA:
Vol. I.—"The Technique of the Instruments."
Vol. II.—"Orchestral Combination."

AUGENER & CO., 199, Regent Street, and 22, Newgate Street.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S LIST.

READY ON TUESDAY

RUDYARD KIPLING'S NEW BOOK:

KIM.

Illustrated by J. LOCKWOOD KIPLING.
Crown 8vo, 6s.

THREE POPULAR NOVELS.
Crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s. each.

ROSA N. CAREY.
HERB OF GRACE.

AGNES AND EGERTON CASTLE.
THE SECRET ORCHARD.
[Ready Oct. 1.

B. K. BENSON.
A FRIEND WITH THE COUNTERSIGN.

NEW BOOK BY CHARLES W. WOOD, F.R.C.S.
Author of "Letters from Majorca," &c.

GLORIES OF SPAIN.

With 85 Illustrations. 8vo, 10s. net.

NEW UNIFORM EDITION OF THACKERAY.

THE WORKS OF WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY.

Reprinted from the First Editions, with all the Original Illustrations, Facsimiles of Wrappers, &c. In crown 8vo, cloth extra, 3s. 6d. per Volume.

Vol. I. VANITY FAIR. With Illustrations by the Author. [Ready Oct. 1.

JAMES LANE ALLEN—HUGH THOMSON.

A KENTUCKY CARDINAL, AND AFTERMATH.

By JAMES LANE ALLEN.
With Illustrations by HUGH THOMSON.
Cloth elegant, gilt edges, crown 8vo, 6s.
The Cranford Series.

Also an EDITION DE LUXE, limited to 250 Copies, super royal 8vo, 30s. net.

THE BORDER EDITION OF

THE WAVERLEY NOVELS.

Edited, with Introductory Essays and Notes, by ANDREW LANG. With 250 New and Original Illustrations by Eminent Artists. Complete in 24 vols. Crown 8vo, green cloth, gilt, 3s. 6d. each. Also an Edition with the Original Etchings. In 24 Fortnightly Volumes (18 Now Ready). Crown 8vo, tastefully bound, 6s. each.

THE EVERSLEY SERIES,

Globe 8vo, 5s. per Volume,

Contains 152 Volumes, among which are—

THE WORKS OF WORDSWORTH.
12 Vols.

CHARLES LAMB'S LETTERS and WORKS.
7 Vols.

JOHN MORLEY'S COLLECTED WORKS.
11 Vols.

THE WORKS OF SHAKESPEARE.
10 Vols.

 A New Complete List sent post free on application.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., London.

Digitized by Google

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1534. Established 1869. 28 September, 1901. Price Threepence.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

THE Letters of John Richard Green, which will be published next month, have been edited and prepared for publication by Mr. Leslie Stephen. They form in reality a biography, since Mr. Stephen, while confining himself as far as possible to the employment of Green's own words, has furnished introductory narratives in explanation of Green's position during successive periods of his life. Information for this purpose has been supplied by Mrs. Green, who has supervised the whole work.

PAINTERS of "literary pictures" in search of a subject might consider the first meeting between Mr. George Meredith and Mr. Thomas Hardy. We are indebted to Mr. Edmund Gosse for the anecdote, who narrates it in a paper in the International Monthly called "The Historic Place of Mr. Meredith and Mr. Hardy":

> The first novel which Mr. Hardy wrote has never been published and will never see the light. The name of it was The Poor Man and the Lady, and it was full of the revolutionary and anti-social extravagances which are native to the unripeness of a youth of genius. It happened by a strange and interesting coincidence that the "reader" for the publisher to whom this MS. was submitted happened to be no less a person than Mr. Meredith. He saw the rough power in the book, and he recommended it for publication. But he also sent for the young man, and with great courtesy and friendliness urged him to consider whether it would not be wise to adopt, on his first introduction to the public, a gentler guise. The result was that Mr. Hardy asked leave to suppress The Poor Man and the Lady, and retired to write Desperate Remedies.

MR. KIPLING'S new story, Kim, which is as long, if not longer, than Captains Courageous, will be published next Thursday. It is skilfully illustrated by Mr. Lockwood Kipling. The father of Kim, the hero, was an Irish soldier, but Kim was brought up as a poor white among natives in Lahore. Loafing there as a street arab of wide experience, and already known as "Friend of all the world," he meets a lama from Tibet who is on a pilgrimage to the Buddhistic River of Healing, where he hopes to be able to escape from the Wheel of Life. Kim accompanies him as chela. The account of the life by the Great Trunk Road, from the plains to the highest hills, gives Mr. Kipling the finest opportunity he has yet found to show shifting phases of Indian life, man and woman, priest and soldier, Hindu and Mohammedan, native and European.

A NEW novel by Mr. G. W. Cable may be expected this autumn. The hero of the story is Ned Ferry, the chief of Confederate scouts, and the heroine is a Confederate newspaper correspondent who was of great service to the leaders by furnishing them with valuable information.

OF the French edition of Dmitri Merejkowski's The Death of the Gods, which we reviewed last week, twenty editions have been sold. In preparing the work, Merejkowski visited all the spots where the hero of his romance had lived and made history. He followed the footsteps of the Emperor Julian through Asia Minor and Greece, and throughout the whole of France and Germany. In preparing the second volume of the trilogy—namely, The Reawakening of the Gods, of which work Leonardo da Vinci is the hero—Merejkowski visited and stayed in all the towns in which Leonardo had lived, from the village of Vinci to Amboise. He has studied in the same thorough manner for the third and final volume, The Anti-Christ, the character and wanderings of Peter the Great.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: Please cordially thank the writer of the articles on style for this last, so timely and illuminant, on the "glittering," and ask him to tell us more. For instance, is there anything in literary style and stylists which at some period in the man or the language reaches its meridian, passes, declines into the dark? anything of self-will, vanity, incapableness, or inherent decay (decadent), as with the pear or the peach, which come slowly to their moment of perfection, and then—tend to rottenness? As, for example, not quite explicably, in prose with George Meredith, or Carlyle (compare his essay on Burns with "Shooting Niagara"), or Pater; and in poetry with Robert Browning. In architecture also: take the Gothic. Has not Amiens Cathedral reached the summit, slightly exceeding and toppling over from perfection? and is not Milan, with all its glory, partly a decay? our own Norman, too, passing into perpendicular, decorated, flamboyant, and then losing itself? Do the arts of sculpture and painting hint at the same advance from ripeness to decay? Where is the Greek grace of form, the middle Italian loveliness of grouping and tint? And the nations—do we find the like law there? Get someone to work out this aspect of the problem for us.

MR. PINERO'S new play, "Iris," at the Garrick Theatre, is a stern lesson to the writers of sentimental novels and gallery-truckling dramas. Few, very few, authors show Mr. Pinero's courage—the courage of forcing a character to be consistent to the end. The treatment of Iris in the last act by Maldonado and Trenwith, may harrow the pitying and sympathetic heart, but to the judicial observer of life, unmoved by sentimental considerations, their behaviour is natural. Mr. Pinero also shows another form of courage in this remarkable drama of modern life. He is content to hold his hand, at any rate in the first two acts, to allow the action to unfold itself quietly, even a little tediously, while preparing for the tragic crises of Acts III. and IV. The finale may almost be described by the much-abused word awful, but who can say that it is anything else but true to the facts of human nature? We need not despair of the stage while there are such brains and temperaments as Mr. Pinero's to work for it. The writing is never forced. Small witticisms, mild epigrams fall naturally, and it is not Mr. Pinero's fault that the audience should laugh loudly at "England, land of lean women and snug men," or "A financier is a pawnbroker with imagination." It is refreshing to hear across the footlights such a reflection as, "Sorrow and remorse have their egotism as ease and joy." "Iris" is a play to see, and to remember.

Digitized by Google

In the October Fortnightly Mr. Nowell Smith writes on "The Popularity of Criticism" in a shrewd and interesting way. He conceives literary criticism—books about books—to be really a superior form of gossip. Moreover: "Literary criticism has this further advantage over other gossips, that its personalities are current coin for so many. A literary causerie cannot, of course, have the intensity of the gossip of two housewives discussing the lady who lives between them; but then anyone, litteratis imbutus, can partake of it. So far are books from being 'absolutely dead things,' that they are better evidence of the existence of their authors than exists for that of almost any human beings outside of the scope of our immediate senses." That literary criticism does not lack the spice of malice which is deemed necessary to the success of more worldly gossip is shown in Mr. Smith's own remarks on that much-whipped horse, Prof. Saintsbury's style. He contends, as many have contended, that Prof. Saintsbury's always weighty opinions would have more acceptance if they were expressed in a less "atrocious" style—a style which he declares must be deliberately affected:

> He is constantly playing with more or less jocular allusions like the following (p. 410):—"Claudian . . . receives praise for his praise of Stilicho, and Dares (as we expect with resignation) for his 'veracity'; indeed, the clerestories toward that south-north are quite as lustrous as ebony." This is all very well occasionally, though the allusions are, it must be confessed, often too obscure for the ordinary reader; but constant repetition of the trick is none the more excusable because it is a well-known pitfall for the "man of letters." And Prof. Saintsbury's unflagging jocularity is most oppressive. "In fact, those to whom the woman who killed Abimelech with a stone or slate is the patron saint of criticism." . . . (p. 464): "But the carnal man cannot help sighing for a tractate—a tractatule even of the tiniest—on English verse, from the Venerable One" (p. 403): such ἀγωνίσματα, scarcely at home outside the sporting papers, may occasionally visit the sleepy lecture-room, but are only irritating when set down solemnly in the black and white of a substantial volume. And the Professor's diction, his structure of sentences, if not his mere formal syntax, are such that one wonders how a lover of literature could write as he does, or could expect lovers of literature to read him without constant disgust.

The question occurs to us, however, How long is it worth while to go on baiting a writer about his style? The style is the man, and when the man is well in years, neither the one nor the other is likely to undergo much change. Prof. Saintsbury's good qualities are many and most valuable; ought we not to rest contented with the all he can give?

Dr. Conan Doyle hopes to get out a new edition of his history of the Boer War very soon. In it he will include all operations up to the second year of the war. Since the first edition appeared Dr. Doyle has remained a close student of events, and has had many officers' letters and diaries from the front through his hands. Meanwhile he has been talking to a representative of the Daily Express on the future of the war. He contends that the thing to be done is to capture the Boer Government on the principle that a serpent should be attacked on its head, not chopped about at its tail-end. And his recipe is this:

> To capture them, one should choose 3,000 of the lightest and hardiest men in the Army, give them 6,000 of the best horses, one led horse for every man; no guns, no baggage, and a young leader, Plumer or De Lisle for choice. Let them loose with a free hand, and help them by stopping the drifts. Let them follow their chase across Africa if necessary, but let them ride it down at last.

We note, by the way, that Dr. Doyle shares our dislike of the use of sporting terms in despatches.

What should be done to put down pernicious literature? Some sensible remarks on this subject fell from the lips of Mr. Stephen Wigney, secretary of the Metropolitan Tabernacle Colportage Association, the other day, in a chat with an interviewer. Mr. Wigney does not believe in denunciation. His word is substitution. His colporteurs, numbering between fifty and sixty, manage to turn over more than £5,000 a year in selling books of distinctly moral and religious tendencies. Their aim is to offer good literature in the place of bad. The selection of such literature must be a difficult task. How compete with the penny dreadful? Mr. Wigney confessed, "It is very difficult indeed," and added:

> I sometimes spend hours skimming books and periodicals to decide if we can admit them to our list. Of course I have always the Committee, with Pastor Thomas Spurgeon as president, to refer to. Yes, it is delicate and difficult to know where to draw the line.
>
> In publications for boys I object to slang and vulgar language. The characters, while adventurous, should always be animated by a noble spirit. Such books need not be always preaching, but they should breathe a pure atmosphere. I know that a boy can and does enjoy such a book as John Halifax, Gentleman. We have sold numbers of that book very cheaply. We can now sell for threepence such books as Queechy, Uncle Tom's Cabin, and the Wide, Wide World. Speaking metaphorically, they will go on selling as long as the world lasts. A very nice book for the family is Ministering Children, which we can sell for threepence, in paper covers. I like the Tract Society's publications, also some of Cassell's, such as the Quiver.

A Daily News leader-writer wrote breezily on Elizabeth Barrett Browning last Tuesday. While hailing her as a great poet, the writer does not spare her extravagances. Thus:

> Such a couplet as—
>
> "Our Euripides, the human,
> With his dropping of warm tears," > gives to most of us a sickly and nauseous sensation. Nothing can be well conceived more ridiculous than Euripides going about dropping tears with a loud splash, and Mrs. Browning coming after him with a thermometer.
>

And again:

> The great curse of the Elizabethans is upon her, that she cannot leave anything alone, she cannot write a single line without a conceit:
>
> "And the eyes of the peacock fans > Winked at the alien glory,"
>
> she said of the Papal fans in the presence of the Italian tricolour.

The writer contends, however, that Mrs. Browning's failures are failures of power, not of weakness:

> This is the great and dominant characteristic of Mrs. Browning, that she was significant alike in failure and success. Just as every marriage in the world, good or bad, is a marriage, dramatic, irrevocable, and big with coming events, so every one of her wild weddings between alien ideas is an accomplished fact which produces a certain effect on the imagination, which has for good or evil become part and parcel of our mental vision for ever. She gives the reader the impression that she never declined a fancy, just as some gentlemen of the eighteenth century never declined a duel. When she fell it was always because she missed the foothold, never because she funked the leap.

She did not funk the leap, and occasionally came a cropper. Well, the argument is good if the language is free, and it is well that this aspect of the "glittering style" should be considered. Unfortunately the opportunities for considering it are few.

The Daily News has published an interesting article by Signor Ugo Ojetti, on Mr. Caine's The Eternal City. Signor Ojetti is an Italian writer, whose knowledge and point of view give his judgment more than ordinary weight. While granting to Mr. Caine's story "many qualities of emotion and conviction," he says that it is "logically an anachronism, because it places men like Pope Leo X. and David Rossi, who are at best men of some remote future, in the contemporaneous atmosphere of to-day." The writer points out that an Anarchist, and particularly a Christian Anarchist, is an impossibility in the Italian Parliament, and he proceeds to show how Mr. Caine has utterly failed to grasp either the social or political life of Rome:

Digitized by Google

> The Italian Government appears in The Eternal City more corrupt than that of Turkey; spies and delators—the masters of public affairs; Deputies reduced to such baseness that after the Speech from the Throne they rush to the public lottery; the postal service so foolishly administered that Donna Roma's letters to David Rossi end in the hands of the Pope; the Home Minister a brigand who introduces false letters into a public trial, decides the state of siege in the capital of the kingdom, and discusses it in the presence of his mistress with the highest officers of the State, treats the King as a schoolmaster would not treat a pupil of ten years of age, and then unceremoniously sends a note to the Vatican to the Pope; the police, so good that they do not sequestrate the Sunrise even when it contains the famous revolutionary Lord's Prayer, do not search the house where the Prime Minister is killed, so that a paper which would alone reveal the true assassin is found by the English Ambassador; and, lastly, our King, timid, a fool, in weak health, who goes secretly to recommend himself on his knees to the Pope to be saved from a supposed Anarchist attempt, creates a rascal Dictator, and on his death abdicates, sighing, "Who will govern now?"
>
> As regards the King, although the Socialists and Republicans may think it necessary to-day or in the future to depose him, no one of them doubts his iron character, his vast culture, his liberal views, the seriousness of his work, his will to do and not only to speak, his immaculate honesty, and the acuteness with which he judges men.
>
> This, I say, as an Italian and as a Roman.

To this Mr. Hall Caine replied at length, and with his usual spirit, in the Daily News of last Tuesday. The passage in his reply which fits the above remarks of Signor Ojetti is as follows:

> If it had been my purpose to impeach the Government of Italy, it is not offences of general application, but, more particular, corruptions, I should have spoken of. I should have spoken of the corruptions which led to the failures of your banks; of your trusts; of your subsidised mail ships which carry no mails; of your Mafia, of your Camorra; of your Press Laws; of your Parliamentary system which is broken up into countless groups and hundreds of office-seekers, each playing for his own hand, and making a staple government of your country difficult or impossible. I should have balanced this picture of the Rome of Monte Citorio by a picture of the Rome of the Vatican, with Roman priests neglecting their pastoral duties while their Holy Head holds gorgeous ceremonials and discourses on Temporal Power. I should have depicted the bad system of your police, which is vitiating the foundations of justice. I should have told a story like that of your Acciarito case, wherein the man condemned for life for an attempt to assassinate King Humbert was neither hanged, as he would be in some countries, nor shot, as he would be in others, but tortured in his cell at Santo Stefano by sham prisoners, warders, superintendents, and directors, who forged letters, created children, and employed all the machinery of bad drama to obtain the denunciation of innocent men. I should have . . .

Space forbids us to quote more of Mr. Caine's cumulative defence, a controversy of which the importance is so doubtful.

A WRITER in the Westminster Gazette has discovered humour in an unexpected place—the Official Guide to the Church Congress at Brighton. The editor of the Guide, wherever possible, has worked in quotations "to enliven leisure moments during dull speeches." These quotations are, he says, "largely from the works of the late Mr. William Shakespeare, of Stratford-on-Avon." Here are some extracts from the Guide:

> The vice-presidents of the Congress it describes as "Reverend Fathers and well-learned Bishops" ("Richard III."), the general committee as "Doing nothing, with a deal of skill" (Cowper), the executive committee as "A little group of wise heads" (Ruskin). Of the reception committee it says they "find you out a bed" ("Midsummer Night's Dream"), and refers to the executive officers in Pope's words: "Fire in each eye and papers in each hand," and to Mr. Chambers himself, as Editor: "Contented, that he lopped a branch" ("Henry VI.," Part III.). Even the time-tables are not sacred. "How poor are they that have not patience" ("Othello"), "Who hath brought the fatal engine in?" ("Titus Andronicus"), "Stir not until the signal" ("Julius Cæsar"), "She sat like Patience on a dress basket" ("Twelfth Night"), improved version, are quotations decorating the extracts from Bradshaw; and to a footnote, "Connexion at Havant uncertain," is added: "Patient, though sorely tried" (Longfellow). The cycling visitors are warned: "Better go on foot than ride and fall" (Middleton).

WE have noted some curious dedications. In his newly-published book of papers entitled Likewise the Younger Women (Grant Richards), the Venerable Archdeacon Sinclair inscribes these religious papers as follows:

TO THE
MOTHERS' UNION
CHURCH OF ENGLAND WOMEN'S HELP SOCIETY
GIRLS' FRIENDLY SOCIETY
METROPOLITAN ASSOCIATION FOR BEFRIENDING
YOUNG SERVANTS
YOUNG WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION
AND
LONDON DIOCESAN SOCIETY FOR YOUNG WOMEN
THESE PAGES ARE DEDICATED WITH ALL BEST WISHES FOR THEIR ADMIRABLE WORK

THE play on the subject of Francesca da Rimini, which Mr. Marion Crawford has written for Madame Sarah Bernhardt, was originally written in English. A rough French version, which the author read to Madame Bernhardt, was made by Mr. Crawford himself, but the actual version to be played will be made by Monsieur Marcel Schwob. This version is merely to be an accurate translation, and does not raise M. Schwob into the position of a collaborator. Mr. Crawford has gathered the material for his play from the true story of Francesca da Rimini, and he believes that he has discovered the actual room in which Francesca was murdered.

IT cannot be said that there is no market for occasional verse while such publications as the Smart Set are with us. The latest issue contains no less than twenty-eight poems or verselets, and we have taken the trouble to count them.

To the American Bookman Dr. Robertson Nicoll, who is always a close observer of journalistic tendencies, communicates his views on the future of the halfpenny newspaper in connection with the recent striking provincial developments of the Daily Mail and Daily Express. Referring to Mr. Harmsworth's untiring enterprise, he says:

> I have good reason to believe that Mr. Harmsworth's plans were on a larger scale than he has yet been able to carry out. It was proposed to purchase the Times, and to sell it at a penny. If the proposal had been carried through, no doubt a great company would have been formed for the purchase and publication of the Times and the Daily Mail, and such a combination would have been most formidable. With us, however, the halfpenny press at its present size must have limits. It is a small eight-page journal, and cannot give anything in very full detail. For example, it could not report the meetings of the Manchester Town Council or give the commercial news which Manchester men require. My own belief is that its development is only beginning, that instead of receiving as at present a small sheet for a halfpenny we shall receive as much as is now given in a penny paper, the additional cost being made up by additional advertisements. Certainly much money will be lost before all is ended, and perhaps some money may be won.

Digitized by Google

From the annual report of the Public Libraries Committee for the Borough of Finsbury we take the following table of books issued to readers :

Science and Art	11,510
Social Science and Theology	3,119
History, Travel, Biography	9,531
Language and Literature	1,842
Poetry and Drama	990
Prose Fiction and Juvenile	83,435
Miscellaneous	5,868

It will be seen that out of a total of 116,295 two-thirds were "fiction and juvenile." The lumping together of "fiction and juvenile" may, perhaps, be taken as an expression of the Committee's mild disapprobation.

The historical romance, which Mr. Howells, amongst many others, considered some time ago to have had its day, appears, in America at least, to be continuing its triumphant course. We hear of such books selling by their hundreds of thousands, and the production is not stayed. A writer in Harper's Weekly tells of an American publisher who has ten or a dozen authors under contract to produce historical novels, which are to appear periodically during the next two or three years. Whether, before their production, the public will have grown tired of the "swashbuckler in literary opera-bouffe" is an interesting matter for speculation. We think they will, though we hardly agree with the writer of the article that the religious novel is likely to get the next "boom."

Bibliographical.

That piquant actress, Miss Rosina Filippi, who has appeared so little on the stage since h r marriage, appears desirous of a literary as well as a histrionic reputation. In 1895 she issued a small volume of Dialogues and Scenes from the Novels of Jane Austen, "arranged and adapted for drawing-room performance." In the preface to this she boldly asserted that Jane Austen "is essentially dramatic, and her characters assume shape, form, and colour; her plots are human, her people are alive. Her dialogues and scenes are complete in themselves." Since then Miss Filippi has given us a dramatisation of "Pride and Prejudice" (which, however, has not yet been published); and now she is announced as about to publish a play of Japanese life and character called "The Mirror." Some may remember that she made a very pleasant appearance, some little time ago, in the "Japanese" play called "The Moonlight Blossom."

A bibliographical interest attaches to the preface which Mr. Watts-Dunton has written for the three-and-sixpenny edition of his Aylwin—the "Snowdon" edition, as it is to be called, in recognition not only of the prominence given in the story to the famous mountain, but of the special acceptance which the book has met with at the hands of Welsh readers. In this preface the author quotes from an idyll which is to appear in his New Poems—an idyll recording the further adventures of Sinfi Lovell, Aylwin, and Winifred. The writer has also something to say about the "close portraiture" in fiction of persons known in real life, on which subject an utterance by Sir W. Besant is cited.

It is becoming quite the fashion for our bards, however young they may be, to issue an edition of their "collected poems." The latest to succumb to the temptation is Mr. Arthur Symons, who surely can look forward to a good many years of poetic effort. Days and Nights (1889), Silhouettes (1892), London Nights (1895), Amoris Victima (1897), Images of Good and Evil (1900)—these, I believe, represent all Mr. Symons's volumes of original verse up to now. Is it not a little early to "collect"? Perhaps what Mr. Symons really intends to do is to sift, to select—which is a very different thing, when you come to think of it.

With reference to the History of Jests, for which, the other day, I expressed a desire, an esteemed correspondent reminds me of Abraham Hayward's essay on "The Pearls and Mock Pearls of History," which is, of course, well known to me—as is also another thing to which he refers: Mr. Paley's little collection of "Greek Wit." There is, to be sure, the French work, L'Esprit dans l'Histoire; but I was thinking rather of our own history and jests, and wishing that the latter could be traced to their actual sources, instead of being ascribed indiscriminately to all sorts of people.

We shall all be glad to welcome the edition of Leigh Hunt's Old Court Suburb, which Mr. Austin Dobson is to supervise. It could not be in better hands. Meanwhile, the whole book is so far alive that Messrs. Hurst & Blackett thought it worth while to issue it, a little more than three years ago, in a half-crown shape. It will be remembered that an edition of Leigh Hunt's The Town was brought out by Messrs. Gibbings in 1893 at 12s. 6d.

There should be room for the monograph on Richard Hurrell Froude which Miss Louise Imogen Guiney proposes to bestow upon us. J. A. Froude's elder brother, R. H. Froude, is one of the "inheritors of unfulfilled renown." His character and work have not yet been popularised. He lives for scholars and theologians in Newman's Apologia and Mozley's Reminiscences; he also lives, more or less, in the volumes of his Remains, published in 1837 and 1839. J. A. Froude discoursed of him in the Nineteenth Century for 1879, but it is to be feared that to the average man and woman he is nominis umbra. He will be best remembered in connection with the Lyra Apostolica and the Tracts for the Times; but what mark can a man hope to make (if he is not a genius) who dies at the age of thirty-three?

A volume of selections from the verse of Dora Greenwell was included in the "Canterbury Poets" series in 1889. One of our publishing firms now intends to do the lady honour by making a fresh choice from among her rhythmical productions. She has a distinct, and no doubt lasting, place among the feminine meditative poets of whom Christina Rossetti is easily first. There are six volumes of verse to select from—those of 1848, 1850, 1861, 1869, 1873, and 1876. Miss Greenwell lived to a fairly good age (sixty-one), and is, perhaps, as well esteemed for her prose as for her verse, though neither is likely to obtain a permanent position in our literature.

I read somewhere of a forthcoming edition of the poems of Tennyson, in which use will be made of the pictorial illustrations contributed by Rossetti, Maclise, Millais, and Holman Hunt to the volume of 1857. This should be a real boon for Tennysonians. I did once possess the volume of 1857, but it has been "conveyed" from me by someone. In place of it, all I have is a copy of an American edition of Tennyson, in which all (or most of) the said illustrations were reproduced, with the most painfully inartistic results. A careful reproduction of the 1857 drawings would be a valuable possession.

Mr. Grant Richards does well to promise, in the issue of his "World's Classics," a reprint of Hazlitt's Table Talk. The book is, I believe, on Messrs. G. Bell's list, but of that I am not quite sure. Anyway, Mr. Richards's reproduction will be thoroughly acceptable.

The Bookworm.

Digitized by Google

Reviews.

The Literature of Regret.

A Vanished Arcadia: Being Some Account of the Jesuits in Paraguay, 1607 to 1767. By R. B. Cunninghame Graham. (Heinemann. 9s.)

> And Huzzab shall be led away captive, she shall be brought up, and her maids shall lead her as with the voice of doves, tabering upon their breasts. . . . Take ye the spoil of silver, take the spoil of gold: for there is none end of the store and glory out of all the pleasant furniture. She is empty, and void, and waste: and the heart melteth, and the knees smite together, and much pain is in all loins, and the faces of them all gather blackness. Where is the dwelling of the lions, and the feeding-place of the young lions, where the lion, even the old lion, walked, and the lion's whelp, and none made them afraid?

Some such refrain as this pervades Mr. Graham's books, and we confess that we are greatly drawn to a writer who, in an age of Success, is consumed by these long and futile regrets. Consumed, did we say? But we are not sure of that. There is in Mr. Graham an interfused cynicism which throws doubt on the word. We do not gather his creed so as to define it. A democrat of democrats in his views of life, he is an aristocrat in thought and feeling. Moreover, he is a preacher whose incidental cleverness obscures the mission it recommends. There he and Mr. Bernard Shaw are in the same box.

Mr. Graham believes in the right of man to be happy, and he has travelled in Paraguay. Doubtless he believes in other things, and we know that he has travelled in other places, but this will serve. The right of man to be happy and undisturbed in a lowly and cheerful destiny is his favourite text; South America is the canvas on which he loves to embroider it. In his Thirteen Stories, published a year ago, we found Mr. Graham's heart going out to strange Brazilian, Uruguayan, and Paraguayan folk of thirty years ago—a people changed and changing; and to lost Gauchos, negroes, British wastrels, and the whole Spanish-Indian fringe of humanity in South America. He has wandered among this cheerful, unsuccessful humanity, and Europe cannot make him forget it. Hating plutocracies and disliking commerce in all its colossal forms, Mr. Graham loves the wandering, unachieving, easily satisfied peoples of the earth in whom gaiety, courtesy, and simplicity survive. So he has written this defence of the Jesuit rule in Paraguay between the years 1607 and 1767. He is probably under no delusions in the matter. He knows that the Jesuit régime could not by any possibility have continued much longer than it did. But he points out that it kept the Indian population going, and the clue to his book is found in these sentences:—"It has been nobly said that the extinction of the smallest animal is a far greater loss than if the works of all the Greeks had perished. How much the greater loss that of a type of man such as the Indians, whom the semi-communistic Jesuit government successfully preserved, sheltering them from the death-dealing breath of our cold northern life and its full, fell effects!" In this illogical-chivalrous strain the book is written. It is a brief for the Jesuits, not a history. It may be a true brief, but the tone is that of the advocate with a lump in his throat and a bitter jest on his lips. We really cannot take the book more seriously than Mr. Graham does himself, and he remarks: "Historicus nascitur, non fit. I am painfully aware that neither my calling nor election in this matter are the least sure. . . . I never took a note on any subject under heaven, nor kept a diary, by means of which, my youth departed and the countries I once knew so well transmogrified, I could, sitting beside the fire, read and enjoy the sadness of revisiting in my mind's eye scenes that I now remember indistinctly as in a dream." Thus it is that bad histories and good books are written. We do not call this a bad history, but chiefly it is a good and flavoursome book—"a hotch-potch, salmagundi, olla podrida or sea-pie of sweet and bitter, with perhaps the bitter ruling most, as is the way when we unpack our reminiscences—yes, gentle and indulgent reader, that's the humour of it."

Mr. Graham had sight of his "vanished Arcadia" in 1870 after the war between Paraguay and Brazil, and much of the charm of the book lies in his descriptions of such relics of the Jesuit times as came under his view. The relics of a human society, be it a family or a tribe or a nation, have in them a profound pathos. For the individual we rightly care little unless he was our friend; but even a stranger cannot stand unmoved before a deserted mansion, or mingle without tears with the last weedy remnants of a fine race doomed beyond hope. Everywhere in Paraguay Mr. Graham seems to have asked himself, "Where is the dwelling-place of the lions and the feeding-place of the young lions?" Where walked the long procession of Indians going to their field labour at sunrise? They were led by the Jesuits bearing some saint aloft, and as the procession advanced to the sound of sacred music the Indians dropped off one by one to their work in the fields until at last the priest and the musicians and the acolyte returned alone to the village. But now—

> On every side the powerful vegetation had covered up the fields. On ruined church and chapel, and on broken tower, the lianas climbed as if on trees, creeping up the belfries, and throwing great masses of scarlet and purple flowers out of the apertures where once were hung the bells. In the thick jungles a few half-wild cattle were still to be found. The vast estancias, where once the Jesuit branded two and three thousand calves a year, and from whence thousands of mules went forth to Chile and Bolivia, were all neglected. Horses were scarce and poor, crops few and indifferent, and the plantations made by the Jesuits of the tree (Ilex Paraguayensis) from which is made the yerba maté were all destroyed.

And this is the note of the book. It is suffused in regret for the vanished Arcadia, such as it was, in which the hard-working Jesuit priests sought to make the Indians good Christians and happy workers. It is certain that for nearly two centuries they maintained a form of government which, even if doomed to be swept away, did during that time enable generations of poor Indians to maintain their numbers in face of the white invasion, and live happily the while. The estancias and workshops were communistically managed, and payment for work and produce was made in food and cloth from the common stock. The arts of Europe were taught and practised, and the Indians, who, left to themselves, would have wandered from plain to plain, settled in the little townships (each ruled by two Jesuits), and made boats, tanned skins into leather, built carts, and printed books. Feast days and processions lent some pageantry to this quiet life, in which neither ambition nor despair had place. Mr. Graham is quite conscious of the instability which besets all such cheerfully stagnant systems. To such objections he has always some charming ineffectual reply. "One thing I am sure of—that the innocent delight of the poor Indian, Alfirez Real, mounted upon his horse, dressed in his motley, barefooted, and overshadowed by his gold-laced hat, was as entire as if he had eaten of all the fruits of all the trees of knowledge of his time." Or he philosophises like this:

> In the eternal warfare between those who think that progress—which, to them, means tramways and electric light—is preferable to a quiet life of futile happiness of mind there is scant truce, so that readers have to take their choice whether to side with Funes or Azara in judging of the Jesuits' rule in Paraguay. There is no middle course between the old and new; no halting-place; no chink in which imagination can drive in its nail to stop the wheels of time; therefore, no doubt, the Jesuit commonwealth was doomed to disappear. But, for myself, I am glad that, five-and-twenty years ago, I saw the Indians who still lingered about the ruined mission towns, > mumbling their maimed rites when the Angelus at eventide awoke the echoes of the encroaching woods, whilst screeching crowds of parrots and macaws hovered around the date-palms which in the plaza reared their slender heads, silent memorials of the departed Jesuits' rule.

Digitized by Google

Such regrets may be in vain, but when they are finely expressed and have some root in the writer's own memories they are good reading. They may also be illogical, but who will say that in this age of ruthless advance they are not medicinal?

Regret is not the only note of this book. Its ironic humour gives salt to its melancholy. Mr. Graham has great sport with the arch enemy of the Jesuits, Don Bernardino de Cardenas, Bishop of Paraguay. That worthy's crusade against the Jesuits is set forth in passages like this:

> Preaching one day in the Cathedral, after the consecration, he turned towards the people, and, showing the holy wafer, said: "Do you believe, my brethren, that Jesus Christ is here?" All, being true believers, answered as one man that such was their belief. In the same way as at a scientific lecture, when the lecturer holds up some substance, and says, "You all know well that calcium tungstate or barium hydrocyanide has this or the other property," the hearers nod assent like sheep, being afraid to contradict so glib a statement from so eminent a man.
>
> Then said Cardenas: "Believe as firmly that I have an order from the King to expel the Jesuits." The people all believed, and Cardenas forgot to tell them that by the expulsion of the Jesuits twenty thousand Indians would pass into his power, whom he could then distribute among his friends as slaves, as he proposed to divide the Indians of the missions among the Paraguayan notables to win them to his side.

Within some eight and twenty years of the expulsion of the Jesuits from Paraguay the Indians whom they had preserved (if only in political amber) were a nation scattered and peeled. They withered, says Mr. Graham bitterly, before "that competition which has made the whole world gray, reducing everything and everyone to the most base and common denominator," adding yet more bitterly:

> The world, it would appear, is a vast class-room, and its Creator but a professor of political economy, apparently, unable to carry out his theories with effect. Therefore to us, the Western Europeans, he has turned for help, and upon us devolved the task of extirpating all those peoples upon whom he tried his 'prentice hand. On us he laid injunctions to increase at home, and to the happier portions of the world to carry death under the guise of life to those into whose lands we spread.

All of which is fair as far as it goes. Thus we all think at times. But are we not as helpless, we who ride the whirlwind, as those who perish beneath it?

The Epistles of St. Paul Secundus.

Passages from the Letters of Auguste Comte. Selected and Translated by John K. Ingram. (A. & C. Black. 3s. 6d.)

Egoism probably never made a more gigantic effort towards subjective immortality than in the case of the eccentric genius whose full name was Isidore Auguste Marie François Xavier Comte. He was a man who repaired by rebuilding. As we read the names of the new months he imposed upon the year—Moses, Homer, Aristotle, . . . (this month is Shakespeare, by the way)—we find ourselves unconsciously murmuring Moses Comte, Homer Comte, Aristotle Comte, although Comte, the Founder of the Universal Religion and the First High Priest of Humanity, is merely claimed by his eminent disciple, J. H. Bridges, as the successor of Aristotle and St. Paul.

The selection from letters to a dozen of his disciples now before us gives one a fundamental idea of the system which Lewes and Mill in Comte's opinion misrepresented and Harriet Martineau ably summarised. Uppermost in the mind of the reader on closing the volume is Comte's mediæval regard for a submissive reverence. "No association can really exist without inequality," he remarks to Dr. Georges Audiffrent, whose Comte MSS. were placed at Dr. Ingram's disposal. The association he has in mind is Positivistic, though Positivists, he informs Henry Dix Hutton, > destined—as they are—to direct the world of our time, some by counsel, others by command, cannot fulfil their mission aright without a constant feeling of their mental and moral superiority to "the individuals and classes which now oscillate empirically between retrogradation and anarchy."

It is the capacity for faith which is withdrawn by a habit of democratic irreverence. Therefore Protestantism, which crippled the priesthood and encouraged even inferior intellects to demand proofs of the statements of persons whose intellectual pre-eminence entitled them to the time-saving compliment of faith—Protestantism was obnoxious to him. In Roman Catholics he saw promising proselytes. He seems, indeed, to be borrowing from a Jesuitic defence of the saints as objects of supplication in the following passage:

> Theologism, especially in its monotheistic form, has . . . developed the taste for absolute perfection which disposes to a disdain of the real affections as unworthy of such a contrast. But in the Positive state it is sufficient that the adored being, without being considered perfect, should be really superior to us, even though this superiority should be only partial, especially if it concerns the heart, as in the ordinary case of feminine types, who are the principal objects of personal worship.

In this passage we have a rationale for the homage which distributes itself in a pantheon; and its excellent commonsense contains the germ of Positivistic mysticism—the adoration of Space, Earth, and Humanity. The mysticism is the climax of Positivism, and, as in all philosophies, its exposure, its catastrophe. It would be strange if it were not, for the life of Comte is not that of a well-balanced being. It is not a well-balanced boy who composes a letter categorically forbidding a professor from entering his school. It is not a well-balanced man who marries a registered fille de joie, and who at least twice attempts suicide. A man of amazing information, a prodigy, Comte certainly was; but we are of opinion that it was his versatility and his suspicious and industrious egoism which made him a philosopher. Vindictive one might also suppose that egoism to be; for it might well wish to avenge his self-threatenings and that trying period of self-sinking when he collaborated with Claude Henri, Comte de Saint Simon, the voluminously incoherent father of French Socialism.

The megalomania which is distinctive of rational thought, and consequently of philosophy, is most striking when Clotilde de Vaux enters his life. In 1844 he informed Miss Austin (Ranke's translator) that she was the only lady of intellectual ability "in whom I have had the happiness of seeing moral delicacy united with mental elevation." The compliment was just in time; a year later he met the incomparable Clotilde. Derelict wife of a "lifer," the tragedy of her marriage must have powerfully suggested his own. Gruber, Comte's German biographer, is sceptical of the uncarnality of his attachment for her; but an interesting passage in a letter to Henry Edger, the leading American Positivist (March 27, 1856)—a passage omitted by Dr. Ingram—has convinced us to the contrary. In that passage Comte seems to indicate that he had wholly surmounted his sensual nature at or soon after the age of thirty. Now, he first met Clotilde de Vaux in 1845, when he was forty-seven. We therefore accept his famous friendship as idealistic, and willingly admire such a tribute as the following in a letter to Dr. Audiffrent (May 23, 1857):

> I have been of late perfectly assured [on the final judgment of Posterity regarding Clotilde de Vaux] by recognising that her moral glorification is irrevocably > bound up with the intellectual conviction of the immense superiority of my Politique over my Philosophie. In order better to measure this decisive superiority, I have read during the last few days the best part of the Philosophie Positive—namely, the last three chapters. . . . Besides their moral dryness, which made me read immediately a canto of Ariosto to restore my tone, I profoundly felt their mental inferiority in relation to the true philosophic point of view at which the heart has completely established me.

Digitized by Google

Unfortunately Clotilde de Vaux was not merely for Comte an influence; she was the "mother of his second life" and the "positivist virgin." These are expressions which indicate that, though he might eliminate Christ from a world remoulded to Positivism, he had a notion that he would not look ill himself in that seamless robe for which Roman soldiers cast lots. He confides to Henry Edger (April 3, 1857) the following "secret hope," omitted by Dr. Ingram. After remarking that Holy Week recalls him every year to the principal catastrophe of his private life, he adds:

> C'est encore au Dimanche des Rameaux qui doit après-demain survenir le fatal anniversaire où commence l'éternité subjective désormais assurée à l'angelique inspiratrice de la religion positive. Mes intimes tableaux de la douloureuse semaine ainsi terminée, quand je les aurai suffisamment publiés dans la biographie promise pour 1864, seront peut-être destinés à doter nos successeurs d'une commémoration annuelle mieux meritée que celle dont nos prédécesseurs honorent la Passion chimérique du prétendu fondateur du Catholicisme.

That is a passage whose itch for imitation almost justifies the lines of Mortimer Collins, which record that positivism came in when tails went out.

And yet it was a great man who died in the rue Monsieur-le-Prince at Paris forty-four years ago. Though one is sorry that he knew his own greatness so much more accurately than his weakness, there is undoubtedly something Messianic in his voice, even the voice that calls war a transitory accident, and advises us to evacuate Gibraltar. It was no uebermensch that, under the benediction of nine new sacraments, sped the altruist on the way to incorporate himself in the Grand Etre. But, and we say it with Carlylean intention and intensity, it was a man.

Galopaud's Goose.

War Notes: The Diary of Colonel de Villebois-Mareuil, from November 24, 1899, to March 7, 1900. With a Preface by E. M. de Vogüé. (A. & C. Black. 5s.)

THE traditional soldier whose heart is on the battlefield as the traditional sailor's is on the sea is still a son of France. The nomenclature of war remains French. Yet France produces soldiers whose ambitions she cannot satisfy—soldiers who cannot bear her defeats and find little scope in her enterprises. Such a man was the brave Colonel de Villebois-Mareuil, who fought against us in the present Boer War, and, refusing to surrender, was shot on April 5 of last year while conducting a reconnaissance of Lord Methuen's position at Boshof.

This record, consisting of his diary in South Africa and an introduction by M. Vogüé, of the Académie Française, is less important than interesting. It is French in every line, and an Englishman experiences that curious mixture of admiration and astonishment which French sentiment and French actions so often inspire.

It is particularly interesting to have M. Vogüé's word that Villebois-Mareuil was a disappointed French soldier. The disasters of the French arms in 1870, and not less the gradual conversion of "that mystic family, the army," into a "good citizen guard," embittered the young officer who had taken up the sword with the reverence of a priest taking orders. He resigned, and tried literature and politics. But his hand still felt for his sword, and "when the African Vendée [note the phrase] presented to all who were free and devoted the attraction of a noble cause to be served, he felt it quiver." The unemployed soldier of France, the Othello-like lover of glorious war, went forth to fight with and for the Boer. "He took the cross," says M. Vogüé—"that is the phrase we must ever use in speaking of men of this lineage"—and of such he adds:

> They still answer, after so many centuries, to the call of ancestors who went to the Holy Sepulchre. Their modern crusades have changed in name and in object; they go to emancipate America with La Fayette, to liberate Greece with Fabvier, to defend the Boers with Villebois-Mareuil. . . . Alas! the same disillusionment everywhere awaits them. It is apparent on every page of the Colonel's diary.

The hero weeping is of all figures dear to the French imagination. But, then, their way of putting things! Villebois-Mareuil was a brave man, that is certain, and we think that Lord Methuen's special recognition of his chivalry might have been noted at the end of this volume. Looked at in another way, Villebois-Mareuil's enterprise was ridiculous. Of all men he, the polished French soldier—an academician of war, so to speak—was least likely to be helpful to the Boers. And he was not helpful. He advised and implored in vain. He was beside himself with grief at the slow workings of the Boer mind and its enslavement to fatal habits. He could not bring home to the Boers certain principles of war; in vain he entreated them to do that little more and to be that little braver which might again and again have wrought havoc on our side.

With true literary instinct M. Vogüé fastens on the manner in which Villebois-Mareuil spent his Christmas on the veldt as typical of his illusion. He whose dearest memories were of the struggle with Germany, he whose dearest wish had been for the revenge which his country had deferred or forgotten, he who had accepted the Boer cause as a last hope of proving himself the perfect soldier, spent Christmas night drinking champagne with German officers. We turn to the diary and read: "The German officers invited us yesterday evening to drink champagne, Braun saying that, at the anniversary of the Christian era, Christian officers could not but unite confraternally. The conversation was very cordial, and I returned the invitation by asking them to dine with us this evening on Galopaud's goose." There follows a humorous digression on the death of Galopaud's unpaid-for goose, and then—the feast, and the skeleton at the feast. For while he disengaged the merry-thought it was borne in on Villebois-Mareuil that the irony of life had brought him and his companions into a curious position. "Between the Boers and ourselves there is the irreconcilable barrier of another religious cult, and between the comrades of the same military cult—drawn together through their isolation as foreigners—is the bitter recollection of a mutilated fatherland." Could the isolation, the homelessness, of the old-world traditional soldier, pure and simple, in the world of to-day be more vividly exemplified? The bones of Villebois-Mareuil's career were that night picked even cleaner than those of Galopaud's goose. But he was a brave man.

The Latest Follower.

Boshtan Ballads: Flotsam from the Isis, and Other Verses. By Lionel F. Begbie. (Oxford: Alden; London: Simpkin, Marshall. 2s. 6d. net.)

MR. BEGBIE is the latest follower in the track of Praed, Calverley, Seaman, "J. K. S.," and the line of light poets who have sprung from the Universities. But we cannot say that he bears undimmed the torch which has been passed on to him. The fun is boisterous and obvious, not to say puerile in many cases: there is little of the classic culture, neatness, and dexterity in style—nothing of the refined and arrowy humour—for which we have learned to look in verse of this kind. Perhaps "Thoughts on Moderations" is as favourable a specimen as we can find. It is quieter and less exaggerated, with something, at least, of the note we have come to think traditional in verse from Oxford and Cambridge:

Digitized by Google

Spring! and the doomed of Spring's exams,
Lamblike, find solace in their Dams;
Remorseless Moderators now
Seek Deltas whereupon to plough,
As swains beside the Nile;
Now waggish S—dgw—ck winks his eye,
Inscribing on my paper "Φ"!
Or flings me down a Gulf to die
Like ancient gaol-birds vile.

Now ghosts return of squandered hours
When as I lolled in jasmine-bowers,
And careless or of book or desk,
Perusing something Zolaesque
Would charm the panting days on;
Reproachful recollections throng
Of social pleasures in the Long,
Of hazel eyes which it was wrong
For reading men to gaze on.

O ye two chairs of wattled rush
Ensconced behind the laurel-bush
At Mrs. Prim's al fresco dance
In June, remember ye perchance
How close ye came together!
Ye scissors that I treasure still,
Ye wrought a very venial ill
In poaching hairs upon that hill
'Mid purple-tufted heather.

Alas! alas! Is this the mind
Of one who leaves all joys behind?
Is this the mood in which to tease
The Bacchæ of Euripides?
The Œdipus Tyrannus?
Proud-prancing Æschylean words?
Terse Tacitus? The Frogs? The Birds?
V.L.'s by shoals? N.B.'s by herds,
Invented to unman us?

O Barber, bare this burning brow!
Round it, my towel, nestle thou!
Shed thine effulgence, midnight oil!
Thou coffee-kettle, haste to boil!
(Be ye inscribed, my cuffs!)
Ye Moderators all, beware,
Dread what the desperate can dare!
Then, d——d be he who first cries "Spare,"
Come on, ye fell Macduffs!

Even here we have the intrusion of blatantly mechanical humour in the last line; and it riots through the semi-political skits which open the volume.

Edward FitzGerald.

Notes for a Bibliography. By Col. W. F. Prideaux. (F. Hollings. 6s. net.)

In the spring of last year Col. Prideaux contributed to the columns of Notes and Queries certain "Notes for a Bibliography of Edward FitzGerald." These, with some additions, were issued later in the year, in pamphlet form, for private circulation, only fifty copies being printed. They now reappear, recast and augmented, in the form of a little bound volume of eighty-eight pages, published by Mr. Frank Hollings, of Great Turnstile, Holborn. The booklet is one which all true devotees of FitzGerald will hasten to acquire. Even the possessors of the privately printed "Notes" will not be able to resist the fascination of the present issue. And, first of all, because of the said augmentations. "Notes" of this sort are among the things that grow. New things come to light; the bibliographer has further opportunities, and hastens to avail himself of them. This is what Col. Prideaux has done. The notes on the Rubaiyat editions of 1859 and 1872 have been expanded with much advantage to the reader. Of the latter edition Col. Prideaux says: "In the history of what is sometimes called the 'Omarian Cult' it is of importance, because it was not till after its issue that it first dawned upon the reading and thinking classes of the time that a new star had arisen in the literary firmament." Other additions have been made in the way of useful and interesting foot-notes. The recasting of the text is a further boon. The "Notes" are now arranged under the headings of "Separate Works," "Posthumous Works," and "Contributions to Books and Periodicals." This is a distinct help. As in last year's pamphlet, the bibliographer ignores the American editions of FitzGerald's works, and contents himself with bare references to only the chief biographical memoranda and critical comments which have grown up round the name and fame of FitzGerald. A bibliographer has a right to limit his own field of inquiry; but it is to be hoped and expected that, in the respects named, Col. Prideaux's successors will repair his deliberate omissions. Already the biography and criticism of FitzGerald has assumed fairly large proportions. One may or may not regret this; but facts are facts, and the bibliographer must do his duty—he cannot shirk it, even when it is most unpleasant. By way of a bonne bouche, Col. Prideaux reprints, as an appendix, and by permission of Mr. Aldis Wright, the little known notes on Crabbe's "Suffolk" which FitzGerald contributed to the East Anglian and Notes and Queries, and which have not till now been reprinted in this country. These, obviously, are very welcome, as an agreeable supplement to the Miscellanies (Macmillan). Lastly, there is the pictorial frontispiece—a reproduction, in photogravure, of the sketch of FitzGerald by Charles Keene owned by Mr. Bain, of the Haymarket, and reproduced with his consent. This presents only a back view of its subject, but it helps, nevertheless, to bring the man before us—within limits—in very graphic fashion. The typography of the present volume is all that could be desired. The paper is good, and the binding is neat, not gaudy. Author and publisher may both be congratulated.

Other New Books.

Alfred the Great: England's Darling. By Alfred Austin, Poet Laureate.

It speaks better for the patriotism than for the literary taste of England that this dramatic narrative (as its author explains it to be) should have reached a fifth edition, and be thought worth a cheaper reissue. For, regarded as a narrative in dialogue, as Mr. Austin tells us we should regard it, and dismissing all discussion concerning the legitimacy of such a form (which may be thought settled by Mr. Kipling's prose work, The Story of the Gadsbys), it is a very languid performance. From the poetic standpoint there is a preponderance of semi-prosaic or altogether prosaic language and conventional imagery. Once Mr. Austin indulges in such carelessness as "the sinewy curve of each fresh keel." Can a keel be sinewy (i.e., muscular)? Or did the Laureate mean "sinuous"? When he would be bold, he talks of Saxon kings "with Woden's thunder moaning in their veins." An unhappier instance of daring which "falls on the other side" it would be hard to quote. A man may have lightning in his veins, for lightning is a fluid, swift and fiery like eager blood. But thunder is mere sound, and a man whose blood should sound like thunder would signal his approach a mile off. There is no correspondence in nature to excuse the singularly misguided and ludicrous image. Yet Mr. Austin is a craftsman and a man of talent. There are one or two happy lyrics, and many passages which capture a certain impressive poetic eloquence, deserving admiration. Occasionally there are lines of true poetry, in a minor and not very noteworthy degree. As a whole, it is clever rather than inspired work, which certainly does not deserve the hasty contempt that some have poured on it. But the limpness of the poem as an organism forbids us to call it a success. (Macmillan. 2s. 6d. net.)

Digitized by Google

THE POEMS OF SCHILLER.
TRANSLATED INTO ENGLISH BY E. P. ARNOLD-FOSTER.

It was a bold task indeed to translate the whole of Schiller's non-dramatic poems. We admire the zeal which dictated such an effort; but it is impossible to say that Mr. E. P. Arnold-Foster has given us more than the "tolerably faithful rendering" which is all he lays claim to. Of Schiller's poetry there is no suggestion in these dry bones. Compare, as an example, Mr. Arnold-Foster's version of the Dithyramb with Coleridge's. The later version is more faithful, but it is shudderingly prosaic beside the spirited lines of Coleridge. The first lines are enough:

> Take my word for it
> That the gods never
> Wander alone.

How conversational is this, when you see how Coleridge has put it:

> Never, believe me,
> Appear the Immortals,
> Never alone.

Lack of elemental poetic taste has, we fear, made this laudable and painstaking effort fruitless. The hexameters are especially terrible—as is the way of English hexameters. (Heinemann.)

PICTURES OF WAR. BY JOHN STUART.

In reprinting his letters from South Africa to the Morning Post Mr. John Stuart says: "I knew that the ground of impressionist description would be covered by the late Mr. George Steevens, to my mind the greatest of all war correspondents. He could see as much as a whole General Staff put together, and had a marvellous power of remembering incidents in the order of their occurrence. . . . I determined, therefore, to adopt a conversational style, only departing from that style when the gravity of the subject made such a departure desirable. And I tried to write as if I were talking in a London club to a soldier, a South African resident in London, who would appreciate certain local information, and to a man who would be attracted by interesting personalities and interesting anecdotes." The result is an interesting and always lively narrative. The book is belated, of course, as books and belatedness go nowadays, but its merits are the same. We cull one passage which speaks for itself:

> We cantered along till we came to a steepish hill, and during its ascent the Queenslander tried to quote poetry. It is a national habit among Queenslanders. They know Lindsay Gordon by heart; they indulgently admit that Whyte Melville is nearly as good as he; they have planked their reputation on "The Man from Snowy River," and every district has a few dare-devils who, in the intervals between hard riding, hard drinking, and hard flirtations, compose really respectable jingles of rhyme, which first they show to the girl of the moment. Then they read them, after the billy and the damper, to a rather more critical circle of men, who are prepared to back their criticisms with their fists. Finally they send them to the local newspapers, and if they be at all good Australia rings with the verses for a week or a month.
>
> One night during the after dinner yarning I owned to a surprised Queenslander that I had never read "The Man from Snowy River." For one brief, painful moment he hovered on the verge of apoplexy. But in less time than the telling takes he had pulled himself together, and in fifteen seconds he was reciting the verses at an easy hand gallop. And I know a dozen Queenslanders who could do the same.

(Constable. 6s.)

GLORIES OF SPAIN. BY CHARLES W. WOOD.

Mr. Wood is a traveller of the "indefatigable" order, and we believe this is not his first book on Spain. His In the Valley of the Rhine is fresh in our recollection. He is a gossipping and picturesque writer of travels, and you know one of his books at sight by their multitudinous tables of contents and their rather florid illustrations. To this volume there is no preface. You plunge at once into an infinity of detail, anecdote, "things seen," descriptions, criticisms. We like the old-fashioned miscellany of chapter-contents. As thus: "Chapter I. On Calais quay—At the Customs-house—A lady of the past—Ungallant examiner—Better to reign than serve—Paris . . . Chapter V. A Gerona senora—Grace and charm—Lord of creation—Morning greeting—Arcades and ancient houses—Conscription—Streets of steps . . . Chapter VI. Beauties of age—Apostle's doorway—How the old bishops kept out of temptation . . . Chapter XIII. Barcelona—H. C.'s anxiety—Mutual salutes . . ." And so on. About such a book there is either very much or very little to be said. Space permits us to say only a little. Mr. Wood knows his subject, and everything interests him. Consequently he interests. But his is the pedestrian vivacity of other days. We dip at random—all dipping here is at random. The Ruins of Poblet:

> "Then you don't believe the legend?"
>
> "Not I, señor. I believe much more in the jovial times the old abbots indulged in. At least we have a capacious refectory and inexhaustible wine vaults to prove what fine banquets they had in the Middle Ages. We have come down to poor times, in my opinion. The world in general seems very much what this monastery is—a patched-up ruin."
>
> "If the world were only half as beautiful," said H. C., "we should spend our years in a dream."
>
> "It would not be my sort of dream, señor," returned the old guardian drily. "I have been here for twenty years, and confess I would give all the ruins in the world for a good and gay back street in Madrid or Barcelona. To you, señor, who probably come from the great cities of the world and mix with gay crowds—well, I daresay you think this paradise. To me it is a dreary wilderness."

Mr. Wood sees the world much as William Howitt did, and he has Howitt's incapacity for growing weary of sight-seeing. But he has not Howitt's aroma of style, nor the flavour of Howitt's Quakerly reservations and complaisances. A very good gift-book, all the same. (Macmillan. 10s. net.)

THE UMBRIAN TOWNS.
BY J. W. AND A. M. CRUIKSHANK.

This volume of the "Historical Guides" series, initiated by the late Mr. Grant Allen, is quite excellent in its way. You must not look to it for what Mrs. Meynell has called "the spirit of place"—the elements differentiating one town from another, and making it a living, recognisable individuality, an organism distinct as any man or woman of our acquaintance. It is an historical guide, and approaches the Umbrian towns as archæological "finds," palimpsests of history. But from this standpoint it is well and even lovingly done. The little résumé of Umbrian history which begins the book is written with no less intelligence than if it were destined for a manual of history; and makes the point (in effect) that the establishment of Italian republics during the feudal decline was the reversion of the Latins to the old Latin municipal idea, held down by the superimposed feudalism of barbarian conquerors, against which it was constantly struggling. A type of the whole book is the treatment of the Church of S. Francesco in Assisi. The course of Umbrian art is carefully sketched, and the frescoes are treated according to the sequence of that historical development, not in their mere order of occurrence. Each fresco is labelled (so to speak), and the more important described and elucidated, with all necessary collateral information. It is a book interesting in the library no less than the tourist's pocket. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d net.)

Digitized by Google

THE CATHEDRAL CHURCH OF RIPON. BY CECIL HALLETT.

"A short history of the church and a description of its fabric" is the sub-title of this book. For its style—well, take this casual passage:

> The great window in the central compartment is one of the finest examples of geometrical tracery, if not one of the largest windows, in England. It is over fifty feet high, is twenty-five feet wide, and has seven lights. Of these the three at either end are compri·ed under a sub-arch, in the head of which are three cheque-foiled circles, while the central light of the seven is surmounted by an arch, not so high as its neighbours, but impaling upon its acute point a huge circle which fills the head of the window, and contains six trefoils radiating from the centre. The arch of this superb window is rather acutely pointed and richly moulded, and has two very slender shafts worked on the stones of either jamb, with foliage on their capitals. Just above the ground below this window there may be observed in the wall one of the many architectural puzzles in which the cathedral abounds, a half-arch, rising towards the right and filled with masonry, except at the right side, where is a narrow opening that runs in for a few feet. A string course continued from the sides of the aisles passes below the three windows and round the buttresses, which are further relieved at a little height above it by a set-off.

This is "one of the many architectural puzzles in which" the book abounds. It may be superlatively accurate, but to the general reader an elementary treatise on liquid air (for example) would, comparatively, be fascinating. For the scientific expositor does explain his terms as he proceeds. In other words, Mr. Hallett is too severely technical and dryasdust for all but architectural students. Yet the book has the outward guise of a popular account; and Ruskin has shown how architecture can be made attractive. Mr. Hallett has given a careful and valuable synopsis of the cathedral and its history; but was it necessary to revel in technicalities as he undoubtedly does? We hope not, if architecture is ever to become a matter of general interest in England. (Bell. 1s. 6d. net.)

THE "ARROW" WAR WITH CHINA. By CHARLES S. LEAVENWORTH

Those who know China are absolutely certain that the present lull is only temporary, and that hostilities will break out again in a few months, exactly as they did last year. In their dealings with European nations the Chinese seem to forget everything and learn nothing. The history of each recurring dispute with China is simply a repetition of those which have gone before; the details differ, but the main facts remain exactly the same. This is very clearly shown in the book before us, The "Arrow" War with China, a useful little volume which tells the history of the wars and negotiations with China from 1856 to 1860. The real cause of the conflict was the "City Question," or the right of entry into Canton, and of direct official intercourse with the authorities there, but the ostensible reason for hostilities was the insult to the British flag which the Chinese perpetrated by boarding the lorcha Arrow, hauling down the Union Jack, and arresting the native crew.

The question of the ratification of the Treaties at Peking was the next cause of dispute, and the war went north. The capture of the Taku forts, the imprisonment of Mr. Parkes and Mr. Loch, and the capture of Peking followed, and need only be referred to, but a delightful specimen of bland Chinese impudence will be worth quoting. Mr. Bruce, the British Minister, had gone north to make peace and demand indemnities after the war, and the Chinese had so little sense of the real facts of the case that they sent him the following message in answer to what was really an ultimatum:

> The [English] despatch written on this occasion is, in much of its language, too insubordinate and extravagant for the Council to discuss its propositions more than superficially. For the future the British Minister must not be so wanting in decorum. The above remarks will have to be communicated by the Commissioner to the British Minister, whom it will behove not to adhere so obstinately to his own opinion, as so doing he will give cause to much trouble hereafter.

The reply was the taking of Peking. Truly nothing changes in China, and this little book is but another witness-stone on the ever-increasing pile of evidence. (Sampson Low. 3s. 6d. net.)

Prescott's great work, The Conquest of Mexico, has now been before the public for nearly sixty years. Its inclusion, in a three-volume edition, in the Bohn Libraries, is welcome, the more so because it is here accompanied by an introduction written specially for this edition by Mr. George Parker Winship, who, in a few competent pages, points out the weaknesses in a work of vast success and surpassing interest. Written with laborious care and art, and following the successful Ferdinand and Isabella, the Conquest was a great success, and, as Mr. Winship says, it has remained the standard authority for one of the most fascinating episodes in American history. Prescott was not a "scientific" historian, of course; and, beyond this, he lacked personal knowledge of Spanish and Mexican character. Hence, although his documentary facts are nearly always right, his interpretations are sometimes less satisfactory. "He probably never saw an American Indian," says Mr. Winship, but concludes his strictures with the remark: "Read as fiction, but as fiction very true to the facts, no one need ever regret the hours spent with Prescott's romance of Cortes, the conqueror of Mexico."

A great deal has been written here and there, and from time to time, about the childhood of Queen Victoria, but in The Childhood of Queen Victoria, by Mrs. Gerald Gurney (Nisbet, 6s.), we have a whole book, carefully compiled and well illustrated, devoted to the upbringing of the Princess Victoria from her birth to her twelfth year. Mrs. Gurney has been industrious; she has "waded through" many volumes, "each of which yielded perhaps but one tiny anecdote or remark." She has been assisted, too, by some of the late Queen's tutors and guardians. The result is a full and readable record. We should have preferred more illuminating page-headings than the names of places and palaces, as "Kensington, 1828 and 1829"; but this is a trifle. The description of Queen Victoria in the preface as "perhaps the greatest sovereign the world has ever known" has in it that amiable lack of the sense of proportion which seems to be inseparable from royal biographies.

Messrs. Macmillan send us a new edition of Mr. James Lane Allen's story, A Kentucky Cardinal (6s.), illustrated by Mr. Hugh Thomson. Do many remember the pretty personal dedication of this book: "This is to her from one who in childhood used to stand at the windows of her room and watch for the Cardinal among the snow-buried briars"? Mr. Thomson's drawings are quite bewitching.

A second edition of The Evolution of Sex ("Contemporary Science Series," 6s.), by Professor Patrick Geddes and J. Arthur Thomson, is issued by Mr. Walter Scott.

Digitized by Google

Fiction.

The History of Richard Calmady: a Romance. By Lucas Malet. (Methuen. 6s.)

When you see Richard Calmady sitting at table he is an Apollo. His splendid head, his strong, clear-cut face, which has all that gallant beauty which comes only to the children of true lovers, his broad shoulders and noble carriage, all mark him clearly as a man among men. But see him stand upon the ground, the hideous deformity in his stature allowing his long arms almost to touch the floor, see the grotesque shuffle which is his laborious substitute for a walk, see him even sitting—when once the concealing table is removed and those legs ending at the knee are disclosed in all their ghastly rigidity—and the Apollo is at once forgotten, and he becomes merely one of those repulsive freaks of a country fair with whom he himself could not fail to recognise his relationship. And the very clear distinction of these two impressions, scarcely ever confused, which are produced by his physical personality, is characteristic of his effect as a literary character The reader never sees him all at once. The table may be there to conceal his legs, and one's admiration may be concentrated on the Apollo; or the deformity may obtrude itself on the view, and one can think of nothing else. Richard is either one or the other, never a combination of the two. And the consequence is that he does not end in being a very real person.

The artistic justification of Richard and his deformity is, in fact, not himself, but his influence upon others, and especially upon the opposite sex. He is himself more or less of a dummy, an ingeniously but rather morbidly contrived prism by which all the many colours in that very subtly blended spectrum, a woman's sexual personality, may be ascertained, decomposed, and separately set forth. Many women are successively put under the lens and subjected to the experiment. There is Clara, the housemaid, who nursed the young dwarf in his youth, and wept when he resolved that he was old enough to have a valet. There is Mrs. Chifney, the trainer's wife at the stables, who also wept—simple soul—because she thought he had a face with the resignation of an angel. There is little Lady Constance Quayle. She, too, wept when Richard released her from the engagement of marriage into which she had been forced by her relations. But the three important patients, the three characters which give the book its claim to be called real and vivid and alive, are Katherine Calmady, Helen de Vallorbes, and Honoria St. Quentin. In these three persons the author shows with very great skill the effect of the deformity on the perfect mother, the perfect sensualist, and the perfect virgin.

It is difficult to say which of the three studies is the most admirable. In all the author shows a subtlety, a frankness, and a tact which are insufficient to conquer one's distaste for the morbid instrument which has been chosen as the key to these women's hearts. Moreover, all the three are drawn with an instinctive sympathy which is quite lacking in the portrait of the man, and which shows, even if we did not know that "Lucas Malet" is the pseudonym of Charles Kingsley's daughter, that the book is written by a woman.

Perhaps of them all, Katherine Calmady, Richard's mother, is the finest. Pure with that purity of one who has once sounded love to its depths and, that love once lost, prefers rather to remain ever afterwards chaste in the memory of the past than accept any second best in the opportunity of the present, she walks through the book almost with a majesty, at any rate with that calm dignity of motion which in Richard's eyes distinguished her so clearly from other women in a crowded room.

The second of the three women, Helen de Vallorbes, Richard's evil genius, if she is certainly not a pleasant character, is scarcely less real, except in a few moments of crude melodrama, than Katherine Calmady. With the artistic temperament's capacities and limitations in emotion, but with no more sentiment or morality in her view of life than to take the most enjoyment out of it, she ends in only developing that side of human character which leads to passionate sensualism. She is cruel—she was the child who laughed at Richard's infirmity—calculating in her pleasures, and with all the subsequent repulsion for the objects of her desires, which is the curse of ignoble passion. To her the grotesquely-deformed Richard becomes a subtle attraction. She begins by inspiring him with love, and ends by degrading that love to lust. The character is melodramatic at times, as when she is dressed in a "flowing, yet clinging silken garment of turquoise, shot with blue purple and shimmering glaucous green." And the chief incident in her amorous relations with Richard is described with quite unnecessary elaboration.

Beyond these three characters of the book nothing else and nobody else matters. Richard does not matter; he is a dummy or a shadow. It is, perhaps, just as well, for if one began to consider this short-legged hero seriously he would very soon become ridiculous. Cyrano de Bergerac had to do a good deal of laughing at himself to maintain his heroic position in relation to his audience, but even he was only grotesque as a lover; he was not grotesque as a man and a warrior. The minor characters do not matter; they are not drawn with originality or comedy, and they tend to become wearisome. The melodramatic absurdity of some of the scenes does not matter, although that of the clergyman, Julius March, discovering the old family legend in the library while the dwarf in the Velasquez picture opposite seems to grin at him through the growing darkness is absolutely Corellian in its obvious luridness. The whole idea of this explanation of Richard's deformity by legend is unworthy of Lucas Malet; it should be left to the Bow Bells Novelette. The unreality of some of the dialogue does not matter, although it frequently includes curiously unconversational words, like "casement" and "greensward," and a speech by the old doctor, on page 404, reads exactly like a schoolboy's essay, and quite unlike anything that any human being could have said in talking. Nothing matters, in fact, except that Lucas Malet has drawn three very real portraits of three very different, but all interesting, women. And, if we regret the rather grotesque figure which is made to assist in the development of these three characters, we can forgive the author for the truth and humanity of the chief characters.

The Wooing of Grey Eyes. By Riccardo Stephens. (Murray. 6s.)

There is a certain kind of melodramatic story which Mr. Stephens writes extremely well—such a story, for instance, as Mr. Peters, which was so good that one wonders why it did not have a more marked success. Now, The Wooing of Grey Eyes is melodramatic enough in all conscience, but it lacks the qualities which distinguished the earlier work; the characterisation is cruder, the situations more forced, the construction, one is inclined to say, amateurish. That the lady called Grey Eyes should have been wandering about Hawksheugh, and there have met Jim Dalrymple, is, perhaps, likely enough, but that her villainous husband, who is also Jim's cousin, and supposed to be dead, should be wrecked outside Hawksheugh and be rescued by Jim is a coincidence quite unworthy of Mr. Stephens's ingenuity. Further, the writing of the story is unequal: at first it is too slangy, later it is overdone with what approaches fine writing. The rest of the volume is made up of seven short stories, all good, and one or two excellent in their kind. That, for instance, called "The Little General," which deals with some experiences of a Roman Catholic priest in an Edinburgh slum, has both humour and effective pathos. Mr. Stephens evidently knows these people, and about them he writes with a sureness of touch which carries conviction.

Digitized by Google

From the Land of the Shamrock. By Jane Barlow. (Methuen. 6s.)

THE charm of all primitive, homely things grows as the complexities of life increase, and stories dealing with the lives of village people, when not unbearably tragic, have a strong and half-tender fascination. Among this simpler society, the demands on the whole are so touchingly little, the humour is so shrewd, the pathos so profound and genuine. Life is set in such close proximity to nature and to natural things, that the fatigue of civilisation falls like a burden off one's shoulders as one reads. From the Land of the Shamrock is a collection of Miss Barlow's peasant sketches, all fragrant of a deep poetic feeling, and at the same time full of delicious and childlike humour, the humour of the Irish people. The entire book exhales the atmosphere of delightful people—the people who are brave and content upon very little; the people who, for all their dirt and illiterateness, have so much to teach the cultured.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

NEW CANTERBURY TALES. BY MAURICE HEWLETT.

A Prologue and six "New Canterbury Tales," dedicated to Mr. Frederic Harrison "with sincere respect." Five have appeared in English and American magazines, the sixth, Dan Costard, "kept his story to himself." This is Mr. Hewlett's manner of introducing them: "Here, then, you have the tellers of these new Canterbury Tales: the Lady Prioress of Ambresbury; Master Corbet the Scrivener of London; Dan Costard the Prioress' Confessor; Smith the Shipman of Hull; Captain Brazenhead formerly of Milan; and Percival Perceforest, who was born in Gloucester. The first day brought them to New Alresford, the second to Waverley Abbey, the third to Reigate on the side of the hill; the fourth to the Abbey of Boxley in Kent; and the fifth to Christchurch, Canterbury. Now, then, Pergite, Pierides." (Constable. 6s.)

DESPAIR'S LAST JOURNEY. BY D. CHRISTIE MURRAY.

The story of Paul Armstrong's life—told by himself—in a desolate spot in the Rocky Mountains, where he, his ill-ordered career behind him, has just arrived to live the life of a Solitary. "You have made a hideous muddle of things," he said to himself, "a hideous muddle. Nothing to fear, for everything has happened." He asks the station-keeper if he has any whisky. The answer is "Yes." Upon which the Solitary remarks: "It's not unlikely that I may offer you ten dollars for a drink—twenty—thirty—an hundred. . . . If you allow yourself to be persuaded to give me so much as one teaspoonful, no matter when or why, I'll shoot you next day." Then follows the account of his life—four hundred pages of strong writing. (Chatto. 6s.)

THE SECRET ORCHARD. BY AGNES AND EGERTON CASTLE.

The scene is laid in France. The book opens at the Chateau de Fitzroy, "this golden month of September, this golden hour of the afternoon." The company is aristocratic, and the style and manner of telling the story is of the easy, luminous character that we associate with the authors of The Bath Comedy. The pages are peppered with dukes, marquises, ladies' sweetmeat names, and other ornamentations. (Macmillan. 6s.)

THE FOLLIES OF CAPTAIN DALY. BY F. NORREYS CONNELL.

"Zooks, that's a rakehelly cornet on the bay." The speaker was a former Duke of York, the period one autumn day when "he and an allied Anglo-German army were being hustled across a Dutch river by seventy thousand breechless Frenchmen." But the hero is the gallant Captain Daly of the Horse Grenadiers. His exciting adventures are here set forth. (Richards. 6s.)

THE DIVA. BY ANNIE THOMAS.

A quick, brightly written story of modern life, one of the chief characters being Captain M'Kay, who "had displayed courage, endurance, the keen powers of observation of a scout, and all the other fine, manly qualities a soldier should possess under Kitchener of Khartoum." The opening chapter finds the scout in "Lady Betty Pottinger's cosy little home in Green-street." On page 44 the Transvaal President delivers his "insolent and extortionate ultimatum." But that is by the way. Comedy is the note of the story. (John Long. 6s.)

THE JUST AND THE UNJUST. BY RICHARD BAGOT.

A long, leisurely, serious story by the author of Casting of Nets. Hugh Lester, a younger son, through a series of deaths, succeeds to an earldom and forty thousand a year. The Earl married, but there was another lady with whom he had "maintained for some years past a liaison which showed no signs of wearing itself out." Mr. Bagot is an industrious writer. His readers need leisure. (Lane. 6s.)

THE LITTLE SAINT OF GOD. BY LADY FAIRLIE CUNNINGHAME.

"There is material," says the author in the preface, "for half-a-dozen histories, and for a score of romances, in the adventures of the great leader of the Chouans, and of the Chouans themselves." This, then, is the story of the career of the Marquis de la Rouërie, the Chouan leader. The author claims for The Little Saint of God (she was the Chouan leader's beloved) that it is true, not in general outline only, but in almost every detail. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

MASTER OF MEN. BY E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM.

A pleasant story, with dramatic situations. It opens with a picture of Enoch Strone, foreman of Dobell's engineering works, bicycling home to a cottage he has built on a hill, where he can enjoy his books and nature in solitude. The Vicar calls upon him. Strone is rude, announcing that he is not a Christian, and that he doesn't believe a word of the Bible. But the Vicar is a bookman. He has a first edition of the Sundering Flood—and—and Strone offers him a cup of tea. The Vicar was "amazed at the extent and depth of the other's reading." (Methuen. 6s.)

DEATH, THE SHOWMAN. BY JOHN FRASER.

A strange medley of characters troop on the stage in the first chapter, including Mukhtir Bey, a Duchess, a Prince-Bishop, Schändli, Dolores, and Billa, an Indian ape. They are assembled in Mrs. Jack Cade's villa on the slopes of the Pusterthaal, for the purpose of giving "a drawing-room adaptation of Ober-Ammergau's solemn drama." Sir John Clanes, of the 2nd Life Guards, kindly undertook the part of the Beloved Apostle. (Unwin. 6s.)

A FRIEND WITH THE COUNTERSIGN. BY B. K. BENSON.

A bustling story of the American Civil War, told in the first person, and accompanied by thrilling pictures and maps. One of them illustrates this incident: "Suddenly I began to take off my clothes—there in the tree. I must reverse my uniform, and must be a changed man before another Confederate should come my way." (Macmillan. 6s.)

Digitized by Google

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage, One Halfpenny, Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscription, prepaid (including postage) 17/6
" Quarterly 5/0
" Price for one issue /5

A Dreamer of Things Impossible.

IT is a singular and not very creditable fact that (as we have recently experienced) the tales of Edgar Allan Poe should be difficult to procure in their entirety—apart from complete editions of his works. It is the more regrettable and singular because these creations of genius touch on two sides two of the most popular modern schools of British fiction. Perhaps, indeed, this is the explanation of it: that the derivative has ousted the original. On the one side they have relation to the "detective" fiction of Dr. Conan Doyle, on the other they are in contact with the fantastic fiction of Mr. Wells. And between these two extremes is enthroned the very Poe—single, singular, with no predecessor and no authentic successor—unless it be the Stevenson of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. That central and—artistically—supreme class of his tales is difficult to describe, for, indeed, to describe it is to describe Poe himself. It has been the tendency of the modern romantic school, and of modern poets in general, to make themselves the heroes of their own work. Chateaubriand, Byron, Shelley, are instances that come at once to one's mind, and Byron had strong influence on the early Poe. But not Byron, not even the author of Epipsychidion and Alastor, hardly the author of Atala, had such a peculiar gift for arabesquing their own lives, for transcendentalising themselves, their happenings, and environment. In nearly all these tales of idealistic terror or beauty, of which the House of Usher is an example, the hero is Poe himself; while they constantly revolve round situations suggested by his own history. To consider Poe is to consider these tales, to consider the tales is to consider Poe.

It is significant that his family was alleged to be descended from the Irish family of Le Poer—one of the English Pale, it is true, but thoroughly Irished by long residence and intermixture. The spirit of his work is Celtic, if the form of his poetry be not, indeed, of direct Celtic origin. It is at least possible that he should have seen some of Mangan's poems, and that unfortunate Irish poet anticipates Poe's peculiar form so strikingly that it is difficult to believe the resemblance can be accident alone. Yet, hardly less singular than such a coincidence would be, is the coincidence between the lives of the two men—identical in drudgery, misery, poverty, bondage to stimulants, and not far from identical in their deaths. It is the visionary and ethereal spirit of Celtic romance which informs the central group of tales no less than the poems. The Celtic temperament would go far to explain Poe's weakness and strength; his brilliant caprice, his pride and passion, his literary quarrels, his lack of robust moral stamina, his ready enslavement to alcohol. The Celtic visionariness, with its lack of hold on earth, is further accentuated in him by the love of strange ways in reading which he shared with Shelley. The trait is constantly appearing—implicit or explicit—in his heroes. The hero of the scarcely-sane Ligeia relates:

> With how vast a triumph, with how vivid a delight, with how much of all that is ethereal in hope did I feel—as she bent over me in studies but little sought, but less known—that delicious vista by slow degrees expanding before me, down whose long, gorgeous, and all untrodden path I might at length pass onward to the goal of a wisdom too divinely precious not to be forbidden?

His quotations testify to the same thing. Glanville, Raymond Lully, Platonists like Henry King; by his citation of them he indicates the shadowy and mysterious authors whom he found congenial to his mind. But not to penetrate them, so far as we can see, with the zeal of the thinker. He loved, as he says himself, "those who feel rather than those who think." They give him dreams, suggest the stuff of tales or poetry; they are, indeed, to him, in no disparaging sense, "such stuff as dreams are made of." When a mind thus exalted, and of such natural development in one supermundane direction, applies itself to fiction, the result must needs be strange, almost monstrous. The pearl is an abnormality, the result of external irritation which provokes the precious excretion. These tales are no less precious and abnormal. One feels the reading of them as it were an unlawful pleasure, wrung from pain, disease, calamity, and the fruitage of delirium. The cost is too great, and the pleasure itself scarcely human. We said of Ligeia that it was hardly sane; we might have said thus of all the group to which we refer. Poe was conscious of this, and absolutely suggested—before Lombroso—a relation between madness and genius. For the hero of Eleonora surely speaks in the name of Poe:

> Men [he says] have called me mad, but the question is not yet settled whether madness is or is not the loftiest intelligence, whether much that is glorious, whether all that is profound, does not spring from disease of thought, from moods of mind exalted at the expense of the general intellect. They who dream by day are cognisant of many things which escape those who dream only by night. In their grey visions they obtain glimpses of eternity, and thrill, in waking, to find that they have been upon the verge of the great secret. In snatches they learn something of the wisdom which is of good and more of the mere knowledge which is of evil. They penetrate, however rudderless or compassless, into the vast ocean of the "light ineffable."

This perilous doctrine is at least not far from descriptive of Poe's own genius. There was something uncanny about the man which forbade intimacy, almost approach. Of the hero (there is virtually but one) who paces through these tales in Poe's image you feel that no woman could live with him without going mad—or dying. And death, accordingly, is Poe's gift to all his women. The tales are vital with a wrongful vitality. They are told by heroes whose sensitive nerves have the preternatural acuteness of initial insanity; colour, sound, scent—every detail of description in their rendering becomes morbidly distinct to us, like the ticking of a clock in the dark. In the House of Usher this feature becomes conscious of itself; the hero hears the beating of a woman's heart while she stands without the closed door. Beauty and terror are alike portentous, "larger than human," like figures in a mist. The landscapes are preter-human, painted as with fire, and blinded with a light such as only streams from the fountains of the dreaming brain. The heroes live by choice in chambers out of nightmare, where curtains like molten silver fall in cataracts on carpets of burning gold, lighted by coloured flames which writhe from antique lamps, and perfumed from carven censers; on golden tapestries phantasmal figures waver in the rushing of a continuous wind. Amid such surroundings women of unearthly beauty, or the shadow of Poe's own child-wife, pass and die, and dying, give rise to tragedies of impermissible terror; the Red Death incarnates itself among the fated revellers; or a man flies through life pursued by the visible presence of himself. Beauty which cannot separate itself from terror, terror haunted by beauty, are the powers which rule this world of an opium-dream.

It is the deliberate turning away of a man from the normal; it is the obsession by the desire for better bread than is made from wheat. When Poe theorises on landscape-garden ng, he avows his preference for the artificial style; but must have a "spiritualised" artificiality, an artifice which suggests the more than mortal. Yet this world at which the human heart aches becomes real while we read—there is the genius. The art is admirable in its sureness and delicacy. The imagination has seized these things of beauty and terror with more than the closeness of a poet—with the closeness of a dream; and there is no closeness, either to terror or beauty, so appalling as that of a dream. The scope is strange and narrow, but the mastership is absolute.

Digitized by Google

Yet the same man who can thus handle ideal horror and loveliness with the touch and arts of a poet is also, on another side, and within the limits of romance, one of the most convincing of realists. The man who wrote The Fall of the House of Usher and The Masque of the Red Death wrote also The Narrative of Arthur Gordon Pym and The Descent into the Maelström. For the dreamer was also a keen analyst and an amateur of science; and had his active days in youth. Mr. Wells himself has not combined romance and realism more startlingly than that feat is achieved in Arthur Gordon Pym. The seizure of the ship, and, above all, the whole episode of the storm and subsequent starvation, are done with amazing wealth and verisimilitude of imaginative detail. In reading the description of the escape from the Maelström, in the other tale we have mentioned, it is hard to realise that Poe, in all probability, never was in the neighbourhood of the Scandinavian seas. The little vivid touches seem the result of experience. For instance:

> The boat made a sharp half-turn to larboard and shot off in its new direction like a thunderbolt. At the same moment the roaring noise of the water was completely drowned in a kind of shrill shriek—such a sound as you might imagine given out by the waste-pipes of many thousand steam-vessels letting off their steam all together.

Or again:

> The rays of the moon seemed to search the very bottom of the profound gulf; but still I could make out nothing distinctly on account of a thick mist in which everything there was enveloped, and over which there hung a magnificent rainbow, like that narrow and tottering bridge which Mussulmen say is the only pathway between time and eternity. This mist or spray was no doubt occasioned by the clashing of the great waters of the funnel as they all met together at the bottom; but the yell that went up to the heavens from out of that mist I dare not attempt to describe.

The hackneyed comparison is doubly intrusive in the mouth of a Scandinavian fisherman; but otherwise the passage has an admirable air of eye-witness. The effect of the story, however, is not in single passages, in any cataract of "description," such as an inferior artist would have attempted, but is gradually built up from the accumulation of small matter-of-fact details. It is the very opposite pole of style and art from that in the first-mentioned group of tales; yet both are handled with equal power and effect. Perhaps in this group of tales the MS. Found in a Bottle most directly anticipates the wonder-tales of Jules Verne and Mr. Wells. The material is not, like theirs, scientific; but the method strikes the note which all have since followed, according to their ability.

Finally, this wonderfully original artist has struck out and set the method for yet another class of tale—the "detective story" now represented by Dr. Conan Doyle. For, with Mr. Blatchford, we refuse to concede that the deductive method is undeveloped in Poe's tales of this class.

Certain applications of the deductive method Dr. Doyle has developed from his medical experience which are not to be found in Edgar Poe. But the deductive method itself is used by Poe with consummate skill. Dr. Doyle may also pride himself that in many cases he has trusted his mystery entirely to the ingenuity of the problem; whereas Poe holds back the essential clues the better to effect his surprise. But the merit of the tales lies deeper than their display of analysis. It is the finished art of construction and narrative, bringing out the ghastly element or the thrill of excitement with exact crescendo of effect; the beauty of the exposition; and, over all, the style of a master, which can endow with immortality a thing in its essence so ephemeral as this species has shown itself in other hands. Let it be, if you will, that the great Dupin was the bungling pretender which the great Holmes, we know, once declared him to be. Yet Poe makes us believe in his greatness—and that is the thing which matters in art. Perhaps the truth is that Dr. Doyle, too, is an artist, and knows the artistic value of "bounce" in the right place. From the artistic standpoint, however, these latter tales—The Murder in the Rue Morgue and their kind—though they were the first to make Poe's fame as a tale-writer, will be the last to keep it. It is on the two former classes that his fame must chiefly rest—and rest securely.

Things Seen.

The Optimist.

Her cottage was to let, and she personally conducted me over it. Inside there were several beautiful pieces of furniture, and a quantity of mellowed ivories and bronzes; but the dirt and disorder were unpardonable. In the second sitting-room there were three small round tables, and place for little else. She explained that it was arranged in that fashion because one did not invariably feel like having meals on the same spot; and, moreover, that to take food with other people was a most disagreeble practice. Eating, at the best of times, was a gross performance, and to have conversation worth the name with a person thus occupied was an insult to thought. She pointed out the figured Japanese blue silk covering the walls of both rooms, and drew attention to the richness of its colour. The silk was grey with age, and here and there frayed into slits, showing a hideous paper behind.

In appearance she was herself a woman about forty-five, but lined with a literal net-work of nervous lines. She wore a short loose black cashmere jacket, buttoned down the front, but with two or three buttons missing, so that a Jaeger under-garment gazed out from the gap. She wore no corsets, and held a large pair of garden scissors in her hands from beginning to end of the interview. Her fingers were long and white, and on both sparkled a number of antique rings. The face was cold, intolerant, but predominatingly refined. As a girl she might have been very good-looking.

